The Petitioner contends, however, that mates or pilots are first and foremost professional employees without supervisory authority;[10] that their professional status may not be changed simply by the imposition of a supervisory title; and that on leaving the pilot house they merely relinquish their professional status for the moment to assume the routine tasks of gang pushers or straw bosses.[11] Moreover, the Petitioner contends that mates as such may not lawfully be employed on the Great Lakes; that their duties in the capacity of mates are of doubtful validity and ought not to be used to deprive them of their rights as employees. In view of the present record, we find it unnecessary to pass on the Petitioner's contention as to the validity of such employment. However, we note that the record itself tends to disprove the Petitioner's contention in this respect.[12]

As regards Petitioner's contention that the personnel involved herein do not have supervisory authority, such contention is supported neither by the record nor the authorities cited by the Petitioner. The record shows that these employees have the same responsibilities and perform the same duties as do the employees in similar classifications in other cases heretofore considered by the Board.[13] Moreover, the parties hereto have stipulated for the purposes of the record that the duties and responsibilities of the employees involved herein are generally similar to the duties and responsibilities of the employees classified as mates who were considered in the record of proceedings formerly before the Board in the case of Wyandotte Transportation Company.[14] In the latter case, cited by the Employers in support of their position, it appears, as in the instant proceeding, that the mates concerned were designated as pilots on the certificates of inspection issued by the Government inspection service. In that case we decided that the mates there employed were executive employees and constituted a part of management. We recognized that the position of those mates was the same as that of the licensed deck officers involved in prior decisions of the Board. Accordingly, we determined that, notwithstanding their supervisory authority and managerial responsibilities, such employees were entitled to the benefits of the act. However, as a result of subsequent changes in the law brought about by the passage of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, we ultimately concluded that the duties and responsibilities of the mates in question fell clearly within the purview of the definition of supervisor as set forth in section 2 (11) of the amended act excluding supervisors from the definition of employees entitled to the benefits of collective bargaining. Accordingly we agreed to a discontinuance of all enforcement proceedings with reference thereto.[15] There is nothing in the present record which alters our opinion in this respect.

Upon the basis of the present record, and the stipulation of the parties, we find that the unit herein proposed in each of the aforesaid cases is inappropriate

[9] One of the Petitioner's witnesses, who is a licensed pilot and has served on Great Lakes vessels for many years, testified that his own recommendations as to promotion, transferring, hiring, demotion, rewarding, and assigning ship's personnel have been followed in the majority of cases by 10 out of 11 masters with whom he had served.

[10] In view of our finding hereinafter we deem it unnecessary to pass on the issue raised by the Petitioner as to whether or not pilots are professional employees.

[11] The Petitioner in furtherance of this contention points to the fact that mates, when not on duty in the pilot house but working with the deck crew, do a substantial amount of manual labor. The mere fact, however, that a supervisor spends a large part of his time in the performance of manual labor does not necessarily affect his status as a supervisor. (See Matter of The Murray Company, 77 N. L. R. B. 481; Matter of Steelweld Equipment Company, Inc., 76 N. L. R. B. 831.)

[12] Petitioner's own witness, Captain Pollock, testified that the practice was well known to the inspection service and that it did not regard the employment of mates as illegal. Moreover, administrative recognition of the practice and, by implication, approval thereof seems to be contained in section 10.05–13 of "Rules and Regulations for Licensing and Certificating of Merchant Marine Personnel," United States Coast Guard, introduced in evidence by Petitioner as exhibit 15. The section provides that a minimum requirement, among others, for an applicant to qualify for a master's license on Great Lakes steam and motor vessels is "1 year's service as first-class pilot while acting in the capicity of first mate on Great Lakes steam or motor vessels * * *." NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT OF 1949

FRIDAY, MARCH 18, 1949

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10 a. m., Hon. Cleveland M. Bailey, presiding.

Mr. BAILEY. The subcommittee will be in order.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. JACOBS. Before we open the formal hearings, I would like, if there is no objection, to enter into the record a clipping from the Washington Post of this morning, in regard to the closed shop and the hiring hall, disclosing that both parties had agreed that the hiring hall was beneficial, but that General Counsel Denham had refused to drop charges on the west coast.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Chair hears no objection, the article will be accepted for inclusion in the record.

Mr. JACOBS. I might say, Mr. Chairman, it is not offered as evidencing any opinion on my part that the law, as written, should be violated, but rather to show the law is not in keeping with the desires of many employers and employees.

(The article referred to is as follows:)

DENHAM WON'T DROP PROTEST ON T-H CHARGE

[By the Associated Press]

Robert N. Denham, general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, yesterday refused to drop a complaint that union hiring halls for west coast waterfront workers violated the Taft-Hartley Act.

Both Harry Bridges' longshoremen and the West Coast Waterfront Employers Association had asked Denham to drop the charges.

The union and employers joined in urging at a long conference with Denham yesterday afternoon that the complaint—originally filed by the waterfront association—be dismissed.

The current contract, providing for the preferential hiring of union members through the hiring hall, was written at the conclusion of last September's strike. The strike broke out September 2 as the 80-day Taft-Hartley injunction obtained by President Truman expired.

Denham said he would proceed with his plan to ask NLRB Trial Examiner Irving Rogosin at a hearing in San Francisco April 5 to reopen the record in the complaint case so he could insert the new contract as further evidence of Bridges' violation.

The Taft-Hartley Act outlaws the closed shop. Denham told a reporter after the conference that the contract contains all the closed-shop provisions which the act prohibits.

"We are glad that people agree, but when they agree to do something illegal it kind of puts the enforcing officer on a spot," Denham said.

"As far as we are concerned there is nothing for us to do but to pursue the complaint. So long as the law remains unchanged and I am the enforcement officer, that has got to be my position.

"When and if Congress wants to change that law, that will be different," he added.

Mr. BAILEY. At this time the committee will be pleased to hear Mr. Theodore W. Kheel.

TESTIMONY OF THEODORE W. KHEEL, FORMER DIRECTOR, DIVISION OF LABOR RELATIONS, CITY OF NEW YORK

Mr. KHEEL. Mr. Chairman, I have prepared a statement which I have submitted to the committee, and I would like to read parts of it, and paraphrase other parts of it, and give you the testimony that I would like to present on the matters before you.

Mr. BAILEY. I am sure that will be agreeable to the committee.

You may proceed.

Mr. KHEEL. I state in this prepared statement my qualifications to speak before the committee on the matter of new labor legislation, and I would like to address myself primarily to the so-called emergency strikes affecting the health and welfare of the people of this country. I do that because I served, up until very recently, as a Director of the Division of Labor Relations of the city of New York, a very unique agency of municipal government, which Mayor O'Dwyer created because the city of New York had been faced with many serious strikes of an emergency nature so far as New York City was concerned, of its 8,000,000 local inhabitants and 13,000,000 people in metropolitan New York, and it so happened that every time a strike arose of a critical nature, so far as the people of New York were concerned, the people inevitably turned to the mayor for help.

To be sure, there were agencies of the State government prepared to meet the emergency conditions, but nevertheless they selected the mayor to do something about it.

I state my other qualifications to testify, in this prepared statement, and I will not bother you with reciting them at this point.

I will say we have had experience in the handling of emergency disputes in the Division of Labor Relations which I think might be of value to your committee in considering what to do about emergency disputes of a national nature. I would like to stress initially that the Division of Labor Relations, as we called it, was set up in October of 1946, and handled possibly 150 or 200 disputes in New York City from that time until the present. We have never had any fixed procedures. We never tried to impose on employers or unions any time limits or cooling-off periods, or other procedural requirements for the adjustment of their disputes, other than those they set up; nor did the division have any weapons other than public opinion in helping in diverting strikes.

I should like to define what I mean by the force of public opinion or community concern, and how we used it to help adjust disputes.

Whenever a dispute arises which materially affects the welfare of the people of New York City, the mayor calls the disputing parties to City Hall. Then at a joint meeting he discusses the gravity of the dispute, as it affects the people of the city. The mayor avoids at these meetings any discussion of the immediate issues which caused the dispute. In conclusion, he usually designated what we called a citizen's committee to help bring about a settlement. And the use of the so-called citizen's committees has been very effective in helping adjust emergency disputes in New York City. What we did was to reach out and get people of outstanding reputation in ability and in labor and in education, and in the judiciary, to help in a mediatory capacity with these disputes. We paid these people no compensation whatsoever. The only reward they got was the satisfaction of helping the city. The people of all political complexions made no effort whatsoever to consider that factor at all. They came from all walks of life. The single distinguishing factor was their outstanding reputation for having achieved something of significance in the community.

The mayor would bring the parties to city hall, and he would try to instill into the parties a sense of obligation to the community to do something about the dispute, and then just let these citizen's committees go to work. And I must say we found that that was extremely effective. We found that people of outstanding ability and reputation in business, labor, or what have you, were good mediators. The experience they had had in dealing with people we were able to put to good use in the settlement of labor disputes. I think, that while there is nothing revolutionary about that discovery, I think it is something, nevertheless, you might consider for use on a national scale.

Mr. BAILEY. May I interrupt the witness at this point to bring forcibly to your attention that the Bureau of Labor Standards is a part of your legal set-up of the Department of Labor, and in New York——

Mr. KHEEL. No, this is a special division of the city of New York, and it was created by Mayor O'Dwyer. It is, in fact a very small division, and its prime function is to help settle emergency disputes that affect the people of New York City.

Mr. BAILEY. You may proceed with your regular presentation.

Mr. KHEEL. And, as I say, in the process of dealing with these emergency disputes, one of the prime techniques we developed was the use of the citizen's committees, and the attempt through people and through the mayor, and through city hall, and through the newspapers, who were very cooperative in the work we did, to instill in the parties a sense of obligation to the community to achieve a settlement without a strike. I know you might view cynically the doctrine of trying to impress upon companies and unions their obligations to the community to avoid a strike in such matters as milk and food and electricity, and so forth, but the fact is, and I can testify from personal experience, that we have had success in instilling that type of responsibility and sense of obligation in the parties.

And we find further that the people whom we have asked to serve on citizen's committees—and we have no dividing line; they can come from labor or industry—and when they are asked to serve in a mediatory capacity, they serve impartially, and we are not particular to have a balanced board.

We have had exceptional cases where we have used a board of five persons, all from a labor union, or all from the American Federation of Labor, in a dispute involving a union of the American Federation of Labor, and they brought about a very effective settlement under a difficult set of circumstances.

And there are other instances where we have had three or four representatives of management, so-called, in that their primary work in everyday life is on the management side of things; and yet we found that they were able to serve impartially and without regard to their background.

I would like to stress again we used no regularized formal procedures; each case is taken up on its own merits, and treated as a separate problem, different in its issues and personalities from all others. The only procedural deadline we observe is the feeling set by the parties, and that is usually the termination date of their existing agreement. Sometimes, when circumstances warrant it, the mayor may request a postponement of the strike deadline for a short period of time. But we carefully refrain from establishing a pattern for getting a strike postponement and thereby creating the expectation on the part of the companies and unions that a postponement will always be sought. I think that is very important, and I would like to stress that. Sometimes we have asked for a postponement, but we do not do it as a regular matter, and we try to avoid a postponement of the strike deadline, and thereby avoid creating the expectation on the part of companies and unions that a postponement will always be sought.

To explain further why we avoid regularized postponements or cooling-off periods, I must make clear our attitude toward the role of the strike or lock-out in bringing about agreements. We are never disturbed by the threat of a strike. On the contrary, we find that the establishment of a deadline for agreement helps bring about settlements.

Labor unions dislike strikes as much as do employers and consumers. A work stoppage costs the striking employee his wages for the time he is off and, in most cases, he has to work many months for what he loses.

When the parties know that they both stand to be losers unless they reach an accord by a certain date, there is an incentive for them to settle their differences. By the same token, as experience has proven over and over again, in the absence of a deadline the parties tend to avoid any concessions in their positions, since they suffer no disturbing inconvenience for failing to agree.

We can see how this works when we consider the effects of the emergency provisions of the Taft-Hartley law, with its 80-day cooling-off period, on several recent disputes in the New York City area.

Early in January 1949, the division of labor relations, through the assistance of Mr. William J. McCormack, a leading New York businessman, settled a dispute between the operators of tugboats in New York Harbor and local 333 of the International Longshoremen's Association.

I might say that in the early part of 1946 we had a tugboat strike in New York City and, I believe, that of all the strikes that New York City has had, that was probably the worst. We did not fully realize how important our tugboats were until the tugboat strike occurred. The island of Manhattan is dependent upon oil and food which must be brought in by tugboats. It cannot be brought in in adequate supplies by rail or truck, and when this tugboat strike occurred in 1946—and it was really perhaps the most important reason for the creation of this division of labor relations—New York City faced a state of serious emergency.

Again in 1948, or 1949, on January 1, we were faced with the same problem. At this time we had these procedures I am telling you about, to deal with the tugboat emergency, and immediately Mr. William J. McCormack accepted the responsibility—with complete confidence by the labor groups—to act as a mediator in this dispute. The big problem we faced in that dispute was the Taft-Hartley law, in this sense: When we first knew about it or heard about it, we first tried to do something about it in the middle part of December. Their contract expired on December 31. When we consulted with the parties at that time, we found that they were uncertain as to whether or not the tugboat would, if a strike occurred, create a national emergency within the meaning of the Taft-Hartley law; to be sure, it would create a New York City emergency; whether that was national or not, was a legal question which the parties did not have the answer to, and because of that uncertainty, and because of the uncertainty as to whether or not they would be enjoined in the event of a failure to agree, there was absolutely no collective bargaining taking place whatsoever, for the reason that if there was the possibility of an injunction then they were not going to bargain against the December 31 deadline, but March 20. The union would make no concessions and the employer would make no concessions, if the deadline was going to be December 31, and they would be able to bargain in the light of that deadline. That is the way the employers acted, and the way the unions acted. They were not going to make concessions before the expiration of their contract, as they would have roughly 80 days after the contract expired. So we had a state of great uncertainty with no collective bargaining taking place.

We were able, at that time, to communicate with the Federal authorities, and ask them whether they thought an injunction was likely, and without committing themselves—obviously, as they could not—they did indicate that an injunction was not likely because of the local character of the dispute, and we were able to pass that on to the parties, and that made it possible for the wheels of collective bargaining to begin to revolve. And it made it possible for us to work out a settlement. As a matter of fact, we got a postponement of a week or two at the request of the mayor, and some time around the 10th of January we worked out a settlement of that dispute, which probably still would be lingering with us right now if an injunction had been issued, and the deadline had been postponed from January 1 to March 20.

In contrast, I would like to tell you about another dispute we had up in our area. That involved the longshoremen on the water front, not only in New York City, but up and down the east coast. There the parties were engaged in bargaining, and they knew full well that they were going to be enjoined, because their industry, it would seem, constituted an emergency-type industry. I believe their initial contract expired some time in June—I am not certain of the date—but in view of the fact that they knew they were going to be enjoined there was no bargaining to speak of that took place before the injunction date, nor could you expect the employers to make any offers, nor could you expect the union to make any concessions in its position.

The deadline was then postponed for 80 days. During the 80-day period the employers made an offer and I believe that one of the reasons, perhaps, they made the offer was because the law said—I believe it is 10 days before the injunction expires—the National Labor Relations Board must poll the employees on the employer's last offer. The election takes place, as I say, 10 days before the injunction expires. In this particular industry 10 days before the final date happened to be 10 days too soon, because the parties were still bargaining in light of a deadline. At least the employees felt the employers might be bargaining in light of the deadline and, consequently, the employers felt, quite properly, as a matter of self-protection, that they would be silly to make the last offer 10 days before the injunction expired. The employers made their supposedly real last offer, and the National Labor Relations Board was compelled by law to conduct a ballot that the United States Government prepared as the employers' last offer, and it was put to the employees at an election. The employees voted on it, and all the while everyone knew it was a phony offer, and that it was really not their last offer. They would have been very silly if they had made it as their last offer.

And, as everybody expected, the so-called last offer was turned down by a vote of 90 to 1 or 10, or something in that neighborhood, and the parties resumed bargaining, and the employers made another offer which I believe—I do not know for certain—but I believe they intended it to be their real last offer. That was accepted by the negotiating committee of the union, but then when it was reported back to the rank and file, a strike took place, and this last offer was also rejected by a vote of the membership. A strike took place, and the circumstances of that strike were that the employers had twice made a last offer, and it was once voted upon in an NLRB election and, secondly, an improved offer that a negotiating committee had accepted both of them, and they were rejected, and the strike took place.

On the day of the strike the employers could not, with any degree of self-respect make any further improvement in their offer, without completely destroying the integrity of their bargaining position then and for years in the future.

I felt at that time, under those circumstances, and in view of those complexities, that the 80-day provision of the Taft-Hartley law created an impossibility for a settlement for several weeks, and that is exactly what took place. The strike went on for several weeks until it was possible to get the parties, and the parties to get themselves, in a position where they could reach an adjustment where it would be, let us say, face-saving to the employers and to the union, and that is what happened.

They made another offer which was still a further improvement upon their last offer, and which was an improvement upon the offer they put on a ballot of the National Labor Relations Board, as their final offer. That, I say, is the contrast that I bring to your attention between this water-front dispute, where the 80-day injunction applied, and where they knew in advance it would apply, and to the tugboat dispute where we were able to get a settlement, and where the injunction probably would not apply.

I would like to also bring to your attention the fact the 80-day "cooling-off" period creates additional problems. It creates the problem of retroactivity, and that becomes a new issue. That did not exist before the injunction was issued. When the contract expires, if an agreement is reached at the time of the expiration of the contract, presumably it takes effect on that date. When the United States Government comes along and enjoins a strike for 80 days it is only fair to expect that the employees will try to get any adjustment subsequently agreed upon—subsequent to the date upon which their contract expires.

On the other hand, it is very unfair to the employers. It is unfair to those employers, particularly, who are subject to regulatory bodies, because they cannot adjust their prices retroactively and, particularly, as I say, in cases of companies subject to regulatory bodies—and most of those in the so-called emergency disputes are subject to regulatory bodies—they have to apply, after the adjustment is finally made, for rate relief.

On the one hand you get the employees with a justifiable claim for retroactivity, and then you get the employers in a position where any adjustment made retroactive cannot be properly inserted into their price structure and, consequently, they resist retrocativity, so you have a new issue—the question of retroactivity—with equities on both sides, for the employer who cannot recoup the cost of the adjustment, and for the employees who have been restrained from striking for 80 days by the United States Government, who claim quite properly that they are entitled to retroactivity.

So I say there is a new issue: The 80-day injunction creats a new issue that you do not have without the 80-day injunction.

There is another problem it creates in most cases, and that is that particular contract termination dates have some historical significances in the light of the bargaining of the parties. It may come at a time when the business of the employer is in the slow season, and whatever the reason for the particular time, the fact is that the parties have bargained, and you come along with an 80-day injunction, and you can do great harm to employers, and you can do great harm to unions, in that respect because you can alter their basic bargaining positions. You can take an empolyer from the slow season into his very busy season, where a strike would be absolutely fatal to him; and therefore the union's position is strengthened that much. Or, it may work in exactly the reverse.

This problem the injunction creates, of putting the termination date 3 months beyond what the parties themselves have agreed to, can work to the disadvantage of the union, or it can work to the disadvantage of the employers. It is a matter of chance in a particular case. The important thing is that by law you are changing what the parties themselves have selected as the proper termination date of their agreement for whatever may be the reasons they have selected it.

I would also like to bring to your attention the effects of another law, to deal in a regularized way with the relations of employers and unions, and the unfortunate consequences of that law. I refer to the Condon-Wadlin law, which was a law passed in New York State about 2 years ago to deal with these strikes by public employees.

This law sets up certain fixed procedures, including certain fixed penalties for strikes by employees, and it has no escape valve whatsoever; everything flows automatically from what takes place, and the public officials are charged—it would seem, anyway—with the duty applying the fixed procedures.

Just recently in New York, a minor grievance in Yonkers developed into a garbage strike. The garbage collectors were out on strike for several days, 10 days, I believe, and the Yonkers officials found themselves in the position where they could not adjust the grievances of the employees and settle the dispute even though they wanted to. They started legal proceedings for an injunction. They tried to hire replacements for the men who had gone out on strike. And all of those procedures failed.

Finally, they called off their injunction proceedings and reinstated all the employees with the hope, I presume, that nobody would press too hard about the application of the fixed rules of the Conlon-Wadlin bill. In any event, the men went back to work under the old conditions that existed before this unfortunate circumstance took place.

You had the spectacle of a law having to be bent, so to speak, to fit the circumstances of the particular case, which certainly is not calculated to develop the kind of respect for the laws of our governments that we should have.

From this experience we have had in New York, I come to these definite conclusions:

(1) A "cooling-off" period will not contribute to the settlement of labor disputes, but merely postpones the evil day, sometimes intensifies the dispute instead of helping in its settlement, and creates new issues for the parties to settle. In addition, the use of injunctions in labor disputes serves as a further irritant to a settlement when, as a matter of fact, labor negotiations yield only to persuasion and not to force.

(2) Fixed procedures specifying time limits and other requirements for the various stages of collective bargaining will not help settle disputes. The parties merely adjust their strategies to the new procedures.

(3) The most effective method of settling labor disputes is to concentrate all efforts on bringing about a settlement within the time limits fixed by the parties themselves or any extension that is mutually agreeable but not fixed by a blanket law for all disputes.

(4) The use of citizens' committees can be of great help in bringing about settlements if they are composed of outstanding men whose status and ability command the respect of the parties. These committees should function primarily as mediators. They should also be given the power to make recommendations, but should not be required to make recommendations. That matter should be left to their judgment so as to achieve the greatest degree of flexibility in order to fit the circumstances of the particular case.

I might interject at that point that under the Taft-Hartley law, these boards that the President sets up are directed to find the facts and to do nothing more, and that seems to me to be one of the most futile gestures that could be conceived of, because the facts are rarely in dispute in these labor disputes. Everybody knows what the union is asking for and what the employers are offering them in exchange. The dispute is how to achieve a settlement. And these boards that the President is required to appoint in emergency disputes are sent out to find the facts, and they find the facts and then they leave.

It seems to me that the committees that the President could appoint, as we have done in New York, should be given the power to mediate and help to try to bring about a settlement. People of outstanding ability in mediation can help to bring about settlements. If it seems appropriate, they can make recommendations. I do not think they should be forced to make recommendations. I think they should be given the widest latitude, with the object in mind of achieving agreements.

I say, fifthly, that every effort should be made to impress upon the parties their obligation to the public to reach a settlement without any interruption of work.

I am well aware that these suggestions do not guarantee complete elimination of "emergency" type strikes. And I do not want to leave the impression that our system of mediation averted all "emergency" type strikes. We have had a few critical strikes in the last 3 years. But for every strike we had, we averted 100 potential strikes of a serious nature. And the few strikes we had were brought to an end in less time, I am sure, than would have been the case if our procedures had not been used.

The plain fact is that there is no way to guarantee absolutely against strikes unless we enjoin them entirely and adopt the methods of the dictator countries. Even the Taft-Hartley law does not ban strikes permanently; it postpones the beginning of an "emergency" strike with the resultant harmful consequences I have described above.

So long as we want free private enterprise, we must also accept free collective bargaining with the possibility of a strike. But if we focus our main attention on ways and means of achieving agreements through collective bargaining, I do not believe we need be unduly concerned about strikes.

The Taft-Hartley provisions are defective because they start with the assumption that there will be a strike and then set up fixed procedures, with irritating injunctions, for dealing with them. These procedures, as I have shown, stifle collective bargaining and make agreements more difficult to achieve.

The primary emphasis must be placed on agreement making. If that is done "emergency" strikes will virtually be avoided. Those few that may possibly occur will be far less of an evil than the procedures that upset collective bargaining and interfere with the ability of the parties to reach voluntary agreements.

Those are the conclusions I have reached on the basis of my experience as Director of the Division of Labor Relations in handling "emergency" disputes for Mayor O'Dwyer, which I respectfully submit for your consideration.

Mr. BAILEY. The Chair would like to make the observation that this has been one of the fairest and most unbiased presentations that has been made to the committee since it has held hearings.

Mr. KHEEL. Thank you, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. I am sure the committee is intensively interested in actual facts of how you have been handling your labor relations in the city of New York. I am sure as one member of the committee that I am wondering if we might not be able to do that pretty well on a national basis.

At this point, I would like to ask you this, since you said you were directing your remarks more to the matter of Presidential emergency boards that would be set up as a final effort to settle disputes affecting the public welfare. You would suggest that these Boards not only include representatives of labor and management, but that they be composed of businessmen and professional men, regardless of their affiliation with labor or with industry? Do you think they would be more effective?

Mr. KHEEL. Absolutely, sir. I think that men who have been successful in life in dealing with the problems of life and the give and take of day-to-day relations one with the other, have the necessary qualifications to help in the settlement of labor disputes.

Mr. BAILEY. What has been your experience in New York? How has labor and how has management reacted to the idea of having people selected at large from the citizenry? How have they reacted? Have they accepted willingly?

Mr. KHEEL. Mr. Chairman, I can say with all due modesty that the reception has been very, very good. The labor groups and the management groups have viewed with great pleasure the use of these citizens' committees in their disputes.

I think I can say there was not a single dispute that we have handled, and we have handled hundreds, where either party ever left City Hall with a feeling that he had not gotten a fair shake of the dice. And the fact that they have had as mediators people whom they know in the community, leading labor leaders, leading industrialists, bankers, department-store people, insurance people, and what have you, has given them, first, a sense of community obligation, and, secondly, a feeling that their particular problems were being intelligently handled. It has worked exceedingly well, and the reception has been exceedingly good, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. You came very near in your suggestion to saying that these boards have authority to make recommendations, although you do not go so far as to say that the recommendation would be binding. You would be getting pretty close to compulsory arbitration then.

Mr. KHEEL. You would, indeed. Very definitely not. I would oppose vigorously any procedure where in advance the parties were committed to accept by law the recommendations of the Government-appointed body. I think that if the parties themselves agree to accept the decision of the body, that, of course, is not only legally permissible, but is something to be desired. I think that these committees should be empowered to make recommendations. But I would go very slowly about making recommendations. I think perhaps I would not go quite as far, even, as the bill that you have now before you goes in providing there should be boards appointed with the specific job of making recommendations.

Mr. BAILEY. You were referring there to H. R. 2032?

Mr. KHEEL. That is right, sir. I think that once the parties even know that recommendations are going to be made, you see, then the proceedings degenerate, if I can use that word, into a legal proceeding instead of a collective-bargaining meeting where there is give and take.

Now, I think that if a committee is set up with the power to mediate, and it is a high-class committee of really outstanding people, and they have the power to do whatever they think is right, not binding on the parties, of course, to help bring about a settlement, they should not be limited in the scope of their work. They should go very slowly about even making recommendations. There may be some circumstances where recommendations will be desirable. But I think you will find that in more cases it will be possible for them to achieve agreements without making any recommendations whatsoever.

I would not tie their hands by requiring them to make recommendations, but I would permit them to make recommendations if in their judgment recommendations appear to be desirable.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. I do not have too many questions. I notice in the statement the name Battle, Fowler, Neaman, Stokes & Kheel. What type of firm is that?

Mr. KHEEL. That is a law firm, sir.

Mr. IRVING. Is that your vocation?

Mr. KHEEL. That is right. I am an attorney.

Mr. IRVING. I was interested in your comments on the "last offer." I had previously in this committee made some issue in regard to that, and recited some examples approximately the same as you have recited. I think that this view shows a decent philosophy and a fair approach to the problem.

Many new ideas, at least to me, have been exposed, and I think it has been enlightening because of the recitation of practical examples of experience in the matter.

I first would say that I believe that the Golden Rule can be a practical law in the affairs of Government, business, labor, and everyday life, and I think perhaps you injected a little of that idea into this problem.

That is all I have to say. Thank you, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Kheel, I have wondered a good many times about this matter of emergency strikes. I would like to ask you a few questions beyond your statement.

Under the present law, we can get an injunction for 80 days. At the end of the 80 days, if the dispute is not settled, we still have the problem, have we not? We had one gentleman who testified here who said that the injunction should be renewed from time to time and as long as dispute existed. He likewise stated in answer to a question that I put to him that he would not in the meantime fix any terms of employment—that is, the Government should not fix any terms of employment.

What would your reaction be to that?

Mr. KHEEL. I would throw up my hands in horror at the thought of a perpetual injunction with what it means so far as compulsory arbitration is concerned and the maintenance of existing conditions throughout. I would like to ask that particular person how he would feel with regard to that matter if the employer happened to be seeking a cut in wages, and to avoid a strike there was to be a perpetual injunction which maintained wages at the existing level.

Mr. JACOBS. I think that would have been a very good question for me to have asked him. But it is staircase wit, as far as I am concerned right now.

For your information, if you would like to write and ask him, it was Mr. Mosher of the National Association of Manufacturers.

In the last analysis, if we would follow the procedure as set out in the Taft-Hartley law with a report to Congress in the case of a critical strike situation, we might run slambang against that very perplexing problem. Do you agree with me on that?

Mr. KHEEL. Absolutely. You solve nothing by the 80-day injunction. In fact, you create new issues.

Mr. JACOBS. And if we should have the matter thrown in the lap of Congress at the end of 80 days with the dispute still existing and we should obtain, then, a compulsory settlement of the employment conditions, what do you think would be the next thing that would follow in the wake of that action?

Mr. KHEEL. I think one compulsory settlement would encourage other settlements.

Mr. JACOBS. Of wages?

Mr. KHEEL. Of wages and working conditions.

Mr. JACOBS. And that would require, do you think, as time went on, perhaps, a fixing of prices?

Mr. KHEEL. Undoubtedly. And there is another respect in which I would like to comment, because there have been several States that have passed compulsory arbitration laws for public utilities.

Mr. JACOBS. New Jersey and Indiana.

Mr. KHEEL. New Jersey, Indiana, and Pennsylvania was considering one just recently. I would like to point out something in connection with that which I do not think has been properly considered. It is one thing to compel arbitration on wages. I am opposed to it, but I could see that there is some possible basis for it in the public utility cases by analogy to the fixing of rates by public utility bodies. But when you compel arbitration, I do not think you can limit it to wages, because there are other issues in dispute which can cause strikes. You can have a strike about seniority or grievance procedure or union shop——

Mr. JACOBS. Or vacations.

Mr. KHEEL. Or vacations or holidays, or what have you.

Logic, therefore, would require you to say that any issue in dispute can be arbitrated. Then you find that the employers are put in this very unfortunate position under such a law. The union will throw everything in the hopper. Why not? What have they got to lose? And so they come in—and I have seen this happen—with 100 issues in demand, and all of them must go to arbitration. Now, on the law of averages, they are going to win some of them, and it puts the employers in a very unenviable position.

If you confine the arbitration to wages, you have one thing. You have at least a clean-cut issue. But you cannot confine it logically so long as what you are trying to do is avoid the strike. Therefore, you open the whole gamut of issues that the mind of a union man can conceive of for arbitration.

Mr. JACOBS. I think we are only started down the road in that direction. I wonder if there is not some more implication? We have agreed, at least you and I have, and I do not see how it can be logically disputed, that if we fix wages, we are ultimately going to fix prices, and that would result, then, in a permanent OPA, as I figure it; and with a permanently controlled economy, do you not think that some of the zest for private ownership and proprietorship would be lost, and we would lost a great deal of resistance to the nationalization of industry? Do you agree with me on that?

Mr. KHEEL. There is no question about it.

Mr. JACOBS. So that actually, if we analyze the emergency provisions, particularly, in the Taft-Hartley law, and consider its trend and the logical conclusion that we would finally come to and then the destination to which that leads us, it actually points the way to national socialism.

Mr. KHEEL. I agree.

Mr. JACOBS. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. I want to make a couple of comments.

The gentleman refers to New York City's particular and direct type of dispute which the plan arranged by him can help settle. But behind that there is another evil in the mayor of your city getting up these boards of public opinions to step into a dispute threatened or in process. In my experience I have witnessed that invariably these boards of public opinion, while they try to get the two parties to find a common ground, cannot at any time forget that the employer, or the management, concerns itself with the increased cost that is involved in the settlement.

When management makes an offer, they usually make an offer within their means, and if that seems to be insufficient to settle the dispute, then, of course, they have to defend themselves, on the assumption that they are going to have an increase. So in these two or three strikes—and bear in mind that I am a friend of the court here in this case, and I am for the elimination, because it has not solved a thing—but in the cases which you cite, New York City is directly the victim of this city-wide strike. It is not like an industrial dispute between Westinghouse and its employees, that does not affect the whole population. All of your population is affected by a light strike, by a heat strike, by a coal strike, by a tug strike, by a streetcar strike, and by a telephone strike. Your whole city is involved.

Now, then, I presume, and this is the experience that I have witnessed, that the assumption of this board of public opinion, which is usually some responsible citizenry of the community, when they get to the bargaining table and when they get the two parties to the bargaining table and the sun begins to shine on a possible settlement, management says, "We are willing to make this concession, but it is not within our means to make the settlement. We have not the resources. We will be very happy to make the settlement and proceed to settle the strike provided we have some support in an adjustment of our rates or costs."

Now, in the tugboat strike, it meant rates; in the light company, an increase to the public and in the case of the telephone strike, likewise, So the public meeting is usually a group that sponsors the idea that, "We have settled the strike; we have brought the two sides to an amicable settlement"; and then comes the blow to the public, "This is going to cost you an increase."

The only criticism I have of that is that in many cases that is a surface position and not one in which an investigation is made to find out whether the company is justified in their claims relative to a need for an adjustment of their rates. Too often I have found that companies have taken the position that, "This is the way we can get a rate increase, and the only way we can get it," such as in the utilities, for example, with streetcar, gas, light, heat, or any of those.

So it is in these two strikes of yours. So it would be in the case of the Yonkers strike where it was again municipal employees against municipal government. It is a question of getting the increased amount of money involved from some source.

That is the only evil that I find in your plan.

Mr. IRVING. Would you yield, Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. But I agree with you that the injunction and the 80-day cooling-off period in the labor movement—now, they begin to call it a heating period, and not a cooling-off period, because neither party is going to move unless the machinery is perfected and further advancements are made. If the law is in favor of present employers, they sit tight waiting for this machinery that they can operate here, that operates in their favor.

Mr. IRVING. Will you yield to a question?

Mr. WIER. Yes.

Mr. IRVING. I just wanted to mention that I do think that the 80-day period, or injunction, as you brought out, has a very significant factor in the extending of the expiration date, because, as you said, it could work to the advantage or harm of either party. And those dates, in my experience, have been negotiated with very definite reasons and purposes.

Mr. KHEEL. That is exactly so.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. Kheel, I have been interested in your statement here. Of course, you realize that is one of the toughest parts of labor-management problems that we have to contend with. We have never felt that we had fully solved the matter. As you can tell, we have left it in an open-end way, because we did not know exactly how to bring about a settlement. I am not entirely sure that I understand what you would have us do. Have you thought of the way it should be written in a bill? Can you give us your idea?

Mr. KHEEL. No. I have not attempted to give precise phraseology to what I suggest. But I think I should explain it in this way. I do not mean to imply in any way, shape, form, or manner that what I am suggesting is a guaranty against strikes. My point is that if you begin from that end of the problem—and I quite agree with you that it is probably the most difficult problem that there is before this country today—if you begin from the end of trying to guarantee against strikes, you get into all of these difficulties that Congressman Jacobs is bringing out. I think that you have to begin from the end of trying to reach an agreement, and you have to think of all the procedures that there are that you can possibly conceive of that will help make collective bargaining work, if you proceed on the assumption of collective bargaining. I think you will wind up with the conclusion, nevertheless, that there is no absolute guaranty against strikes in emergency industries, unless you want to have a dictatorship-type of operation or a national socialist type of operation for this country.

I do believe that by concentrating your primary emphasis on bringing about agreements, through citizens' committees, through better mediation, through procedures that are as flexible as possible so that they can be adapted to the particular industries, to the particular personalities, to the existing problems—and there are different problems for different industries each year—that you will——

Mr. McConnell. That general theory is good. How would you write it in a bill? What would you say in a bill? Would you just say nothing, except that they have a right to strike where a national emergency is threatened, and so on, and hope that they work it out?

Mr. Kheel. I would find difficulty just spouting off language that would be adequate for a bill without trying to frame it more carefully.

Mr. McConnell. You say that there is no procedure set up. Now, I presume by that it is just left free and open.

Mr. Kheel. That is right. I think ultimately you would have to leave it free and open. I would take the administration bill and possibly enlarge upon the procedures for bringing about agreements by providing for the use of citizens' committees and providing for——

Mr. McConnell. But you are going to provide some procedure? That is what I mean.

Mr. Kheel. That is right. And providing for the greatest measure of flexibility by these committees in terms of acting as mediators and making recommendations.

Mr. McConnell. I do not quite understand what we are to say in a bill. That is what I mean. Are we to ignore it, or just provide for something, or what?

Mr. Kheel. No. I think you should provide for procedures that would make available by designation of the President the most outstanding people in this country to serve in a mediatory capacity with the power to make recommendations, but without the requirement that they should make recommendations, and that these persons should be given the greatest latitude in devising ways and means that would fit the exigencies of the particular disputes, to bring about agreements.

Mr. McConnell. Now, assuming a strike has started, then what would you provide? If the strike is under way, what would you provide? Would you leave it entirely to the discretion of the President? Would not that be dangerous, too, assuming we had a President who would step in and assume authority over it?

Mr. Kheel. No. I think there is an element of danger, sir, in what I propose, to be sure. I think, however, that it is far less of a danger than the procedures which are now contained in the Taft-Hartley law or any other type of fixed procedures which, in attempting to correct a particular situation, with the assumption that you make, "Supposing there is a strike," upsets our whole procedure of collective bargaining and makes it more difficult to reach the settlements in 100 other disputes. I say "Yes," the possibility of a strike in a particular situation does exist under what I am suggesting. I say that danger, which I recognize, is far less of a danger and will create far less trouble than a fixed procedure which upsets collective bargaining and makes for strikes in many other situations.

Mr. McConnell. Of course, you realize that the most conservative of the capitalists and others who have come before us have advocated leaving this free, "Do not interfere with it at all; let them work it out between labor and management.

Mr. Kheel. I find myself in that respect in accord with the conservative capitalists.

Mr. McConnell. Then your theory would be to leave it entirely out of the bill, and say virtually nothing about it; would that be it?

Mr. Kheel. I would say that the bill should provide the facilities for the designation of committees and other procedures of a mediatory nature; that is, that would not be binding upon the parties; and the bill should not contain any provisions for fixed procedures that have to be followed in particular cases, but the President, through his designees and through himself should have the power to devise procedures of a mediatory nature, not a binding nature, and therefore I do not think their precise nature need be spelled out, except to say that it should be the most effective in dealing with the particular dispute that comes before them.

Mr. McConnell. Would you let them strike and then proceed with that?

Mr. Kheel. I would let the possibility of a strike continue; yes. I think once you start with the assumption that you are going to try to prevent the strike, then you get yourself either into the difficulty that the Taft-Hartley law finds itself in, where it just postpones things for 80 days, creates an issue of retroactivity, and changes the expiration date of the contract, and then faces the same problem 80 days later; or you find yourself in a position where you permanently are enjoining strikes and having to substitute compulsory arbitration procedures with all that that brings about. I think you must in the final analysis leave the possibility of the strike as a possible eventuality.

Mr. Wier. Would you yield for a minute, Mr. McConnell?

Mr. McConnell. Surely.

Mr. Wier. On the point that we are on now, we could say what he is driving at is somewhat similar to the Railway Labor Act. But picking up the argument from the present labor law, suppose we leave the law as it is here. The danger is that both sides start anticipating an 80-day period with that opportunity of somebody's extending and settling it. But suppose you reverse the machinery and say that they shall start negotiations 60 days prior to the expiration date when the dynamite starts, giving opportunity for not only the President, if it is on a national level, but the local government, if it is on a local level, to do something.

Now, Mr. McConnell, the reason I say that, and I say it to both of you, is that under the present law employers are not too prone to desire that. A union is required to give a 60-day notice for the renewal of the opening of a contract. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. McConnell. That is correct.

Mr. Wier. It has been my experience, and I think experience generally, that employers are not too prompt in accepting that responsibility of "Let us try to get that settled now."

I have heard employers say, "We have a lot of time. We have 2 months, and we ought to get this thing settled in a week."

Now, that is on the assumption that it is going to be easy to settle. And behind that lies the theory that we have this law here which will give us additional time with its processes. So I think that, instead of having the attempt to settle afterward by legal means, all the pressure should come before the expiration date of the contract, giving sufficient notice, 60 days, for management and labor to get together with the help of such agencies as the witness speaks of in New York

State, or, in the national picture, with the President appointing a board as he does under the Railway Labor Act.

That is my reaction to your questioning. That is all.

Mr. McCONNELL. The biggest pressure we have found has come from the public in all these matters.

Mr. KHEEL. I agree.

Mr. McCONNELL. I have said to various people in many cases, "Well, let labor and management be free in the handling of these strikes, or in any type of strike."

However, they will always say, "What difference does it make what management and labor want? We are the ones hurt by this whole matter, and we demand action."

And there you are, right in it, right away. It is the public that keeps the pressure on this matter.

Mr. KHEEL. That is right, sir. I think the factor of public pressure is an important factor in bringing parties together.

Mr. McCONNELL. In connection with the administration bill, H. R. 2032, on page 17; it says in section 302, under (c):

> After a Presidential proclamation has been issued under section 301, and until five days have elapsed after the report has been made by the board appointed under this section, the parties to the dispute shall continue or resume work and operations under the terms and conditions of employment which were in effect immediately prior to the beginning of the dispute unless a change therein is agreed to by the parties.

I imagine you would be opposed to such a section, particularly if the President has the inherent right, either by an injunctive or a military process, to enforce such a proclamation; would that be correct?

Mr. KHEEL. The period, of course, is only 5 days, which in the nature of things should not be too serious. But I frankly would be more in accord with Congressman Wier's suggestion, that these figures that we talk about should be attempted before the normal expiration date, rather than after it, and you avoid, then, this question of compelling the maintenance of the status quo, even for as short a period of time as 5 days.

Mr. McCONNELL. Do you see any harm in the requirement for a period within which this citizens' committee should make some report?

Mr. KHEEL. I think a period of 5 days certainly is not going to be——

Mr. McCONNELL. No. They have 25 days, I believe, for the report of the Board. I am substituting your citizens' committee for a Board.

Mr. KHEEL. I think the administration bill has narrowed it down to about the least possible amount that you can have to enable the Board to give some intelligent consideration, and at the same time to avoid these other problems that I mentioned, of retroactivity, of heating up instead of cooling off, or changing the normal expiration date of the parties, and so forth.

Mr. McCONNELL. There is a 30-day period in H. R. 2032.

Mr. KHEEL. A 30-day period or a 50-day period is better than an 80-day period.

Mr. McCONNELL. It violates your principle, whether it is 1 day, 50 days, or 80 days?

Mr. KHEEL. That is right.

Mr. McConnell. It still violates your principle, when the President under a directive, issued because of the inherent power claimed for him by the Attorney General, requires them to work under those conditions, whether it is 1 day, 5 days, or 60 days? It does not make much difference.

Mr. Kheel. I agree, sir, although it is still a matter of degree.

Mr. McConnell. Just one other question. These settlements that you were successful in achieving in New York, did practically all of them end up with an increased wage agreement?

Mr. Kheel. Most of them did. But some of them did not involve wages.

Mr. McConnell. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bailey. Mr. Smith?

Mr. Smith. Mr. Kheel, I think I am in agreement with Mr. Bailey about what he said about the importance of your testimony. I think you have a very splendid approach to this problem, and I think that we are dealing here, to get it down to common terms, in preventive medicine. This is preventive medicine. I think that all doctors will agree that preventive medicine is the most important medicine. But as Mr. McConnell indicated, there comes a time in the field of medicine where there must be an operation, and the public is going to demand that operation.

Do you agree that we should ever use the knife? In other words, do you believe that the Government should ever use the knife and just say, "You have to settle this for the matter of public interest"?

Take the railroad strike, or something that is vital to the whole country.

Mr. Kheel. The great difficulty with your analogy, sir, is that in this field of labor relations when you start with the assumption that a knife is going to be used in one form or another, then you alter the course of collective bargaining in practically every other case and create new problems over and above those which you seek to settle by the use of the knife. I think you start from the wrong end. You have to start from the end of trying to bring about an agreement.

Mr. Smith. Now, you and I are not in disagreement about that at all. But is it not possible that sometime we will just have to get down to the point where we have to do something? Now, what are you going to do about that?

Mr. Kheel. I think that that is so. The circumstances may arise where something has to be done.

Mr. Smith. Do you think we should just leave that wide open and not say anything about it?

Mr. Kheel. I do, indeed, sir. That may sound as if I am leaving the welfare of the country in jeopardy. I do not think that is so. I think if you ask a hypothetical question and get a hypothetical answer and then build the law upon such circumstances, which then alters the whole procedure of collective bargaining in other cases, you get a distorted result in labor relations. I do think that the problem of what you do in theoretical circumstances where a strike takes place of such a critical nature that something has to be done, should be left open. It has been open until the Taft-Hartley Act was passed, and it is still open under the Taft-Hartley law. That does not solve the issue. We have gotten by so far, and I think we will get by in the future, too.

Mr. SMITH. I would like to ask this rather personal question. In your opening statement you say you were invited to be here. Now, I would like to know who invited you.

Mr. KHEEL. I received a telephone call from the secretary to the committee, sir.

Mr. SMITH. The secretary of this committee?

Mr. KHEEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH. I just wanted to know, because I want to compliment him on getting you down here. That is why I asked. I appreciate a great deal what you have had to say here. Under your theory, do you think we should get away from professional conciliators, as now provided in the Conciliation and Mediation Service?

Mr. KHEEL. Not for what I might call the routine dispute. I think that they perform a very valuable function and do a good job in 99 percent of the cases. I think that when you get a dispute of national significance and national importance, where you are dealing with a major company or a major industry and a very important union, and they are all top-level men speaking for both sides, the Government should seek out as its representatives the most able men that are in the country to do that work.

Mr. SMITH. In other words, it does not follow that we should not abolish, then, the Mediation and Conciliation Service?

Mr. KHEEL. Certainly not. You have thousands of cases——

Mr. SMITH. Well, if it will work in public emergency strikes, as you have designated, will it not work there, too?

Mr. KHEEL. I think you can wear this thing thin. I think there are too many cases that come up every day where the mediation services of the State and Federal Government are really a part of the collective bargaining processes and I think that that function they perform is a very necessary one and must be continued. The use of outstanding citizens for particular cases ought to be reserved for those special cases.

Mr. SMITH. Now, let us take the case of any town in Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, or any place like that where there is a quite sizable industry. We will say they employ 1,000 people and it is a town of 5,000 or 6,000 people. The economy of the whole town and the welfare of the community is based upon that particular plan. Now, under your theory, you would have public opinion. Why would not public opinion work in that town in that case?

Mr. KHEEL. Absolutely. I quite agree with you. I think for that town, the mayor of that town or the industry and labor people should get together to provide some special procedures, because that particular company is an emergency company.

Mr. SMITH. It is an emergency for that community.

Mr. KHEEL. For that town, in much the same manner as we have set up this division of labor relations of New York for New York City labor disputes.

Mr. SMITH. And do you not think, according to this theory, that this service that you have in New York City would be more effective in a town that I have described than if you brought in professional conciliators and arbitrators?

Mr. KHEEL. I think it could be used effectively. I do not want to be categorical in my answer. I think that each situation is a different one.

Mr. SMITH. We have all the elements in this town that I have described that you have in New York.

Mr. KHEEL. I think something of that sort can be developed very effectively if you have the proper people on the side of management and labor with some sort of coalescing force to bring them together.

Mr. SMITH. But the coalescing force is public opinion.

Mr. KHEEL. Public opinion, plus somebody to take the initiative to achieve it. But I think it can be used very effectively in those circumstances.

Mr. SMITH. You mentioned something about the longshoremen's strike, and you said it was voted 90 to 10. What did you mean by 90 to 10?

Mr. KHEEL. I meant that in percentage terms.

Mr. SMITH. Well, it is 9 to 1, then, about?

Mr. KHEEL. Nine to 1; 90 percent to 10 percent. I meant that 90 percent of the employees who voted, voted to reject the employers' so-called last offer. Now, it might have been 89 percent or 91 percent, sir. I do not vouch for the figure.

Mr. SMITH. But when you said 90 to 10, I wanted to know if there were only 100 people voting on it.

Mr. KHEEL. Oh, no; it ran into the thousands.

Mr. SMITH. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Nixon.

Mr. NIXON. No questions.

Mr. IRVING. Would you yield?

Mr. NIXON. Yes.

Mr. IRVING. As I see it, it is a great deal of an educational problem on both sides. I think our unions and our union leaders need to be educated; I think management needs to be educated, as proven by the fact that some larger corporations and industries have developed very fair and reasonable plans, and they are working satisfactorily.

I would like to comment on the public opinion in this small town, or any town. It perhaps should be considered how that opinion is formed or developed. The amount of propaganda on either side, if the public opinion was formed that way, could have a harmful effect.

Mr. KHEEL. Yes.

Mr. IRVING. I was going to ask Mr. Nixon if he is familiar with C. F. Braun there, in his district?

Mr. NIXON. That is in Bell Haven.

Mr. IRVING. Yes. Their president has developed quite a lot of literature. I have the full set of his literature on labor-management relations and employee relations and department relations, and so forth. As I understand it, they have very good relations. It is a very fine firm. They are working in my district at present.

Mr. NIXON. They have an excellent reputation.

Mr. IRVING. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the witness, and I am sure the committee appreciates your appearance.

Mr. KHEEL. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BAILEY. The formal statement of Mr. Kheel will be included in the record at this point.

(The statement referred to is as follows:)

STATEMENT OF THEODORE W. KHEEL

I am pleased to accept your invitation to give my views regarding the labor legislation now under consideration by your committee.

I should like to address myself primarily to the problem of adjusting labor disputes, with particular reference to the so-called emergency strikes affecting the health, welfare, and safety of the American people.

Until January 1, 1949, I was the director of the division of labor relations of the city of New York. I had served Mayor William O'Dwyer in the division from October 1, 1946, when this department was set up to cope with the many serious labor disputes which New York City faced. I resigned on January 1, 1949, to return to the private practice of law, engaging mainly in the arbitration and mediation of labor disputes. During the war I served as the executive director of the National War Labor Board, and before that I was on the legal staff of the National Labor Relations Board. Only for the purpose of qualifying myself to comment on the legislation before your committee, I would like to say that in all probability I have aided in settling as many strikes and labor disputes in the last 12 years as any other person in the United States.

The division I headed in New York City was created by Mayor O'Dwyer to deal with emergency labor disputes which almost weekly confronted the people of New York City and a metropolitan area of more than 12,000,000 inhabitants. In the several months before the division was established, New York City experienced several paralyzing strikes, including a tugboat workers' strike which cut off vital oil and other essential supplies, a communications strike which isolated the city from the rest of the world, a general trucking strike which brought all commerce almost to a complete halt, constant threats of strikes on the city's complex network of subways, elevated lines, and busses, and dangers of walk-outs in several other vital industries.

The establishment of the division enabled the mayor to deal effectively with disputes involving hundreds of union, CIO, AFL, and independent, with many hundreds of thousands of members working in virtually every industry essential to the well-being of New York City. Specifically, we averted walk-outs in transportation, communications, trucking, tugboats, bakeries, dairies, fuel oil and coal, water front, groceries, printing and publishing, and building construction. I might mention in passing that the division played a most important part in creating a master wage stabilization program for approximately 35 crafts in the building construction industry, and that this program has eliminated strikes for the last 15 months by more than 200,000 unionized building construction workers, and promises to maintain peace in this all-important industry at least until July 1950.

Out of this experience have come certain definite conclusions regarding the adjustment of emergency disputes which I believe may be of value to the committee in connection with the formulation of new labor legislation. It represents what has come to be known as the O'Dwyer plan for industrial peace.

Primarily, it should be stressed that the division of labor relations has not and has never had any fixed procedures. We never tried to impose on employers and unions any time limits, "cooling-off" periods, or other procedural requirements for the adjustment of their disputes other than those which they themselves set up. Nor has the division ever had any weapons other than the force of public opinion to help it in averting strikes and bringing about agreements.

I should like to define what I mean by the force of public opinion or community concern and how we use it to help adjust disputes. Whenever a dispute arises which materially affects the welfare of the people of New York City, the mayor calls the disputing parties to city hall. Then, at a joint meeting, he discusses the gravity of the dispute, as it affects the people of the city. The mayor avoids, at these meetings, any discussion of the immediate issues which causes the dispute. In conclusion, he usually designates what we call a citizens' committee to assist the parties in eliminating their differences.

These citizens committees represent, in my judgment, a major contribution to the techniques of settling labor disputes without strikes or lock-outs. Composed of leading citizens of our city, persons of outstanding reputations in business, labor, education, and other fields, these committees serve without compensation. Their only reward is the satisfaction of helping their fellow citizens to avert catastrophic economic dislocation. As a matter of fact, neither the city nor the Federal Government could ever adequately compensate these persons for the time they spare from their positions as heads of big corporations, huge unions, and, in many cases, important posts in our big universities and our high courts.

We follow no set rule regarding the composition of these committees. Sometimes we use one man, sometimes as many as five, but most often three. One committee consisted entirely of persons who were officials of labor organizations. Another committee had four industry men and one labor man. We settled one dispute through the efforts of two nationally famous sports writers.

We have found that irrespective of a man's background, his primary concern as a member of a mayor's citizens' committee in dealing with a dispute of vital concern to the city is to adjust the dispute without a strike on the most equitable basis for all concerned.

Community concern becomes the motivating factor in the settlements achieved by these committees. Civic responsibility, invoked by the mayor, spurs committee members and the representatives of companies and unions to their topmost efforts to spare the community, of which they are a part, the social and economic dislocation of a serious work stoppage.

It is my sincere belief that similar measures can be used with the aid of persons of national reputation to help settle disputes that might become national emergencies.

I want to stress again that the division uses no regularized, formal procedures. Each case is taken up on its own merits and treated as a separate problem different in its issues and personalities from all others. The only procedural dead line we observe is the dealing set by the parties, and that is usually the termination date of their existing agreement. Sometimes, when circumstances warrant it, the mayor may request a postponement of the strike dead line for a short period of time. But we carefully refrain from establishing a pattern for getting a strike postponement and thereby avoid creating the expectation on the part of companies and unions that a postponement will always be sought.

To explain why we avoid regularized postponements or "cooling-off" periods, I must make clear our attitude toward the role of the strike or lock-out in bringing about agreements. We are never disturbed by the threat of a strike. On the contrary, we find that the establishment of a dead line for agreement helps bring about settlements.

Labor unions dislike strikes as much as do employers and consumers. A work stoppage costs the striking employee his wages for the time he is out and, in most cases, he has to work many months to make up what he loses.

When the parties know that they both stand to be losers unless they reach an accord by a certain date, there is an incentive for them to settle their differences. By the same token, as experience has proven over and over again, in the absence of a dead line the parties tend to avoid any concessions in their positions since they suffer no disturbing inconvenience for failing to agree.

We can see how this works when we consider the effects of the emergency provisions of the Taft-Hartley law, with its 80-day "cooling-off" period, on several recent disputes in the New York City area. Early in January 1949, the divisions of labor relations, through the assistance of Mr. William J. McCormack a leading New York businessman, settled a dispute between the operators of tugboats in New York Harbor and local 333 of the International Longshoremen's Association. This dispute first came to the official attention of the division of labor relations in the middle of December 1948. At that time there was great uncertainty on the part of the employers and the unions for the reason that they did not know whether they would come under the emergency provisions of the Taft-Hartley law in the event of a strike.

The dispute was local in character but might have become national in scope because of the serious effect of a tugboat strike on the economy of the biggest city in the country.

We know that the parties felt that if they were subject to the Taft-Hartley law, they would not make any concessions toward a new agreement until close to the expiration of the 80-day injunction. The reason was obvious. If a strike was to be delayed for 80 days, there was no need to reach an agreement before the expiration of their contract. The employers justifiably feared that any offer they made would be rejected because the union would have an additional 80 days to try to get more. Similarly, the union was reluctant to reduce its demands because of the prospect of having 80 days added to their normal collective-bargaining period.

In order to get the wheels of true negotiation in motion, we urged the Federal authorities to give the parties some indication of whether an injunction was likely. If it was contemplated, then we would have relaxed our efforts to obtain a settlement because we knew full well that none would be possible until the latter part of March 1949 when the injunction was due to expire.

The Federal authorities were wise and helpful enough to indicate that an injunction was unlikely. It then became possible for us to roll up our sleeves, get down to work, and settle the dispute. Incidentally, the dispute was settled a few minutes before the final dead line.

The water front dispute involving the longshoremen which tied up the entire east coast began the same way. But there the parties knew for certain that there would be an injunction. Consequently, no true collective bargaining took place before the injunction was issued.

Sometime during the 80-day period, the employers made an offer to the union. Indications were that they were prompted to do this because the law requires the National Labor Relations Board to poll employees on the employer's last offer 10 days before the injunction expires.

But the employers knew full well that that last offer would be rejected no matter what it was. The employees were also aware that the employers were unwilling to make their real last offer at that time. Consequently, the NLRB was compelled by law to conduct a ballot on a last offer which both sides knew was not the final word. Thus the Taft-Hartley law forced the water-front employers into a deliberately dishonest position which they had to take as a matter of self-protection. Such a situation does not, obviously, make for sound labor relations.

After the election, in which the employers' last offer was rejected overwhelmingly, the employers advanced what I am sure they intended to be their real last offer. When this was also rejected and a strike took place, the employers found themselves in the unenviable position of having twice made a last offer which was twice turned down. If only to preserve their bargaining integrity for future years, the employers could not immediately alter what they had advanced as their final position for the second time. No wonder, then, that the water-front strike dragged on for 3 weeks before both sides could find a face-saving compromise.

I feel strongly that the 80-day so-called cooling-off period of the Taft-Hartley law, which in this case became, instead, a heating-up period, actually impeded settlement of that dispute. This case, and others I have studied, convince me that the emergency provisions of the Taft-Hartley law are as harmful to employers as they are to unions.

For example, take the problem of retroactivity which the 80-day cooling-off period creates. If the Government enjoins a strike for 80 days, it is only fair to the employees to expect that any adjustment ultimately granted will be made retroactive to the date on which the contract expired. But this can be unfair to the employer since any adjustment in prices which he may have to make because of the wage increase cannot be made retroactive. This becomes especially difficult in the case of regulated companies who must apply to some public body for permission to make an adjustment in prices. Many of the regulated companies are in emergency industries. With employees understandably seeking retroactive adjustments and employers understandably resisting them, this issue of retroactivity, created by the 80-day cooling-off period, further complicates the dispute and makes it that much more difficult to settle.

There is another respect in which the 80-day cooling-off period can be harmful to employers as well as to unions. The date on which a contract expires usually has some special significance. It may be in the slow season of the employer's business so that he will not be under pressure of the full demand for his products or services while negotiating a labor contract. It might possibly be at the beginning of the period he negotiates with his customers for the services which he is to perform for them during the year. In order to fix his prices, the employer may have to know just what his labor costs will be. When, in effect, the termination date of the contract is extended for an additional 80 days, the basic relationship between the employer and the union may be altered. It is possible that such a postponement will improve the union's bargaining position and thereby work to the disadvantage of the employer. It might also have exactly the opposite effect. What the effect will be in any particular industry cannot, of course, be determined in advance. But this much is clear: The 80-day injunction provisions change by a substantial period of time the termination date which the parties themselves have selected for whatever reason they believe to justify such a date and thereby the injunction may work to the disadvantage of the employer, the union, or both.

The difficulty of applying fixed procedures to relations of employers and unions becomes clear when we consider the impact of the so-called Condon-Wadlin law of New York State on the garbage workers in Yonkers. That law makes it mandatory for any agency of the State Government to impose fixed penalties on employees who engage in a strike or other form of work stoppage. No matter what may be the merit of their complaint the same fixed penalties must be applied under this law. Because of these rigid requirements, a small grievance in Yonkers was blown up into a municipal calamity, with a garbage strike that threatened to endanger the health of the people. Finally the municipal authorities found it necessary to reinstate the strikers, withdraw all legal proceedings, and hope, I presume, that sleeping dogs would be permitted to lie.

The plain fact of the matter is that the relations of labor and management cannot be fitted into any fixed procedures no more than you can have one size shoe for every person in this country. There must be sufficient flexibility so that the problems of particular industries can be given proper consideration.

The experience we have had in New York leads me to these definite conclusions:

(1) A cooling-off period will not contribute to the settlement of labor disputes, but merely postpones the evil day, sometimes intensifies the dispute instead of helping in its settlement, and creates new issues for the parties to settle. In addition, the use of injunctions in labor disputes serves as a further irritant to a settlement when, as a matter of fact, labor negotiations yield only to persuasion and not to force.

(2) Fixed procedures specifying time limits and other requirements for the various stages of collective bargaining will not help settle disputes. The parties merely adjust their strategies to the new procedures.

(3) The most effective method of settling labor disputes is to concentrate all efforts on bringing about a settlement within the time limits fixed by the parties themselves or any extension that is mutually agreeable but not fixed by a blanket law for all disputes.

(4) The use of citizens' committees can be of great help in bringing about settlements if they are composed of outstanding men whose status and ability command the respect of the parties. These committees should function primarily as mediators. They should also be given the power to make recommendations, but should not be required to make recommendations. That matter should be left to their judgment so as to achieve the greatest degree of flexibility in order to fit the circumstances of the particular case.

(5) Every effort should be made to impress upon the parties their obligation to the public to reach a settlement without any interruption of work.

I am well aware that these suggestions do not guarantee complete elimination of emergency-type strikes. And I do not want to leave the impression that our system of mediation averted all emergency strikes in New York City. We have had a few critical strikes in the last 3 years. But for every strike we had, we averted 100 potential strikes of a serious nature. And the few strikes we had were brought to an end in less time, I am sure, than would have been the case if our procedures had not been used.

The plain fact is that there is no way to guarantee absolutely against strikes unless we enjoin them entirely and adopt the methods of the dictator countries. Even the Taft-Hartley law does not ban strikes permanently: it postpones the beginning of an "emergency" strike with the resultant harmful consequences I have described above.

So long as we want free private enterprise, we must also accept free collective bargaining with the possibility of a strike. But if we focus our main attention on ways and means of achieving agreements through collective bargaining, I do not believe we need be unduly concerned about strikes.

The Taft-Hartley provisions are defective because they start with the assumption that there will be a strike and then set up fixed procedures, with irritating injunctions, for dealing with them. These procedures, as I have shown, stifle collective bargaining and make agreements more difficult to achieve.

The primary emphasis must be placed on agreement-making. If that is done "emergency" strikes will virtually be avoided. Those few that may possibly occur will be far less of an evil than the procedures that upset collective bargaining and interfere with the ability of the parties to reach voluntary agreements.

Those are the conclusions I have reached on the basis of my experience as director of the Division of Labor Relations in handling "emergency" disputes for Mayor O'Dwyer which I respectfully submit for your consideration.

Mr. BAILEY. The next witness is Dr. Arthur Kornhauser.

To avoid the necessity for any member of the committe getting serious enough to ask about the party responsible for this gentleman's appearance, may I say that I suggested that this gentleman be invited to address the committee. I think he has some information that will be of benefit, and I would just like to say that I would like to have the Doctor give us just a little of his background. I am sure that he is well qualified for the purpose for which he makes his appearance.

You may proceed, Doctor.

Mr. KORNHAUSER. Thank you, Congressman.

TESTIMONY OF ARTHUR KORNHAUSER, PROFESSOR OF PSYCHOLOGY AND RESEARCH PSYCHOLOGIST, INSTITUTE OF INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS, WAYNE UNIVERSITY, DETROIT, MICH.

Mr. KORNHAUSER. I am glad to be of any use that I can to the committee in its deliberations. I am a psychologist by profession and have concerned myself, especialy for some years, with the problems of industrial relations, and especially the attitudes and opinions bearing upon labor relations.

I come before you this morning to discuss specifically the evidence from some of the opinion polls that have been widely publicized in recent times as bearing upon these labor relations questions and the laws pertaining to them.

My background, if I may say a word about it, in line with the request that the chairman just expressed, can be briefly summarized this way. I have my doctorate degree from the University of Chicago. I spent quite a few years on the faculty of the University of Chicago; during my period in Chicago. I also was the managing director of the Chicago office of the Psychological Corp., which is an organization of psychologists that has conducted a good deal of work in the industrial relations field and in the opinion polling field. I also conducted opinion and attitude studies there toward the social science research committe of the University and for the Office of Civilian Defense of Chicago during the war.

Subsequently, I spent several years with the Bureau of Applied Social Research at Columbia University as a research project director and consultant, and there, too, we conducted number inquiries in the attitude and opinion measurement fields, largely in reference to publications and radio audiences. At that time, too, I conducted a special type of polling effort, now terminated, which dealt with the polling of expert and specialized opinion on public questions rather than the ordinary sort of attempt to find out what the members of the public at large believe about these matters.

One of the questions which we polled experts at that time upon was specifically in this field of labor relations, and I may wish to say a word about that later. Currently I am at Wayne University in Detroit as professor of psychology, and as research psychologist for the institute of industrial relations which has been established at Wayne University to try to carry on educational and research work on these problems of labor-management relations in the Detroit area.

I want to speak particularly this morning about some of the polls, as I mentioned, which have been receiving rather wide publicity in recent weeks or months in connection with the legislative efforts pertaining to labor relations.

I should preface my further remarks on those particular matters by saying that I think public opinion polling has a very important and valued type of service, that it can and in many instances does perform. At the same time, like other good instruments, it is subject to abuse, and in my judgment a number of these recent polls have misused the public opinion polling technique in a manner that proves misleading and against which we need to be on guard.

I am referring particularly to the use of public opinion poll questions in some of the newspaper advertisements and circulated lists of questions by General Electric Co., by the Revere Copper & Brass, Inc., and in the way of a more specific opinion poll conducted among working people, both office and factory, which was widely publicized early by Dr. Claude Robinson, the president of Opinion Research Corp.

That material, with which I am sure most of you are familiar, was published in Look magazine originally in September 1947, and in a later follow-up publication in, I believe it was, June 1948. The details are more specific in the prepared statement that I have put into the hands of the committee.

The questions that I think we need to ask ourselves with respect to such opinion-polling materials are two, that I want particularly to deal with this morning. One is the question of how adequately and how fairly and fully any such list of questions does correspond to the actual content of the Taft-Hartley Act or of proposed legislation in this field. The second question has to do with the matter of how far the ordinary member of the public, the kind of person who is reached by polling techniques, is equipped by special information and understanding to answer in an intelligent and meaningful way the points that are put before him in those questions.

There are, of course, many other critical questions that can be raised and need to be raised with respect to polling procedures: The selection of the sample of people, whether it really represents the public, for example; the way in which the interviewers, in the case of field interviewing, proceed, whether they are properly trained and supervised to avoid biases; the way in which the results of such polls are analyzed and interpreted and published.

I shall omit these questions except as they may be referred to in questioning later, in order that I can concentrate on this matter of the poll questions themselves.

Incidentally, all of those matters are receiving a great deal more attention now by the pollsters than they received prior to last November 2. I cannot refrain from adding that my own criticisms of the matter in question antedate November 2 by many months, and in some instances, by some years, so that I do not feel that I am being particularly uncharitable now in repeating criticisms that I expressed much earlier.

On the face of the matter, and perhaps this is so obvious that it needs no elaborate defense, it seems clear that any short list of 10 or 18 questions composed in language simple enough for at least many citizens to understand, cannot adequately reflect the actual complications and indirect implications and interrelations of the provisions in a law such as the Taft-Hartley Act.

The discussions before this committee, including the one that has taken place this morning, would seem to me to be ample evidence of how far short the ordinary citizen's thinking is likely to fall comprehending and dealing with the matters in question in the actual bill when he was confronted simply with a question like, for example, this first one in the Look magazine material by Dr. Robinson, which asked, "If you were in Congress, would you be for or against a law to require unions to give 60 days' notice before they can go on strike?"

Now, that is all it asks with reference to that entire matter. I can scarcely be assumed that that does properly portray to the respondent who is being questioned the actual issues that are involved in the detailed provisions of the law.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. Kornhauser, may I ask one question there just for information? Let us take that question. Could you word it in a way that could be fair? And if you could, would you tell us what that would be?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. I was about to say within the next few minutes that I believe that that is an impossible task. I believe that it is an improper type of question to attempt to use with the general public. Some of the other questions seem to me even better to illustrate the impossibility, justifiably, of reflecting what is in the law, with all the best intentions in the world.

For example, another of Dr. Robinson's questions was, "If you were in Congress, would you be for or against a law to forbid a company to have a union shop until a majority of all the workers vote in favor of it?"

A few words are added in definition of a union shop. But that question certainly does not direct the attention of the persons answering, although technically it may be in the question, to this problem, for example, of whether it is wise to require a majority of all eligible voters or a majority, as in ordinary election procedures, of those who are voting, then certainly a more or less subtle point of that kind which, however, may be highly important, does not get into the thinking of the person who is asked this over-simplified version of the question.

Similarly, there is no hint in such a question of the various detailed procedures and the possibilities of delay that are entailed by the actual specific provisions of the law.

As you gentlemen know far better than most of the rest of us, the difficulties in drawing good legislation arise not with respect to the general objectives in broad, vague terms, such as are stated in these questions, but the difficulties and the real problems lie in the framing of detailed provisions and specifications that will enable the objectives to be achieved without being more costly and doing more harm in the process than is warranted by the goals that are achieved. And that difficulty and that source of error are true in the questions in all of these questionnaires that I have referred to, and I should suppose also in the questions that I understand Mr. Fulton Lewis has used over the radio, the responses to which undoubtedly been brought to the attention of many of you in Congress.

Other questions in the lists are faulty in their overgeneralities, not only in their failure to reflect some of the details and technical matters of the essence of the case but in being so general that they prove, it would seem to me, entirely worthless as expressions of the attitude on specific matters that have to be considered in legislation.

For example, from the Revere Copper & Brass list, I take these two questions:

Should the labor law protect both employers and unions against violations of contracts mutually agreed upon?

And:

Should the labor law protect the employee against the use of violence, force, or intimidation?

I do not think I need to comment in detail on these questions. We can come back to some of them if any of you care to later.

Other poll questions use rather loaded language. That is, they are open to criticism in terms of the biased wording. For example, another question from this Revere Copper & Brass questionnaire:

Should the union shop, under which a person is forced to join a union a short time after his employment, be unlawful?—

makes that same mistake.

Now, Americans are likely to react against anything that a person is forced to do, especially when, as here, no explanation or justification is offered as to who forces whom or why. The question would be a little nearer the law and less open to charges of bias if it mentioned that a majority of employees have entered into an agreement with the employer that requires employees to join the union within a specified time. There are various other employees that I could cite with such use of language as to bias responses.

But the more general point, if I may return to it for a moment, is, as I conceive it, the rather patent impossibility of summing up in a brief statement that will be understandable by the ordinary member of the public and will at the same time reflect the actual content of an intricate provision of such a law as this.

The second question that I mentioned has to do with the people's ability to answer. You see, even if it were possible now to get questions that accurately tell what is in the law, then I would still maintain that it is unthinkable that any large part of the public would be sufficiently informed and have sufficient experience, under the implications and interrelations of those provisions of the law to be able to answer in a way that indicates that they know what they answer or know what they mean.

Public opinion polls in general have failed sufficiently to recognize the fact that not every sort of question is appropriate for public opinion polling. Some questions do produce valuable responses while others can only be addressed to special subpublic, such as experts, leaders, or other groups who are particularly qualified through particular experience to be able to answer the question.

As to the general public, the kind of question that is most valuable is that which reflects broad, general social objectives, general goals that the people want to have achieved, leaving the means or the instrumentalities to the gentlemen who make the laws and leaving to their own leaders to help formulate the means of carrying out the object. The polls are also valuable as means of reflecting the feelings that people have about their own intimate problems, their own experiences as working people in this case, and what they feel needs to be done to better protect their interests.

But what I am adding is that there is an important place for expert views and views of leaders rather than depending upon public-opinion polls that try to get cross-sections of the general population.

I mentioned earlier that I had conducted a number of such polls of expert views, one of them on problems of labor relations including specific questioning about compulsory arbitration. That, I think, is rather interesting as an illustration of the point that I am making because at the time, 2 or 3 years ago—and this had been true through the war and in the post-war years, as you know—public opinion polls conducted by Dr. Gallup and Fortune Surveys and others were showing a vast majority of the public saying, "Yes, let us have a law to forbid strikes; let us have compulsory arbitration under governmental auspices."

It seems to me that what was reflected in that answer was the public's irritation, annoyance, and dislike of strikes, and its wanting to see something done about it. And when the question was asked, "should there be a law to forbid them," yes, that was a practical remedy, and hence people seized upon it as the thing they were for. Actually, I think they were voting in terms of a vague, general sentiment against the interference with production and the public inconvenience occasioned by strikes. That, I think, is rather characteristic of these questions that ask about specific matters which are not within the range of the respondent's information, and hence which he answers in terms of very vague, general, overall, and indefinite sentiments that do not mean what they seem to mean.

I say, at the time the public was recording its opinion strong for compulsory arbitration, this poll of experts' views by persons who had spent many years and in many instances their entire lives in the labor relations field, some of them associated with labor unions and some associated with industrial managements, many of them associated with Government and with universities in independent or semi-independent positions, all agreed overwhelmingly that compulsory arbitration was undesirable and ineffective.

It seems to me in all these more technical matters, we do have to reply upon the natural leaders of people, their politically elected representatives, and their labor union representatives, and their management personnel, to reflect the views that take into account the actual intricacies of the problem, the pros and cons, the longer-run effects of the proposed actions, rather than using the uninformed opinions of the public.

The errors that I am pointing to here lie not in the fact that people are expressing general sentiments. I think that is the kind of thing that opinion polls should get at. It lies rather in the fact that specific questions are used which pretend that people are answering the particular matter covered in the question when in fact they are rather expressing the vague, general impressions in respect to what they vaguely feel the question is touching upon.

Mr. BAILEY. Would you say at that point, Doctor, that there might be some prejudice?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. These vague general sentiments might well be called prejudices. I think it is another name for what I am referring to.

Doubts about the meaning of people's replies to all questions are augmented by certain research findings regarding what people have in mind in answering. In several instances, after people have answered the simple poll questions—not these particular ones I am referring to, but other ones that I think are strictly comparable, but with reference to other public issues—they have then been asked to explain what they had in mind, what the question meant to them, and what they thought they were saying. And in several of those studies, it has become apparent that people who gave in some instances the same answer had entirely opposite views on the matter in question, and that in other instances people who had similar views gave opposite answers.

One other piece of evidence that I would like to mention is that that pertains to the large areas of public misinformation and ignorance with respect to labor relations matters. Dr. Robinson himself, in this Look magazine study, reports that 54 percent of the people interviewed were unable to mention a single specific provision contained in the bill. That is, over half of the people knew nothing that was in the bill. And yet their opinion is taken on these various oversimplified questions as though those, then, do reflect their attitudes on these matters in the bill.

Other polling agencies have reported as many as two-thirds or even four-fifths of the people unable to answer certain poll questions on particular labor topics. That emphasizes the impossibility of obtaining a true cross-section of popular attitudes on the more difficult and technical questions. What happens, clearly, is that if one takes the answers only from those parts of the public that can answer, he gets the highly educated, or tends to get more strongly a reflection of the views of the highly educated persons, which goes along with the more prosperous persons, and hence gives a rather disorted picture of the public at large, through its failure to include the lower income and more poorly educated groups, who, I think we have ample evidence, are more likely to be concerned about preserving the interests of strong labor unionism.

The somewhat difficult wording of questions in some of these lists adds to this difficulty because it means that a rather high, or reasonably high, degree of literacy is required on the part of the persons who do and will respond.

Take such a question, for example, as this:

> Should labor laws protect the employer and the employees in a plant where there is no labor dispute from interference by a union which is seeking to coerce another employer with whom it is in dispute?

That is an attempt to get into reasonably simple language the notion of secondary boycotts. But it seems to me it places a pretty great burden upon the person who is not already familiar with what the whole issue involved is.

Yet people feel that they know that. I suspect often they feel that any strike is unjustified about which it is worth raising a question. And if the question is raised, it must have something bad about it, and they say, "I am against unions and strikes, anyhow." That is what we get, rather than a vote on specific matters.

All of this seems to add up to me the need for very heavily discounting the results, if not completely wiping them off the slate, from such polls materials as those that I have been referring to.

With your permission, I might try to summarize a few of the main points I make by reading a brief quotation from a letter that I recently wrote in answer to a request from one of the leading poll-takers in which he asked me to suggest questions for his agency to use in the next few months on the debate over the Taft-Hartley bill. He called it the "Bill."

I said in answer to him:

> The central point is that technical questions regarding specific measures of control, such as the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law, are not appropriate for public opinion polling. On such issues the public should be asked only broad questions regarding the social objectives and directions of change; attitudes toward different means must be judged by experts and leaders. In my judgment it is totally impossible to frame questions on the points in the Taft-Hartley law in a way that will be simple enough to be understood and answered by the ordinary voter and that will at the same time be adequate in the reflection of the actual import of the law. People's responses to necessarily oversimplified questions about the law are bound to be misleading. The responses will appear to be on the specific technical point at issue when in actuality they will be expressing general sentiments set off by what the respondent vaguely suppose the question to mean.
> The views of the ordinary individual concerning the specific sections of the Taft-Hartley law are vastly less important than the question of whom he trusts to represent his interests in these matters. Accordingly, the most soundly revealing questions for your polls would be the ones that inquire whether the respondent knows the stand that labor union leaders and the political friends of labor unionists have taken toward the law and whether the respondent is willing to accept their leadership in this connection.

In other words, I am saying that public opinion is not directly expressed in polls of this kind in a significant and effective way nearly so well as it is reflected in the willingness to follow and support given types of leaders, political leaders, labor union leaders, and community leadership or church leadership, or whatever sort the individual has come to trust in the particular area, as to the matter under consideration.

That completes my statement, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Irving, do you have any questions?

Mr. IRVING. I do not have too many. I was going to say that Mr. Wilson, of General Electric, testified they had 750,000 of their questionnaires printed, at the expense of $40,000, I believe, and 200,000 of them were sent to their employees; that is, he stated they had 200,000 employees, approximately.

Would the poll have been, in your opinion, a little more accurate if it had been a little blind on its face, and not stating that it came from General Electric?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. I think the question answers it itself, and I would add that the people being reached are certainly not representative, even apart from any influence in the questionnaire itself, of the public, as a whole, or as of working people as a whole.

Mr. IRVING. They might get adverse answers because of the fact some of their employees were strong union people who would resent the poll, and then they might get people who feared not to answer them as they thought they were desired to be answered? I mean it is not a good test, in your opinion?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. I think there are so many motivations inducing him to answer in the direction he does, and with the misunderstanding he may have as to the questions, that the results are completely worthless.

Mr. IRVING. I know from my own experience that the average workingman, or union man, does not answer too many letters, or does not answer too many polls, and is not qualified or capable to answer too many questions, or his literacy is not of a high quality—and I am not criticizing in any way that particular thing, either—but I think experience in the field that you are talking about, practical experience, has something to do with it, as to your ability to answer these questions properly. I myself could not answer one on how to perform a tonsilectomy, or something like that, or how to examine a bank. I think accommodations, convenience, inconvenience, sentiments, emotions, and prejudices have a great deal to do with the answers, and I feel, as you say, that we should perhaps discount a great deal for that reason.

That is all, and I will yield the balance of my time to Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. Doctor, I am quite interested in your statement. I find that you and I are more or less kindred spirits. A gentleman by the name of Fulton Lewis—commonly known in most professions as "fulminating Fulton"—has been trying to take a good deal of my hide off, recently, because I questioned his poll. I have commented in the committee room that I am proud of my friends, but I am prouder of my enemies.

But to get down to the subject: It seems like you and I have been keeping paralleling information. I have the poll here of Dr. Robinson that appeared in Collier's, was it not?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. Look magazine.

Mr. JACOBS. That is right, Look.

For example, take question No. 2—we are considering loaded questions. Take question No. 2: We are asked whether or not we would favor a law that would give a company the right to sue the union if it breaks its contract. Do you not read in that an implication that prior to the enactment of the Taft-Hartley law that the company could not sue the union?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. I think the ordinary person would read that into it.

Mr. JACOBS. And, of course, with the background of agitation that went through the 1930's that unions should be incorporated so that they could be sued, and that having been spread before the public over a number of years, would more or less lend itself to that conception of that question?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. May I add that it would seem to me perhaps even more serious. There is no hint in such a simplified question of the matter of the union being made liable for the actions of subordinate officials, any shop steward, for example, and if a person knew the full facts there he might very well vote differently on even an obvious question like this.

Mr. JACOBS. But even forgetting the question of an agency which used to keep me up burning the midnight oil when I was going to college—and it still sends me back to the musty library—just leaving the broad aspect as to whether the union could not be sued, that implies that before the Taft-Hartley Act, the union could not be sued, does it not?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. I think so.

Mr. JACOBS. We had one witness who was an employer—and I rather got myself embarrassed as a result of my questions—he gave rather vigorous testimony that the Taft-Hartley law should be retained so that unions could be sued the same as an employer, for breaching a contract, and I asked him who told him it was possible to sue only after the Taft-Hartley law was passed, and he said his lawyer, and I told him if he would have his lawyer write me a letter I would be glad to give him the information about it, and it turned out his lawyer was sitting in back of him in the room, and he was not very happy, but he did not dispute the point when he came up to talk to me about it.

Take question No. 8 on Dr. Robinson's poll; that is about the union shop. Are you familiar with the fact that the poll did not stop at the printing stage, but that during the last campaign they followed out the suggestions of the Taft-Hartley law, section 8 (c), and went into the visual form of communication, and drew cartoons which the artist purported to say carried out the public's opinion as shown by Dr. Robinson's poll?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. I have not seen the cartoon, no.

Mr. JACOBS. There was a series of them. They were run in one of the local papers back in Indianapolis, Ind., in opposition to my candidacy. The cartoon, so we can have it in the record as best we can, shows before and after—it is one of the before-and-after deals, you know—like the advertisement or the booklet which guarantees you can be the life of the party—and up above is the employer sitting at the desk, and the gentleman applying for a job, and there is a very, very disconcerted look upon both faces, and it states, "We have a job for you"—the right-to-work idea—"but first you must apply for membership and be accepted by a labor union because we have a closed-shop contract."

That is the end of that scene.

The next scene is the afterscene. There is the employee standing at the same desk, and the same employer, but their faces are beaming with smiles, and the employer says, "You can start to work tomorrow, and if you like the job and your work is satisfactory you must join the union in 30 days because we have a union-shop contract."

And the picture gives a very, very happy feeling because the man, of course, got himself a job.

Do you think that that cartoon, and others similar to it, would probably carry the impression that with the provision of the Taft-Hartley law—and, incidentally, it is headed "The Taft-Hartley law—that very beautiful and neighborly combination that is shown at the bottom is definitely attributed to the Taft-Hartley law—do you think that might gain the impression of the average person that once that union election was held, and that the employer always granted the union security shop, and it was just a matter of election—do you think it might give that impression?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. I think it is quite reasonable to suppose it would.

Mr. JACOBS. I have had a labor union, a rather large one, suggest we retain that provision in the law, but add to it the provision that once the union security provision was won by the union that it automatically and by force of law becomes a part of the contract, which again illustrates a provision of today may lead to other provisions later on, as the gentleman who preceded you said. Those are not usually pointed out in the polls, either; is that correct?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. That is certainly correct.

Mr. JACOBS. Take General Electric's question No. 18, for example—I have not asked you, are you reasonably familiar with the Taft-Hartley law, or have you made any study of it?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. I certainly am no expert on it, and I am not trained in the law, but I am familiar with it as an ordinary intelligent citizen might be.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you recognize question 18 involves the interpretation of a number of provisions of the Taft-Hartley law, or are you sufficiently familiar with it?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. I recognize that it omits many of the technical matters that are of a good deal of importance in connection with what you are presumably asking about.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you recognize the last words there? "At the conclusion of a strike" is definitely a misrepresentation of the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. Yes. May I add that that was called to my attention when I read the Congressional Record of your report as to your letter to Mr. C. E. Wilson?

Mr. JACOBS. I am glad my poor debunking efforts are getting around a little, from time to time.

Did you happen to read in the Congressional Record my report upon the result of the poll that Mr. Lewis induced by his fumbling and fulminating?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. Yes, I saw that.

Mr. JACOBS. In other words, by virtue of his inducing questions to be answered and, particularly question 14, which he plagiarized from the General Electric questionnaire, and only changed just a few words, 70 out of 91 people said they were opposed to laws that forbade violence. He described that in his broadcast, and said an avalanche of mail on that "had come into my office." I understand the gentleman is subsidized in his broadcasts, and I am not, so I cannot get a Nation-wide broadcast to answer him; but nevertheless, I did not consider it an avalanche, nor did I put anything in the poll. I do not believe they thought the law should not forbid violence.

You have not had the opportunity to read the testimony of Mr. C. E. Wilson?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. No; I have not.

Mr. JACOBS. Since you have been making a study of polls, may I suggest—and I will get the information for you myself if you will call it to my attention, when it is printed—I suggest you get the testimony of Mr. Wilson in reference to his poll. It will disclose the following:

When I came to ask questions in regard to his questionnaire, the first simple question that was asked him was in regard to question 7, and he referred it immediately to his general counsel.

At that point, we stopped to get the record straight, and we found he had the following people around him to help him answer the questions: The general counsel of General Electric, the vice president in charge of labor relations, the attorney for labor relations, and Mr. Gerard Reilly, who is said to be one of the chief architects of the Taft-Hartley law, and a General Electric legislative representative, and three other unnamed experts.

The record will disclose that I had stated to Mr. Wilson and Mr. Boulware, the vice president in charge of labor relations, that I was going to propound to him the following day, when they visited me in my office, a certain question; and I stated the question and I propounded it to Mr. Boulware, and he conceded that I had propounded it 24 hours in advance, but he said he could not answer it, and referred it to counsel for his department, and counsel for his department could not answer it, or, at least, could not point out the section in the Taft-Hartley law which made the provisions that had been claimed.

I just merely make that as a suggestion that it might be a good addition to your study.

Mr. KORNHAUSER. Yes; I certainly shall want to see it.

Mr. JACOBS. I believe that is all.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. McConnell, do you have some questions of the witness?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Doctor, I enjoyed your statement. I do not entirely agree with you, but I enjoyed it. I listened to the protestations of some of my colleagues on the other side, and I think they protested too much.

You are a psychologist, and I can say very frankly to you my observation of reactions is that they vary according to "whose ox is gored." I have known such polls to be contrary to my ideas, and when that occurs I try to create an atmosphere that they are not much good. If it is in my favor I try to play it up, and if it is not I play it down, so I think psychology enters into it.

Mr. KORNHAUSER. May I interject the remark it seems to me you are discussing the use of polls as propaganda. If they are recognized to be such I have no serious objection to each person using the polls to argue in the direction he wants to have proven, but what many of us who are in the attitude and opinion research field are trying to do is to assist, and to have an instrument here that can ascertain valuable information which is simply not to be taken or left, depending on whether it pleases or displeases.

Mr. MCCONNELL. I believe many organizations have seriously endeavored to arrive at conclusions as to public opinion on various questions, and I think they have meant it seriously; but the way it has worked out in our political ramifications, and so on, it ends up with a particular poll being condemned or praised, according to how it affects our own opinions or our own particular group or cause.

In the very last paragraph in your statement you say—

> The views of the ordinary individual concerning the specific sections of the Taft-Hartley law are vastly less important than the question of whom he trusts to represent his interest in these matters. Accordingly, the most soundly revealing questions for your polls would be the ones that inquire whether the respondent knows the stand that labor union leaders and the political friends of labor unionism have taken toward the law, and whether the respondent is willing to accept their leadership in this connection.

I would say you are definitely freezing what the answers and opinions would be. I cannot imagine a poll that would be generally contrary to the special group interest concerning certain questions. Labor men would generally vote along the lines probably of their labor leaders, because they would trust them, and you would have a vice versa situation in connection with the other side of that question. In other words, I believe you have a loaded poll, you might say, either way. I cannot imagine a group of labor leaders who would answer the questions on the Taft-Hartley in a way which would be contrary to their position in their union, regardless of the right or wrong of such a view. I mean it may be an incorrect view, but that would be their view as they prefer to believe it, and as they see it, and it would run along those particular channels. I do not think you get a very revealing poll under such a paragraph as that.

Mr. KORNHAUSER. The only purpose, Congressman, that I have in mind in suggesting that sort of thing, is to find out how many people feel loyal to each type of leadership, the union leadership and various other forms of leadership, and it seems to me that is a legitimate and somewhat informative type.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Questionnaires are submitted to us as candidates for office, and on those questionnaires they will often say, "Do you favor H. R. bill so-and-so, for this or that?" And that bill will change considerably between the time the questionnaire has reached us and the time the final vote is taken, and it makes our answer meaningless. I do not know whether they should continue polls, except for specific purposes, as they are, in business companies, more like a market analysis or something of that sort. I do not know the—

Mr. JACOBS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCCONNELL. My view is that I think every man has a right to conduct a poll, and any kind of a poll he wants to conduct.

Mr. JACOBS. He certainly has. And the other fellow has a right to debunk it.

Mr. MCCONNELL. That is what happens; if it does not agree with our opinion, we debunk it.

Mr. WIER. Will you yield?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Yes.

Mr. WIER. I have been concerned because there are three types of questionnaires that have come to my office as the result of my being a member of this Labor Committee. One was from the General Electric, and one from Mr. Fulton Lewis, and then there is another one I have been getting. I got some consideration, Mr. McConnell, out of the General Electric questionnaires, because they were all signed. I do not want to indicate the number I received, but they were all signed and they came from my district, so I had a pretty good idea of who had taken interest enough to sign them and fill out the questionnaires.

But on the Fulton Lewis questionnaire there is no designation. I would like to know who is sending them out, whether it is the down-below, or middle, or top, and I have to have those checked individually. The others are signed, so I get an idea about who sends them. In other words, I get a reaction as to where the noes and yeses come from.

Mr. JACOBS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. I will say this, that as a candidate I never failed to answer a communication that was addressed to me, or a question; but as a candidate I never answered "yes" or "no." I took the question and wrote my opinion on the subject and sent it back. I did that as an elected official and as a candidate, because I took a firm stand that I would not answer "yes" or "no," except as to the most simple questions. For example, on questions 1 and 2 on the General Electric questionnaire, I received such a questionnaire from labor, such a question as No. 1, and I expanded on it, and told them my views on the whole subject. I thought they were entitled to it.

Mr. KORNHAUSER. The diffiulty, it seems to me, in accepting the questionnaires that are sent in even when they are signed, is, first, you do not know through what range of the population they were distributed, and, if, for example, they had been given to only top-income groups, then naturally they will tend to be reacted to, and answered in a somewhat different way from what would have been true if they had been distributed throughout the population; and, in the second place, if they have been answered by representatives of the people the question is whether they know what they are answering, and if the answers mean anything. I think we have ample evidence to show that many replies to such questions do not mean what they seem to.

Mr. MCCONNELL. I am absolutely opposed to any law or bill that would forbid polls. I think people have that right in this country, but I do believe they are received or accepted in the light of one's own personal opinion about something; I think that is the general human tendency. If a poll suits them, they will voice approval, and if it does not suit them, as my colleague here mentioned, then they will start to try to debunk it.

Mr. KORNHAUSER. I think that is true, but we had better set as our goal, it seems to me, in this matter, the type of acceptance or rejection that we have toward scientific evidence and conclusions in other fields. We may not like what a thorough physical, medical examination shows, but we are confident enough that we are likely to accept the judgment of the competent physician.

There are sound polling techniques, and there is good procedure that does get results that stand up under criticism, and it is not, it seems to me, taking what you like and rejecting what you do not like.

Mr. MCCONNELL. I wonder what the reaction would have been if the General Electric polls had been in the opposite direction.

Mr. KORNHAUSER. I personally do not know what direction the replies have taken, but I can guess. I am criticizing it as a technical instrument, or a technical procedure. The doctor does not examine your lungs without a stethoscope. I think this is just a poor method, and that is the basis on which I am offering my criticisms, and not in terms of any results.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Thank you, Doctor.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. Your testimony sums up to me just a general indictment against the American public that they are too dumb to answer anything except in the broad field of social legislation.

Mr. KORNHAUSER. That certainly is far from my own way of summarizing what I think I have said.

Mr. SMITH. About the only poll you would agree to would be the Hooper rating, and you would call up a man on the telephone, and say, "What program are you listening to," and then you would want him to turn it up loud enough so you could listen and check it?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. On the contrary. I have conducted a good many polls myself, indicating I think people could get valuable results from the public, and I have gotten results I found enlightening; and many other people, I think, have found them useful. It is not my intention at all, as I tried to state at the outset, to damn all opinion polling. I am trying to make a distinction between sound, effective procedure and slipshod and biased procedure.

Mr. SMITH. Will you tell me some people in this country that you poll? You said you cannot trust the masses and you cannot trust the higher brackets.

Mr. KORNHAUSER. I will repeat that I have conducted polls of the public as a whole, and I have great confidence in opinion polls of the public if the questions are ones within the experience and competence of those people. I similarly have conducted polls in the rank and file employees in companies, and have asked them questions with respect to their own feelings about their work and job relations. It is not that I distrust their attitude and opinions, except as to complex social questions where, it seems to me, perfectly clear that the ordinary persons—and I include college professors—cannot answer. I have asked some of my academic colleagues, and they are frank to confess they do not know enough about what is in the law to be able to answer the questions intelligently.

Mr. SMITH. In a field of law or legislation do you think the average man can answer, in your definition, an intelligent poll?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. If you refer to the specific forms of legislation, and the specific elements and provisions in law, I would say the ordinary man is not the person to judge the matter at all.

Mr. SMITH. My opening statement was that you have indicted the whole American public because they do not know anything about the technique, or anything about the law.

Mr. KORNHAUSER. About the technical aspects of the law, I think that is a position that can readily be defended.

Mr. SMITH. What would you ask him?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. Questions about his objectives: whether he thinks, for example, labor unions do have too much power, and should be regulated.

Mr. SMITH. You are going to send out a questionnaire and say, "Do you believe labor unions have too much power?"

Mr. KORNHAUSER. I, in general, would not do any polling by mailing a questionnaire. I think the only way to find out what a person thinks is through personal interview, and I would always have the response of free answers, where he can tell me in his own words at some length.

Mr. SMITH. In other words, when you take a poll you want to cross-examine the witness?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. No; I would not cross-examine—if I may differ again—I say it is a matter of seeing what he really has in mind.

Mr. SMITH. Then, after he tells you, you are going to put down the answer as to what he honestly thinks?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. It is done by first-rate polling agencies and surveying agencies, right along. I will mention, for example the Survey Research Center at the University of Michigan, which is doing a first-rate job on all sorts of complex questions along the lines I am testifying.

Mr. SMITH. But experts must ask the question, and experts must classify them, and then say what the man said and what he meant?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. It is a technical job to do this, as it is to carry on any other kind of scientific research.

Mr. SMITH. In other words, the polls, then, are in the realm of scientific research, and do not belong down in the lower stratus of society?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. The supervision is a problem of scientific research, and the response comes from the general run of people.

Mr. SMITH. How do you suppose the old town halls in New England got along without all of that?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. There was sufficient discussion of each matter, I think, so they were able to crystallize their opinions; and, moreover, they were able to see which of the leaders in whom they had confidence locally, were on each side.

Mr. SMITH. You are placing great emphasis upon leaders here this morning, and people who believe in their leaders.

Mr. KORNHAUSER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH. Where I come from they do not place must emphasis on the leaders; they do their own thinking—of course, under your definition, they do not do any thinking—but they do not want anybody telling them how to think on these matters; they express their own opinions.

Mr. KORNHAUSER. They derive their opinions on technical problems from what they read and hear.

Mr. SMITH. You have laid great stress here on the social sciences and social objectives.

Mr. KORNHAUSER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH. Do you not think that is just as technical as labor legislation, or any other field?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. No; I should say the broad goals we have, and the broad kinds of society we want to see, is something that everyone has a feeling about.

Mr. SMITH. Security—social security, and old age, for instance?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. That is an example.

Mr. SMITH. Everybody believes in that, but the methods sometimes are not agreed upon?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. I agree completely.

Mr. SMITH. That is all.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Just one more thing: Having listened to the later discussion, I am convinced we should continue all the polls and let the chips fall where they may. That would be the easiest way to handle it, instead of getting into technical problems, and let us have a lot of polls, and continue the battle of polls in the future.

Mr. KORNHAUSER. Would you say the same thing about medical practice, Mr. Congressman?

Mr. JACOBS. Just one additional question: Is not the distinction between a poll, and the type of so-called polls, as we have from General Electric, that the General Electric is actually a sort of a straw vote, but a poll is one in which opinion is properly weighted scientifically to determine public opinion?

Mr. KORNHAUSER. Yes; I think that is true. These are not polls in a true sense of the word.

Mr. JACOBS. I might say, Mr. Chairman, in that regard, that in the last election there were two daily newspapers ran polls in my town, and one of them simply sent out cards to literally thousands and thousands of people throughout the city, and they showed me defeated by about 20 percent. The other newspaper took what they called a weighted poll, which was taken somewhere along the line—I could not understand it myself—the man who took the poll had to explain it to me, and I threw up my hands as to how he was doing it, and his percentages of it. It showed me elected and, gentlemen, I am here.

Mr. SMITH. That was a scientific poll.

Mr. BAILEY. Doctor, you will please submit your formal statement for inclusion in the record, and for members of the committee.

(The statement referred to is as follows:)

STATEMENT BY ARTHUR KORNHAUSER

PUBLIC OPINION POLL QUESTIONS BEARING ON CURRENT LABOR BILLS

I am glad to appear before the committee to be of any assistance I can in discussing questions within my special field of competence. I am a psychologist, formerly on the faculty of the University of Chicago and of Columbia University, and now at Wayne University in Detroit. My research and publications deal principally with the psychology of labor relations and with the study of attitudes and opinions in that area.

Specifically, I came here today to state my views regarding certain recent opinion polls that have been given wide publicity because of their presumed significant bearing on current labor legislation. I wish particularly to discuss two such uses of poll questions pertaining to the Taft-Hartley Act.

The first is a set of questions reported by Dr. Claude Robinson, president of Opinion Research Corp., in Look magazine. The original publication was in the issue of September 30, 1947; a later report occurs in the issue of June 8, 1948.

The second type of questioning is that utilized in recent lists of questions circulated to the public by General Electric Co. and by Revere Copper and Brass, Inc. Doubtless these sets of questions have come to your attention in recent weeks since the persons receiving them, or seeing them as newspaper advertisements, are urged to send them as ballots to their Congressmen.

I do not know how seriously you gentlemen take the views ostensibly revealed by such polls. But I believe it profoundly important that all of us, citizens and elected representatives alike, keep ourselves alerted to certain inherent defects and misleading implications in these procedures for determining "the public will."

There are two basic questions we may well ask ourselves in this connection:

(1) How adequately and fairly do the poll questions express the actual content of the law, or the proposed legislation?

(2) Does the ordinary citizen have the necessary information and understanding to know what his yes-no responses to the questions really mean?

You will note that I am omitting numerous other important questions of polling techniques and procedures—whether the questions are put to a representative sample of people; whether the interviewrs who ask the questions are properly selected, trained, and supervised; whether the results are analyzed and reported in a justifiable manner. These problems are now receiving a great deal of critical attention among opinion pollers—considerably more attention than was accorded them prior to last November 2. I omit them today in order to concentrate on the single matter of the poll questions themselves.

(1) On the face of the matter, one is entitled to entertain serious doubts whether a few simple poll questions can adequately represent what is in a complex piece of legislation like the Taft-Hartley law. Even before examining the specific questions, it appears unreasonable to suppose that a short question or two on union security, for example, or on free speech for employers, or on jurisdictional disputes or decertification procedures, could possibly put before the voter a correct and sufficiently complete idea of what the law provides and how it would work in practice.

A few examples from the three sets of questions mentioned above will illustrate that these doubts are not without substance.

Dr. Robinson boils the Taft-Hartley law down to 10 very brief questions and finds that a majority of working people are in favor of every single one of the 10 parts (both in 1947 and 1948). One of the questions reads as follows:

"If you were in Congress, would you be for or against a law to forbid a company to have a union shop until a majority of all the workers vote in favor of it. * * *?"

There can be no surprise that four out of five working people voted for this simplified statement of the law. I leave it to you who are familiar with the law to say whether the statement adequately presents the issue. It scarcely insures that respondents will notice that a majority of all eligible voters is required rather than the usual election procedure based on a majority of votes cast. It surely gives no indication of the various procedural requirements and potential delays that are introduced by the law itself.

It would appear quite possible for a voter thoughtfully to approve Dr. Robinson's deceptively simple version of the law on this point and nevertheless to be strongly opposed to the Taft-Hartley regulations on what is supposed by the same point. This is characteristic of a number of the poll questions under consideration. To the extent that it is the case, one must question whether the accumulated replies to such poll item add up to any useful and meaningful knowledge at all as regards people's views on the concrete provisions of the act.

Certain other questions are so general that they have no clear reference to actual or proposed legislation. For example, one of the General Electric questions reads as follows:

"Should labor laws protect the employee against unfair practices by unions and management?"

Since we are all against unfairness, an affirmative response is easy to give. But the problems arise over what are unfair practices, in what way are they to be prevented, and by what specific procedures are they to be dealt with when they occur. These essential matters are completely sidestepped in the question.

Other examples of very general, indefinite questions are the two that follow, from the Revere Copper & Brass list:

"Should the labor law protect both employers and unions against violations of contracts mutually agreed upon?"

"Should the labor law protect the employee against the use of violence, force, or intimidation?"

While assent can confidently be expected to these items, one wonders how useful the replies are in guiding concrete efforts to write a sound labor-relations law.

A few of the poll questions are also open to criticism because of biased wording. A single example will illustrate—a question taken from the Revere Copper & Brass questionnaire:

"Should the union shop, under which a person is forced to join a union a short time after his employment, be unlawful?"

Americans are likely to react against anything a person is "forced" to do—especially when, as here, no explanation or justification is offered as to who forces whom or why. The question would be a little nearer the law and less open to charges of bias if it mentioned that a majority of the employees have entered into an agreement with the employer and that under this agreement employees are required to join the union.

More important than these criticisms of particular questions, however, is the general proposition that simple poll questions cannot possibly present fully and fairly what is in the law. Questionnaires like the three considered here are deceptively innocent in their coverage of vital (and controversial) features of the law. As a consequence, it is my judgment that people's votes on such questions yield no reliable indication of what these persons desire or oppose in actual labor legislation.

(2) My second major critical question has to do with people's ability to respond to opinion polls on complex technical issues. Even if questions could be asked that adequately represented the content of the law, the replies would be of little value, in my judgment, and might prove more misleading than helpful. Even if we could overcome all the difficulties already discussed, that is, we still are confronted with the fact that these are intricate problems on which offhand opinions are worthless. The ordinary citizen lacks the information, experience, and training that are indispensable for seasoned judgments about effective means for accomplishing the desired goals.

As you gentlemen so well know, the baffling aspect of legislative and social-control problems lies not in deciding what broad objectives are desirable but in finding sound means that will accomplish what is desired without doing more harm or involving more cost in the process than is warranted by the good accomplished. It is precisely this difficult weighing of comparative values that is absent from the simplified poll questions.

Public-opinion polls in general have failed sufficiently to recognize the fact that not every sort of question can appropriately be put to cross-sections of the public. Certain types of questioning produce valuable responses, while other questions can profitably be addressed only to special subpublics—e. g., experts, leaders, or other groups possessing unusual competence on the matter in question.

In the sphere of labor relations, as elsewhere, we clearly need to know what the public's broad goals are, the general direction of their sympathies and condemnations, and, likewise, their opinions on particular issues that have become familiar through personal experience or widespread discussion. Other questions—and this includes the specific provisions of labor laws like the Taft-Hartley—are ones for the specialists and leaders. The problems are ones of technical means; pros and cons of specified conditions and regulations; consequences of changing intricately ramifying group relationships.

When questions on such topics are put to the average man, he responds according to vague general sentiments he holds toward whatever the question suggests to him; he does not weigh the concrete proposal against alternative means nor appraise its estimated effectiveness. Thus, for example, a few years ago opinion polls were reporting large majorities of the public in favor of antistrike laws and compulsory settlement of labor disputes. People dislike work stoppages and public inconvenience. Hence many respond in favor of any proffered remedy—the usual one being "a law."

At the very same time that public polls showed these results, a poll of expert views that I conducted showed a quite different picture. The "experts" or specialists were overwhelmingly against compulsory methods—and this view was held in common by the specially competent men associated with labor unions, industrial management, government, and universities.

We have noted the tendency of uninformed persons to answer specific questions on the basis of vague over-all impressions. Questions like those in the General Electric and Revere Copper & Brass lists, for example, that ask whether jurisdictional strikes and secondary boycotts should be prohibited will be answered "Yes" by some persons who do not understand the issues (the questions are not easy to grasp) but who have an indefinite feeling that any strike should be prohibited if the grounds for it are even worth calling into question. These respondents are expressing a general attitude toward unions and strikes (which is well worth ascertaining as such) but their responses are used as if they were specific endorsements of the particular legislative proposals. This source of error runs through great numbers of opinion poll questions.

The error lies in the use of specific question content to tap general attitudes. It is certainly unjustifiable to pretend that the respondents possess information on the particular matters and that they are reacting to these. Their replies seem to be votes on specific measures whereas many are in fact voting with no understanding of the definite proposal and the alternatives to it.

Doubts about the meaning of people's replies to poll questions are augmented by research findings regarding what people have in mind in answering. Several studies have demonstrated that questions on complex issues have extremely varied meanings to the different persons who answer them—so much so that individuals holding opposite views sometimes give the same yes or no reply while other persons with similar views give opposed answers.

Other evidence has shown the large areas of public ignorance with respect to labor-relations matters. Dr. Robinson himself reports in his Taft-Hartley inquiry that 54 percent of the people interviewed were unable to mention a single specific provision contained in the bill. Other polling agencies have reported as many as two-thirds and even four-fifths of the people unable to answer certain poll questions on particular labor topics. This emphasizes the impossibility of obtaining a true cross-section picture of popular attitudes on the more difficult and technical issues.

At the same time these facts point to the danger of accepting tabulations of those who do respond as if they constituted a sample of the entire public. Since the persons who answer come disproportionately from the higher educational levels, which means also from the more prosperous, the findings portray the views not of the whole population but more heavily of the groups less likely to favor strong labor unions.

In questionnaires like the General Electric and Revere Copper & Brass, which are answered voluntarily and mailed by respondents, this selection effect is bound to be pronounced. It is further increased by the fact that the questions use phraseology that demands a fairly high degree of literacy.

By way of summary, the central thoughts of this memorandum can be briefly caught up in the following quotation from a letter I recently sent to a leading poll-taker in response to his request that I suggest questions for his agency to use "in the next few months on the debate over the Taft-Hartley bill":

"The essential point is that technical questions regarding specific measures of control, such as the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law, are not appropriate for public-opinion polling. On such issues the public should be asked only broad questions regarding the social objectives and directions of change; attitudes toward different means must be judged by experts and leaders. In my judgment it is totally impossible to frame questions on the points in the Taft-Hartley law in a way that will be simple enough to be understood and answered by the ordinary voter and that will at the same time be adequate in their reflection of the actual import of the law. People's responses to neecessarily oversimplified questions about the law are bound to be misleading. The responses will appear to be on the specific technical point at issue when in actuality they will be expressing general sentiments set off by what the respondent vaguely supposes the question to mean.

"The views of the ordinary individual concerning the specific sections of the Taft-Hartley law are vastly less important than the question of whom he trusts to represent his interests in these matters. Accordingly, the most soundly revealing questions for your polls would be ones that inquire whether the respondent knows the stand that labor union leaders and the political friends of labor unionism have taken toward the law and whether the respondent is willing to accept their leadership in this connection."

Mr. BAILEY. We have several statements and communications which have been submitted for inclusion in the record.

The statements are submitted by Mr. Julian D. The communications are from the American Hospital Association, Magnetic Metals Co., of Camden, N. J., and the Illinois Association of Merchandise Warehousemen.

If there are no objections, we will accept these for inclusion in the record.

(The statements and communications above referred to will be found in the appendix at the close of today's testimony. See index for page numbers.)

Mr. BAILEY. The subcommittee will stand in recess until 2 p. m.

(Whereupon, at 12:45 p. m. the subcommittee recessed until 2 p. m. of the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

(Pursuant to the recess, the subcommittee reconvened at 2 p. m.)

Mr. IRVING (presiding). The next witness will be Gerald Morgan.

Before starting, Mr. Morgan, I see you have quite a lengthy statement here.

Mr. PERKINS. Let him summarize it, and we will put it in the record.

Mr. IRVING. I was going to say we will put it in the record. And if it is possible for you to summarize it and not read the whole thing, it may help some.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; I was not intending to read the whole thing by any means, because I certainly do not want to impose upon this subcommittee.

Mr. IRVING. Some do desire to read their statements.

Mr. MORGAN. With the committee's permission, I would like to read part of it and very briefly summarize the rest of it.

Mr. IRVING. Would you state your name, address, and occupation? Then we will proceed.

TESTIMONY OF GERALD D. MORGAN, ATTORNEY, FORMER ASSISTANT LEGISLATIVE COUNSEL, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. MORGAN. My name is Gerald D. Morgan. I live in Bethesda, Md., and am a practicing attorney in Washington, D. C., a member of the firm of Morgan & Calhoun.

I am not appearing here in behalf of or at the request or suggestion of anyone but myself. The reasons for my appearance will be apparent from what I have to say.

I have had a fairly long and, I believe, unique experience in the field of labor law, having had a major part in the drafting of most of the important labor legislation that has been enacted since the Wagner Act became law, as well as most of the important proposed labor legislation during the same period that failed of enactment.

My experience in this regard started in the early part of the 11-year period January 1935, through December 1945, when I served in the office of the legislative counsel of the United States House of Representatives. For nine of those years I was assistant legislative counsel for the House. As such, when the services of the legislative counsel's office were requested, I had the responsibility, on behalf of that office, of assisting various committees of the House in drafting legislation, the responsibility of advising committees on legal problems that arose in connection with legislation under consideration, drafting amendments for offering on the floor of the House, preparing committee reports, conference reports, statements of managers of House conferees, and generally doing a great variety of other things that counsel for committees and the House on legislative matters might do. Among the committees for which I did these things was the Committee on Labor.

The legislation and proposed legislation that I have had a major part in drafting included the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938; the Smith committee amendments to the Wagner Act proposed in 1940, as well as the amendment formulated by this committee as a substitute therefor; the War Labor Disputes Act; the various labor proposals preceding the War Labor Disputes Act that were considered by the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the House during the early part of the war period; the Case bill passed by both Houses in 1946 but vetoed by the President; and lastly the Taft-Hartley Act. .

My work on the Case bill and on the Taft-Hartley Act was performed after I had left the legislative counsel's office. In both instances my assistance was requested by Members of the present minority of this House. I presume I was asked to help because of my prior experience in the field—it certainly could not have been for political reasons, because I am a Democrat, and I made this fact clear at the time the requests were made.

The legislative counsel's office has always been completely removed from politics and patronage. Thus, until after I resigned from the legislative counsel's office, I don't believe there was a single member of the House who knew my political affiliation.

In view of the statements that have been made and are still being made as to how the Taft-Hartley Act was drafted, I believe it would be of considerable value to have this record show for all to see just how it was drafted. I can tell you how it was drafted, because I was continuously and intimately connected with the bill from the time the first word was put down on paper—and even before that.

In the early part of 1947, I was requested by Mr. Hartley, then chairman of this committee, to serve as special counsel to the majority members of the committee in the drafting of the intended labor bill. Mr. Halleck, who at that time was majority leader of the House, had previously talked with me at some length about the same matter and had suggested that, pending conferences with Mr. Hartley, I get something started in the draft form for purposes of preliminary discussion. Pursuant to this suggestion, I had taken the Smith committee amendments to the Wagner Act that had passed the House in 1940 and the vetoed Case bill that had passed both Houses in 1946, combined the two into one document for working purposes, and had incorporated therein a number of additional ideas that Mr. Halleck thought would be appropriate for the preliminary discussions.

Mr. Hartley's request that I act as special counsel was made to me at the conclusion of the first of a series of extended conferences, among a small group of Members of this House. At these conferences the policy issues raised by the original document that I had drafted, as well as policy issues raised by various witnesses in the hearings then in progress on labor legislation, were taken up and discussed. As a result of these conferences, the original document was substantially revised and a preliminary working draft was prepared by me for Mr. Hartley to submit to the majority members of this committee for use by them in their deliberations with respect to labor legislation.

Mr. Hartley submitted this draft to the majority members as a vehicle for discussion shortly after the conclusion of the committee hearings. Thereupon the majority members of the committee met daily all day—and sometimes at night as well—for over 3 weeks considering not only the issues presented by this preliminary draft but many others as well. These meetings were attended by the majority members of the committee, myself, and no one else. As a result of the meetings, a tentative draft of a bill for introduction was prepared by me embodying the various policy decisions made by the majority members. This tentative draft was read and considered by the majority members word by word and line by line at further meetings and perfected further.

The tentative draft as finally agreed upon by the majority members of this committee was, before being introduced, submitted to the Republican steering committee and considered in detail by that group at a meeting at which I was present.

I may say, Mr. Chairman, off the record, that I am probably the only Democrat that ever got into a Republican steering committee meeting.

The steering committee recommended further changes in the draft, whereupon the majority members of this committee again met, considered the recommendations of the steering committee, and finally agreed to them.

Mr. IRVING. May I interrupt to say that I hope that no other one will ever get in?

Mr. PERKINS. I want to interrupt to say that this is the most interesting witness that I have heard yet.

Mr. MORGAN. It was only after this long and careful process that the bill was finally introduced and referred to this committee as a whole for consideration. Although the full committee had but a short time to consider the bill by reason of the schedule of business in the House, the bill was read in the full committee in its entirety. I was present in the executive sessions of the full committee when it considered the bill. As the bill was read various amendments were adopted thereto, and on April 11, 1947, the bill as so amended was reported by the committee to the House.

From the time of the first discussions that I had with Mr. Halleck about the intended labor legislation, until the bill was reported by the committee, my work in connection with the bill was virtually continuous. And by "continuous," I mean morning, noon, and night.

During this period I not only needed, but I sought, expert technical assistance in connection with numerous legal, administrative, and practical problems that were involved in the various policies being considered. I sought this technical assistance almost exclusively from two men, both outstanding experts in the field of labor law—Gerard Reilly, formerly a member of the National Labor Relations Board, who during most of the period that I worked on the bill was acting as special counsel to the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and Theodore Iserman, an attorney with an extensive labor-law practice, whose writings on labor-law problems had received wide circulation, not only within the legal profession itself but outside it as well, and who is presently, I understand, vice chairman of the labor-law section of the American Bar Association.

The technical assistance that I received from these two men was just that information on policies and practices of the National Labor Relations Board, on Board decisions and court decisions; advice with respect to the effects that a change made in this provision or that would have on other provisions of the act, and similar matters. Neither they nor I decided policy. All of the decisions of policy were made—and made in my presence—by elected representatives of the people who had been assigned by the House to the committee having the responsibility for labor legislation. They were made at meetings at which there were present those representatives, myself, and no one else. And every word in the bill was drafted by me to carry out those policies.

While the bill was formulated and sponsored by members of the majority party of this committee, it was not treated as a political measure either in the committee or in the House. It passed the House with a majority of the Members of both parties voting in favor of it. After the Hartley bill had passed the House and the Taft bill had passed the Senate, conferees for both Houses were appointed as a conference committee to adjust the differences between the two bills. With the consent of the conferees from both Houses, I was present at all of the meetings of the conference committee in the capacity of counsel to the House managers. The drafting of the final bill to carry out the policies decided by the conference committee was done jointly by Gerard Reilly, special counsel for the Senate committee; Thomas Shroyer, the general counsel for the Senate committee; Dwyer Shugrue, counsel for Senator Ives; and myself.

To complete the record, let me return for a moment to my relationship to the bill. When my services were requested by Mr. Hartley he initially asked me to go on the regular professional staff of the committee. Since it was not possible for me to do that because of my regular practice—which, incidentally, had no connection, direct or indirect, with any labor-relations matters—the question of how I was to be compensated for my services, and on what basis, was left entirely up in the air. It remained up in the air during the whole period that I worked on the bill, and during that period I received no compensation whatsoever for the work I was doing or the time that I was devoting to it. Several months after the bill became law, through the good offices of Mr. Halleck, I received compensation for my time from the Republican National Committee.

I have gone into considerable detail as to how the bill developed because I believe very deeply that the Taft-Hartley Act should be considered on its merits rather than be judged emotionally on the basis of a false assumption as to its origin. Because of my feeling in this respect I asked and secured the consent of Mr. Halleck and Mr. Hartley to make the foregoing statement with respect to it. I did not consider myself free to make it without their consent, because lawyers treat their dealings with clients as confidential.

The Taft-Hartley Act has merit—a great deal of merit—and I believe intensely that its repeal would constitute a tremendous blow to the cause of true liberalism. By true liberalism I mean liberalism that believes first and foremost in the dignity of human personality and in the freedom of the human spirit, that insists upon fairness in all things and to all persons, that scorns oppression of all kinds and from all sources, that demands restrictions upon all powers which can be used as instruments of oppression, and that constantly strives for the effectuation of social programs not as ends in themselves but merely as means of giving greater opportunity for the expression of individual dignity and greater freedom for the human spirit.

This kind of liberalism was what prompted countless people—including myself—to favor the enactment of the Wagner Act. Experience had demonstrated the helplessness of the individual in an industrial economy of tremendous production units in which the relationship between the employee and the boss could no longer be a friendly personal one, and in which many employers, both individually and collectively, sought, through the blacklist, labor spies, yellow-dog contracts, and other shameful devices and practices, to use a superior economic power to despoil the dignity of the individual and to prevent him from exercising a free choice in the matter of associating with his fellows for mutual aid and protection. The liberal resented these things, and for that reason strove for the enactment of legislation that would restore to the individual his right to freedom. For the same reason the liberal is still in favor of retaining the essential features of that legislation as part of our basic law.

The liberal is not, however, a person whose philosophy permits him to regard the National Labor Relations Board appointed to administer that legislation as an agency which has done no wrong—for he knows in his heart that it has. He knows that the Board completely lost sight of the liberal purpose of the Wagner Act and embarked upon a course of action that was the very antithesis of liberalism.

Unionism—a thing that true liberalism regards as a means to an end—seemed to be treated by the Board as an end in itself. Thus it was apparently considered liberal to force as many individuals as possible within the union orbit and under union control, irrespective of their individual choice in the matter. In the same manner it was evidently thought liberal to ignore or belittle abuses of power by unions and to close the eyes to coercion and intimidation of individuals by unions, for the union was the thing, and the union could do no wrong.

In its zeal to be for the union the National Labor Relations Board developed doctrines, practices, and procedures that had the effect of generating in the United States new and tremendous aggregations of power concentrated in the hands of a relatively few individuals—the leaders of organized labor. The true liberal fears unconfined power in the hands of anyone, because it can be used to the injury of the individual. When overwhelming evidence is presented that it has been so used, the true liberal does not close his eyes or his mind simply because the wielder of the power happens to be a labor union or a labor leader. It is not the course of such a power or the person who exercises it that is important. What is important is that power is being used to despoil the dignity and freedom of a human being.

So the Labor Board forgot—if it indeed ever knew—that it was not the fact that the Wagner Act would promote unionism that caused countless liberals to strive for its enactment; it was the fact that that act would prevent the use of economic power to oppress the human spirit. The same reason must prompt the true liberal to be for the essential features of the Taft-Hartley Act, if he will analyze exactly what the Taft-Hartley Act does.

Mr. Chairman, I have discussed at length in my prepared statement various provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. First, the provisions that deal with so-called national-emergency strikes. I have gone at some length into the question of whether enjoining a strike results in any involuntary servitude. I also discussed some of the provisions of the act which deal with intimidation and coercion by unions.

I have discussed the closed shop, political contributions by unions, boycotts, and jurisdictional strikes. I have discussed the question of representation of employees and the so-called decertification petitions in particular.

I have discussed also various procedural provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, the provisions which separated the so-called prosecuting and judicial functions. The provisions relating to the preventing of the trial examiner from conferring with the Board about the trial examiner's report are discussed; and the provisions abolishing the old review division.

I also discussed the provisions relating to union responsibility the so-called suability of unions, and at the conclusion of my statement I make some suggestions for changes in the present law, because I certainly do not think that the Taft-Hartley Act is perfect by any means. I have never seen any legislation that is.

I do wish to state in conclusion that merely as one American, speaking for no group and representing no interest except what I believe very deeply to be the interest of true liberalism in government, I urge you to consider the Taft-Hartley Act provision by provision on its merits, judge it according to liberal principles, and then determine whether it is not more consistent with those principles to retain the essential features of that act and to modify the act only where the application of those principles dictates that modification should be made, rather than repeal it outright.

Would the committee like to have me discuss some of the suggested changes that I would like to see incorporated in the act?

Mr. PERKINS. I think the best procedure would be to question him, Mr. Chairman, and let him file that statement. We would get along better that way.

Mr. IRVING. Do you want him to discuss the changes or bring it out in questions?

Mr. JACOBS. I do not see that it makes much difference, Mr. Chairman. The rule that we have here does not permit us to examine a witness who files a 45-page statement. I mean, it does not permit any adequate examination of the witness. So it could be done that way, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. IRVING. The rule is that each one has 10 minutes for questions: so it does not give us sufficient time, hardly, for that.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest that he read the suggestions for changes in the law, about six and a fraction of these pages. That would not take long to do that, and he can skip this part which he has summarized here and go on through.

But here are the suggestions for changes in the law, which I think are pertinent. There are about six and a half pages.

Mr. IRVING. Very well.

Mr. MORGAN. First, I have attempted to show that labor's right to strike is not a right that we can or should permit to be exercised in an manner to attack the life of the community or to prostrate the public. The Taft-Hartley Act contains a fairly cumbersome procedure which to my mind does not go to the heart of the problem. First a board of inquiry is created. Then the board of inquiry reports to the President. Next the President—if he deems it necessary—requests the Attorney General to apply to the appropriate court for an injunction. If the injunction is issued, the board of inquiry is reconvened, and if the dispute is not settled at the end of 60 days, the board is to make a report to the President. Thereupon the National Labor Relations Board must take a secret ballot of the employees on the employer's last offer. At the end of 80 days, irrespective of whether the dispute has been settled, the injunction must be discharged, and thereafter the public is entirely without protection.

In the case of strikes which are causing or threatening to cause substantial injury to the national health or safety, I would suggest doing either one of two things:

First, give the President authority to seek an injunction against striking in such a matter as to cause such injury. The adoption of such a suggestion would not preclude separate strikes against individual employers, except possibly under very unusual circumstances. The injunction would be a permanent injunction—its effectiveness not being limited to any particular period of time; or Second, outlaw industry-wide bargaining, in a manner similar to that proposed in the Hartley bill as passed by the House in 1947. Such a suggestion would prohibit—with certain exceptions to take care of the problem of employees of small employers—a union from representing for bargaining purposes the employees of more than one employer, and would also prevent unions from acting in concert with respect to their bargaining arrangements. It would not preclude affiliation of local unions with internationals, but would very substantially restrict the power of the international over the local. In addition to imposing these restrictions on unions acting in concert, the suggestion would also prohibit employers from combining or agreeing with one another with respect to their bargaining arrangements.

With respect to the free-speech provision, the "evidence" rule in the free-speech provision of the act presents a very difficult problem. It is undoubtedly true that this rule has the effect of excluding evidence of a kind that in other proceedings, both judicial and administrative, is treated as having some probative value. On the other hand, it is also true that the Board, in its zeal to advance union interests at all costs, had grossly abused its power to consider such evidence, through according it weight out of all proportion to its significance. The practical result was that if the employer or his agents said anything critical of the union of his employees, or even critical of unions generally, the employer thereafter discharged employees at his peril.

I might say, departing a minute from the prepared text, that the committee will probably recall that in 1940, I think it was, the American Federation of Labor was extremely interested in amending the Wagner Act to include in it a free-speech provision, because at that time, the American Federation of Labor considered that the Board was bent on swallowing up its craft unions by industrial unit determinations, and the American Federation of Labor evidently found that the employer could not even say a kind word for the American Federation of Labor without getting into trouble with the Board. So the American Federation of Labor, in 1940, did very strongly urge the inclusion of a so-called free-speech provision in the Wagner Act.

Getting back to the evidence rule, I would suggest that the committee determine whether it is not true that as a practical matter it is rarely, if ever, necessary to use speech that consists merely of views, argument, or opinion, and this does not include admissions, statements of fact, questioning of employees, and similar matters, as evidence of motive or intent in labor-relations cases, if it is not true that there is invariably other, and much stronger, evidence of such motive or intent. If it is true, and I think you will find it to be, inasmuch as the right to speak freely is a right that we in America wish to protect against all unnecessary encroachments, and inasmuch as the present evidence rule applies both in respect of employer conduct and union conduct. I would not at this time favor changing the rule. If, however, it is found to prejudice the just rights of unions or of employers, I certainly would favor it being either restricted in its application or eliminated entirely.

As further illustrative of the attitude of the Board toward the expression of views, argument, and opinion, the Board has held that the existing free-speech provisions does not apply to speech before or in connection with representation elections, and has set aside elections where the employer has made comments critical of the union. This seems to me improper.

Mr. JACOBS. May I interrupt at that point? Is it not true that the free-speech provision to which you are referring has no application whatever to representation elections, but only to unfair labor practices?

Mr. MORGAN. I think that is correct, the way the law is written.

Mr. JACOBS. Then the point you are making here is hardly applicable to the provision.

Mr. MORGAN. The Board has held that. I think the Board correctly held that, the way the act is presently written.

Mr. JACOBS. Because the section actually has no application to representation.

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. I am sorry for the interruption.

Mr. MORGAN. Thus I would suggest that the free-speech provision be amended to make it applicable to views, arguments, and opinions expressed either by employers or unions or their agents in connection with representation elections.

I do not believe that it is either necessary or appropriate that fulfillment of the financial reporting requirement imposed on unions be made a condition to the exercise of a union's rights under the Wagner Act. It seems to me that this requirement should more properly be made wholly independent of the Wagner Act, and also that union members should have the right to inspect the reports filed with the Secretary of Labor by his union.

I believe that the discretionary power which now exists under section 10 (j) of the amended Wagner Act to seek temporary injunctions against either employers or unions or both pending decision by the Board on the merits of the case, should be retained. But I do not believe that there should be a separate provision imposing a duty to apply for temporary injunctions against labor unions when they do particular things. Thus I would suggest repealing section 10 (l) of the amended Wagner Act.

I have previously indicated that under the Taft-Hartley Act, the refusal by the general counsel to process a charge or issue a complaint is—if such refusal is arbitrary, capricious, or even incorrect—tantamount to a denial of relief under the act. I have also urged that this fact is no argument for revesting the prosecuting functions in the judicial body, the Board.

I would suggest that the act be amended so as to give parties the right, if they wish, to issue their own complaints under the act and prosecute those complaints before the Board. This suggestion is a suggestion for an additional remedial procedure—not one to take the place of the existing procedure. Thus if parties were dissatisfied with the action of the general counsel, they would have a right to initiate and conduct their own cases.

I do not believe that prohibiting the closed shop is sufficient to give individual union members adequate protection against arbitrary action by the union. There are countless individuals who want to be union people, and be known as such. It is no answer to them to say that if the union expels them for reasons other than failure to pay dues they can nevertheless still keep their jobs. They do not want to be expelled—they want to be good union men, and stay in the union.

For this reason, I suggest that there be added to the Taft-Hartley Act the essential features of the so-called bill of rights that was contained in section 8 (c) of the Labor Act under the Hartley bill, but that was dropped out by the conference committee on the bill. I also suggest that there be added to the Taft-Hartley Act a provision making it an unfair labor practice for an international union to restrain or coerce any of its locals in respect of their bargaining arrangements or otherwise.

The definition of collective bargaining in the Taft-Hartley Act, requiring 60-day notices and so forth, seems to me to be cumbersome and unnecessary, as well as a trap for the unwary. Moreover, it seems to me that its provisions depriving individual employees of rights under the act, are unduly harsh. For these reasons I would suggest the elimination of this definition, and the substitution therefor of the provisions of section 108 of the President's bill, H. R. 2032.

I think that concludes my statement, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. IRVING. I am not going to ask any questions, Mr. Morgan. I might make this observation, that there are still a whole lot of people in this country who have not been dignified, as you mention, in this act. Maybe if it goes along further, that will be accomplished. But certainly it has not been so far.

Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. IRVING. I will yield my time to you and Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. PERKINS. I want to make the observation that I have been wondering ever since we started these hearings, up until I heard this witness, just who prepared the act. I am glad to have this information, along with the other counsel who assisted you in the preparation of the act.

I notice from your statement that you applied approximately 24 hours a day in drafting the act for a period of several months, and that you received no compensation until several months after the bill became law. You further stated that when you were paid compensation, you were paid by the Republican National Committee, and that you had had no contract with Representative Halleck or Mr. Hartley concerning what your compensation would be. Inasmuch as you applied yourself so diligently, and you have disclosed the fact to the committee, would you mind telling the committee just how much compensation you received from the Republican National Committee for this difficult task that you have detailed to the committee?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; I would not. I received $7,500.

Mr. PERKINS. That is from the Republican National Committee?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. And also, how long did it take you to earn that money, if you do not mind telling the committee?

Mr. MORGAN. I started work on the bill in January 1947, and my work on the bill went through the conference committee on the bill; so it was a period of about 6 months. I did not mean to imply in answering your question the way I did that I spent 24 hours a day. There were periods during my work on the bill when it was morning, noon, and night. There were other periods when there would be a day, 2 days, or 3 days when I would be engaged in other matters.

Mr. PERKINS. You were looking to Mr. Halleck and Mr. Hartley as paymasters for your services, were you not?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. And from your conversations with those two gentlemen while you were drafting the act, you knew that you would well be paid for your services, even though you did not ask them directly?

Mr. MORGAN. Hr. Halleck told me that he would see that I got paid for my services. He said, "I do not know whether I can get you paid by the National Congress or whether I can get you paid by the Republican National Committee, or whether we will have to take up a collection. But you will be paid for your services."

Mr. PERKINS. Did they pay that fee at one time, the Republican National Committee, or did they pay it by installments?

Mr. MORGAN. They paid it by installments.

Mr. PERKINS. You do tell the committee that you received only $7,500 from the Republican National Committee; am I correct in that statement?

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct.

Mr. PERKINS. And you further tell this committee that you did more work on the drafting of the Taft-Hartley Act than any other person? That is the way I interpreted your statement.

Mr. MORGAN. No; I would not say that. Mr. Reilly did a great deal of it. He did all of the work on the Senate side. My work was confined to the House side and the conference committee. I did not do any work on the Senate side.

Mr. PERKINS. When did Mr. Halleck first contact you and inform you that he wanted you to work on it?

Mr. MORGAN. It was in the early part of January 1947.

Mr. PERKINS. Had you been contacted previously to that date by anyone?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. To serve in that capacity?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. You tell the committee that you got permission from Mr. Halleck inasmuch as you tell the committee that the client relationship existed during the time of your employment, before giving your testimony in this case?

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct.

Mr. PERKINS. And it was perfectly agreeable to Representative Halleck, of course, for you to give this testimony?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir. He thought it would be a good idea to get this testimony.

Mr. PERKINS. He thought it would be a good idea for you to give this testimony?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. In other words, I presume he thought that it would be a good idea for the author of the act to come in before the committee and defend the act?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not claim to be the author of the act, sir. I was merely a technician.

Mr. PERKINS. I mean, the technician of the act. I will change my word from "author" to "technician." Then he thought it would be a good idea for the technician in the draftmanship of the act to defend the act before the committee? Did he make that recommendation to you?

Mr. MORGAN. No, he did not.

Mr. PERKINS. What prompted you to come here and make this statement, Mr. Morgan, if it was not for the purpose of defending the act?

Mr. MORGAN. It was for the purpose of defending the act.

Mr. PERKINS. The Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. MORGAN. The defending of what I consider to be the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. PERKINS. Have you altogether severed your employment with the Republican National Committee at this time?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. When did they last pay you an installment for your services? What month? That is, an installment on your fee?

Mr. MORGAN. It was either January or March of 1948.

Mr. PERKINS. 1948?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. Are you now employed by the National Association of Manufacturers, I mean, to represent them, in any litigation?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; and I never have been.

Mr. PERKINS. You never have been?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. IRVING. You have about 1 minute, Mr. Perkins.

Mr. PERKINS. That is all.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Morgan, I was rather perplexed and amazed when I found out that you, a Democrat, had gotten into that Republican circle, that inner circle. But as you testified further, I found out you were their private lawyer, and it more or less clarified itself in my mind. I suppose that would be a pretty fair characterization of it, would it not?

Mr. MORGAN. As I say, I consider the work I did on the Taft-Hartley Act was purely as a technician. It is exactly the same sort of work that I did here when I worked for 11 years for the House of Representatives, in drafting for committees; in other words, to try to find out——

Mr. JACOBS. Now, that is not the question. The question is whether or not you considered yourself a lawyer hired by the Republican National Committee.

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir. I considered myself a lawyer employed by the majority members of this committee and by the majority leader.

Mr. JACOBS. Then if you considered yourself a public lawyer hired on the pay roll, why did you consider yourself under obligation from an ethical viewpoint to go back and ask Mr. Hartley and Mr. Halleck whether or not it would be all right to disclose the conversations?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not quite understand. Will you repeat that?

Mr. JACOBS. As a lawyer you know that you are ethically obligated not to disclose what is communicated between yourself and your client, do you not?

Mr. MORGAN. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Now, you acted as a lawyer in this case?

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. And when you got ready to ask for permission to disregard the ethical seal of secrecy, you did not come to this committee and ask permission, did you?

Mr. MORGAN. No, I had not. I thought——

Mr. JACOBS. All right. You went to Mr. Halleck, who was supposed to be a representative of all the people, did you not?

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. And you went to Mr. Hartley, who, when he employed you, was at least in a position of being a representative of all the people; is that right?

Mr. MORGAN. He was chairman of this committee.

Mr. JACOBS. He is not any more, is he?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. JACOBS. You never came to this committee and asked its consent to disclose what had transpired, did you?

Mr. MORGAN. Maybe——

Mr. JACOBS. Now, did you or did you not?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I did not.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Then, as a matter of fact, a lawyer usually goes to his client and asks for permission to disclose confidential matters, does he not? That is his duty, is it not?

Mr. MORGAN. Well——

Mr. JACOBS. Well, is it or is it not?

Mr. MORGAN. It is, certainly.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Then when you got ready to be relieved from the ethical obligation of maintaining secrecy, you went to Mr. Halleck and Mr. Hartley; is that right? That is what you said in your statement; am I correct?

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Now, then, you state, as I understand it, that you had not at that time been employed by anyone in labor relations; is that correct?

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. And have you ever been since?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. JACOBS. Has your firm ever been?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you represent any clients who have labor problems?

Mr. MORGAN. I think so, yes.

Mr. JACOBS. You do. You revealed to us that a man by the name of Iserman assisted in the drafting of this legislation. You referred to him as a labor relations expert. Do you know who his principal client is?

Mr. MORGAN. I know who one of his principal clients is.

Mr. JACOBS. Tell us.

Mr. MORGAN. I know that his firm is general counsel for the Chrysler Corporation.

Mr. JACOBS. Chrysler?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. And you referred to Mr. Gerard Reilly. You know he is a legislative representative for General Motors, do you not?

Mr. MORGAN. I know that he is now; yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. And General Electric?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; I know that.

Mr. JACOBS. And the printing industry?

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. Did the minority ever call anyone in who represented labor and have him in the room and consult with him in regard to any of the provisions of this act?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know whether they did or not.

Mr. JACOBS. In your presence, they did not?

Mr. MORGAN. Not in my presence.

Mr. JACOBS. Then you never heard of anybody who did?

Mr. MORGAN. They never called in anybody who represented anyone else in my presence, either.

Mr. JACOBS. Not even Mr. Iserman?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Was he there when you were there?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. But you do know that he did assist in the—well, it seems to be a sort of question of not letting thy right hand know what thy left hand doeth; is that right? You were not there when these other men were there, and they were not there when you were there?

Mr. MORGAN. I have no knowledge of it. He was never there when I was there.

Mr. JACOBS. But did you not say in your statement that he participated in drafting the bill?

Mr. MORGAN. I said that he helped me.

Mr. JACOBS. He helped you?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Who told you to consult with him? How did you happen to consult with him?

Mr. MORGAN. I happened to consult with Mr. Iserman because in the first suggestions that Mr. Halleck had made to me, a great many of them were fairly similar to the suggestions that had been made by Mr. Iserman in a little book that he had written called Industrial Peace and the Wagner Act. When he was down here testifying——

Mr. JACOBS. Particularly, I wonder, did anyone direct you to get in touch with Mr. Iserman, or did you do that on your own?

Mr. MORGAN. No one directed me to get in touch with Mr. Iserman, no. I did that on my own.

Mr. JACOBS. You did that on your own. All right. Now, as I understand you, you are here, as you say, to defend the essential features of the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. And I take it that you are reasonably familiar with the law.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Is there any particular provision in the Taft-Hartley law that you could claim to be the author of?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. That you feel your influence caused to be incorporated?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Take particularly section 8 (b) (4) (D). That is the one on jurisdictional disputes in the crafts. You would not have been the author of that?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. And section 10 (k), which provides for the Board to issue awards in connection with such disputes?

Mr. MORGAN. No. Both of those came from the Senate bill.

Mr. JACOBS. I was going to say, whoever was the author of that, should have gotten more than $7,500 for it. They would be otherwise cheated.

Particularly referring to those two provisions, Mr. Morgan, I asked this question of a labor relations expert of General Electric the other night and gave him 24 hours to look it up. I could not give you 24 hours, because I did not see you 24 hours ago. But I want to ask you whether or not you could tell me any provision in the Taft-Hartley law that gives the union a right to enforce an award that is made by the Board under section 10 (k).

Mr. MORGAN. There is not.

Mr. JACOBS. There is none. Thank you very much. I had an awful time getting that answer from General Electric. But there certainly is a method to enforce the award against the labor union, is there not?

Mr. MORGAN. You mean, through the——

Mr. JACOBS. Through the injunction.

Mr. MORGAN. Through the injunction; that is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. In fact, it is the last sentence in section 10 (1), is it not?

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct. When I say there is none, possibly I ought to expand on that a little. After the Board had issued one of those awards, a strike by a union to compel the employer to accede to that award is not a strike that is proscribed by any of the provisions of section 8 (b).

Mr. JACOBS. You mean that when the union strikes against the award of the Board, it is not an unfair labor practice?

Mr. MORGAN. If it strikes in favor of the award.

Mr. JACOBS. What if it strikes against the award?

Mr. MORGAN. That is an unfair labor practice.

Mr. JACOBS. But there is no provision where the Board is empowered to go in and procure an injunction to enforce the award against the employer, is there?

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct. There is not.

Mr. JACOBS. And if you are correct, which I will assume for the sake of this examination you are, what the Taft-Hartley law actually does is this: It says, when we make our award, we will put Uncle Sam on the union if it does not obey the award, but if the employer does not obey the award, we will just cut the union loose out in the cold world and let it forage the best way it can. That is what it amounts to, is it not?

Mr. MORGAN. That is about the substance of it.

Mr. JACOBS. I may have embellished that a little bit, but that is just about the substance of it. Are you defending that particular feature of the Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; I am not.

Mr. JACOBS. There is nothing in your recommendations to correct it, is there?

Mr. MORGAN. No. And what is in here is by no means exclusive. When you get in to discussing all of the various provisions of that act, you get in a document that thick [indicating]. And I think I imposed a great deal on the committee in getting one even this thick [indicating].

Mr. JACOBS. I do not know whether you imposed or not. I would like to have a day to go into your ideas on this thing, a whole day. I believe we could develop quite a number of things that might be helpful. You, for example, say that you think that the general counsel should be separate from the Board. Have you read the Hoover Commission report on that?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; I have not.

Mr. JACOBS. It was in the Post the other day.

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; I have not.

Mr. JACOBS. Getting back now to what you say about the emergency strikes, did you recommend that type of procedure to the Board when you were representing the majority, as counsel?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you agree with it at all? Do you think it is good procedure? I notice you made some recommendations.

Mr. MORGAN. The existing procedure?

Mr. JACOBS. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; I do not think it is.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you consider it rather a dangerous procedure, as to what it might lead to?

Mr. MORGAN. No. I think it is just cumbersome, and I do not think that it helps to get the parties together, because during the very period when they should be trying to get together, they are having to go to all these meetings of boards of inquiry.

Mr. JACOBS. It starts getting some law into it?

Mr. MORGAN. That is about what it does.

Mr. JACOBS. There may be a good deal of sense in what you say. But I am just wondering what they are going to do when they come to the 80 days and the strike is not settled.

Mr. MORGAN. In my suggestion, there would not be any 80 days at all. I would start off with the basic assumption that the right to strike is not a right which can be exercised or ought to be exercised in a manner as to prostrate the public. Now, if you start off with that basic assumption, which is the basic assumption that I start off from, then it does not seem to me that any particular period of time is necessary. You just enjoin striking in that matter. Now, that is not——

Mr. JACOBS. Let me ask you at that point, what would you do under these circumstances? Prices are falling. We understand now that we are going into a lower level of economy. And if prices fall far enough, there will be some employers who will be trying to lower wages. That would be natural, would it not?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. What would you say about a situation where there was a contract between the union and the employer for $1 an hour and the employer comes to the conclusion that he wanted to pay only 6 bits an hour, and the men say, "No; we won't take it." Would you enjoin the employer from cutting the wages to 75 cents?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I would not. And the reason I would not——

Mr. JACOBS. I think you have answered the question.

Mr. MORGAN. The reason I would not is this: Because a situation of that sort never produces a national emergency strike. It is only these strikes that affect entire industries.

Mr. JACOBS. Let us take a national industry. Let us take the coal industry. Let us say it is the coal industry. Now, they are working for $1 an hour, and the employer offers 75 cents an hour, and they say, "No, we are not going to do it. We are not going to work for that."

Now, you enjoin them. What is going to be the wage under this injunction?

Mr. MORGAN. I would enjoin them from striking in such a manner as to prostrate the public. That would not prevent the United Mine Workers, if I am a coal operator, from striking me now and striking Mr. Smith some other time. They can harrass the employers for all they are worth, for all I care. All I want to see is that they do not strike in such a manner that the public is going to be prostrated. Now, they can exercise their right to strike and achieve——

Mr. JACOBS (interposing). In other words, you would reduce the strike to where it would not affect the public interest?

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Now, then, I want to get back to this——

Mr. MORGAN. I do not want to interfere with their right to strike.

Mr. JACOBS. We will get back to this free speech thing. You apparently make, or attempt to make, a case that the rule was applied too liberally in the admission and consideration of evidence under the old law. What do you think of the last sentence in section 10 (b)? Wasn't this the adoption of the rules of evidence as approved by the Supreme Court of the United States? Did you not think that would be sufficient protection without adopting a completely exclusionary rule whereby nothing the employer said could be used against him unless it was an actual threat expressed? In other words, what I am getting at is this——

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know whether it was ever thought of at the time. I d onot recall now ever having thought of it particularly.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not think that the last section in section 10 (b) was adopted for the purpose of adopting the judicial code of evidence?

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes. There is no question about that, so far as practicable.

Mr. JACOBS. You admit in your statement—which I appreciate—and you admitted it forthrightly—that 8 (c) is actually an exclusionary evidentiary rule?

Mr. MORGAN. 8 (c).

Mr. JACOBS. It is 8 (c)?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. You admit that very candidly?

Mr. MORGAN. There is no questioin about it.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not think it would be better to strike out the four words "or be evidence of," or do you think it necessary in view of the judicial code of evidence as adopted, or have you thought about it?

Mr. MORGAN. I have thought about it a great deal since, I will tell you. I have thought about that evidentiary rule in the free speech a great deal, and here is the difficulty, as I see it——

Mr. JACOBS. I would like you to answer my question first, and if you want to enlarge upon it we will grant you the privilege of doing so.

Mr. MORGAN. May I answer it this way, then: I would not be in favor of striking out the evidentiary rule if the committee determines that evidence of motive, or that motive or intent can invariably be proved by other evidence. And that was what I suggested that the committee do, to see whether——

Mr. JACOBS. I understand that point. You do not need to explain that to me. I was away ahead of you on that. But why is it you say that in this particular type of case that the triers of fact should be deprived of what is considered valuable and probative evidence in every other tribunal that has to determine questions of fact?

Mr. MORGAN. Perhaps the difficulty I have is the feeling that the National Labor Relations Board has been something more than a trier of facts, and the National Labor Relations Board has been an advocate for one side. I think the fact—and you undoubtedly saw in the newspaper the other day that the board of examination——

Mr. JACOBS. Yes, I saw that; and I have heard an awful lot about it, too. Who was the man at the head of that board of examination who disqualified all of the trial examiners?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know.

Mr. JACOBS. He is a lawyer. Do you know who he represents?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. I do not want to use my time going into it, but I might suggest you investigate that a little bit. There is more than meets the eye on that deal.

I want to ask you one more question. I expect my time is about up.

Mr. IRVING. You have 5 more minutes.

Mr. JACOBS. Five more minutes? Thank you.

Do you not think that the adoption of the rules of evidence that are used in court would have been adequate, without adopting an exclusionary rule? What is your opinion, as a lawyer, as to that?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not believe it would have.

Mr. JACOBS. In other words, do you think the courts are wrong; do you think the Supreme Court is wrong about the rule of evidence it has adopted?

Mr. MORGAN. No, but the rule of evidence, as I understand, as applied to evidence of this character, when you introduce statements and opinions of that sort to prove a person's motive or intent, the admissibility of that kind of evidence is always within the discretion of the trial judge, and the appellate courts rarely, if ever, disturb that discretion.

If the trial judge thinks that the statement is too remote, he will exclude it.

Mr. JACOBS. We are not a court, are we?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I think the difficulty——

Mr. JACOBS. But you think we should exercise that discretion in advance, and say the Board will always exclude it? I guess that is your point.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not think you should if that kind of evidence is necessary to prove motive.

Mr. JACOBS. May I ask you one question: I would just like you to answer me this. I have one more question I would like to ask you at the end, and this is the second from the last I want to ask. Take as much time as you need, outside of one more question.

Tell me of better evidence to disclose a man's motive and intent than that which he says himself, his own words; tell me a better item of evidence?

Mr. MORGAN. It depends in large measure upon what he says.

Mr. JACOBS. I mean upon the subject that we are trying. Can you think of any higher and/or more cogent evidence of what a man's thinking and his motive is than what he himself says?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not think the fact that I would come up here and testify before this committee on certain practices that I——

Mr. JACOBS. I just want you, as a lawyer—and I will understand what you mean—to give me another class of evidence that is more likely to disclose what a man is thinking and what his motive is.

Mr. MORGAN. I will agree with you wholeheartedly if the matter is relevant to the matter in issue.

Mr. JACOBS. If it is relevant to the issue?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. I want to ask you this question: Under section 8 (b) (4) (A), (B), and (C), and 10 (l) provides a mandatory injunction for a strike if it happens to fall under those provisions?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. You were with this committee all the time, or most of the time, when it was drafting this legislation, and the question I want to ask you is whether or not it was ever considered that they would provide a mandatory injunction to force an employer not to commit the unfair labor practice of firing a man for joining the union, and leaving him without a job, and leaving him without means of a livelihood; was that taken up at any time?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not think the question either way was ever taken up in the House.

The mandatory injunction question came from the Senate——

Mr. JACOBS. So far as you know the answer would be "No"?

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. That is all.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. I have not gotten your connection with the Government, here.

First, I will ask you: Were you ever an employee of the National Labor Relations Board?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. WIER. I gathered from your statement here that you have been very close to it in all of its labor-relations legislation?

Mr. MORGAN. No. My work in connection with labor legislation was done for the House legislative council's office, for the most part.

Mr. WIER. Then you were not in the administration of the Wagner Act at all?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. WIER. In spite of the fact that people might be led to believe that you were.

You made some statement here a minute ago about those that you associated with in the preparation of the Taft-Hartley Act. You mentioned the name of Mr. Reilly. You said that you had gone to him, or somebody had sent him to you, to prepare this material which Mr. Halleck and others were particularly concerned with?

Mr. MORGAN. I went to him.

Mr. WIER. You went to Reilly?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. I do not consider myself a labor-relations expert, by any means.

Mr. WIER. So you enrolled the assistance of Mr. Reilly in preparing the material Mr. Halleck and Mr. Hartley wanted?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. You and Reilly—did you meet here with the committee, or were you holding your meetings some place else?

Mr. MORGAN. We would hold them at various places. Not here; no.

Mr. WIER. You did not hold them in the House building here?

Mr. MORGAN. Sometimes over on the Senate side; that is where it would usually be.

Mr. WIER. During the course of the drawing and preparing the architectural work of the Taft-Hartley—you and Reilly and Hartley—did you at any time sit in with any other groups in the preparation and the acceptance of material for this act?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. WIER. You never sat in any meetings in this building in which the representatives of the National Manufacturers Association participated, with advice?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. WIER. Or were you accepting the advice of Reilly in that field?

Mr. MORGAN. It depends on what you mean by "advice," Mr. Wier. I was accepting Reilly's advice on matters of National Labor Relations Board practices and policies, and Board decisions. I mean, it is just something he had lived with, and it was something that I had not lived with.

Mr. WIER. And at no time during your preparation of this material for Mr. Hartley and Mr. Halleck, at no time did you ever see any of the agents or representatives of the National Manufacturers Association?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; I did once. That was at one time when I talked with Mr. Smethurst, who is the counsel for the National Association of Manufacturers. He evidently did not know what took place beforehand, but I guess Mr. Hartley asked me to talk with him, and he had some questions about an antitrust provision that had appeared in the Case bill. I have no very definite recollection of just what the thing was all about at this particular time, but it was a provision that had appeared in the Case bill.

Mr. WIER. That meeting was not in the Capitol, though?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir, it was.

Mr. WIER. Up in the committee room?

Mr. MORGAN. It was either here or up on the fifth floor.

Mr. WIER. On the fifth floor, upstairs?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. Is that the only meeting that you participated in——

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct, and that provision is not in the Taft-Hartley Act at the present time.

Mr. WIER. I am not concerned with the provision; I am concerned with the context.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the only time.

Mr. WIER. During the time you were presumed to be on the pay roll of Mr. Hartley and Mr. Halleck, and during which time your pay was not specifically understood between the parties, were you on the pay roll, or in the employment, of any other individual or corporation?

Mr. MORGAN. I had some clients.

Mr. WIER. I do not mean in your private practice downtown; I am talking about corporations and individuals in connection with——

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir, and I would never work on a bill under such circumstances.

Mr. WIER. What did you mean by "other clients"? I am not talking about private business; I am talking about legislation on the Hill.

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. WIER. You had no other income or employment on the Hill here except that which you expected to get from Mr. Halleck and Mr. Hartley?

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct. There may be one exception to that, and I will tell you what it may be: I had a regular client, and I represented him in Washington, and I had a great deal, or almost all of their work, and all of my work for them was before the United States Maritime Commission. Some time in 1947 the Merchant Marine Committee had a bill affecting the ocean service to Alaska. I appeared before the committee on that bill, and I also proposed to the committee an amendment to that bill, and wrote a letter to Senator White, who was then chairman of the——

Mr. WIER. I know about that. I am not concerned about that.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the only activity.

Mr. WIER. Let me ask you, Mr. Morgan: After you and Mr. Reilly and Mr. Hartley had laid the groundwork for the so-called Taft-Hartley Act and got it in shape for its presentation to the Labor and Education Committee here, do you feel satisfied that the majority of the provisions and your thinking and your recommendations were the items in the bill that were finally passed, or did the committee change your bill materially?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not recall ever having made any recommendations one way or the other.

Mr. WIER. That is what you were employed to do, was it not?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; it was not.

Mr. WIER. I am talking about your recommendations to Mr. Hartley. That is what he employed you for?

Mr. MORGAN. I had absolutely nothing to do with the recommendations.

Mr. WIER. Who made the recommendations for the material in the Taft-Hartley bill?

Mr. MORGAN. As I said, the original recommendations, the things that were to go in, were outlined to me by Mr. Halleck at the first meetings that were held, as I said before. The bill, the original bill, preliminary bill, was submitted to the majority members of the committee at the conference——

Mr. WIER. I just want to stay here; I do not want to go to the conference.

Mr. MORGAN. I mean the conferences on the original document I prepared for Mr. Halleck.

Mr. WIER. What I am trying to get at, you came in here today, and in your brief here you make suggestions of quite a few changes; and what I am trying to get at is did the House subsequently pass the legislation that you and Mr. Reilly and others prepared for the committee? Was it, in substance, about what you prepared?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I do not think it was at all. When the majority members of the committee went over that original document, we just about had to throw the thing in the wastebasket and start over again.

Mr. WIER. How about the second draft of the bill? Did that meet with their approval, in the main?

Mr. MORGAN. Whose approval?

Mr. WIER. The committee's.

Mr. MORGAN. It formally met with their approval; yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. I want to ask you some questions on one or two points. I do not have much more time, but as long as you feel you had a large part in the drawing up of this Taft-Hartley bill, and because of your practical and law experience in labor legislation, I would like to ask you one or two more questions.

It comes to mind immediately that, in the Taft-Hartley bill—I will use the example of the west coast fruit strike, where thousands of people were involved in the strike—and your committee or the Congress preferred to leave them out, but left them subject to injunction. Do you have any reasoning on that?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. WIER. The agricultural worker and the big institutions, why should they not have been protected by the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. MORGAN. The agricultural exemption had not been changed at all in the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. WIER. They were subject to the provisions of the injunctive process of the Taft-Hartley Act, which later developed—as you know, perhaps—but they were not entitled to the protection of representation.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not familiar with that.

Mr. WIER. Then, apparently——

Mr. IRVING. Your time is up, Mr. Wier.

Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. I have no questions.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Kelley?

Mr. KELLEY. No questions.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. Morgan, I am very glad that you have come down here today to tell the background of the writing of the Taft-Hartley bill in the House. There has been so much misinformation spread over this country about the NAM and various other groups writing the bill, that it is about time that we learned the truth of how it was put together; and for that reason I am glad you are here.

You came into the employ of the Government during the New Deal administration, and no Republican brought you in; and by your own efforts——

Mr. MORGAN. Nor did any Democrat.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Yes; and by your own efforts, and this is very important, and by your character and the way you handled yourself, you won the respect of both parties of Congress, and I can say that because I have talked to many men high up in the Democratic and Republican Parties who have praised you, and they all have expressed their appreciation of your intelligence, of your sincerity, and of your character, and I am glad you came here and made that statement, because it verifies what I participated in, and what I know about the facts, as I remember them in the writing of the Hartley bill in the House.

Mr. WIER. Will you yield for just one question?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Yes.

Mr. WIER. I just asked him the question, and he said to me that he had not been an employee of the Government or the Labor Department.

Mr. MCCONNELL. He was a legislative draftsman on the Hill.

Mr. WIER. Previous to the Eightieth Congress?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Yes; previous to the Eightieth Congress. I was informed that we were seeking a legislative draftsman to put together the provisions of a labor-management relations bill, who would understand how to phrase it in intelligent and in understandable and in legal language, and the unanimous opinion was that Jerry Morgan was the man to do it, and that is why he was employed to do the particular work. The very fact of the size of the fee shows to me you are a man of high principle. If you had said $25,000 I would not have been surprised, knowing the charges for various types of work of that nature in the country, and I think that alone speaks for the type of man that you are.

A question was asked of you about taking your suggestions as to the provisions of the Taft-Hartley, or of the Hartley Act, because that is the part we were mainly involved in on this side of the House.

I do not recall you making a single suggestion that had anything to do with policy, or the present various provisions of that act, except how to word them in a legal manner, and to set them up correctly in the phrasing of a bill; and I think you have brought that out. So any efforts to bring up any mysterious or hidden tie-ups on your part in this thing are really, to me, aside from the point, because your only job was to draft the legislation as we put it together, and I can remember the agonizing hours we thought it out in the committee. Every major provision was voted on step by step, and in that committee were several lawyers, and they were not taking anybody's advice about anything. As you remember, they wanted their own ideas put forth.

But, as to who contributed the general ideas of the Hartley bill, I would say they came from all over the United States. There was a great deal of agitation due to the unrest at that time, and many of them were culled out and fought over, and bit by bit the bill was put together, and no one sent the bill down to us, either from the manufacturing group or from the administration, because we were not in charge of the executive branch of the Government.

I would like to refer to something you have brought out in your statement here, speaking of the national emergency strikes. Speaking of the protection of the public, and that is very vital in the national emergency strike matters, and I will admit I have not found anyone yet who knows the solution to the matter, we fought over that for a long while as to how to handle national emergency strikes, because it is serious when the lives of people are affected. Certain concerns can close down, and it makes little difference, but when national emergency strikes occur, the loss to the country, not only in human lives, but in other ways, can be very large, and it brings a question to us that is very paramount, and that is to see if we can find some way to handle such type of strikes. You have spoken here, and I am reading from page 16; I do not know whether it is the same statement as the others:

All of the cases up to this present moment, beginning with Mr. Justice Harlan's decision on circuit in 1894 in the case of Arthur v. Oakes (63 Fed. 310) have recognized the continuing validity of the distinction between individual action by employees—which is protected by the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution—and group action which has no such constitutional protection.

Would you mind enlarging on that a little?

Mr. MORGAN. The theory of the law is that there are very significant distinctions between individual action and group action.

I think all of our antitrust laws are founded on that distinction. The whole development of the antitrust laws shows that when numbers get together to combine to do a particular thing, or produce a particular result, you do not have any constitutional protection.

Even in the old days of the Supreme Court, when the Supreme Court was kind of mossback about these things, pardon the expression, in those days, if Congress tried to prevent an individual businessman from fixing a price, or tried to control the price that he would fix, the Court that held that Congress did not have any authority to do that, that he had freedom to conduct his business under the fifth amendment to the Constitution.

But when a group combined to do the same thing, there was no constitutional protection to that group. I suppose the theory is they could produce results that would be very harmful to society as a whole, and that is the same distinction that has been made in the labor cases, that when individual employees exercise their own individual judgments about things—whether they want to work or do not want to work; whether it is for a good reason or a bad reason—they ought to have a right to do that; but when employees combine themselves into a group and put themselves under the discipline of the group to produce a particular result, they are not then exercising their individual rights or their individual freedom. They have subordinated that to the will of the group, and that is the distinction that the courts have attempted to make in these cases. I think it is a valid distinction.

In my statement I mentioned the consideration in 1926 of the Railway Labor Act. In the Railway Labor bill there was a provision to the effect that nothing in this act shall compel any employee to perform any labor service without his consent or make the quitting by an employee an illegal act.

The Senate committee report, which I quote in my statement on that particular provision, and I might read this:

As to paragraph 8 of section 9—which is the so-called "quits" paragraph—

it was urged that it should be clarified so as certainly to apply only to the use of legal process against an individual employee and so as not to apply to combinations or conspiracies between several employees to interrupt interstate commerce. It was frankly stated by the advocates of the bill, both those representing the carriers and those representing the employees, that the purpose of the paragraph was to deal merely with individual employees, to express only the constitutional right of individuals against involuntary servitude, and is not intended to deal with combinations, conspiracies, or group action. This construcure has been made abundantly clear by an amendment to the bill by which the word "individual" has been inserted before the word "employee" wherever the latter word appears in the paragraph.

That particular provision of the Railway Labor Act has been carried in virtually every labor bill dealing with labor matters since that time, and it is in the Taft-Hartley Act at the present time, word for word I believe, as it appears in the Railway Labor Act.

That particular provision was also considered by the Supreme Court in one of the first cases under the Railway Labor Act. As a matter of fact, it was the first case that recognized the right of association as a legally enforceable right.

Mr. IRVING. Your time is up.

Mr. SMITH. I will yield 5 minutes.

Mr. MCCONNELL. There is one other point I wish to bring up, Mr. Morgan.

In H. R. 2032, page 17. Do you have it there?

You say here in your statement—that is, page 17, line 22—you say here in your statement:

The President's bill seems to recognize—and by "President's bill" I suppose you mean H. R. 2032?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCCONNELL (reading):

The President's bill seems to recognize that the public has some interest in labor disputes, but have you considered the President's bill in connection with the term "slave labor"? I call your attention to section 302 (c) of his bill, which directs that the employees "shall continue or resume work." It is this duty under the President's bill, the duty to continue or resume work—

Mr. IRVING. Will you refer to that as the Lesinski bill instead of the President's bill?

Mr. MCCONNELL. If he wants to change it. Mr. Lesinski has introduced the bill, and you speak of it here in your statement as the President's bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. MCCONNELL (reading):

It is this duty under the President's bill—the duty to continue or resume work—which the President says he has an inherent right to enforce by injunctive, and even perhaps by military, processes. The duty to continue work and the duty not to strike are, as I have attempted to point out, two entirely different things. Enforcing a duty to continue or resume work really does constitute involuntary servitude; preventing a strike or directing its termination has nothing to do with it.

Will you elaborate on that more in particular?

Mr. MORGAN. If an injunction says, "It is hereby ordered that the employees shall continue work," there is no factor or group action or conspiracy, if you want to call it that, I do not think it is conspiracy, it seems to be involved. The order directs the employees to continue work.

When you enjoin a strike you do not direct the employees to go back to work; you direct them to cease, in effect, agreeing with one another to subject their individuality to the discipline of the group. After you have done that, and have directed the employees to stop the conspiracy, so to speak, they can quit or not quit, as they see fit. They can exercise their individual right to quit. There is nothing in the Taft-Hartley Act which prevents that, and there is nothing that could prevent that.

Mr. MCCONNELL. In other words, you see in that particular provision of the Lesinski bill a real slave-labor danger?

Mr. MORGAN. Here is the difficulty: There is a provision in the Lesinski bill on page 21, section 404:

> Nothing in this act shall be construed to require an individual employee to render labor or service without his consent.

That is the provision that is word for word like the provision that is in the Taft-Hartley Act and in the Railway Labor Act, but the difficulty with that is that it says nothing in this act. The trouble is that the President claims that he has an inherent power apart from this act. All you would be doing would be enforcing outside of this act a duty which appears in this act, but it would not be anything in this act that would prevent——

Mr. MCCONNELL. In other words, there is nothing in the act that would cause slave labor; it would be something outside of the act——

Mr. MORGAN. It would be something outside of the act by reason of a duty that is imposed in the act.

Mr. MCCONNELL. That is all.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Morgan, I want to reiterate what Mr. McConnell said about your activity in writing the Taft-Hartley labor law, and the Hartley bill. I have a very distinct recollection of seeing you standing down at the end of that table, with the whole table covered with papers and amendments, and things of that sort, that people wanted to get into the act, and I felt at that time that you were doing a magnificent job of trying to get all of those ideas down into shape. You stated you came here to testify as one American citizen for two purposes, as I get it: The first was you wanted to say how the Taft-Hartley Act was written, and your part in it, and, second, as to what you felt would be needed for legislation.

Now, the direct question: Do you believe that the passing of the Lesinski bill, H. R. 2032, would be a step backward, as far as labor relations are in this country, as the bill is now written?

Mr. MORGAN. I have not approached this in my statement from the standpoint of labor relations. What I have approached it in terms of is some sort of philosophy of government, and I have called it a philosophy of what I deeply believe to be the philosophy of true liberalism, and I am talking about all old-fashioned liberalism, if you want to call it that. I have tried to measure the various provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act by that yardstick, and by doing so I very sincerely believe that it would be a step backward if the Lesinski bill were adopted in its present form.

Mr. SMITH. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Werdel?

Mr. MORGAN. But that is only the opinion of one person.

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Morgan, how long were you a legislative draftsman?

Mr. MORGAN. Eleven years.

Mr. WERDEL. And when did you discontinue your services—that was in the House side?

Mr. MORGAN. That was in the House side; yes, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. And when did you discontinue your services?

Mr. MORGAN. December 31, 1945.

Mr. WERDEL. Then you were in private practice until January 1947?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; and I still am.

Mr. WERDEL. But in January 1947 you were hired by the committee, and still maintained your private practice?

Mr. MORGAN. I was not hired by the committee.

Mr. WERDEL. You went into this engagement of drafting the bill?

Mr. BREHM. It was unanimous.

Mr. MORGAN. I am sure they did.

Mr. WERDEL. You were here present, working?

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. WERDEL. And during the period that you were working on the bill I believe you stated, with the exception of one instance, that you did not talk to employer groups in regard to their requests?

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct.[1]

Mr. WERDEL. Did you have any instructions from Mr. Halleck in that regard?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I did not.

Mr. WERDEL. I mean as to whether or not to talk to groups?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I did not.

Mr. WERDEL. Do you know whether it entered into Mr. Halleck's mind when you were employed, the fact that you were from the legislative council and were respected by all parties on the committee?

Mr. MORGAN. I am sure he did. I think that is the only reason he ever got me.

Mr. WERDEL. That is the point I want to bring out. That was one of the motivating factors in hiring you; is that not correct?

Mr. MORGAN. I am sure it was. Of course, I cannot say, of my own knowledge.

Mr. WIER. Will you yield?

Mr. WERDEL. Yes.

Mr. WIER. You have me confused now, because the question was just asked of you if the committee knew you were working for the committee and, I think, the gentleman over there said "Yes, it was unanimous;" is that correct?

Mr. BREHM. I am not on the committee. I was just talking to Mr. Werdel as a private man.

Mr. WIER. If that is the case, Mr. Werdel, I am wondering why the committee did not pay him?

Mr. WERDEL. I do not know any more about that than you do. I am just as inquisitive about this as you are.

Mr. BREHM. With your consent, I could make a statement. I am not on the subcommittee, but I will say the gentleman was approved by everybody.

Mr. WERDEL. As I understand your remarks and your suggestions at the end of your written statement, they are prepared by you as a draftsman and not as a labor expert; is that correct?

[1] Under date of March 21, 1949, in a letter to Chairman Kelley, Mr. Morgan stated: "In reviewing the transcript of my testimony * * * I must have misunderstood Mr. Werdel's question, for while I did not at any time talk with employer groups on my own responsibility, on numerous occasions I conferred with employer representatives and others concerning their proposals when I was requested so to do by Members of the House, and for the sole purpose of advising the Members in question with respect thereto. In every case I reported directly to the House Member concerned—and to him alone—as to what was desired by the particular individual he had asked me to confer with, what in my opinion was the practical effect of what was proposed, and how it could be accomplished by amendment if the Member himself wished to suggest an amendment. I desire to emphasize that nothing was ever put into the bill by me as a result of any such conference."

Mr. MORGAN. My recommendations at the end were not prepared as a draftsman. As a draftsman I never made any recommendations. When we were down in the legislative council's office we were draftsmen, and that was all we were. We drafted anything any committee wanted, whether we thought it was good or bad, and that was the function that I performed in connection with this bill. The recommendations that I make here are recommendations of policy. I am not making those as a draftsman. I am making those as recommendations that I personally feel, as a result of having been all through the thing.

Mr. WERDEL. That is what I am getting at. You were the draftsman of the Hartley bill?

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct.

Mr. WERDEL. And that is not the present Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct.

Mr. WERDEL. And the act that was passed came from the Senate through conference?

Mr. MORGAN. Substantially that is correct.

Mr. WERDEL. And the recommendations that you make are made by you in the light of the conferences that you sat through in the drafting of the Hartley Act and the conferences on the Senate bill and are not necessarily predicated upon experiences in labor law that you have had since the drafting of it; is that correct?

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct.

Mr. WERDEL. That is all.

Mr. MORGAN. I have had no experience in labor law since the drafting of the Taft-Hartley.

Mr. WERDEL. But you have kept yourself acquainted with some of the regulations?

Mr. MORGAN. Generally speaking, yes, sir; as a matter of interest.

Mr. WERDEL. I will give the balance of my time to Dr. Brehm to make a statement to help clear up this employment.

Mr. BREHM. Thank you, Mr. Werdel.

I will say this publicly, that there was not one bit of opposition to Jerry Morgan, by a Democrat or Republican, at the time he was serving here.

Mr. KELLEY. As I recall, the Democrats did not have anything to say about it.

Mr. BREHM. They always have quite a bit to say, regardless of what it is.

Mr. IRVING. I am a little bit confused here. I understood the witness to testify that all the meetings were with the majority group at all times, and I took that to be with the Republican members of the committee.

Mr. MORGAN. May I answer that, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. IRVING. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. Before the bill was ever introduced the bill was formulated by the majority members of the committee. Of course, you doubtless realize that where you have one party in control of a legislative branch of the Government, and another one in control of the executive branch of the Government, that the party in control of the legislative branch has to form its legislative program in a different sort of way, and that was what happened to that particular bill. The bill, before it was ever introduced, was formulated by the majority of the members of the committee, and by the Republican steering committee. The bill was considered by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JACOBS. Will you yield, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. IRVING. I would like to finish. In your statement you say all your work in formulating the bill was with the majority side: is that not the statement? Is that the way your statement reads?

Mr. MORGAN. Until after the bill had been introduced and referred to the Committee of the Whole, and after that I was with the committee itself, the whole committee, when it considered the bill in executive session. I think I so stated in my statement.

Mr. BREHM. That is what I had in mind. When we started in writing the bill, Jerry Morgan sat here as a counsel, and was acceptable to every member of the committee.

Mr. JACOBS. How long was the bill before the full committee? Either one of you can answer it.

Mr. BREHM. If I am not mistaken, it was here Thursday, Friday, Saturday, and Monday—I do not know: that is the best way to answer that, without looking it up.

Mr. KELLEY. Will you yield?

Mr. IRVING. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY. As I recall, it was Thursday and Friday.

Mr. BREHM. I think the bill was brought in, and we intended doing the same thing which you fellows did regarding the minimum-wage bill. We had the votes, but we were bigger hearted than you fellows, so we waited a few days.

Mr. IRVING. What was the end result?

Mr. BREHM. The end result was we all got together and wrote a bill.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Nixon, do you have any questions?

Mr. NIXON. I was at another committee meeting and was not here, but I did read Mr. Morgan's statements previously.

My comment, I think, relates to the procedure which Mr. Morgan referred to, that the Republican majority in the committee during the last session necessarily had to follow in writing this bill. I think the new members of this committee on the Democratic side will probably be interested in that procedure, because they, this year, are not confronted with the same problem that we were confronted with 2 years ago.

As the Democratic majority this year well knows, when you want a bill written you go down to the Government Department, which is also Democratic, and they write the bill for you, just as your fair labor standards bill, as you know, was written by the Government Department. You called in their people and although they are paid by the Government they do the work for you. If the Republican majority had called upon the Government to write its bill it would have been a completely useless act. We would have been told, "We are not interested"——

Mr. BAILEY. He said in all of his 11 years' experience as a draftsman they wrote what people asked them to write.

Mr. NIXON. Of course, that is understandable. Of course, this is your first time, as mine was——

Mr. BAILEY. You are wrong about that.

Mr. NIXON. The first time on the committee. Mr. Morgan was referring to the Legislative Reference Service—I mean to the Legislative Counsel's office of the Congress, and it is true that that service is available to both majority and minority.

Mr. BAILEY. You will agree, then, you expressed some little misgivings about trusting the Government, will you not?

Mr. NIXON. My point was that as far as the administrative agencies of the Government are concerned, when the administrative agency of the Government is under the control of one party, and the legislative branch of the Government is under the control of the other, the administrative agencies of the Government are not going to assist the majority in the legislative branch of the Government. I am not being critical, but just giving the facts. So, necessarily, the Republican majority during the last session had to get expert help for the purpose of drafting the legislation, and I want to ask Mr. Morgan if he thinks that is a direct analysis of the situation with which the Republican majority was confronted at the time we asked him to step in and do the work which was done by him on the bill?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not think there is any question about it.

Mr. WIER. He finally got his money from the National Republican Party. When you people won control of the Labor and Education Committee, at that time why was not Mr. Morgan placed upon your pay roll as counselor or adviser?

Mr. BREHM. We did not want the taxpayers to pay for the services of the Republican Party. We had our own money.

Mr. WIER. That is understandable, too.

Mr. NIXON. I have the floor, and I want to ask another question, which I think the gentleman will be interested in.

Mr. Morgan has indicated the Republicans paid for the expert help. I would be very happy myself, being a taxpayer, as is every person sitting on this committee, if the Democratic majority of this committee would have the Democratic National Committee pay to the various administrative agencies which assisted the gentlemen in writing their bill, pay back into the Treasury compensation for the amount of time the men have expended in behalf of the legislation. As I say, I only raised the point because we must understand the difference in the problems with which we were confronted. And you gentlemen are having your work done with the taxpayers' money, by the administrative agencies of the Government. If we were in power we would be doing the same thing—I must say that—but I say also that when we were not in power, although we were in control of the House during the last session, we had no other alternative but to get expert help where we could get it. I will say frankly, because I worked with Mr. Morgan on this legislation and on other legislation on which he has been employed on a retainer basis by Members of the Congress and, I think, we were very fortunate to have a man of his caliber to do the work that was to be done. I have no apologies for the work he did on behalf of the committee. We may disagree as to the provisions of the bill as a matter of policy, but the work that was done was excellent. There was no question, and I think Mr. Morgan deserves the highest commendation for the work he did.

Mr. JACOBS. Would you yield some of your time, Dr. Brehm?

Mr. BREHM. I do not have any time.

Mr. JACOBS. I ask unanimous consent to ask one question.

Mr. IRVING. All the time has expired, and I would like to thank you, Mr. Morgan, for your appearance here. I think everybody appreciates it.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate very much the opportunity of appearing before you.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, was there an objection to my request for unanimous consent?

Mr. IRVING. There were several objections. They want to proceed with the hearings.

The prepared statement of Mr. Morgan, except that part which he has already given, will, without objection, be included in the record.

I should like to discuss with you what I consider to be some of the essential features of that act, to ask you to analyze them in terms of principles of real liberalism, and then to decide whether it is the liberal thing to do to repeal them. And I should also like to discuss those provisions of the act which in my judgment require amendment—for the Taft-Hartley Act is by no means perfect, I know of no legislation that is.

At the outset, it is important to emphasize that the Taft-Hartley Act did not repeal the Wagner Act, rather it added to it. Every protection afforded employees under the Wagner Act in the matter of self-organization and collective bargaining and in the matter of unfair labor practices by employers was retained by the Taft-Hartley Act, and in many particulars that protection was extended and strengthened. So we still have all of the essential features of the Wagner Act in force today.

PROTECTION OF THE PUBLIC

One of the essential features of the Taft-Hartley Act is the series of provisions for the investigation of labor disputes that may cause or are causing substantial injury to the national health or safety, and for giving to the President authority to postpone strikes growing out of such disputes.

Mr. Justice Holmes, in an unpublished dissenting opinion in the case of Hitchman Coal and Coke Co. v. Mitchell (245 U. S. 229; 38 S. Ct. 65), quoted by Holmes in a letter written by him under date of October 26, 1919, to Sir Frederick Pollock, said:

"I have no doubt when the power of either capital or labor is asserted in such a way as to attack the life of the community, those who seek their private interests at such cost are public enemies and should be dealt with as such."

It seems very clear to me that true liberals would regard the individuals comprising our community that we call the general public as having a vital interest in labor disputes that is entitled to protection, that true liberals would demand that the wielders of the tremendous new power of organized labor be not permitted to use that power in such a way as to paralyze the community, jeopardize its health, and imperil its internal and external security.

It is difficult for me to see how it is being liberal to deny to the President authority to prevent this power from being used to attack the life of the community, or how granting the President such authority is akin to imposing slavery upon workers. The name "slave labor" that has been applied to the Taft-Hartley Act by those who not only can do but actually have done these things does not contribute to intelligent appraisal of the act in terms of principle. "Slave labor" is an emotional epithet that I suspect was devised to avoid the necessity of intelligent appraisal.

Slavery means working under legal compulsion. The Taft-Hartley Act not only does not authorize such compulsion, but it in specific terms (sec. 502) prohibits it. Union leaders argue that preventing union members from striking, or that directing them to terminate a strike, is the same as making them work under legal compulsion against their will, and hence slavery. This argument is not new. It has been made by union leaders for at least 50 years, and has never been accepted as valid by the courts.

Preventing strikes no more constitutes involuntary servitude than punishing conspiracies transgresses rights of free speech. The legal philosophy in Anglo-Saxon countries has always recognized significant distinctions between individual action and group action. All of our antitrust laws are founded upon such a distinction; and it is important to remember that the group action doctrines as applied to business, that were developed under the antitrust laws were developed during a period when action by a single individual entrepreneur to the same end was treated as constitutionally protected from legislative regulation.

The distinction between individual and group action as applied to labor problems was indeed recognized by an important segment of organized labor itself, the Railway brotherhoods, in its representations to Congress in connection with the consideration in 1926 of the bill that became the Railway Labor Act. Let me read to you a portion of the Senate committee report on that bill:

"As to paragraph 8 of section 9, it was urged that it should be clarified so as certainly to apply only to the use of legal process against an individual employee and so as not to apply to combinations or conspiracies between several employees to interrupt interstate commerce. It was frankly stated by the advocates of the bill, both those representing the carriers and those representing the employees, that the purpose of the paragraph was to deal merely with individual employees, to express only the constitutional right of individuals against involuntary servitude, and is not intended to deal with combinations, conspiracies, or group action. This construction has been made abundantly clear by an amendment to the bill by which the word 'individual' has been inserted before the word 'employee' wherever the latter word appears in the paragraph." [Italics supplied.]

The provision of the Railway Labor Act discussed in this committee report was also considered by the Supreme Court in the case of Texas and New Orleans Railroad Co. v. Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks (281 U. S. 548; 50 S. Ct. 427), a case that was hailed by unions as the first case recognizing freedom of association as a legally enforceable right. The Court in that case said (p. 566):

"The provision of section 10 is to be read in connection with the qualification in subdivision eighth of section 9 that nothing in the act shall be construed to require an individual employee to render labor without his consent, or as making the quitting of service by an individual employee an illegal act, and that no court shall issue any process to compel the performance by an individual employee of labor without his consent. The purpose of this limitation was manifestly to protect the individual liberty of employees and not to affect proceedings in case of combinations or group action. The denial of legal process in the one case is significant with respect to its expected, appropriate use in the other."

One wonders whether even unions themselves believe what they say when they charge that any restriction on the right to strike constitutes slavery. For all unions seem to be in favor of the President's bill. That bill restricts a union's right to strike, but it does so only where the exercise of that right would unjustifiably interfere—not with rights of the public—but with rights of other unions, that is in the case of jurisdictional strikes and boycotts in aid of jurisdictional strikes.

All of the cases up to this present moment, beginning with Mr. Justice Harlan's decision on circuit in 1894 in the case of Arthur v. Oakes (63 Fed. 310), have recognized the continuing validity of the distinction between individual action by employees, which is protected by the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution, and group action which has no such constitutional protection. In Re Lennon (1897 (166 U. S. 548; 17 S. Ct. 658). Dorchy v. Kansas (1926) (272 U. S. 306; 47 S. Ct. 86). Texas and New Orleans Railroad Co. v. Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, supra. United States v. Petrillo (1948) (332 U. S. 1; 67 S. Ct. 751). U. S. v. United Mine Workers of America (D. C. D. C., 1948) (77 F. Supp. 563). LeBaron v. Printing Specialties and Paper Converters Union (D C. Cal., 1948) (75 F. Supp. 678).

In Dorchy v. Kansas, supra, the opinion of the Court was delivered by a revered liberal, Mr. Justice Brandeis, who said (p. 311): "Neither the common law, nor the fourteenth amendment, confers the absolute right to strike."

See also the portion of the Texas and New Orleans Railroad Co. case quoted above. In the France Packing Co. case, supra, involving the legality of a strike under the War Labor Disputes Act, the Court said (p. 753):

"The contention that a limitation of the right to strike under the specified narrow conditions of section 8 partakes of involuntary servitude is not substantiated by the cases. To the contrary, there is a wide distinction between a worker quitting his job, for any reason or no reason, on the one hand, and a cessation of production by workers who seek to win a point from management, on the other hand.

* * * * * * *

"In brief, the restricted limitation of the right to strike, in this act, refers to circumstances involving a continuing master and servant relationship. There is no involvement here with the distinct—and unquestioned—right of the worker to quit his job or the right of the employer to discharge him for cause. In this situation we fail to see any true constitutional question in this case."

And in the LeBaron case, supra, involving the Taft-Hartley Act itself, the court in its opinion (p. 681) stated:

"We find no support whatever, under the record before us or within the provisions of the act that are involved in this matter, for a finding or conclusion that the thirteenth amendment has been transgressed."

The distinction between group action and individual action that has been consistently made by the courts is written into the Taft-Hartley Act itself. Section 502 of the act, derived from section 9 of the Railway Labor Act, specifically and unqualifiedly recognizes the right of an individual as an individual to quit work at any time and for any reason he sees fit, be it a good reason or a bad one.

Workers who strike, however, do not quit and do not intend to quit. One of the principal purposes of the strike device is, through simultaneous concerted action of all workers, to foreclose the opportunity that the employer might otherwise have of replacing those on strike. It is the right of an individual as such to refuse to work or to quit, that is protected by the Constitutional guaranty of freedom from involuntary servitude. The thirteenth amendment has no application to combinations. Thus a worker who, along with his fellows, is enjoined from striking, can—under the Taft-Hartley Act—as an individual quit any time he chooses, and neither the President, the courts, nor any other officer or agency of Government can prevent him from freely exercising that right.

While the right to strike is not a right having any constitutional status, it is a right whose exercise we have over the years come to treat as a traditional and legitimate means whereby workers, through simultaneous concerted action, can bring economic force to bear on their employer to meet their terms. The right to strike, like all rights, however—even those that are enshrined in the Constitution—is a relative right. Mr. Justice Holmes succinctly stated the relative nature of all rights when he remarked that the right of free speech did not give one the privilege of crying "Fire" in a crowded theater. Similarly the right to strike—which all sincere liberals desire to protect against any and all selfish encroachments—does not give anyone the privilege of exercising it in a manner to prostrate the public.

The President's bill seems to recognize that the public has some interest in labor disputes, but have you considered the President's bill in connection with the term "slave labor"? I call your attention to section 302 (c) of his bill, which directs that the employees "shall continue or resume work." It is this duty under the President's bill—the duty to continue or resume work—which the President says he has an inherent right to enforce by injunctive, and even perhaps by military, processes. The duty to continue work and the duty not to strike are, as I have attempted to point out, two entirely different things. Enforcing a duty to continue or resume work really does constitute involuntary servitude—preventing a strike or directing its termination has nothing to do with it.

I am not contending that the national emergency provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act are not cumbersome or that they do not require amendment—because I think they do. I do contend that it is the essence of true liberalism to treat the public as entitled to protection against irresponsible exercise of power by anyone or any group, including unions, and that the provisions of the President's bill are either entirely worthless in giving this protection, if it should ultimately be determined that the President does not have the inherent power he claims, or are so drastic in compelling involuntary labor—if he does have inherent power to enforce the duties imposed by his bill—that such provisions should not even be seriously considered by this committee.

INTIMIDATION AND COERCION BY UNIONS

(a) In General.—Another essential feature of the Taft-Hartley Act is the series of provisions dealing with intimidating and coercive practices that unions use (1) to prevent individuals from exercising their right to work and from exercising their right to refrain from engaging in union activities, or (2) to cause economic injury to innocent bystanders unless such bystanders enlist in support of the union purpose, or (3) to compel employers to violate the law, or (4) to recruit support for political candidates or political doctrines, and for other miscellaneous purposes.

All of you at one time or another have seen intimidation and coercion by unions. The records of the hearings before this committee and its subcommittees both in 1947 and 1948, as well as numerous transcripts of proceedings before the National Labor Relations Board, are replete with testimony and documentary evidence of the existence of such intimidation and coercion and the forms which it takes. The National Labor Relations Board's recent decision in United Furniture Workers of America, Local 309, CIO and Smith Cabinet Manufacturing Co., Salem, Ind., is merely illustrative. In that case the Board found, and I quote:

"We find, as did the trial examiner, that the following conduct attributable to the respondents or their agents constituted restraint and coercion within the meaning of section 8 (b) (1) (A): (1) the carrying of sticks by the pickets on the picket line; (2) the open piling of bricks for use by the pickets: (3) the blocking of plant entrance by (A) railroad ties, (B) automobiles, (C) raised gutter plates, and (D) tacks; (4) the threat of violence to the nonstriking employees over the loud speaker; (5) the threat of bodily harm to employees Homer Williams, Ruby Winslow, Dorothy Strange, and Wiley Williams; (6) the intimidation of and threats of violence to nonstriking employees including specifically Walter Hilton, Milt Trinkle, Ralph Dobbins, Mabel Asher, and Mirel Mount; (7) the warning given nonstriking employee Albert Holt that 'when we get in with the union you old fellows won't have a job'; (8) the placing of pickets in such a manner as to prevent nonstriking employees from performing their work during the boxcar incidents; (9) the goon squad mass assaults upon various nonstriking employees and the overturning of the automoile belonging to employee Hyde; (10) the assaults committed upon nonstriking employees * * *; (11) the damage to the automobile[1] of White during the aforesaid assault; (12) the barring from the plant of Superintendent Simpson and Foreman McKinney by force and intimidation; (13) the assaults upon Superintendent Simpson; (14) the attempt to upset Foreman McKinney's automobile as he sought to enter the plant and the damage thereto as McKinney later drove past the plant."

It is no answer in the case of occurrences such as these, to say that union coercion should be dealt with, if at all, under State and local criminal laws. It is elementary that there are many forms of very effective coercion that do not constitute crimes under State and local laws. Moreover, the report of the Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations submitted to the Senate and House of Representatives pursuant to section 401 of the Taft-Hartley Act specifically found (p. 79):

"We have observed one factor running throughout these hearings—the inadequacy of local and State laws, or of their enforcement, to protect the right to work during a strike. In some instances the picketing amounted to outright plant seizure. Supervisors and top management were denied access to the plants as well as rank and file workers. In one incident, cited below, the strikers invaded the plant and forcibly ejected employees who had continued at work."

The minority report filed does not in any way dispute this finding.

It does not seem to me to be consistent with liberalism to belittle these things or close the eyes to them, as seems to be done by the President's bill. Mr. Louis D. Brandeis in 1904 stated the views of a true liberal about such things:

"You may compromise a matter of wages, you may compromise a matter of hours—if the margin of profit will permit. No man can say with certainty that his opinion is the right one on such a question. But you may not compromise on a question of morals, or where there is lawlessness or even arbitrariness. Industrial liberty, like civil liberty, must rest upon the solid foundation of law. Disregard the law in either, however good your motives, and you have anarchy. The plea of trades-unions for immunity, be it from injunction or from liability for damages, is as fallacious as the plea of the lynchers. If lawless methods are pursued by trades-unions, whether it be by violence, by intimidation, or by the more peaceful infringement of legal rights, that lawlessness must be put down at once and at any cost." (Address at the annual banquet of the Boston Typothetae, Boston, Mass., on April 21, 1904.)

When unions argue that coercive and intimidating practices on their part should be dealt with exclusively under local law, we all know—and we might as well admit it—that they do so because they wish to remain reasonably free to engage in them.

[1] The car of another nonstriking employee was blown up in the yard of his home, according to the trial examiner.

Unions also argue that if intimidation and coercion on their part is prevented by Federal law, unions wil be subjected to a "double penalty"—once under Federal law and once under State law. As to the many forms of coercion that do not constitute crimes under State law, it is obvious that this argument is wholly lacking in substance. As to coercion of the kind that can be prosecuted criminally under State law, the argument doesn't prove anything.

An employer who coerces employees to stay out of the union by threatening them with physical violence commits a crime under State law, but he also makes himself subject to the remedial processes of the National Labor Relations Board. It is both necessary and proper that such be the case. The right of freedom of association embodied in the Wagner Act is a right provided by Federal law. The State criminal laws were neither enacted, nor are they enforced, with a view to protecting any such right. Many practical considerations are involved in the administration of State criminal laws that are wholly inappropriate in the determination of whether particular acts have the effect of intimidating or coercing individuals in the exercise of a right to associate or to refrain therefrom, or in the exercise of a right to work.

Moreover, it is not at all unusual to have particular acts punishable even criminally under both State and Federal law, and it has been consistently held by the courts that no question of double jeopardy is involved in such situations. Similarly it is not at all unusual to have particular acts that are criminal under State law subject to administrative or other civil proceedings under Federal law. The State laws in such cases are exclusively penal—the Federal proceedings merely remedial. So it is with the intimidation and coercion provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. There is no penalty under that act against a union for engaging in coercive practices—the act merely provides a procedure whereby the National Labor Relations Board can direct the union to cease such coercive practices. If unions really believe they are being penalized when they are told by the Board to stop such practices, it is very apparent that their argument is founded on a shocking premise—namely that intimidation and coercion by unions should be treated as an ordinary and legitimate part of union activities.

The Taft-Hartley Act was formulated on the opposite premise. It followed the precedent of the Norris-LaGuardia Act by specifically recognizing, as does the Norris-LaGuardia Act, the right of individuals, if they wish, to refrain from engaging in concerted activities. The Taft-Hartley Act does more, however, than merely recognize the right. It contains provisions to protect individuals from intimidation and coercion when they wish to exercise it. I do not know of any responsible American who could be called liberal who would deny that individuals have this right. If they do have it, why should it not be protected against assaults upon it by powerful groups—be they union groups, employer groups, or otherwise?

(b) The closed shop.—Another provision of the Taft-Hartley Act that was designed to deal with coercion of individuals by unions is the provision outlawing the closed shop. Under the act, however, an individual can still be compelled to join the union and pay his dues to keep his job. The only important difference between the closed shop permitted under the old law and the union shop permitted under the Taft-Hartley Act is that under the Taft-Hartley Act a union cannot by expelling an individual from the union for reasons other than his failure to pay his dues compel the employer to discharge him.

The importance of this provision of the Taft-Hartley Act to individual freedom cannot be overemphasized. A case that came to the attention of the Board shortly after the act became law is illustrative:

A union in New York—Local 65, Wholesale and Retail Workers, CIO—having numerous closed-shop contracts with employers, levied an assessment against its members to raise funds to oppose the bill. Many of the members of the union objected to the assessment and announced their refusal to pay it. Thereupon the union ordered the expulsion of the recalcitrants and directed the employers to discharge them, as the employers were required to do under the closed-shop contracts with the union.

The fact that the assessment was made for the purpose of opposing the bill is not important. No truly liberal-minded person ever objects to opposition to his views because he believes, with Mr. Justice Holmes, that "the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas—that the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market." What is important is that individuals were being coerced with loss of jobs, or by threats thereof, to support doctrines with which they chose not to agree. Such is the result—and all too frequently the purpose—of the closed-union shop. It is the yellow-dog contract in reverse. It is the tyranny of the union over individuals instead of the tyranny of the employer.

The historical justification for the closed shop device was that nonunion employees could and would undercut the union standards. This argument can no longer be used, however, for under the Wagner Act the union representing the majority speaks and acts for all, and the employer is prohibited from treating separately with employees who are not members of the union.

It is impossible for a truly liberal-minded person to justify the closed shop on principle. What arguments there are that are made in its favor are arguments of expediency. Why should any private group—union or otherwise—have the power to pass sentence of economic death over an individual in America merely for exercising his right to decline to join the group or, as happened in New York, merely for exercising his right to favor the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act? To me the closed shop is simply the blacklist in reverse.

Many employers like the closed shop because it saves them a lot of bother in recruiting workers, but the fact that employers like it and unions want it doesn't make the closed shop right. Employers and unions should not have the privilege of combining to determine the economic destiny of someone else.

If the size of minorities is important—and I don't believe it is to the true liberal—it might be appropriate to point out that it has been reliably estimated that in the representation elections conducted during the first 10 years under the Wagner Act, at least 3,000,000 American workers voted against the unions that were ultimately chosen to represent them. Should these 3,000,000 individuals in America be subject to being forced into the unions they did not want? Moreover in the union shop elections conducted in the first year under the Taft-Hartley Act—and these were held for the most part where there was already a closed or union shop contract in existence—some 141,000 individuals voted against even the union shop. Are the wishes of these 141,000 individuals to be disregarded? Has not each one of them some right to individuality of thought and action?

One of our great Americans, the late Mr. Justice Brandeis, universally revered as a champion of liberalism, had some things to say about the closed shop. Some of them are gathered together in the opinion of Mr. Justice Frankfurter in the case of American Federation of Labor v. American Sash & Door Co. (69 S. Ct. 258, 264):

"The objections—legal, economic, and social—against the closed shop are so strong, and the ideas of the closed shop so antagonistic to the American spirit, that the insistence upon it has been a serious obstacle to union progress." (Letter of September 6, 1910, to Lawrence F. Abbott.)

* * * * * * *

"But the American people should not and will not accept unionism if it involves the closed shop. They will not consent to the exchange of the tyranny of the employer for the tyranny of the employees." (Letter of February 26, 1912, to Lincoln Steffens.)

* * * * * * *

"It is not true that the 'success of a labor union' necessarily means a 'perfect monopoly'. The union, in order to attain and preserve for its members industrial liberty, must be strong and stable. It need not include every member of the trade. Indeed, it is desirable for both the employer and the union that it should not. Absolute power leads to excesses and to weakness; neither our character nor our intelligence can long bear the strain of unrestricted power. The union attains success when it reaches the ideal condition, and the ideal condition for a union is to be strong and stable, and yet to have in the trade outside its own ranks an appreciable number of men who are nonunionists. In any free community the diversity of character, of beliefs, of taste—indeed mere selfishness—will insure such a supply, if the enjoyment of this privilege of individualism is protected by law. Such a nucleus of unorganized labor will check oppression by the union as the union checks oppression by the employer." (Contribution to a discussion entitled "Peace with Liberty and Justice" in 2 National Civic Federation Review, No. 2, pp. 1, 16, May 15, 1905.)"

In contrast to these views of a great American liberal I am setting out below the contentions made by the American Federation of Labor in the recent closed-shop cases in the Supreme Court, as summarized by Mr. Justice Black (Lincoln Fed. Labor Union v. Northwestern Iron and Metal Co., 69 S. Ct. 251, 254), and ask you what liberalism you find in those contentions.

"Their contention is that these State laws indirectly infringe their constitutional rights of speech, assembly, and petition. * * * Justification for such an expansive construction of the right to speak, assemble, and petition is then rested in part on appellant's assertion 'that the right of a nonunionist to work is in no way equivalent to or the parallel of the right to work as a union member; that there exists no constitutional right to work as a nonunionist on the one hand while the right to maintain employment free from discrimination because of union membership is constitutionally protected.' * * *

We deem it unnecessary to elaborate the numerous reasons for our rejection of this contention of appellants. Nor need we appraise or analyze with particularity the rather startling ideas suggested to support some of the premises on which appellants' conclusions rest." [Italics supplied.]

(c) Boycotts and jurisdictional strikes.—The Taft-Hartley Act also makes union coercion in the form of secondary boycotts, strikes by unions to compel employers to disregard and violate Board certifications, and jurisdictional strikes by unions unfair labor practices. In the case of boycotts and strikes to compel violations of Board certifications, the act also makes the union liable in damages to innocent third parties injured thereby. And it also directs the Board, through the General Counsel, to apply to the appropriate court for an injunction restraining boycotts and strikes to compel violations of Board certifications, where the preliminary investigation of the charge produces reasonable cause to believe the charge is true. This provision requiring the General Counsel to apply for an injunction I will discuss later.

The President's bill recognizes that some boycotts and jurisdictional strikes are indefensible. Under that bill the boycotts that are treated as unfair-labor practices on the part of labor organizations are those conducted to compel an employer to bargain with a particular labor organization if (1) another labor organization has been certified by the Board, or (2) the employer is required by an order of the Board to bargain with another labor organization, or (3) the employer is currently recognizing another labor organization and has executed a collective bargaining agreement with it: and those conducted in furtherance of a very limited kind of jurisdictional dispute.

One thing that is immediately apparent from the President's bill is the premise on which it seems to have been drafted. This premise is that labor organizations are entitled to protection from other labor organizations, but that individuals who do not wish to be members of labor organizations, innocent bystanders, and members of the general public are not entitled to any protection at all.

You are doubtless all familiar with cases involving small retail stores run by a family consisting of a man, his wife, and perhaps one or two boys. The family has no desire whatsoever to join any labor organization, but it is not uncommon in a situation of this sort for unions having control of delivery and other facilities necessary to keep the shop going to conduct crippling boycotts to force such a family to pay tribute to the union.

Can a boycott of this sort be defended? The argument that unions make to the effect that boycotts are necessary and desirable to protect union standards against sweatshop conditions may have had some validity in the days before minimum-wage legislation, strict regulation of industrial home work, prohibition of child labor, and other laws prescribing minimum labor standards. But what sweatshop conditions exist in such a store that justify extortion under threat of business ruin?

There are many other forms of boycotts that are indefensible and yet are not touched by the President's bill. The President's bill on jurisdictional disputes over assignment of work tasks is wholly inadequate. It seems to be based on the premise that strikes and boycotts in furtherance of interunion and intra-union quarrels of this sort are justifiable until the National Labor Relations Board can get around to a compulsory arbitration proceeding and issue an award assigning the work to one union or another. It is during the period prior to the settlement of such disputes that the injury is done by the jurisdictional strike or boycott. Under the President's bill (sec. 106 (a)) employers are evidently supposed to maintain a neutral position until the dispute is settled. The only way in which an employer can maintain a neutral position in the face of a jurisdictional strike is to close down his plant or stop all work until the matter is settled. Does this solution of the problem of jurisdictional strikes seem fair?

(d) Union political contributions and expenditures.—The provision of the Taft-Hartley Act which prohibits political contributions or expenditures by unions is another provision designed to protect the rights of individuals and minorities by preventing union leaders from using a member's money to support candidates or doctrines with which the member may not agree. Does this deny to that member his political freedom, or does it actually protect it? A union as a legal entity separate and distinct from its individual members has no political rights. It is political rights of individuals that we should concern ourselves about.

Bloc voting has never come to America, for in America individuals are free to think and speak and vote as they wish. The liberal prays that it never will come to America, for if it should its doing so would mean the destruction of liberalism in government. If bloc voting is to be feared as a danger to the cause of liberalism, why should we countenance bloc contributions and bloc expenditures for political purposes and disregard the freedom of the individual?

REPRESENTATION OF EMPLOYEES

Another essential feature of the Taft-Hartley Act designed to protect individuals is a provision recognizing the right of employees to get rid of a representative that they don't like. The Wagner Act, in section 9 (c), provided that "whenever a question affecting commerce arises concerning the representation of employees, the Board may investigate" and certify the representatives that have been selected. Despite this provision, the Board consistently refused to grant to employees the right to vote on the question of getting rid of a union that they did not like as their representative. The Board would only recognize their right to shift from one union to another. Do you think that this practice of the Board was consistent with any philosophy that could be called liberal?

If a union once wins a representation election, must employees be required to keep that union as their representative forever unless some other union comes along? What excuse is there for not giving employees the right to get rid of such a representative if they wish to do so? Yet the old Board consistently refused to entertain employee petitions for elections to decertify a representative.

Unions say that giving employees the right to vote to decertify a representative can be used by antilabor employers to "bust" the unions. Such an argument conveniently ignores the fact that such practices by an employer would constitute unfair labor practices subject to the remedial processes of the Board. If the provisions prescribing unfair labor practices on the part of employers are not sufficient to protect employees in their right to engage in union activities if they wish to, for heaven's sake, let's make them sufficient; but don't in the name of liberalism or otherwise deny to employees the right in a secret ballot to make a free choice. If the employer seeks to use the decertification procedure as a means of trying to "bust" a union, the Board can and would refuse to hold the election, or can and would set it aside if it had already been held, just as it has uniformly done in the past under analogous circumstances.

There are other provisions of the act also dealing with the representation of employees, such as the provision recognizing the rights of employees in craft units to be separated from larger industrial units if they wish to have their own representative for collective bargaining. The treatment of professional employees in a similar manner is another example. All of such provisions have the effect of giving greater freedom to the individual, which is the very essence of liberalism.

FREE SPEECH

The Taft-Hartley Act specifically provides that both employers and unions and their respective representatives may freely express and disseminate views, argument, and opinion about any matter without by doing so being guilty of an unfair labor practice, if the expression does not threaten reprisal or force or promise a benefit. The act also provides that such expressions of views, argument, or opinion may not be used as evidence of any unfair labor practice. This latter provision is discussed later in some detail.

One would think that in the United States it would be unnecessary to write into law one of the basic guaranties of the Constitution. The need for doing so, however, stemmed from doctrines adopted by the National Labor Relations Board. The sequence of these doctrines illustrates the necessity for this provision of the act.

In the first few years of the Wagner Act the Board devised a doctrine pursuant to which, if it found the "totality" of the employer's conduct to be antiunion, it would hold whatever the employer said that was critical of the union (even though what he said was not coercive or threatening by itself) to be coercive as a matter of law, and would issue a cease-and-desist order against the speech itself and thus seal the employer's lips for the future. This doctrine was abandoned by the Board after the Supreme Court warned the Board that both employers as well as unions had a right of free speech in labor controversies. The Board thereupon developed another doctrine—that speech by the employer critical of the union would be treated as coercive if made to employees during working hours, or would be treated as coercive if the employer had done something else, even severable from and unrelated to the speech, which the Board found to be an unfair labor practice. Moreover, speech by the employer or the employer's agents that was critical of the union would be uniformly seized upon by the Board to show that employees who had been discharged were in fact discharged for union activities.

The consistent practice of the Board from the beginning of imposing limitations on the employer's right to speak had very practical effects in day-to-day labor-management relations. The unions could say anything they wanted to (including in many cases vilification of the employer himself), but the employer dared not say a word in reply. In 1940 the American Federation of Labor endorsed a free-speech amendment to the Wagner Act, because even they found, in their struggle at that time to maintain the identity of their crafts in the face of industrial-unit determinations being made by the Board, that employers dared not even say a kind word for the American Federation of Labor.

The very practical effects that these changing, but always restrictive, doctrines of the Board had on day-to-day labor-management relations—the "totality of the Board's conduct" in this respect, if you will—made it necessary to write a free-speech guaranty into the act itself so as to compel the Board to abandon those doctrines. Otherwise the employer spoke at his peril—the peril of a cease-and-desist order and perhaps even of an order directing reinstatement of employees and imposing a substantial liability on the employer for back pay. Does this seem fair?

Do you really believe that the National Labor Relations Board or any other agency should have the power, and encourageemnt from the Congress that it be exercised, to close people's lips by issuing and enforcing cease-and-desist orders against what they say? Do you think repealing a denial of such a power, with all the implications involved in such a repeal, is the liberal thing to do?

DUE PROCESS

The Taft-Hartley Act contains a number of provisions directed to the same end—that proceedings before the Board be conducted in accordance with due process of law.

(1) I had always supposed that one of the cornerstones of liberalism was insistence upon compliance with the fundamental requirements of due process and fair play. Does it seem fair to you to have an administrative agency act as investigator, prosecutor, judge, and jury in the same case, and then, insofar as its findings of fact are concerned, be in effect its own supreme court? Why is it not fair to deny to the judge the power of investigating and prosecuting cases that he himself must decide, as is done in the Taft-Hartley Act?

It is undoubtedly true that the prosecuting official—the general counsel—under the Taft-Hartley Act can refuse to issue a complaint, and he may even do so arbitrarily. It is also true that such a refusal is tantamount to a denial of the means of redress established by Congress for unfair labor practices. But these are not arguments against separating the prosecuting and judicial functions. They are arguments against the present scope of the prosecuting powers.

The majority members of this committee in 1947 seriously considered a proposal by one of the members that the parties conduct their own proceedings before the Board: Issue and serve their own complaints and prosecute them before the Board, etc., as is done in judicial proceedings. The desirability of imposing a duty on the general counsel to issue and serve complaints filed with him alleging violations of the act, and doing away with the preliminary step of the charge now provided by law, was also seriously discussed. Such suggestions, however, have nothing to do with limiting the judicial body to judicial functions. Why is it proposed to revest the judicial body with prosecuting functions? Do you really think doing so would be more consistent with the Anglo-American concept of due process and fair play?

(2) What is your opinion as to the fairness of a procedure which has the trial examiner hear the evidence, observe the witnesses, and make findings of fact which, before they are ever seen or considered by the judge, are changed by the trial examiner's supervisor, who has not heard the evidence, observed the witnesses, or even read the record? After you have had your hearing before the judge on your objections to the trial examiner's report, what is your view as to the fairness of the trial examiner conferring with the judge in your absence and arguing in support of his position? These things were part and parcel of the practice and procedure of the National Labor Relations Board before the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act. Their continuance was specifically prohibited by that act. What reason is there for returning to the old system?

(3) The Taft-Hartley Act abolished the Review Section of the old General Counsel's Office in the National Labor Relations Board. Are you familiar with the functions that were performed by this section? After a trial examiner had prepared his report in a case, discussed the evidence, and made findings of fact and conclusions of law, the Review Section would rereview the transcript of the hearings, review the findings and conclusions of the trial examiner, and prepare a memorandum on the case for the Board.

The preparation of this memorandum would be initially assigned to one of the attorneys in the Review Section. He would go over the transcript and the trial examiner's report, and draft a proposed memorandum thereon. He would not have heard the evidence or observed the witnesses. This proposed memorandum would then be reviewed, and perhaps changed, by the review attorney's supervisor in the Review Section, who had not even read the transcript, and then delivered to each member of the Board. The same memorandum went to each member, but was not available to the parties. It was this memorandum that was generally used by the Board members to inform themselves on the case. If you were a party to a proceeding before the Board, what would you think of the fairness of having your case brought to the Board in this fashion? Does such a procedure impress you as being fair?

After the Board members had been thus informed about a case and had voted as to how the case should be decided, it was the practice to assign to the Review Section, rather than to one of the Board members as would be done in the case of a judicial body, the duty of preparing a draft opinion. Thus, unless there was a dissent by one of the members which one of the other members saw fit to answer, both the decision and the form in which the decision appeared were virtually a product of the corporate personality of the Review Section.

Under the Taft-Hartley Act the Review Section was abolished, and in lieu thereof each member of the Board is provided with legal assistants of his own to assist him, and him alone, in reviewing transcripts and drafting opinions for him, just as judges have their own law assistants to give them such help.

Is it wrong to require the Board to function in a judicial fashion in the same manner that our courts do? What reason is there for reinstating the Review Section?

UNION RESPONSIBILITY

The Taft-Hartley Act makes both unions and employers answerable in damages in the Federal courts for breaches of collective-bargaining agreements affecting commerce. It also makes unions liable in damages to innocent third parties caught in the middle of a union boycott or a jurisdictional strike.

There is no valid reason that has ever been communicated to me for exempting labor unions from a responsibility that all others in our economy assume when they make a contract; viz, the responsibility of complying with it or being liable in damages for its breach. Do you think it is fair for the laws of the United States, through the device of compulsory collective bargaining, to in effect compel the making of collective labor agreements and then to in effect exempt one of the parties from all liability for violation of his own undertakings? Why do some of you want to do this? I have read and heard "expediency" arguments in support of exempting labor unions from suit—arguments, for example, that suits against unions would soon exhaust union treasuries and thus destroy the union, or that unions would be harassed by suits brought by antilabor employers bent only on destroying the union. But the experience under the Taft-Hartley Act has shown these arguments to be invalid. Unions have not been flooded with suits. And to date there has not been one cent in damages collected against either unions or employers under this provision of the act. Unions are stronger today than they ever were. Moreover, to the extent that the arguments imply that unions would be "soaked" in a manner or to an extent not warranted by the circumstances, the argument implies lack of both competence and integrity in the American judicial system.

Unions argue that it is wrong, by outlawing the closed shop, to deny them the means of disciplining their members, while at the same time making them responsible for fulfilling their contracts. There are several answers to this argument. I will mention but two. First, the law does not prescribe what obligations a union shall assume in its contract. If a union or any other person negotiating a contract cannot comply with a particular obligation that is proposed, it is better not to assume that obligation. Second, insofar as wildcat strikes, work stoppages, slow-downs, job actions, and other disruptive activities and practices of union members are concerned, unions ordinarily not only fail to denounce them, but they even try to prevent the employer from disciplining those who engage in them. Unions can very easily disclaim responsibility for these disruptive practices if they will permit the employer, without retaliating against him, to discharge the participants.

OTHER ESSENTIAL FEATURES

The provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act that I have discussed above are some of the essential features of that act. There are others equally as important, such, for example, as the mutual duty to bargain, the independence of the Mediation and Conciliation Service, the barring of stale charges, the power of the Board to secure temporary injunctions either gainst employers or against unions, or both, in order to assure maintenance of the status quo pending decision by the Board on the merits. There is not sufficient time here to discuss all of them.

SUGGESTIONS FOR CHANGES IN LAW

By discussing what I consider to be some of the essential features of the Taft-Hartley Act, I do not wish in any way to imply that I believe the act does not require amendment, because I think it does. Some changes are indicated from the experience that we have had under it. Others seem to me to be necessary to better balance the scales between labor and management, between labor, management, and the public, and between unions and their members. I should like to discuss very briefly what I think those changes should be.

(a) National emergencies.—I have attempted to show that labor's right to strike is not a right that we can or should permit to be exercised in a manner to attack the life of the community or to prostrate the public. The Taft-Hartley Act contains a fairly cumbersome procedure which to my mind does not go to the heart of the problem. First, a board of inquiry is created. Then the board of inquiry reports to the President. Next the President—if he deems it necessary—requests the Attorney General to apply to the appropriate court for an injunction. If the injunction is issued, the board of inquiry is reconvened, and if the dispute is not settled at the end of 60 days, the board is to make a report to the President. Thereupon the National Labor Relations Board must take a secret ballot of the employees on the employer's last offer. At the end of 80 days, irrespective of whether the dispute has been settled, the injunction must be discharged, and thereafter the public is entirely without protection.

In the case of strikes which are causing or threatening to cause substantial injury to the national health or safety, I would suggest doing either one of two things:

(1) Give the President authority to seek an injunction against striking in such a manner as to cause such injury. The adoption of such a suggestion would not preclude separate strikes against individual employers, except possibly under very unusual circumstances. The injunction would be a permanent injunction, its effectiveness not being limited to any particular period of time; or

(2) Outlaw industry-wide bargaining in a manner similar to that proposed in the Hartley bill as passed by the House in 1947. Such a suggestion would prohibit (with certain exceptions to take care of the problem of employees of small employers) a union from representing for bargaining purposes the employees of more than one employer, and would also prevent unions from acting in concert with respect to their bargaining arrangements. It would not preclude affiliation of local unions with internationals, but would very substantially restrict the power of the international over the local. In addition to imposing these restrictions on unions acting in concert, the suggestion would also prohibit employers from combining or agreeing with one another with respect to their bargaining arrangements.

(b) Amendment of free-speech provision.—The evidence rule in the free-speech provision of the act presents a very difficult problem. It is undoubtedly true that this rule has the effect of excluding evidence of a kind that in other proceedings, both judicial and administrative, is treated as having some probative value. On the other hand, it is also true that the Board, in its zeal to advance union interests at all costs, had grossly abused its power to consider such evidence, through according it weight out of all proportion to its significance. The practical result was that if the employer or his agents said anything critical of the union of his employees, or even critical of unions generally, the employer thereafter discharged employees at his peril.

I would suggest that the committee determine whether it is not true that as a practical matter it is rarely, if ever, necessary to use speech that consists merely of views, argument, or opinion (and this does not include admissions, statements of fact, questioning of employees, and similar matters) as evidence of motive or intent in labor-relations cases, if it is not true that there is invariably other and much stronger evidence of such motive or intent. If it is true—and I think you will find it to be—inasmuch as the right to speak freely is a right that we in America wish to protect against all unnecessary encroachments, and inasmuch as the present evidence rule applies both in respect of employer conduct and union conduct, I would not at this time favor changing the rule. If, however, it is found to prejudice the just rights of unions or of employers, I certainly would favor its being either restricted in its application or eliminated entirely.

As further illustrative of the attitude of the Board toward the expression of views, argument, and opinion, the Board has held that the existing free-speech provision does not apply to speech before or in connection with representation elections and has set aside elections where the employer has made comments critical of the union. This seems to me improper, and so I would suggest that the free-speech provision be amended to make it applicable to views, arguments, and opinions expressed either by employers or unions or their agents in connection with representation elections.

(c) Union financial reports.—I do not believe that it is either necessary or appropriate that fulfillment of the financial reporting requirement imposed on unions be made a condition to the exercise of a union's rights under the Wagner Act. It seems to me that this requirement should more properly be made wholly independent of the Wagner Act, and also that union members should have the right to inspect the reports filed with the Secretary of Labor by his union.

(d) Mandatory application for injunctions.—I believe that the discretionary power which now exists under section 10 (k) of the amended Wagner Act to seek temporary injunctions against either employers or unions or both pending decision by the Board on the merits of the case, should be retained. But I do not believe there should be a separate provision imposing a duty to apply for temporary injunctions against labor unions when they do particular things. Thus I would suggest repealing section 10 (l) of the amended Wagner Act.

(e) Prosecution of cases before board.—I have previously indicated that under the Taft-Hartley Act, the refusal by the general counsel to process a charge or issue a complaint is, if such refusal is arbitrary, capricious, or even incorrect, tantamount to a denial of relief under the act. I have also urged that this fact is no argument for revesting the prosecuting functions in the judicial body, the Board.

I would suggest that the act be amended so as to give parties the right, if they wish, to issue their own complaints under the act and prosecute those complaints before the Board. This suggestion is a suggestion for an additonal remedial procedure, not one to take the place of the existing procedure. Thus if parties were dissatisfied with the action of the general counsel, they would have a right to initiate and conduct their own cases.

(f) Additional protection to individuals.—I do not believe that prohibiting the closed shop is sufficient to give individual union members adequate protection against arbitrary action by the union. There are countless individuals who want to be union people and be known as such. It is no answer to them to say that if the union expels them for reasons other than failure to pay dues they can nevertheless still keep their jobs. They don't want to be expelled, they want to be good union men and stay in the union.

For this reason, I suggest that there be added to the Taft-Hartley Act the essential features of the bill of rights that was contained in section 8 (c) of the Labor Act under the Hartley bill, but that was dropped out by the conference committee on the bill. I also suggest that there be added to the Taft-Hartley Act a provision making it an unfair labor practice for an international union to restrain or coerce any of its locals in respect of their bargaining arrangements or otherwise.

(g) Definition of collective bargaining.—The definition of collective bargaining in the Taft-Hartley Act, requiring 60-day notices, etc., seems to me to be cumbersome and unnecessary, as well as a trap for the unwary. Morever it seems to me that its provisions depriving individual employees of rights under the act are unduly harsh. For these reasons I would suggest the elimination of this definition and the substitution therefor of the provisions of section 108 of the President's bill (H. R. 2032).

CONCLUSION

It has been my purpose to tell you exactly how the Taft-Hartley Act was drafted, to discuss some of its provisions in terms of what I consider to be the philosophy of true liberalism, and to suggest various changes in the act that seem to me to be necessary or desirable. As merely one American, speaking for no group and representing no interest except what I believe very deeply to be the interest of true liberalism in government in America, I urge you to consider the Taft-Hartley Act, provision by provision, on its merits, judge it according to liberal principles, and then determine whether it is not more consistent with those principles to retain the essential features of the act, and to modify the act only where the application of these principles dictates that modification should be made, rather than repeal it outright.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I have a request from the National Farm Labor Bureau, a large farm organization in the country, wanting time to appear before the committee holding hearings on this act, and I talked to the clerk and he said he thought all the time had expired, and I wanted your ruling on it.

Mr. KELLEY. He stated correctly. All the time has been taken. The committee adopted a rule in the beginning that we would have 10 full legislative days, and I might say they have been full, in order to take care of the witnesses we had scheduled.

There have been three farm groups already testify before this committee. Why does he not file a statement? We will accept that.

Mr. SMITH. I am simply passing it on to you at their request.

Mr. KELLEY. That is the answer.

Mr. SMITH. They will not be given time?

Mr. KELLEY. There is no time.

Mr. IRVING. Will the witness state his name, and proceed?

TESTIMONY OF HON. ANTHONY F. TAURIELLO, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF NEW YORK

Mr. TAURIELLO. My name is Anthony F. Tauriello, and I represent the Forty-third Congressional District of New York.

At the outset, permit me to thank you for affording me the privilege of appearing here and making this brief verbal statement. I have no prepared statement.

I have served on the Erie County Board of Supervisors for two terms, and on the Buffalo Common Council for two and a half terms, being a member of that legislative body up to January of this year, at which time I resigned to assume my duties here in the Congress.

Some of the things I may say to you this afternoon, I am sure you have heard repeatedly during your hearings. I feel that you gentlemen, who are sitting here with so much patience and listening to the witnesses as they come in, certainly want to know how some Members of Congress feel insofar as the Taft-Hartley law is concerned.

Last year when I sought the office I presently hold, I ran on the Democratic platform which embodied the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. While I am not a constitutional lawyer nor a labor expert, I feel that I am qualified to present the opinion of the greater part of the district it is my privilege to represent.

My district is made up of a cosmopolitan people, laborers, white-collar workers, wealthy people, and very poor people.

The man whom I defeated last November, and who preceded me here, voted for the Taft-Hartley Act, and voted to override the President's veto. In 1946 he was elected by an overwhelming majority of 33,000 votes. Last fall I defeated my predecessor by almost 7,000 votes, so that I feel that in appearing before you this afternoon and urging you to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act, I am representing the will of the people in my congressional district, a district which is normally Republican, at least, a majority.

As I say, I ran on the Democratic platform, and I supported the President and his policies. Because of that I feel I am representing the will of the people of my district.

Personally, I am partial to labor. I came from a laboring family—came up the hard way, like most of you gentlemen, and worked on construction jobs and in steel plants. While earning my livelihood to go to school, I experienced some of the conditions which labor encountered, during the years prior to the passage of the Wagner Act.

We are all familiar with the events that prompted the passage of the Wagner Act, which virtually emancipated the laboring man in this Nation. When this act became public law it spelled out for the first time in this country's history the rights of labor to organize, to bargain collectively, and to enjoy freedoms of expression within industry and at the conferences of its elected representatives with management's representatives without fear of reprisal.

The best testimony I can give you here today, gentlemen, is to relate some of the remarks that were made by members of the House, and of the Senate, in 1947, when this bill was being debated.

On February 15, 1947, Representative Klein had this to say, on the floor of the House:

> The bill was actually written with the help of the National Association of Manufacturers and the United States Chamber of Commerce. Some of the most valuable assistance came from William Ingalls, who represents Allis-Chalmers Co., Fruehauf Trailer Co., J. I. Case Co., the Falk Co., and the Inland Steel Co. Theodore R. Iserman put aside his rich Chrysler law practice for two full weeks to help out the House Labor Committee.

There has been much said about the National Association of Manufacturers drawing up this bill, and I say where there is smoke there must be fire. This bill was strictly a punitive measure to punish labor; an attempt to take away all of the gains it had made under the Wagner Act.

Representative Karsten of Missouri said this on the floor of the House:

> The authors of this bill are clearly not interested in pushing the American economy uphill to higher living standards. They are bent upon establishing monopoly control over the roller-coaster, and taking the American people for a dangerous ride.

Senator George D. Aiken, a very eminent member of the Senate and very liberal and progressive in his views, on May 12, 1947, said:

> Mr. President, the leaders of industry, who gave the committee members all kinds of advice, were for the most part vindictive, and it was clear to me, at least, from their attitude that their principal desire was to destroy labor organizations completely. * * * We have been subjected to the most intensive, expensive, ambitious propaganda campaign that any Congress has ever been subjected to.

Quoting from Senator Morse on June 7, 1947:

I supported the Senate committee bill which was a fair, reasonable, constructive and enforceable bill, and I opposed the amendments that were made on the floor of the Senate because they seemed to me to strike serious blows at the rights of labor and to impair the efficient administration of the law. The amendments which have been made in conference not only infinitely aggravate every serious vice of the Senate amendments, but they add such restrictive and administratively unfeasible provisions of their own that, even if I believed the bill we passed were sound and helpful, I would be compelled to vote against the conference bill because of the inevitably disastrous effects I am sure it will have on industrial peace.

To further quote from Senator Morse—and, gentlemen, how prophetically accurate it later proved:

If you pass a piece of labor legislation as unfair as the Taft-Hartley bill, you will hear about it at the ballot boxes, because millions of independent voters, yes, and Republican voters, will not in 1948 support a party which passes such a bill.

So, gentlemen, I say to you, when men such as Senators Morse and Aiken and Representative Klein, who attended all legislative consideration of the Taft-Hartley bill, come to the conclusion that the Taft-Hartley Act is a vicious piece of labor legislation and would do great harm, not only to the workingmen of this country, but to the entire economy of the Nation, then I, as an individual and as a member of the House of Representatives, feel that the Labor-Management Act of 1947 should be repealed in its entirety.

I compare the Taft-Hartley Act, if I may use this inelegant comparison, to an apple with a rotten core. No matter how much you may polish it outside, the core is still rotten, and the whole apple within a short space of time will decay.

Ex-Congressman Hartley wrote a book, and I just want to quote two paragraphs from that book, which I feel are clinching arguments insofar as the repeal of the Taft-Hartley law is concerned.

I am quoting from his book entitled "Our New National Labor Policy," wherein, on page 193, he said:

Once we accept the concept of the Taft-Hartley Act as a model to begin an interim period leading to complete elimination of the governmental labor relations agencies, we can apply that concept to other areas of government activities. I am well aware of the political difficulties of eliminating the New Deal social legislation. It cannot be repealed at a single stroke.

On page 194, quoting once again from that book, he said:

The Taft-Hartley Act is but a step toward that goal, but it is certainly the first definite step this Nation has taken since the merry-go-round began in 1933.

That is conclusive evidence to me that the Taft-Hartley Act was placed on the statute books of this country for the sole purpose of taking away from labor all of its gains, the results of many years of strife and endeavor. And I, as a Member of Congress, want to assure you gentlemen that when the bill comes on the floor for the repeal of that Act, I will support it 100 percent.

Mr. Chairman, with your permission, may I submit for the record two resolutions adopted by the Buffalo Common Council last week? The common council of Buffalo is composed of eight Democrats and seven Republicans. They adopted two resolutions memorializing Congress that the Taft-Hartley Act be repealed in toto, and these resolutions were adopted unanimously. The eight Democrats and the seven Republicans voted affirmatively on the two resolutions.

Mr. IRVING. Without objection, it is so ordered.
(The resolutions referred to are as follows:)

RESOLUTION No. 151

(By Messrs. Rybka and Young)

RE: IMMEDIATE REPEAL OF THE TAFT-HARTLEY LAW

Whereas there has been enacted by the Eightieth Congress of the United States a labor bill known as the Taft-Hartley law; and

Whereas since the passage of this law, labor organizations have been oppressed and collective bargaining has been made more difficult to promote the advancement of the American labor movement; and

Whereas the Taft-Hartley law creates an inferior class of citizens, and inferior category and a debased position politically for the men and women who toil by hand or brain for their daily subsistence; and

Whereas the Taft-Hartley Act, in its entirety, is an insult to the working people of the United States, a brand upon their integrity and decency, a handicap to all fair-minded employers; and

Whereas the Taft-Hartley Act invades the constitutional guaranties of free speech, free press, and freedom of contract; and

Whereas the Taft-Hartley Act breathes suspicion and repression in every line and in no instance aids or assists the process of peaceful colective bargaining; and

Whereas one of the main issues in the last presidential campaign was the repeal of the Taft-Hartley law and such issue was supported by an overwhelming majority vote for candidates to political office who were on record for the immediate repeal of this vicious and obnoxious law; and

Whereas the Eighty-first Congress has conducted hearings on a substitute labor bill known as the Thomas bill and such hearings have resulted in needless repetitious testimony, consequently, delaying action on the repeal of this law; and

Whereas thousands of collective bargaining contracts, presently expiring and will expire in the very near future, and labor organizations and employers cannot negotiate with any degree of confidence as to the provisions that may be contained in a new labor bill, thus creating an air of uncertainty and endangering harmonious labor relations between labor and management which may result in unavoidable work stoppages; and

Whereas the citizens of the United States of America have, by their vote last November, delivered a mandate to the new Congress for immediate repeal of the Taft-Hartley law: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Common Council of the City of Buffalo assert its disapproval of the Taft-Hartley law; and be it further

Resolved, That the Common Council of the City of Buffalo go on record for the immediate and unqualified repeal of the Taft-Hartley law and that the President of the United States, Harry S. Truman, the majority leaders of the House and Senate, the Members of Congress from the western New York area, and the United States Senators from New York State, be so notified as soon as possible after the passage of this resolution so that they may act accordingly.

Adopted.

Ayes—15. Noes—None.

RESOLUTION No. 152

(By Messrs. Young and Rybka)

REPEAL OF TAFT-HARTLEY LAW

Whereas hearings are now completed in the Senate Labor and Education Committee of the United States Congress concerning the repeal of the Taft-Hartley law; and

whereas Buffalo has the best reputation in peaceful labor-management relations down through the years; and

Whereas there is no necessity for this kind of punitive legislation other than to cause disruption of these harmonious relations in our community; and

Whereas evidence has shown itself, particularly in the case of the Goldblatt Department Store against the CIO Wholesale Retail Department Store Union whose employees were members of that union; and

Whereas unquestionably a majority of these employees were members of this union and under normal conditions the company would have bargained collectively with these employees, except for the obstructions involved in the Taft-Hartley law; and

Whereas through the obstructions contained in this law, the company was able to deprive these employees of their jobs by intimidation and coercion; and

Whereas this case has been before the National Labor Relations Board since August 1948 and not even a preliminary hearing has been held, proving how this law has obstructed normal procedures in collective bargaining. Such procedures that have been accepted in the Buffalo area down through the years such as consent elections or recognition of unions by card checks of majority shown to be members of a particular union; and

Whereas this company being alien to the city of Buffalo and its good neighborliness attitude in labor-management relations, used all of the methods given employers under this law to destroy collective bargaining through the method of injunction and damage suits to the leaders of this union; and

Whereas the Taft-Hartley law protected this company in its antilabor attitude to the point where it closed up its business and left town without ever sitting down to bargain collectively with the union: Therefore be it

Resolved, That in view of the foregoing, we the members of the Common Council of the City of Buffalo call upon the Congress of the United States and the Congressmen from this area to do everything within their power to repeal the Taft-Hartley law and reestablish the National Labor Relations Act so that firms such as Goldblatt Bros. Department Store will not be in a position to use the laws of our land to defeat the objectives of the working people who are entitled to collectively bargain regarding wages, hours and working conditions.

Adopted.

Ayes—15. Noes—None.

Mr. IRVING. Do you wish to submit that other statement?

Mr. TAURIELLO. No; I made my statement verbally, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. IRVING. Do you have anything further to add?

Mr. TAURIELLO. No; I have not. I think I have covered it insofar as I am concerned, and as a Member of the House of Representatives, I want to thank you for fitting me in in this testimony. I greatly appreciate it.

Mr. IRVING. Just a moment, Congressman. Someone may have some questions.

Mr. Bailey, do you have any questions?

Mr. BAILEY. No; I have no questions. I think his statement was forthright and clear-cut.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Kelley?

Mr. KELLEY. I reserve my time.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Werdel?

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Tauriello, I do not think there is anybody on the committee on either side that does not think that we need collective bargaining today. I think perhaps where I disagree with you is at this point. First, I would like to know the specific reason why you think the core of the apple is rotten. I do not see where in the last 2 years the prophecy that the Taft-Hartley Act will destroy organized labor is borne out. But that is all argumentative, I realize.

I am wondering how we can justify a complete destruction of the Taft-Hartley Act or any other act which apparently is passed after experience under previous legislation without putting ourselves right back into the field of resentful attitudes on the part of various people in our community, whether it is local or national. In other words, when we entered upon this picture of the Wagner Act, to be sure, labor probably needed some assistance. And there was the terrific feeling that grew up. Whether we can put our finger on specific instances is beside the point. The fact that so many people talk about it is probably evidence of the fact that there was a lot of feeling when the Taft-Hartley Act was passed.

Now, beyond any manner of doubt, there are good provisions in the Taft-Hartley Act, and I think it behooves us as Members of Congress to talk about the good and the bad rather than recite the fact that some of us did for political purposes run on a platform for the complete repeal of a piece of legislation which if we do repeal it outright is going to cause more serious discussion in our country.

What I am driving at is this. I think that where I disagree with you is that you do not even agree that we as Congressmen should sit down and talk about the good and the bad in this piece of legislation and publicize that, instead of saying, "We may have a little majority here today. We are going to bang this thing through," and then ask for trouble tomorrow.

I do not agree with you there. I do not think there was a mandate in this last election for the outright repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. I think there is always a mandate to do something for the workingman. Some of them may have had legitimate objections to certain sections of this act. It may be that it can be demonstrated that proper union organization functioning reasonably and as we admit it should function has objections to the Taft-Hartley Act. But certainly there are provisions in the Taft-Hartley Act that are for the preservation of individual rights and public rights. And I think it is incumbent upon both you and me to think about those and express ourselves on them so that we can tone down some of the feeling that is building up.

Mr. TAURIELLO. May I answer you in this way, Congressman? When I ran for the office of Representative, I ran on the Democratic platform and supported the President for the outright repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. I feel that the fact that I was able to overcome the overwhelming majority that my predecessor won by in 1946, and again stating to you that the Forty-third Congressional District is overwhelmingly Republican, I feel that it was a mandate on the part of the people of my district, that whomever they elected to Congress should come here and support the President for the outright repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act.

When I ran on that particular platform, I did not support that plank purely for political reasons or to garner and attract votes to myself. My feelings toward labor—and I am prejudiced, I will admit—are deep-seated. If there were a decision to be made, and the scales were balanced, business on one side and labor on the other, I would cast my vote with labor. I have always done that in the 15 years that I served on legislative bodies, and I will always continue to vote that way. During all of those years, I always fought to advance the cause of labor, to protect its gains, and to defend it at any time.

That is the reason I feel the way I do about the Taft-Hartley Act. If there is any good in it, the good is so heavily offset by a vast maze of encumbering provisions and limitations that our national labor movement will never recover a sound, balanced position in this country's economy. Definite relief is indicated, and it is my fondest hope that this committee can set such a vehicle of law into motion.

Mr. WERDEL. What kind of law would you revert to, then?

Mr. TAURIELLO. I would revert back to the Wagner Act.

Mr. WERDEL. And, if an employer cannot pay a wage, you think by law we can force him to pay it?

Mr. TAURIELLO. Those things will all be adjusted in their natural course. There will always be an adjustment. And labor, let me tell you, Mr. Congressman, since there has been, if we may call it, a slight recession, has been the first to tell its employer, "If you cannot afford to give us a raise, we are willing to go along with you."

We had a case in Philadelphia. I think it was a bakers' union or a milk drivers' union. I think labor had been more than fair in the past few months.

Mr. WERDEL. I will agree with you that some branches of labor are fair. But I also think that you should agree that, when we gave the powers that these men have as we gave them under the Wagner Act, the time comes when we have to pass some reasonable legislation to control them. In the old days, when England could not fight Spain and when we could not handle the high seas, we commissioned people to go out and confiscate people's property on the high seas. We had again to turn around and pass legislation to prohibit it and run them down all over the world.

Now, somewhere along the line we are going to have to pass a reasonable labor bill, and you and I are going to have to talk about it as a reasonable bill to meet all the requirements of all the parties concerned. That is the only point I am making.

That is all.

Mr. IRVING. Thank you, Mr. Congressman, for appearing. We appreciate your coming.

Mr. TAURIELLO. Thank you, gentlemen.

Mr. IRVING. The next witness is Frank Reel.

TESTIMONY OF A. FRANK REEL, NATIONAL ASSISTANT EXECUTIVE SECRETARY, AMERICAN FEDERATION OF RADIO ARTISTS

Mr. REEL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen——

Mr. IRVING. Will you kindly state your name?

Mr. REEL. Yes, sir. My name is A. Frank Reel. I am national assistant executive secretary of the American Federation of Radio Artists.

Mr. IRVING. You may proceed.

Mr. REEL. Thank you, sir.

I have a prepared statement, I might say, that I have brought copies of; and, in the interest of saving time, I am going to run through this statement, but I may short-cut here and there in order to leave more time for questioning on the part of the members of the committee.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, President Truman in his veto message of June 20, 1947, vetoing the Taft-Hartley bill, stated one of his objections as follows:

> In weakening the protections afforded to the right to organize, contrary to the basic purpose of the National Labor Relations Act, the bill would injure the smaller unions far more than the larger ones. Those least able to protect themselves would be the principal victims of the bill.

Nineteen months' experience under the Taft-Hartley law has proved that President Truman was correct.

The American Federation of Radio Artists, which I shall hereafter refer to in its colloquial term of AFRA, is one of those smaller unions. It is the American Federation of Labor affiliate which represents the performers on the radio through the United States—mainly actors, singers, announcers, and some sound-effects men. The great bulk of its membership is in the so-called centers of network organization, New York, Los Angeles, and to a lesser extent, Chicago. Approximately one-third of its membership exists in some 70 other cities, and is made up of employees of radio stations, most of whom are full-time staff employees. The organization has approximately 30,000 members; but, due to the transient nature of the free-lance performers' work, its active paid-up membership is closer to 10,000.

In numbers, therefore, you can see that AFRA is a comparatively small union. It is an extremely democratic union, being run by the members through their annually elected local boards and their annually elected national board, and through an annual convention. It enjoys splendid employer-employee relationships throughout the country, and has a reputation for fair dealing. Like many other of the so-called white-collar unions, it exists within and, in a real sense, by reason of the National Labor Relations Act. It has conformed from the beginning to all of the requirements of the Taft-Hartley law, and has scrupulously adhered to the Wagner law since the union's inception in the late 1930's.

I appear before you as national assistant executive secretary of AFRA to point out to you some of the injustices we have suffered because of the Taft-Hartley law. I have been national assistant executive secretary since June 1947, and, prior to that time, I practiced labor law in the city of Boston for 15 years, except for 4 years in the Army, representing many labor unions in New England. Although I shall confine my prepared remarks to the AFRA situation, I trust that you will feel free to question me, bearing in mind my labor-law background.

Now, first of all, I know you have had many excellent witnesses who have covered the more dramatic aspects of the Taft-Hartley law. I intend to confine myself to two or three of the lesser publicized but equally unfair provisions, particularly insofar as they affect AFRA. Thus, for example, there apparently has been considerable discussion before your committee and the Senate committee of the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law having to do with strikes involving the national health or safety, the provision of the law having to do with the place in the administrative structure for the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, the provisions of the law having to do with political expenditures by unions, the patently unfair provision of the law that prevents economic strikers from voting at a certification election, and the much-talked-of provision having to do with anti-communist affidavits. To date, none of these clauses have been of immediate concern to AFRA, although the provision having to do with prevention of a striker's voting might become important at any time.

Speaking personally, I have been amused to read that most of the industry representatives who have urged retention of the Taft-Hartley law have expressed a willingness to file non-Communist affidavits themselves as a condition precedent to taking advantage of the Board procedure, but I have looked in vain for any suggestion that they would comply with the companion requirement, so that the employer would file annual statements showing salaries of its corporate officers, the manner in which corporate officers and directors are chosen, the details of democratic or lack of democratic representation of stockholders, a statement of all receipts and disbursements and assets and liabilities, and similar statements for all subsidiaries or holding companies involved in the corporate structure.

Before discussing some specific booby traps in the Taft-Hartley law that have made it especially injurious to the smaller unions, I should like to state that the general effect of the law has been to make the employer-employee relationship more difficult than it ever has been, to encourage strikes, and to disrupt collective bargaining. As a matter of fact, I am appearing before this committee as the result of a letter that I wrote to your chairman, which incorporated a copy of a similar letter that I sent to the chairman of the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee.

On February 18, 1949, the New York Times reported that Mr. Charles E. Wilson, president of the General Electric Co., and his labor-relations aide, Vice President L. R. Boulware, appeared before the Senate committee on the previous day in support of retention of the Taft-Hartley law. The newspaper report stated that these men claimed that the Taft-Hartley law had brought about a balance between labor and management. Mr. Charles E. Wilson was quoted as saying, "There is a spirit of unity, or we are now on the road to get it, as a result of the improved relationship in the last year."

Upon reading that report, I was moved to tell the Senate committee that, if it wished to find an example of how false that statement on the part of the General Electric executives is, they need look no further than Mr. Wilson's own shop, and Mr. Boulware's own department in Schenectady. And because I understood that Mr. Wilson may appear before your committee, and that Mr. Gerard Reilly did appear before your committee on March 12, stating that, among others, he represented the General Electric Co., I felt that you, too, are entitled to this statement of fact about General Electric Co.'s "spirit of unity" and "improved relationship" since the passage of the Taft-Hartley law.

For many years AFRA has represented the staff announcers at General Electric's own radio station in Schenectady, WGY. For many years AFRA has enjoyed very pleasant and peaceful relations with the General Electric Co.

Starting in 1940, a series of collective-bargaining agreements between AFRA and General Electric covering the WGY announcers have been executed and regularly renewed. Those contracts had a union-shop provision which allowed the employer to hire anybody it chose, and which simply required that membership in the union after 30 days of employment was a condition precedent to continued employment. Those contracts also provided that, even if an announcer was suspended or expelled by AFRA, the company could retain him for as long as necessary for the company to fulfill all obligations or commitments made by the company prior to notice from the union that the member was suspended or expelled. These contracts further provided that AFRA agreed that it would not impose unreasonable entrance fees, dues, or assessments.

All this was encompassed in the so-called union-shop clause that is part of all AFRA agreements, and that practically all employers in this industry agree is fair. General Electric apparently thought it was fair—until the Taft-Hartley law was passed.

Negotiations were undertaken for a new contract in the fall of 1948. As usual, the AFRA representatives negotiated with the managers of station WGY. As they had many times in the past, they came to an agreement on the essential terms of the contract, which, of course, included the union shop as above described, which had, in fact, existed at WGY for many years. The agreement reached was subject to check by the legal department of General Electric.

Much to our astonishment, this year the new agreement was not approved by the industrial-relations department of General Electric solely because it contained a renewal of the union-shop clause. I personally made three trips to Schenectady to try to find out what the trouble was. I had one conference with a Mr. Burnison, and two conferences with a Mr. Pfeif, both of whom are in Mr. Boulware's division. On all three occasions these men stated in front of witnesses that there had never been any trouble with AFRA over the union shop; that there had never been a case of any man refusing to join the union or indicating that he was averse to joining the union. They also admitted that relations with AFRA had always been very friendly.

At the last conference, in response to my question as to why the General Electric Co. was now insisting upon upsetting this hitherto splendid relationship, Mr. Pfeif stated that the change in attitude resulted from the existence of the Taft-Hartley law.

Not only has AFRA always complied fully with the Taft-Hartley law, but this clause followed the language of the law. We had the union-authorization election at WGY on January 14. AFRA won that election by a vote of 9 to 1, with all members of the unit voting; not a bare majority of those eligible to vote, as required by the Taft-Hartley law, but 90 percent of those eligible to vote voted for the union-shop clause. Mr. Pfeif insisted that these elections meant nothing to the General Electric Co. He also refused our offer to arbitrate and gave as his reason the fact that he was sure we would win the arbitration.

For these fine gentlemen to tell you that the Taft-Hartley law has improved labor relations is the sheerest hypocrisy, in view of the fact that they have used this law as an excuse to destroy what have been decent labor relations with this union for many years.

The vicious and uncalled-for action of the General Electric Co. in the WGY case has had no result other than to make possible the calling of a strike which, although originally involving only 10 announcers in this unit, might well result in a disastrous tie-up of the entire General Electric plant or plants. We recognize that such a strike would do no one any good, except that it would dramatically show the American people just exactly how the Taft-Hartley law has wrecked decent labor relations.

Now, gentlemen, for a few of the hidden defects or booby traps in the Taft-Hartley law that have been used by employers to wreck unions:

Section 9 (c) (1) of the act states that whenever a petition for representation has been filed, the Board shall investigate it and, if there is reasonable cause to believe that a question of representation affecting commerce exists, it shall provide for a hearing. The section then says that if the Board finds after such a hearing that there is a question of representation, it shall then direct an election by secret ballot. This looks innocent enough and seems simply to restate the old Wagner law. But there is a very significant difference, because the new law requires the Board to have a hearing and election after the hearing, whereas formerly the Board was given a wide latitude that allowed a cross-check of union membership applications against a pay roll and, more important, that allowed the Board to develop its previous administrative practices of so-called prehearing elections. Today, if an employer wishes to stall a union, all he has to do is insist upon his right to a hearing before a hearing officer, followed by a decision made by the NLRB itself, here in Washington. He need give no reason and he need have no valid purpose. Under the Wagner Act, as it was administered by the old NLRB, if an employer insisted upon a hearing, either without reason or utilizing a patently false excuse, the regional director could order an election to be held immediately, and then, at a later date, a hearing would be conducted to decide whatever issues regarding unit or interstate commerce might exist. In other words, under the Wagner law, the employer could not stall, simply for the sake of stalling.

Let us see exactly how this has worked in one or two typical cases. Here is one: The announcers in three radio stations in a city in Texas joined AFRA early in 1948. The three radio stations got together and hired one lawyer to represent them. He repulsed all attempts to arrive at a consent election, simply taking the position that the employers would not consent to anything. Accordingly, a hearing officer was appointed by the regional office of the NLRB after a number of weeks delay, and finally on May 17, 1948, a hearing was held on the case of these three radio stations. At the hearings AFRA presented the evidence in support of its petitions for representation, and the employers' attorney made it clear on the record that the companies admitted they were engaged in interstate commerce, and that AFRA and the employers were in complete agreement as to what the proper bargaining unit in each station should be. In other words, there was absolutely no issue for the NLRB to decide. The employers were simply standing on their rights under the Taft-Hartley law to get a hearing and a decision by the NLRB in Washington, although there was nothing to be heard and nothing to be decided. The record was sent to Washington for consideration by the National Labor Relations Board. Immediately after the hearing, I wrote to the Board telling them the facts and stating:

> It is clear from the record that the employers and their counsel are using, or rather abusing, processes of the NLRB, solely to obtain an unjustifiable delay of the representation elections to which the employees are entitled.
> It is apparent that the employers are counting upon a nonpriority, leisurely approach to their cases, which they hope will enable them to deny their employees rights guaranteed to them by the law, because of the accepted information that the NLRB is overwhelmed with work and, in routine course, cannot be expected to get around to this matter for several weeks or months.
> This appears to us to be a challenge to the NLRB, as much as to ourselves. We urgently request you to meet the challenge by acting immediately to direct representation at the radio stations involved.

After 1 month had gone by another letter was sent by AFRA to the NLRB, again asking for speedy action. That was pressure, if you please, but we were in a hurry.

Our letters apparently had some effect, because we got the fastest action we ever had from the NLRB. We got a decision on July 19, 1948, which was only 2 months after the hearing, and 3 months after we had filed our petitions.

The elections were finally held at these three stations on July 30, 1948, but despite the unusual speed on the part of the NLRB, too much time had gone by—the employers had been able to control the situation and AFRA lost all three elections.

Bear in mind that these announcers all joined AFRA without solicitation. AFRA is in no position to afford the cost of organizing that is required for proselytizing, and we can only take care of those who literally beg us to come in and represent them, but in this case the employer had been able, through sheer, unadulterated, undisguised stalling tactics to get a 4-month delay, during which time personnel changed, announcers were talked to, and their natural impatience was capitalized on. Had the old Wagner law procedure been in force, there would have been a prehearing election—that is, the election would have been held in May, and not on the last day of July, and the employer could have had his completely unnecessary hearing and decision later.

Some employers do not realize that under the Taft-Hartley law they can stall simply by saying that they want a Board decision, without giving any reason. Most often they cook up excuses for hearings and decisions. We have actually had owners of large and powerful radio stations that are affiliates of national networks claim that they are not engaged in interstate commerce, in order to gain the time that it takes for the NLRB in Washington to say in each case that of course they are engaged in interstate commerce. Most often the employer creates a dispute about what the appropriate unit should be, even though there may be no real basis for any dispute. As a result, in order to get a consent election and avoid this delay, AFRA has had to agree to some of the most fantastically contrived units that can be imagined. We have even had to include company-minded supervisors.

What happens during the delay can best be shown by a recent case involving a station in Delaware. We notified this station that we represented their announcers by letter dated September 24, 1948. Within 1 or 2 days after that, we filed a petition for certification. It took 3 weeks to get a conference with the employer conducted by an NLRB representative, at which we sought a consent election. The company asked for a unit that was more than twice as large as the small group of four announcers for whom we petitioned, the company wanting to add persons who quite clearly were in a supervisory capacity and persons whom we felt should not properly be in the unit. Because of the disparity, no consent was forthcoming, and the matter went to a hearing before a NLRB hearing officer on December 9, 1948. That is more than 3 months ago, and we have still had no decision from the NLRB.

Meanwhile, one of our four men has been fired—we claim, of course, for union activity, but at any rate he has been replaced by one full-time man and two part-time men. Knowing this employer's expressed attitude, it is a safe bet that these three men will never vote for the union, so that even if we won a decision on our unit, we could never win this election. Not only that, but the announcers at the station cannot wait forever for amelioration of their shocking working conditions, and so they have already been meeting individually with the owner and he has indicated in no uncertain terms, incidentally, that he can get along with his men if they will only forget about that blankety-blank union.

Had the old Wagner law been in force, I dare say there would have been a prehearing election here. That is, there would have been an election last December, and after the election, assuming the union won, the employer would have had all of his rights to claim and try to prove that the unit was improper. To say that the union has the right to go to the NLRB and file a complaint against this employer for unfair practices because of his individual bargaining and because of the discharge, is to state an irrelevant truth—irrelevant because the processing of a complaint case from beginning to end takes at the very least 2 years, and the employer welcomes that further respite from the union's activities. One of the most important changes that would result from the reenactment of the Wagner law is the restoration of the prehearing election—the only way to avoid the deliberate stall.

Now, second, in his message of June 20, 1947, vetoing the Taft-Hartley law, President Truman predicted that its passage would—> invite conflict between the NLRB and its general counsel, since the general counsel would decide, without any right of appeal by employers and employees, whether charges were to be heard by the Board. * * *

Not only has this prophecy come to pass, but the dictatorial authority given to the general counsel has been one of the painful thorns in the union's side. Although the Taft-Hartley law provides for complaints against the unfair practices of employers by putting into the hands of General Counsel Denham the final right to dictate whether any complaint should issue, it effectively destroyed the union's rights. AFRA has run into a veritable snowstorm of discharge cases. Whenever we go into a new section and file a petition for certification, we find that our men are fired. Our complaints of unfair practice have for the most part been dismissed, and we have no effective appeal. At one station we petitioned for a unit of five, and within 24 hours three of the five were fired. The General Counsel's Office refused a complaint and we had no appeal. At another station we petitioned for a unit of four and within 48 hours two of the four were fired with the same results.

But even more disastrous is the mockery that has been made of section 8 (a) (5)—the charge of refusal to bargain, which is the foundation of the very existence of the ordinary white-collar union. At one station AFRA won a representation election unanimously in 1947. Negotiations ensued, but the employer refused to meet AFRA's request that he guarantee more than $36 for a 40-hour week for announcers. After the Taft-Hartley law was passed another election was held, this one the union-shop election. It was held in January 1948, and again AFRA won unanimously. Negotiations recommenced. At one point it appeared that the AFRA representative and the employer's representative had reached an agreement, and as a result AFRA's representative sent the employer a proposed contract. The employer said after we got in touch with him he did not like the contract and said he had written a letter stating what was wrong with it. But he never sent the letter, and he never stated his position to AFRA. Instead, he changed his personnel and informed AFRA that he was no longer under any duty to bargain despite the elections, because he had all new announcers. We filed a charge of refusal to bargain.

The NLRB investigator said he would recommend a complaint, but the regional director turned it down. We appealed to Mr. Denham, and he turned us down. The czar had spoken and there was nothing further we could do.

At another station refusal to bargain was so patent that the NLRB investigator recommended a complaint, but the regional director gave the employer the right to "settle"—and I put that word "settle" in quotes—by simply posting a notice saying that he would bargain. He had always stated that he would bargain—merely saying so means nothing, and we protested to the regional director and then to Mr. Denham's first assistant in Washington. I was informed that although we could appeal to Mr. Denham's office there was no chance of that appeal being successful because it was the official policy to allow these so-called settlements by the simple posting of a notice. Of course that employer did not bargain with us after that, any more than he had before, and he made it qiute clear that he never intends to bargain. This whole requirement of bargaining as set forth in 8 (a) (5) must be read in relation to section 8 (d), which is a new section in Taft-Hartley, which spells out the fact that the obligation to bargain does not compel either party to agree to anything. Only recently in Atlanta an employer's representative sat back in his chair, smiled, and said to me: "We'll bargain. We'll listen. We don't have to agree to anything."

In view of these Taft-Hartley activities of employers as outlined above, basically the fact that under the Taft-Hartley law an election can be stalled for months and our people are fired one by one during the interim, and even after we win an election the requirement to bargain has become meaningless. In view of all that, this peaceful law-abiding union will probably have to come to the conclusion that if the Taft-Hartley Act is not repealed, instead of using these peaceful processes we shall have to adopt an entirely different approach in order to protect innocent announcers and their families from being thrown on public welfare. We shall have to forget about petitions, elections, and long drawn out negotiations, and substitute the quick and unexpected strike for recognition. Instead of using Labor Board procedures, we shall be driven to adopt the system of sending a representative into a manager's office with a proposal, asking for immediate and quick bargaining, and pulling a strike without warning, in the event that he does not agree. AFRA has always scrupulously avoided such tactics. We could avoid them successfully under the Wagner law, but the continued existence of the Taft-Hartley law must push us, and probably many other white-collar unions, into that undesirable position. In other words, the Taft-Hartley law will cause more strikes.

Third, of special interest to AFRA are the provisions of section 8 (b) (4), which have to do with what are commonly called secondary boycotts. We are in the peculiar situation of having our own members in the network centers being forced to contribute their efforts to help recalcitrant employers in the field break down AFRA standards. Thus in some city other than New York, Chicago, and Los Angeles, we organize the announcers at a radio station that is a network affiliate—that is, it is an independently owned station, but it carries most of its programs on a network basis. Its owners, we will say, refuse to pay their staff announcers a reasonable wage. They refuse to arbitrate and they say to us: "Go ahead—go out on strike. You won't hurt us a bit, because instead of taking network programs for 70 percent of our broadcasting day, we will cut into the network during 100 percent of our time on the air. And your own members who perform on network shows originating in New York, Los Angeles, and Chicago will scab on you." To prevent just that situation, we have established by contract, a voluntary agreement, with the networks the right to refuse to perform on shows that would be fed to an unfair station, providing our members in the network centers voted to take such action in any individual case. In other words, they must vote to do it.

We do not call that a secondary boycott—we think it is distinctly primary, because those network performers appear on the affiliated station just as surely as they appear on the originating station. Nevertheless, the passage of the Taft-Hartley law has raised a considerable question about this, becaue it makes it an offense to refuse to perform services where an object thereof is to require an employer to cease doing business with any other person. Admittedly this is not clearly applicable, but the danger is great, particularly in view of the fact that section 303 of the Taft-Hartley law repeats the language of section 8 (b) (4) and adds a provision for recovery of damages, and also in view of the fact that under section 10 (l) any charge of violation of section 8 (b) (4) (A), (B), or (C) must be given priority over all other cases, and even before a complaint is issued, if the regional attorney has reasonable cause to believe there is some truth to the charge, he must petition for an injunction.

This, incidentally, is one of the most unfair provisions of the Taft-Hartley law. In cases of violations of the law by an employer, there can be no injunction until after there is a complaint, and then there need be no injunction. It is simply discretionary on the part of the Board. But in the case of this particular type of violation by a union, not only need there be no complaint and not only is the injunction mandatory, but it is obtained by one of the regional officers so that there is no waste of time.

Now this whole subject is further confused by the fact that subsection (B) of 8 (b) (4) apparently allows a refusal to perform services in order to require some other employer other than your own to recognize and bargain with a certified labor organization. The cute catch here is, as pointed out above, the practical difficulty of getting the general counsel to authorize a complaint against any employer on the grounds of refusal to bargain. We feel that the provisions of H. R. 2032 insofar as secondary boycotts are concerned are satisfactory and do allow the sort of essential primary action that is no necessary in this type of situation, but that anything less than that must be carefully scrutinized to avoid the one-sided oppression produced by the Taft-Hartley law.

Fourthly, another provision of the Taft-Hartley law which is of a special interest to AFRA is the proviso in 8 (a) (3) that says that under a union-shop contract the employer can discharge a man only because of his failure to tender his periodic dues and initiation fees. AFRA has never had a closed shop; we have always permitted employers to hire anyone they wanted. But this provision makes it impossible for the union to enforce any kind of discipline. In a talent union, certain minimum scales are set up, both by agreement with employer and by rule. These minimum scales are absolutely necessary to prevent the sort of thing that occurred in the pre-AFRA days when kick-backs, commissions, agency fees, and cut rates took most of a performer's earnings. Unlike the mass-industry unions, it is important for a talent union to enforce its minimum-pay rulings and its rulings that limit the amount of commission an agent may take—and to prevent, in some cases, its own members from entering into kick-back arrangements or from working below scale.

The only method of disciplining members for such violations is the threat of suspension from the union and consequent loss of employment. Under the Taft-Hartley law, however, that threat has been taken away. Any member who pays an agency an exorbitant commission or who works below scale or who indulges in a kick-back or who otherwise violates a contract, can today do so with impunity—and thus lower the standards that all of his fellow members depend upon. The Taft-Hartley law on the one hand makes unions responsible for all sorts of unauthorized activities on the part of some members, and at the same time it takes away from the union the very necessary right to discipline its membership.

Finally, in closing, gentlemen, current newspaper reports indicate that the prospects of repeal of the Taft-Hartley law and enactment of H. R. 2032 are seriously threatened by a coalition of opposing forces. It is apparently possible that the repeal will be so cluttered by amendments as to result in the retention of most of the worst features of the act, including the booby traps, to some of which I have referred.

This would be a tragic mistake. American labor unions, including AFRA, are extremely anxious to see the Taft-Hartley law repealed as a simple matter of self-preservation. But they recognize the fact that, vital though this is, it is not the most important issue facing the world today. The great global struggle is between democracy and totalitarianism—and our most pressing need is to be able to sell democracy as a way of life to millions of confused people. In order to do that we must show them that democracy, as we know it, works.

Now what does that mean? It means that when our people demonstrate by orderly peaceful use of the ballot that they want a certain law repealed, it is repealed—really repealed. Under our system, the only opportunity the people have to influence legislation is in the congressional and presidential elections. In 1948 we elected a President who, more than any other in modern history, made a forthright campaign on the issues. Both he and his party pledged repeal of the Taft-Hartley law. Both he and the majority of the successful candidates for House and Senate campaigned vociferously against the record of the Eightieth Congress, a record that was epitomized by the enactment of the Taft-Hartley law. If ever in American history there was a mandate from the people, there is one here.

Certainly an unholy coalition may defeat the will of the people—but what a fine argument they will present to the supporters of dictatorship. I can hear their propaganda now: "Americans prate of democracy" they will say—"but it means nothing. Coalitions and amendments and legislative booby-traps make a mockery of their high-sounding phrases."

This, gentlemen, must not be. The members of the American Federation of Radio Artists at their last two annual conventions have gone on record as opposed to the Taft-Hartley law. They will not rest until it is repealed. Most of our members will, I am sure, volunteer their time and their talent to see to it that it is repealed. And they will do so inspired by the knowledge that they are not only fighting for the survival of their union and themselves, but that they are striking a blow for American democracy, and for the faith of liberty-loving humanity throughout the world.

If there are any questions, I shall be pleased to answer them.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Kelley, do you have any questions?

Mr. KELLEY. Under the Taft-Hartley Act, under the subject of discipline, how are you going to get rid of a Communist if you have one?

Mr. REEL. That also is made impossible under section 8 (a) (3). You cannot discipline any member for any reason other than his failure to pay his dues and initiation fee.

Mr. KELLEY. Not failure, but as long as he even tenders his dues—

Mr. REEL. Tenders them; that is right.

Mr. KELLEY. You do not even have to accept them?

Mr. REEL. Correct.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, that is all.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Werdel, do you have any questions?

Mr. WERDEL. I have just one I want to ask.

From your expressions on the secondary boycott, you feel that the act should be changed so that you could picket, for instance, the networks to go off the air so that they would not be servicing one station when you took that station on; is that the point you make?

Mr. REEL. Let me explain that, sir. We have established by contract with the four networks the right to terminate those contracts for that purpose, provided the people involved who would be striking would vote to do that. In other words, it cannot be done by any executive order. It cannot be done by vote of our national board. It must be done by the vote of the people in our three major centers, New York, Chicago, and Los Angeles. And if they do so vote, they have, under their contracts, that right.

It is our fear that the Taft-Hartley law has taken away that right. We do not call that a secondary boycott, because we feel, and we know, that those people are paid by their employers, who are usually advertising agencies or sponsors, not because they appear simply on the originating station. That would not pay them enough. But they are paid to appear on all of these stations, and we feel that is very much a primary situation.

Mr. WERDEL. Yes. But what you really are saying is that you want the right, then, whether it is by contract right or the right of secondary boycotts, that you had under the Wagner Act, to close those network primary stations so that they will not feed an individual station which you are dealing with?

Mr. REEL. We want the right to be able to exercise our contractual right, to refuse to scab on ourselves, to have our own members in New York scab, we will say, or our members in New Orleans or our members in Buffalo or wherever it may be.

Mr. WERDEL. What you have just said, then, is that that is the right you want?

Mr. REEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. You want to be able to close down the central station?

Mr. REEL. Yes, sir. I do not want to describe it as a secondary boycott. I do not think there is anything secondary about it, and I do not think it is a boycott.

Mr. WERDEL. We have a lot of confusion of meanings of words in this case.

Mr. REEL. Oh, yes.

Mr. WERDEL. And then if the issue was whether or not a man who did not want to go into your union, from Texas or Washington, would be forced in, still you would be able to say to the station operator, "Either he goes or you go off the air?"

Mr. REEL. No, sir. The contracts that we have with the networks gives us that right only in the event that we represent the people in the State and the employers refuses to arbitrate or deal fairly with us. We must offer him arbitration; we must represent the people. We do not want the right for any other purpose than to get a square deal where we represent the people and where we have offered arbitration and where everything has been turned down. It is not a case, sir, of requiring anyone to join the union.

Mr. WERDEL. I believe that is all.

Mr. IRVING. Thank you for your presentation and appearing here.

Mr. REEL. I want to thank you, sir. I realize I was a little late because the plane I intended to come down on was canceled, and I had to come by train. I appreciate your indulgence.

Mr. IRVING. We had plenty of witnesses; so it is all right.

(By order of the chairman, the following letter is made part of the record.)

GENERAL ELECTRIC CO.,
New York 22, N. Y., March 22, 1949.

Hon. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

DEAR MR. KELLEY: Last Tuesday evening when Mr. Wilson, our president, and I were appearing before your subcommittee, you referred to a letter or statement which you mentioned you had received from a Mr. Reel with respect to a situation at our radio station WGY in Schenectady. Since then, Mr. Reel's testimony before your subcommittee on March 18, 1949, under the caption "The General Electric situation" has been called to my attention.

Although I believe that we covered this situation generally in answer to your questions, I am writing you merely to clarify the record in order that you may have the facts more fully before you.

We have never had a strike or other unsettled dispute among these 10 employess at Station WGY in the almost 10 years we have operated this station. Our relations with them have always been very harmonious. The agreement with the American Federation of Radio Artists originated when the National Broadcasting Co. was operating Station WGY, was taken over by this company at the time we reacquired the station, and was renewed from time to time until the union served a notice of termination last August.

Mr. Reel, who has never been either an employee of this company or a member of the bargaining unit in question, went up to Schenectady from New York City and insisted upon provisions which our lawyers concluded might constitute an illegal closed shop and which also appeared to countenance illegal secondary boycotts and featherbedding practices under certain conditions. Although we declined to agree to such provisions, we suggested that the employees be given the wage and salary increase, which had tentatively been agreed upon, without waiting for final agreement on this particular question of the union shop. As soon as Mr. Reel and all others concerned agreed to this proposal, we immediately put the pay increases into effect.

Our last meeting with Mr. Reel was held with a Federal mediator, J. A. Rooney of Albany, present. Mr. Reel agreed to eliminate the provisions which were objectionable on legal grounds but again insisted on a union shop. We offered a maintenance-of-membership clause covering the payment of dues and providing for an annual escape period, but this was not accepted, allegedly because the national office of the union had passed a resolution stating that it would not approve any contract which did not include a union shop. We have heard nothing further from Mr. Reel since that time indicating any willingness or desire whatever to negotiate further with respect to any matter.

Mr. Pfeif, who has been in charge of our union relations for many years, and others of my staff who attended the last meeting with Mr. Reel, advise me that Mr. Pfeif told Mr. Reel very clearly that there had not been any change in our attitude with respect to union-shop provisions. Quite aside from the objectionable possibilities we felt were implicit in Mr. Reel's proposal, our general policy over the years has been to try to negotiate union security only to the extent of maintenance of membership or the voluntary check-off, leaving employees free to join or not join unions and to remain or not remain members, just as their individual impressions of the union and its management warranted.

The Taft-Hartley Act could not have had any effect in changing anyone's attitude with respect to a union shop, unless it were to somewhat reduce their objection thereto, in view of the provisions in that law designed to eliminate some of the abuses thereof, because both before and since the passage of that act the question of union shop has been a matter for collective bargaining.

At the time of our last meeting (mentioned above) with Mr. Reel, I am informed that he refused to consider a contract without the union-shop clause, which was the only unsettled issue between us, stating that he was afraid the men would not remain members of the union unless he had a union shop and that the board governing the national office of his union had passed a resolution stating that the board would not approve any contract which did not include a union shop. I also understand he first stated that his union had no contracts without a union-shop provision, but subsequently admitted that they did have in States where union-shop provisions were forbidden by law; and still later he admitted that there might be other local contracts without such provisions which did not have his national board approval.

We do not question that some national or international union officials may be displeased with some of the provisions of the present law, including their duty to bargain. We feel that this very situation at Station WGY, where our employees received the pay increases they negotiated and have continued to work uninterruptedly, is illustrative of our feeling that the distemper with the present law is confined to some union officials whose power over members has been interfered with, and that it proves very definitely that there has been no interference with good employee-employer relationships.

Very truly yours,

L. R. BOULWARE, Vice President.

Mr. IRVING. The next witness will be Mr. Kearns, of the Boston Chamber of Commerce.

TESTIMONY OF LAWRENCE M. KEARNS, MEMBER, INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COMMITTEE, BOSTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, BOSTON, MASS.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I know the hour is late, and I will try to confine my remarks to about 5 minutes.

Mr. IRVING. It does not have to be that short a time. But, if you care to summarize a little, it will help.

Mr. KEARNS. My name is Lawrence M. Kearns. I live in Beverly, Mass., and practice law in Boston, Mass., with the firm of Morgan, Brown & Kearns. I have ben engaged in industrial-relations law since my admission to the bar in 1938, except for 3 years in the Army, during part of which time I was also engaged in labor-relations work for the labor branch of the War Department.

I am a member of the industrial relations committee of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, for whom I am speaking today.

The Boston Chamber of Commerce has a membership of 2,300 persons, including 1,500 employers, employing 200,000 people in the Greater Boston area. We think we have good industrial relations in Greater Boston.

Back in December, the industrial relations committee, which consists of 14 people actually engaged in labor-relations work for companies as personnel managers for as industrial consultants or labor attorneys, sat down and prepared what they felt would be a fair labor law, a fair national policy, which they could live with and which would not be unfair to labor.

This resulted in a statement which was approved by the board of directors of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, consisting of 33 leaders of business in the Greater Boston area. You have a copy of this statement, and I will summarize it very briefly.

We list six unfair labor practices for employers and six unfair labor practices for unions. The first five employer unfair labor practices are the same as were contained in the Wagner Act and the Taft-Hartley Act. The sixth unfair labor practice is a corollary of the fifth union unfair labor practice, which is to strike or engage in a walk-out if there exists any bargaining agreement containing a procedure for the final adjustment of grievances arising under it. In other words, we propose to deal with the problem of wildcat strikes or strikes during the term of an agreement by saying that it would be an unfair labor practice for a union to strike or an employer to lockout if we have a voluntary arbitration clause in that agreement.

We feel that one of the important things in preserving collective bargaining is to assure that the agreement will be lived up to by both sides. This provision that we have proposed will encourage the inclusion of voluntary arbitration provisions and agreements, which is stated as a policy in the administration bill, but this gives us an enforceablity without the resort to damage suits, which was an indirect method under the Taft-Hartley Act.

Under the union unfair labor practices we listed the restraint or coercion of employees; and we list the refusal to bargain in good faith by the union engaging in a secondary boycott on a jurisdictional issue, which is covered in the administration bill; or engaging in a secondary boycott where the employed against whom the economic pressure is brought is not directly involved in the union's primary labor dispute, or where the issue involved is not one involving wages, hours, or conditions of employment.

We feel that the secondary boycott is a very difficult subject, and if the employer is really neutral or innocent he certainly deserves some protection under the law, but there are times when one employer may inject himself into a primary labor dispute, and in that instance the protection of the law should not be afforded him.

The fourth would be to draw the line between direct and indirect interests. But an administrative agency experienced in this field can perhaps evolve a series of decisions which would not be possible for the legislature to include in a formula in a law.

We also suggest that so-called featherbedding be included as an unfair labor practice.

Then, in discussing the NLRB, we believe in the separation of functions and in the reasonable statute of limitations, that the Board should have the authority to determine jurisdictional disputes, which the administration bill covers, and that both employers and union should have the right to petition for an election if a union claims to represent a majority, and that the Board hold elections.

Those are all covered by previous speakers. For example, the testimony of Mr. Brooks, the other day, went into that.

I would like to point out specifically this question of preliminary relief in unfair-labor-practice cases. The preceding witness pointed out to you the long delays in the Board's processes. Under the administration bill, if there is a secondary boycott in a jurisdictional strike case, what the previous witness said would be true; it would be a matter of many months, perhaps even a year or two, before the Board's order would be finally enforced in the circuit court. And meanwhile the innocent company, the neutral company which suffered the secondary boycott for jurisdictional reasons, would either be out of business or there would be no longer much point to the circuit court's order; so that this, we feel, is an important thing, for the Board to have discretionary authority to get some immediate action in these cases. This is entirely distinguishable from the cases of injunctions in public-emergency disputes.

The administration bill, in fact, does provide for an injunction in a sense, which is nothing more than a court order direction action. The only difference in the administration bill is that that court order does not issue until after the hearing and all the administrative processes have first been held.

We believe that the right of free speech should be spelled out, and on the closed and union shop we propose what the Massachusetts law now provides, which is to leave the closed shop, the union shop, and union security to collective bargaining but to protect the rights of individual employees by permitting an appeal to the labor relations commission, or in this instance the NLRB, if they have been arbitrarily denied admission to, or arbitrarily suspended or expelled from, membership by a union.

The Massachusetts law was passed as a result of a unanimous report of three members of labor unions, A. F. of L., CIO, and the railroad brotherhoods, three industry representatives, and three members of the public. It was headed by Professor Slichter, of the Harvard Business School. They recommended that the principle of the open union was important to maintain because the right to union membership, either to join or to remain a member, is now affected with the public interest, because the livelihood of so many people depends upon whether they are able to be in good standing in a union.

The idea of having an open union is simply to require that the union act fairly in regard to its admission requirements and its suspension or expulsion of members.

We are not necessarily supporting the closed shop or the union shop in this position we take, but we say it may well be left to collective bargaining; and, if an employer does not wish to grant it, then, as under the Wagner Act, he has a right to that poistion.

We also believe that supervisors and other representatives of management should not be included within the area of compulsory collective bargaining, because management so strongly feels that they are a part of their own organization and that the forced bargaining in this field would result in many bitter disputes and create a great deal of disharmony.

We also believe that every legitimate weapon should be used to fight communism and that the weapon of the non-Communist affidavit under the Taft-Hartley Act is an appropriate method to do that, and also in respect to our union-shop and closed-shop proposal we suggest adding that no union which has failed to file the non-Communist affidavit be permitted to have a union-security clause.

Finally, we recognize that national-emergency strikes must be handled in some way, but we do not presume to say how that shall be done.

I think that is all I wish to say, and I certainly appreciate the opportunity of speaking before you, and I appreciate your staying over until this late hour.

If there are any questions, I should be glad to answer them for you.

(The recommendations referred to are as follows:)

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE BOSTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE RELATIVE TO PROPOSED FEDERAL LABOR LEGISLATION, BASED ON A REPORT OF ITS COMMITTEE ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

Again the spotlight is focused on the problem of what national labor relations policy should be embodied in Federal law. The Secretary of Labor and other public officials have stated that Federal labor legislation should be fair to both management and labor. The committee on industrial relations recognizes the difficulties in securing general agreement on whether many of the particular provisions of a national labor law are fair and equitable. In an effort to assist in working out a constructive basis for the orderly handling of union-management relations, it is our purpose to set forth what we, as a management group, consider essential in a national labor policy without implying that additional provisions may not be desirable.

1. We believe that the practice and procedure of collective bargaining should be protected and encouraged. Certain practices of employers and unions which are contrary to this policy or involve the use of economic power where not justified should therefore be proscribed.

(a) It should be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

(1) To interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of their right to form or join labor organizations and engage in union activities;

(2) To establish or maintain a company-dominated union;

(3) To discharge or otherwise discriminate against employees because of union membership or union activities;

(4) To discharge or otherwise discriminate against an employee because he has filed unfair-labor-practice charges against the employer or testified in a case arising under the act;

(5) To refuse to bargain collectively in good faith with a union which has been chosen as the representative of the majority of the employees in an appropriate unit;

(6) To engage in a lock-out while a collective-bargaining agreement is in effect, if such agreement coatains a procedure for the final adjustment of grievances arising under it.

(b) It should be an unfair labor practice for a union—

(1) To restrain or coerce employees in their right freely to choose whether they desire to form or join a labor organization or engage in union activities;

(2) To refuse to bargain collectively in good faith with the employer if it is the majority representative;

(3) To engage in a strike or secondary boycott where a jurisdictional issue is involved; i. e., where a rival union strikes against a union certified as the majority representative or where the dispute concerns the class of work over which the union claims jurisdiction;

(4) To engage in a secondary boycott (i) where the employer against whom the economic pressure is brought is not directly involved in the union's primary labor dispute, or (ii) the issue involved in the primary labor dispute is not an economic issue such as improvement in wages, hours, or conditions of employment, or other generally recognized legitimate trade-union objectives.

(Comment: This would permit secondary boycotts against companies which inject themselves into the primary dispute by doing work for the company involved in the primary dispute or which deal with the company involved in the primary dispute in a manner other than in the normal course of business. It would prohibit the application of coercive economic pressure in the form of secondary boycotts where the purpose is to conscript companies which are neutral as far as the primary dispute is concerned or are far removed in every way from the primary strike, and also where the primary dispute involves political issues, a demand to violate the law, or to remedy unfair labor practices. If the unfair labor practice, there is no need for a union to resort to economic warfare.) administrative agency is given effective power to remedy promptly any employer

(5) To strike or engage in a secondary boycott or cause the employer financial loss thereby while a collective-bargaining agreement is in effect if such agreement contains a procedure for the final adjustment of grievances arising under it.

(Comment: Unions and employers should assume the same degree of responsibilty in seeing that labor peace is maintained while a collective-bargaining agreement is in effect and to back up this responsibility by making good any damage caused.)

(6) to require work to be performed which the employer does not desire to be performed or to require payment for work which is not done.

2. We believe that an administrative agency such as a National Labor Relations Board should be given the responsibility for administering the policies above enumerated. To carry out such policies effectively we believe that the following provisions are vital:

(a) There should be a separation of functions between the Board and the General counsel so that the former makes the decisions after the hearing and the latter initiates and prosecutes the cases.

(b) The general counsel of the NLRB should have discretionary authority to obtain preliminary relief from the courts to restrain any employer or union from continuing to engage in an unfair labor practice.

(c) There should be a reasonable statute of limitations so that neither employers nor unions could file unfair labor practice charges long after their occurrence.

(d) The NLRB should have the authority to determine jurisdictional disputes, i. e., disputes as to the class of work over which a union claims jurisdiction.

(e) Both employers and unions should have the right to petition for an election to determine the claim of a union that it represents a majority of the employees.

(f) Prior to certifying a union as the majority bargaining agent for employees, the NLRB should hold an election.

3. We believe that employers and unions should have their right of free speech in labor matters fully recognized so long as the expression of views contains no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit.

4. We believe that the extent of union security under a labor agreement may reasonably be left to collective bargaining, provided that unions which have closed shops, union shops or maintenance of membership agreements should be required—

(a) to maintain an "open union," or not insist on denying the applicant opportunity for employment, and

(b) to suspend or expel members only for proper cause and after a fair hearing or not insist upon their discharge, and provided that unions which have not filed non-Communist affidavits may not have any form of union security.

Comment: An "open union" is one which permits applicants for membership to join upon tender of reasonable initiation fees and dues, on the same terms and conditions generally applicable to other members, and without any discrimination as to race, creed, color, or political beliefs.

(It might well be provided that if an employee covered by a union-security agreement is suspended or expelled by the union, he may be suspended from work subject to a decison by the NLRB whether he was granted a fair hearing by the union or suspended or expelled by the union in violation of the principle of maintaining an "open union."

(To permit a Communist-dominated union the privilege of a closed shop or other form of union security would entrench Communists in positions of leadership and hinder the efforts of responsible American trade-union leaders and workers in their efforts to rid the American labor movement of the relatively few, but important and dangerous, Communist leaders.)

5. We believe that employers should not be required to bargain collectively with supervisors or other representatives of management.

6. We believe that a very legitimate weapon should be used to fight Communist influence wherever it may exist and that in labor-management relations an effective and legitimate weapon is to deny the processes of the NLRB to any union or employer whose officers refuse to file non-Communist affidavits.

7. A procedure for the handling of threatened strikes which would endanger the national health and safety must be included.

8. Conciliation and mediation services of the Federal Government should continue to be available to employers and unions, and appropriate conciliation services, Federal, State, and local, should always be called in before either the employer or union resorts to the use of economic force to settle a dispute.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Kearns, you are not actually taking a position of sustaining the Taft-Hartley or reverting back to the Wagner Act?

Mr. KEARNS. That is correct. We felt that the question of the Taft-Hartley Act or Wagner Act was so largely a political and emotional issue that the proper approach should be one of looking at issues and trying to point out those which were the most important and most essential and to see if a national labor law could not be drawn up on that basis.

Mr. IRVING. In others words, you are more interested, if any laws are necessary, in those that would promote harmony between the employer and the employees?

Mr. KEARNS. That is correct.

Mr. IRVING. I noticed something you said about featherbedding and the closed shop. I have many good friends that are lawyers, and I hope you will not take offense. I know in Missouri—I live just close to the Kansas line—if we have any litigation or cases in Kansas it is always advisable to get a Kansas lawyer to represent us.

Then I was talking to a witness here the day before yesterday, I think, from the papermakers' union, and their union was involved in considerable litigation under the Taft-Hartley Act. He said—I believe it was Pennsylvania, although I would not want to say for sure—that it appeared that if you had a case in one county, you could not bring a lawyer from another county. There was a closed shop in each county. You could use your own lawyer, but you had to have a lawyer from that county introduce him to the court, and then he sat there all day long without doing anything, and yet he charged $100 a day.

It looks like a combination of featherbedding and a closed shop. So I bring that out, not in any way of approving those things, but more or less to bring out the fact that a lot of statements have been in regard to unions, but it seems to exist in a great many other professions and in business, and so forth—and if we have no demand for some legislation on that subject.

Mr. KEARNS. I would just like to say that in Massachusetts we do not have any such policy as they do in Pennsylvania. I understand what you have said is correct in respect to the policy of Pennsylvania in regard to lawyers being confined to counties. In Massachusetts a lawyer can appear anywhere in the State.

Mr. IRVING. You would agree that it is somewhat of a closed shop, and something in the nature of featherbedding? You understand, featherbedding is supposed to be getting paid for something you do not do or work you do not perform.

Mr. KEARNS. I imagine in Pennsylvania that probably is historical, and perhaps goes way back. I have never looked into it, but in any event, I suppose it is not a national problem, but a problem of Pennsylvania.

Mr. IRVING. I understand they have some similar regulations in California, that you have to be a member of the bar association there, or something.

However, you speak of its being historical. Many of the practices of trade-unions are very historical—50, 60, or 75 years. In fact, they started with the guilds before the trade-unions were developed.

I think that is all.

Mr. Kelley, do you have any questions?

Mr. KELLEY. You say these recommendations were culled from your Massachusetts labor law?

Mr. KEARNS. There are three of them which are in our Massachusetts labor law. As a result of the Schlichter Committee's report, they added two of them to our State Labor-Relations Act, which was originally the same as the Wagner Act—the unfair labor practice of a union to refuse to bargain collectively in good faith. This committee which represented management and labor and the public equally felt that that was a fair thing to have in the law. The closed- and union-shop provision with the open-union proviso was the second one; and a third one was giving the employer the right to petition for an election if the union which is demanding to be recognized, has not previously been recognized as a bargaining agent, or if it is on strike for recognition without submitting a demand. In other words, they limit it to a first recognition and not to a question of where you have recognized a union and may want another organization. It is the initial election.

Mr. KELLEY. Suppose you had a secondary boycott like this. Suppose you had two manufacturing plants making the same material, automobile wheels. Let us say they organize at one plant, and that wage scales were satisfactory and working conditions, and hours, and so on, and management signed up.

In the second plant they were not successful. Do you think that it is permissible to boycott the second plant?

Mr. KEARNS. I would say that if the second plant—excuse me just a minute.

As I understand it they have organized the first plant?

Mr. KELLEY. That is right.

Mr. KEARNS. Then they go to the second plant and they cannot get anywhere. Now, do they strike them, the second plant?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. That is a direct strike for higher wages.

Mr. KELLEY. Let us say they boycott it and draw a picket line around it.

Mr. KEARNS. If they do anything directly to that company, it would not be a secondary boycott. The point would be, if they went back to the first company and said, "We are going to picket you unless you tell that fellow over there that he should get in line," then it is a secondary boycott on that first company.

Mr. KELLEY. What do you think of that situation then?

Mr. KEARNS. I do not think that is fair, because the first company is living up to union standards, and it has nothing to do with that other company; it is just——

Mr. KELLEY. Then suppose that happens. Suppose the second company which is not organized pays a smaller wage scale or works longer working hours, and produces the same goods that the first plant did, which is organized. They go out and undersell the first plant, and maybe steal their markets. I think even the management of the first plant would be glad to go along to see that the second fellow was organized. I have known those cases to happen where the management wanted the unions to take care of the second plant, and they would cooperate with them.

Mr. KEARNS. That may be true. The only difficulty is where you have that plant and then they might ship goods to two or three people down the line, and somebody who was 4 or 5 degrees removed from that may be working on those goods and he has those goods, and he has no connection with the first fellow; if he is genuinely neutral and innocent, it seems rather hard for him to bear the burden of having his business damaged simply because he happened to be working with the product which four or five steps back along the line may have been made by an unfair fellow. I mean, there are two justifiable ends. I can see the union's point of view in wanting to improve the standards up here.

Mr. KELLEY. The management's point of view?

Mr. KEARNS. If they are competitors in that industry, but then the poor fellow down here is in a tough spot, too, because he may be paying good wages. He may have a union contract. But if this particular part was made out in California, and if the workers said, "We have been informed by that union that that company is having trouble with that union, and we cannot work on it," in many instances, it is difficult to find a ready substitute for some parts. But what we mean by direct and indirect is that if one company tries to help another—in other words, if you have trouble with the union and I am in the same business, so that I do your work for you to help you out, and we say, "Well, I am no longer neutral or impartial"—I put myself in the middle of that thing, and if I am picketed, that kind of secondary boycott should not necessarily be declared illegal.

In Massachusetts, however, all forms of secondary boycott always have been, and still are, illegal under the common law, and it has never been changed.

Mr. KELLEY. Is most all the labor in the Boston area organized?

Mr. KEARNS. Greater Boston is a largely organized area.

Mr. KELLEY. Do the labor members agree or assent to the recommendation of yours?

Mr. KEARNS. No, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. They were not consulted about it?

Mr. KEARNS. We submit this as a management view. We specifically say that we set this up as what we think a management group should consider essential in a national labor policy.

Mr. KELLEY. That is all.

Mr. IRVING. I was going to ask you the same question, whether there were any labor leaders or labor people in the Chamber or on this committee that drew this up.

Mr. KEARNS. At one time, our industrial relations committee contained a representative of the A. F. of L. and the CIO, directly on our chamber committee; but for some reason or other, lack of interest or difficulty in meeting, and so on, it has more or less drifted apart, and there has not been any specific policy on it, but we think generally conditions and relations between unions and industry and management are good in the Greater Boston area, and we think we have some solutions in our Massachusetts law that may be well worth consideration nationally.

Mr. IRVING. Just expressing my own opinion, I think it is probably more helpful if both sides are taken into consideration and consulted on those matters which certainly affect both sides. There is certain to be a reaction when one side has no voice or no chance to give their ideas on the matter. I think perhaps that was one thing wrong with the law that we are talking about now. It was fixed up by one side and not much consideration given to the other side.

That is all.

Mr. Wier, do you have some questions?

Mr. WIER. You said you have in the State of Massachusetts a Labor Relations Act covering industrial relationships?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. Is the closed shop forbidden in the State of Massachusetts?

Mr. KEARNS. No, sir; the closed shop and union shop is handled——

Mr. WIER. Just answer "Yes" or "No." I do not want the details. The closed shop is still legal?

Mr. KEARNS. Correct.

Mr. WIER. Do you have a waiting time in the State of Massachusetts before service can be called?

Mr. KEARNS. No, sir.

Mr. WIER. Many of the things you advocate here are not in your State law?

Mr KEARNS. That is correct.

Mr. WIER. Is the secondary boycott in your State law?

Mr. KEARNS. That is a matter of common law in the State of Massachusetts. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts has upheld injunctions.

Mr. WIER. Does the State include within its provisions an injunctive process where they think they have a right to get relief by getting injunctions without hearings?

Mr. KEARNS. No, sir; the State act is similar to the Wagner Act.

Mr. WIER. Why did you not bring the State law down here? If it is good for your State it should be good for all people.

Mr. KEARNS. We analyzed the situation from the point of view of our State act, and all the other suggestions that the members of the committee brought in.

Mr. WIER. You are tougher in your State law than you are in this.

Mr. KEARNS. I do not know. For example——

Mr. WIER. Let me ask you this, then: Has your State law worked with some degree of satisfaction to the population of the State?

Mr. KEARNS. There has been some question since the Taft-Hartley Act, particularly as to the scope of its jurisdiction.

Mr. WIER. That has happened in every State.

Mr. KEARNS. Yes; so that I think it can be fairly said that there has not been as much activity, or use of it, since the Taft-Hartley Act, as there was before.

Mr. WIER. When was your State law enacted?

Mr. KEARNS. I believe it was around 1935, or so. It was very soon after the Wagner Act. It has been on the books quite a while.

Mr. WIER. That is all.

Mr. KEARNS. There is one other thought, and that is the provision outlawing State laws and check-offs. For example, in Massachusetts, since 1933, we have had a statute permitting the check-off of union dues, provided there was individual written authorization. There is a question under your bill——

Mr. WIER. Not mine; do not look at me.

Mr. KEARNS. Excuse me, under the administration bill, whether or not that would supersede our Massachusetts act, because as I understand it in the administration act it permits the compulsory check-off and says that any State law that prohibits a check-off is out. Would that prohibit our Massachusetts law which provides for individual authorizations?

We just had two cases in the Supreme Court in the last couple of weeks on the question of State union shops.

Mr. WIER. We have that in Minnesota, too. The National Labor Relations Board has assumed jurisdiction over our State board on several differences of law.

Mr. KEARNS. It would seem the clarification of that is important, because it seems reasonably clear in the Taft-Hartley Act that the State union-shop acts could act, and yet there was grave doubt about it.

For example, in Massachusetts the State act we would like to see superseded by the national act, and similarly, if the national act does not provide an open-union policy and closed shops, we would like that in the Massachusetts act to continue.

Mr. WIER. You are here representing the Boston Chamber of Commerce, and I assume you are speaking to some degree, at least, in the interest of employers of the State of Massachusetts or the city of Boston?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes, sir; entirely.

Mr. WIER. That is what I thought.

Mr. IRVING. There are no lawyers left here on the committee, and I do not suppose we could rule on your question.

We want to thank you for appearing here, and I will make this announcement, that the committee will adjourn its hearings until Monday morning at 10 o'clock, and they will be in the caucus room on the third floor.

(Whereupon, at 5:30 p. m., the subcommittee adjourned to meet again on Monday, March 21, 1949, at 10 a. m.)

APPENDIX

The several statements and communications referred to by Mr. Bailey are as follows:

STATEMENT OF JULIAN D. CONOVER, SECRETARY, AMERICAN MINING CONGRESS

The American Mining Congress, representing the various branches of the mining industry of this country, is deeply interested in the legislation now under consideration by your committee.

We feel that the pending bill, H. R. 2032, falls far short of providing a sound code of labor law which will promote harmonious labor-management relations and will be fair to all parties—employees, employers, unions, and the public.

The mining industry recognizes that good employee-employer relations cannot be produced by legislation alone. This universally desired objective can only be achieved by understanding, mutual trust and confidence, and a desire to cooperate between labor and management. These necessary elements are a state of mind of the individuals in management and in labor and cannot be legislated, but one-sided legislation which does not provide for equal rights and responsibilities has been found to be a tremendous obstacle in the way of achieving good employee relations. This is not a matter which concerns employers and unions alone but is one which is extremely important to the public welfare because the standard of living which we have achieved in this country cannot be maintained and improved unless sound and cooperative relations exist between management and labor.

The bill now before you, H. R. 2032, omits certain important provisions which our experience has shown to be of the highest importance to sound industrial relations. Among the notable deficiencies in this bill are the following:

PROTECTION AGAINST COMMUNISM

The mining industry has had a harrowing experience with a Communist-dominated union—the International Union of Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers, CIO—which has convinced us that the anti-Communist affidavit must be retained. Leaders of this union were denounced as Communists by President Philip Murray of the CIO, following an investigation and report showing that the then president (and now secretary-treasurer) of the union was continuously dealing with representatives of the Communist Party in shaping union policies, and that other union representatives were active in attempting to organize men into the Communist Party. During the past 2 years more than 65 local unions, representing employees of various companies, have seceded from this international union, in protest against its Communist domination.

The destructive tactics of Communists in labor, their planned interference with stable relations and efficient production, and their "militancy" in stirring up trouble and demoralizing operations in an industry producing strategic and critical materials, were described in some detail by Howard I. Young, president of the American Zinc, Lead & Smelting Co., and president of the American Mining Congress, before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare on February 19. Mr. Young outlined the action taken by his company—in order to give a clear understanding of the Communist menace to the great majority of loyal Americans among the company's employees, and to carry out the evident intent of Congress to protect workers against Communist exploitation—in refusing to recognize the mine-mill union or to negotiate with it until its officers filed the non-Communist affidavits as specified by the law. He described the strike which followed, marked by violence, intimidation, and coercion of employees, and concluded with the following statement, which represents the position of the mining industry on the Communist issue:

"We know from bitter experience that Communist control must be removed from the mining industry and this is equally true of all industries in which it still maintains a foothold. We feel that our protection from communism is in the hands of this committee. We are dealing here with a menace to the safety of our country. Unless you can devise an even more effective means of ridding the labor movement of communism, I strongly urge you to retain and strengthen the anti-Communist affidavit provisions of the present law. I think it would likewise be advisable to make these provisions apply to employers so as to eliminate the complaint that labor is being discriminated against.

"Our country is spending billions of dollars in an endeavor to prevent communism from spreading beyond the iron curtain. We surely should not be remiss in our endeavors to prevent communism from further infiltrating into our labor unions, and to eradicate its baneful effect wherever a foothold has been obtained."

FREEDOM OF SPEECH

We strongly urge retention of the provision in the present law which grants freedom to employers, employees, and labor organizations to express their views on labor matters "if such expression contains no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit." It is of the utmost importance to good employee-employer relations that both labor and management have full freedom to explain their viewpoints in all matters affecting contract negotiations and collective bargaining. To omit the guaranty of freedom of speech would be a distinct backward step and would tend to defeat the objective we all seek of promoting mutual understanding and cooperation between labor and management.

SUPERVISORY EMPLOYEES

We cannot too strongly emphasize the importance of the provisions in the present act under which supervisors are specifically excluded from the definition of "employee" and the term "supervisor" is carefully defined. In our experience these provisions have had a very beneficial effect.

"In the mining industry it is imperative, from the standpoint of the hazards involved in the safety of men and property alone, that supervisors and other employees who are a part of management be in a position to give their undivided loyalty to the employer. Supervisors are responsible for the enforcement of safety codes and State mining laws. They must so conduct mining operations that valuable equipment will be safeguarded and valuable ore will not be lost. They must at all times be in position to enforce discipline without fear or favor. One of their responsibilities is the making of contracts with miners, in which the supervisor exercises the full responsibility of management as to the method and amount of payment and as to measuring up the work for which payment is to be made. The supervisor represents his company when a miner first brings up a grievance and the action which he takes at that time is binding upon the company. It is impossible for supervisors to sit on both sides of the bargaining table in the adjudication of grievances or in contract negotiations.

Before the present Labor-Management Relations Act became law there was much turmoil in mining as well as in other industries over the status of supervisors in connection with collective bargaining by rank-and-file unions. The act remedied this situation and the public attention which was focused on the problem of unionization of supervisors awakened many managements to the need for strengthening the ties between foremen and the higher ranks of management. As a result many companies have adopted new programs or have strengthened old programs for making foremen feel that they are truly a part of management. The fact that there have been no strikes in the supervisory ranks in this period is evidence that supervisors are responding to these programs and that there is today little or no desire for foremen's unions.

Exclusion of supervisors from the definition of employees in the law has tended to clarify the status of foremen in their own minds as well as in the minds of higher management, and the relationship of supervisors with higher management is far better today than it was a year and a half ago. This provision of the law has proven its value and should be retained.

BARGAINING IN GOOD FAITH

If the law is to promote true collective bargaining, it is essential that there be an equal obligation on management and labor to bargain in good faith. To impose such an obligation on one of the parties to collective bargaining and not on the other is not only repugnant to our sense of justice in America, but mitigates strongly against responsible leadership in unions; it plays into the hands of the Communist labor leader who looks upon collective bargaining merely as a means of driving a wedge between management and labor and weakening the industry of our country.

To achieve and maintain industrial peace, there must be a proper balance in the responsibilities and obligations of management and labor. Both should be equally responsible and answerable in carrying out their undertakings and for any violation of contracts that may occur.

THE RIGHT TO WORK

We recognize that the right of men to strike for proper purposes should be protected so long as they do not resort to violence, intimidation, or coercion in the course of a strike. We submit that the right of men who wish to work should be given equal protection. We therefore urge that you retain the existing restrictions upon compulsory union membership, with the exception of the requirement that elections be held in union-shop cases. We also urge that you retain the provision of the present law which protects the integrity of State laws dealing with compulsory union membership and with protection of the right to work.

It is appropriate at this point to quote briefly from the statement submitted by Charles R. Kuzell on behalf of the mining industry to the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare on February 11, 1947 (record of hearings on S. 55 and S. J. Res. 22, part 2, pp. 698, 700, 701). Mr. Kuzell said:

"Compulsory unionism is a weapon which good union leaders do not need and which irresponsible union leaders should not have. * * * The Railroad Labor Act has for many years prohibited the closed shop, but that has not destroyed unions. * * * The brotherhoods are today among the soundest and strongest of labor organizations.

"Unions demand and fight for compulsory union membership. That provision gives the union the power to enforce a real sanction against a man through expulsion from the union—involving loss of his job and entry of his name on the union blacklist. An individual threatened with expulsion for noncompliance with or criticism of union policies or actions is thus faced with the loss of his livelihood. His membership in the union becomes more important than his rights as a citizen. A totalitarian state has no power more effective than this.

"Compulsory union membership is an invasion of the civil liberties of the individual. It should be outlawed in a sound code of labor law."

WELFARE FUNDS

The bill now before you would remove such safeguards as are provided in the existing law upon the collection and administration of trust funds or so-called welfare funds for union members. We suggest that the entire subject of union welfare funds be given further study, and that the effect upon the Federal Government's social security program and upon our general economy of these vast funds (which are in reality collected from the consuming public, to be devoted to the exclusive benefit of the members of certain unions) be carefully considered. We recommend that the law be amended at this time to remove the central union welfare fund from the field of required bargaining under the law.

CONCILIATION AND MEDIATION SERVICE

In our judgment it is extremely important that the independent status of the Conciliation and Mediation Service be retained. The establishment of this Service as an agency independent of the Department of Labor has resulted in a feeling of confidence in its impartiality on the part of both management and labor. To return this Service to the Department of Labor would tend to reduce or destroy its effectiveness.

SEPARATION OF FUNCTIONS WITHIN NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

Experience under the former National Labor Relations Act demonstrated that one of its greatest defects was the failure to recognize the fundamental principles of American justice by separating the prosecuting and judicial functions of the Board. That defect was remedied under the present Labor-Management Relations Act, and Congress should not now repeat the mistake which was previously made.

NATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY STRIKES

The provisions of the present law for dealing with national emergency strikes were enacted to meet a real need, which has nowhere been more apparent than in the coal-mining industry. That need still exists, and the Government must have adequate means of coping with strikes which affect the public health and safety. It would be a serious mistake to omit such provisions in any new Labor-Management Relations Act.

STATEMENT RELATIVE TO POSITION OF THE FOREMAN'S ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA, COMPILED BY A COMMITTEE OF FIVE MEMBERS AND SUBMITTED BY CARL BROWN, PRESIDENT, IN REPLY TO TESTIMONY AND STATEMENT GIVEN TO SENATE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE ON FEBRUARY 16 AND 17, 1949, BY WILLIAM T. GOSSETT, VICE PRESIDENT AND GENERAL COUNSEL, FORD MOTOR CO.

From the foreman standpoint, bargaining relations with the Ford Motor Co. from the first recognition in May 1942 through its various stages, while not entirely satisfactory, did represent growth and development that was not without acceptable compensations to both the company and the union.

As long as supervisors in industry are hired and compensated, either on an hourly rate or salaried basis for their services in performing the functions delegated to them by management, they are employees in this relationship and no amount of categorical statements or misstatements can change the fundamental basis of their position. The problems of management in modern industry may differ between one group of employees and another just as the responsibilities and obligations of one group of employees may differ from those of another group of employees in relation to management.

Mr. Gossett states: "The problem of supervisory unions is often characterized as a 'labor' problem. This is a fundamental error of great importance. The question involved is, rather, the ability of management to perform its function."

It is our contention that this is strictly a labor problem in that the rights of Ford supervisors are involved in their relationship as employees of the Ford Motor Co.

We also want to make it clear that we regard the Ford Motor Co. in its role of employer as being entitled in full measure to the application of our individual abilities and loyalty. Our adherence to our own individual [illegible] through membership in a labor union, namely the Foreman's Association of America, does not in any way impair or diminish our obligation to our employer within the scope of the responsibilities inherent in our position.

The fact that Mr. Gossett has only recently become associated with the Ford Motor Co. may preclude his having a complete insight into the [illegible] relationship with its foremen, because in all labor relations [illegible] influence of personalities is always present and leaves its imprint [illegible] the written record.

The signing of the contract between the Ford Motor Co. and the UAW-CIO had an influence on the organization of foremen in the Ford [illegible] that a new set of circumstances under which they worked was created. The company failed to furnish guidance for its foremen, and for some time the individual foreman was forced to struggle with the situation as best he could. At the same time the company markedly failed to take cognizance of the foreman in his economic relationship, until at last, through a spontaneity of action seldom witnessed in the labor world, Foreman's Association of America came into being. Foremen sought membership, rather than becoming members through solicitation, and it was a very small minority who were subsequently solicited to make up the better than 95 percent of Ford foremen who joined Ford Chapter No. 1.

The Foreman's Association of America was formally set up at a meeting in Dearborn, Mich., on November 2, 1941, and within 3 days thereafter opened its office at 5746 Schaefer Road, from which address chapter No. 1 has operated since.

In December of 1941 a formal request for recognition was mailed to Mr. Harry Bennett, then heading labor relations for the company. Subsequently a number of other communications were sent and attempts to contact Mr. Bennett were made during the months of January, February, March, April, and May seeking a conference for the purpose of requesting recognition by the company.

On May 22, 1942, the foremen had become so well organized that when a superintendent of the Spring & Upset Building saw fit to fire within the matter of a few hours all of the foremen in his building (totaling 169) for protesting against the discharge of their elected representative for speaking up in their behalf a crisis developed that eventually led to recognition of the association by the company. This event brought to light the fact that arbitrary dictatorial action on the part of management's representative when it involved an injustice to a foreman who was a member of a labor organization no longer could be effective. The 169 discharged foremen were asked to return to work the next day, but all refused to return unless their representative was taken back first. Two days after the firing, with production tobogganing in the building without supervision, the company finally agreed to meet with representatives of the association. At this meeting on May 25 the first recognition of the Foreman's Association of America was initiated, and thereafter began the process of setting up the machinery for the effectuation of such recognition. This was settled amicably through negotiations, and all the discharged foremen were reinstated without any blemish on their record and reimbursed fully for the time lost.

Despite Mr. Gossett's statement in the last paragraph of page 2 to the effect that late in 1941 the Foreman's Association of America was making promises to weld the so-called management team together, all of the record of that period shows that the activities of the Foreman's Association of America was aimed in behalf of its own membership, and that even the company representatives had no thought of including foremen as part of management, even to the extent of talking to them as a group, until May 25, 1942. The meetings between representatives of the company and of the association during the summer of 1942 took the form of discussions of problems of relationship on an exploratory basis, and not until November 5, 1942, did there emerge the concrete accomplishment in the form of the original rate and classification agreement signed between the Ford Motor Co. and the Foreman's Association of America.

Mr. Gossett chooses not to review the first few years of the relationship between the company and the association, but we believe that this is the important period to be considered in discussing this relationship. This was the period of growth and development. Many ideas were advanced, discussed, and partially accepted or discarded by both sides. This was the period in which the first economic readjustments were agreed upon. This was the period in which the foremen accomplished a reclassification that was a recognized determination of their position in the scheme of things.

The period preceding the signing of the contract of May 9, 1944, was not entirely free of friction, and to any sensible person it could not possibly have been expected to be so—but, by and large, the relationship between the company and its foremen improved. Certainly the willingness of the company to sign a complete labor contract with the Foreman's Association of America on May 9, 1944, is conclusive verification of the foregoing statement. The contract represented a great advance in our relationship over that exhibited in the rate and classification agreement of November 2, 1942. Even though this contract was never considered entirely satisfactory by all the foremen nor by all the representatives of management, it did establish a workable relationship.

The principle of arbitration through an impartial chairman of the joint final grievance committee was included in the contract of May 9, 1944, but its operation was held in abeyance through differences of opinion with respect to the selection of such impartial chairman for more than a year. It was 2 months later before any case was processed by an umpire, due to refusal of the company to submit its portion of the case as required by the supplemental umpire's agreement dated July 13, 1945.

With respect to Mr. Gossett's claim beginning on page 3 and continuing on page 4 of his statement that the company was under no obligation to recognize and deal with the Foreman's Association of America, let us point out that the basic law of the land gave all employees the right to organize and bargain collectively, and that this difference of opinion as to the possible interpretation by the courts of the question of foremen being employees has no valid place in the picture. The facts are that the foremen were organized. They demanded the right to bargain collectively—and that demand was acceded to by the Ford Motor Co., and that is all there was to it.

If the company expected bargaining relationships to function automatically and completely to the satisfaction of the management, it was their own self-delusion that lead to their disillusionment. The Foreman's Association of America fully recognized that a contract did not automatically solve the management-employee relationship, but that it had to be interpreted and made to work by day-to-day application of the provisions therein on a reasonable and logical basis.

Under the provisions of the contract there ultimately developed a very large number of foremen grievances that had progressed through the various States provided for, and were ready to be appealed to the umpire as a result of persistence on the part of the association in pressing the claims of its members and obstinate resistance on the part of the company to the recognition of these claims. It so happened that contracts with other employers covering chapters—contained provisions for arbitration similar to that in the Ford contract. Under none of these contracts has there ever developed the necessity of a case being appealed to the umpire or arbitrator. When negotiations are carried on in good faith, appeals to an arbitrator are seldom necessary.

Those who advocate denial to supervisory employees of the right to protect their own interests do so on the theory that only one interest is involved. An employer-employee relationship by its very nature must include at least two distinct interests—one of which is that of the employer, and the other separate, and sometimes conflicting, is that of the employee, who in this case serves his employer in a supervisory capacity. In a free and democratic economy the interests of one's self and his family must be the primary interest of every individual. When he becomes an employee he thereby enters into a contract, either explicit or implied, to perform certain specific or customary functions in behalf of his employer, but he does not thereby renounce any right or even privilege to protect his own interests. If those interests lead him to combine his efforts with those of his fellow employees in an appropriate group for the purposes of dealing with his employer on a basis of more nearly equal strength, he would be a failure as a free citizen if he did not avail himself of such a medium in his own interests.

If the experience of an employer through the habit of exercising absolute and unrestricted power over all the interests of his supervisory employees has led him to believe that only the interests of the employer can be taken into consideration, it is a sad state of affairs, and a correction of this impression is now long overdue.

The elements of allegiance, responsibility, morale, and efficiency are intangibles in the employer-employee relationship which are basically dependent upon human reaction both in the employer and the employee group. They cannot be measured in fixed units, nor by their very nature can they be other than resilient and fluctuating. They are good or bad as past or present practices influence them.

The charge that independence of collective action is impossible by one group of employees or another in the same plant is dependent only on whether or not the employer has seen fit to treat the interests of one group or the other in the same manner or from the same viewpoint. A denial of the right of any group of free citizens to confer or to consult with any other group of citizens with respect to their own rights is something that no true American will stand for.

The citation of specific cases by Mr. Gossett as examples of the vacillation of the loyalty of supervisory employees, in the performance of their duties, is so restricted a showing of the routine practices of foremen in the performance of their duties, in which literally thousands of similar incidents were handled daily in the interests of the company, and in such manner as to produce in large volumes the finest products the company has ever turned out. All of these cited instances occurred during a period when the company was reorganizing from war production to the production of automobiles under conditions in which a rank and file union was involved, which was something that had not existed previously in the Ford plants while producing automobiles. The foremen had not at any time previous to this period received instructions from management as to the requirements of the company's new policies. If we are to rely on cited instances to determine whether or not organization among foremen is detrimental to the requirements of their job, why does the company not bring forth a few of the thousands of cases in its files in which the foremen were not backed up by the company when they did attempt to perform their functions of direction and discipline and orderly conduct of production processes in the traditional manner.

Shortly previous and during the time covered by the cited instances much trouble was occasioned by the development of the habit among the rank and file workers of lining up at the time clocks before the specified quitting time, and excessive loafing in the toilets. In hundreds of cases foremen have docked employees for time thus lost, and have upon repeated occasions been reversed by their supervisors or the labor relations department. These practices, condoned by the company through their disciplinary machinery, were not conducive to the maintenance of morale nor the effectiveness of the foremen. In fact violent assaults upon foremen while attempting to perform their duties in the traditional manner became so frequent that without the self-protection afforded by organization among the foremen themselves, company measures to protect foremen in these cases was admitted by the company to be ineffectual. However, action by the foremen through the association in cooperation with the company and the union ultimately reduced these incidents to a point where they are no longer a problem. Among the assault instances there occurred at least one death and quite a number of serious injuries to foremen.

In answer to the complaint, page 9a of Mr. Gossett's statement that representatives of the Foreman's Association of America spent excessive time collecting union dues and soliciting membership, we recall that the question of dues collection was a matter of negotiation, and that instead of writing a provision into the contract it was mutually understood that dues would be collected anywhere and anytime. With more than 95 percent of the foremen as members there was practically no solicitation for membership by anyone, either in or out of the plant. As for setting an example to the rank and file union, with the dues checkoff and union shop in the UAW contract, it was not necessary for them to follow anyone's example with respect to these two items.

With the authority of the supervisors so undermined by company policy in dealing with union matters, and with inadequate instruction in these policies, is it reasonable to hold foremen responsible for the failure of the company's policies to be carried out?

Contrary to the attempt to indicate that collective bargaining by supervisory employees interferes with recognition of merit and initiative, the facts are that one of the primary incentives to organization among foremen was the resentment against what is known in the shop as apple polishing. In other words, the placement in preferred positions of men incapable of fulfilling the functions thereof except through the dependence on services of capable and efficient subordinates, who if the strict rule of merit were followed would be the logical candidates for promotion.

The association suports the general rule of seniority only to the extent that it does not interfere with the true recognition of merit and ability. This is shown by the terms of the contract between the company and the association. In the administration of this clause, certainly the interests of any individual foreman affected by promition or demotion were processed by the association with vigor through the recognized channels provided in the contract.

As early as the preagreement days of late 1942, and following the establishment of the foremen's personnel office by the company in January of 1943, representatives of the association repeatedly complained to the director of that office that the company should have a comprehensive program of training for its foremen, so that every foreman could be better equipped to meet his problems in accordance with the policies of the company. The feeble attempts along this line made by the company for a long time were ineffectual. Only within the past year and that following the strike by the foremen in the summer of 1947 has there been a real effort made by the company along this line, and that effort has been coupled with a program of attempted indoctrinization in the statement that "foremen are part of management," in spite of the fact that no appreciable change in the authority vested in them has been made.

The fact that the Ford Motor Co. and others repeatedly refer to foremen as part of management certainly does not make it so, unless foremen are given the authority to set company policy and are treated similarly to those who are now vested with genuine management prerogatives.

Proof of the insignificant part of management foremen are considered to be by the company can be cited in the fact that Form No. 6 (rev. 9–3–1948) recently prepared by the company and referred to by Mr. Brown in his testimony as "They are also now required, as I understand it, to sign a yellow-dog contract" is just as repugnant to Ford foremen as a yellow-dog contract and can only be considered as being in a yellow-dog category.

The contract of May 9, 1944, provided for a schedule of pay rates for the different classifications of the foremen as a basis for their compensation, but it also provided as follows: "The differential indicates the minimum per hour which a foreman shall be paid over a rate base as follows:". And in another section provides as follows: "(3) The agreed rates for foremen as per schedule section 20 (a) will be minimum rates paid by the company and higher rates may be paid without changing the classification of foremen, upon proper approval." It can be plainly seen that the statement by Mr. Gossett or the implication that the association stood in the way of the company's rewarding any foreman on a merit basis is not a fact.

In answer to the statement beginning in the middle of page 14 of Mr. Gossett's statement, the association might well say: "The situation facing us in the spring of 1947 thus had many aspects:"

(a) We did not want to strike.

(b) Experience had convinced us that management's conception of a proper supervisor's union was that it should be a company-dominated organization.

(c) In the Packard case the National Labor Relations Board had held finally that supervisory employees were employees under the National Labor Relations Act, and that management thereby was obligated to recognize and bargain with them.

(d) The foremen through the fact of organization were committed to the principle that if they so chose they could be represented by a labor organization in dealing with their employer on their own employer-employee problems.

The objectives of the company as proposed in a letter dated May 15, 1947, were all properly subject to negotiation under collective bargaining because they very plainly involved the interests of every supervisory employee of the company. The requirement that these objectives, as stated in the letter be blindly endorsed by the association as representing the foremen and as demanded therein, did not constitute collective bargaining.

The subject matter of negotiation under collective bargaining cannot in any way form the basis of a conclusion that collective bargaining per se for any group of employees should be outlawed.

Without representation by a strong organization the interests of the individual are overwhelmed by the will of the company.

Let it be noted that the deterioration of the authority of the foreman and the destruction of the traditional respect in which he was held by those under his direction resulted from failure on the part of the company to support him in said authority previous to the time the foremen felt impelled to organize in defense of their position. Credit for rebuilding the respect and prestige with which formen are held by those under their direction was the result of insistence on the part of the association that the company support their foremen in the performance of their duties.

Circumstances leading to a strike emanate from at least two sources, one, being the company, and the other, the group contemplating said strike. A strike, in essence, is a test of economic power inherent in the parties to it—in short, economic war. In toto it is never conclusive. During its existence the resources of one or the other, possibly both, tend toward depletion. When the resources of the weaker party are exhausted the strike comes to an end, but in no way can the circumstances attendant upon it be considered in the determination of the right of employees to equal treatment under the law with respect to their right to collective bargaining.

The conclusions of the management of the Ford Co. with respect to its experiences in dealing with the Foreman's Association of America or its predictions based on those experiences are weak arguments indeed upon which to base the denial of equality before the law to supervisory employees. Predictions in the past have proven fallacious, and promises are as good only as the results of the company's practices may indicate.

Despite the assertions and claims made by Mr. Gossett's statement on behalf of the Ford Motor Co. as to the present improved status of their foremen, one must obviously conclude that this has been largely, if not wholly, brought about by the activities of the Foreman's Association of America in the Ford plants.

This question of denying foremen collective bargaining rights under the Taft-Hartley Act is strictly a labor problem, and the only real issue before the committee is, will the foreman's interests best be served by granting the same collective bargaining rights to foremen as are enjoyed by other groups of employees throughout this country, or whether on the other hand the foremen should be denied protection under the law of our land in his efforts to improve his working conditions. Anyone taking the latter view would in effect be placing the foremen in a position of absolute servitude in his day-to-day relationship to his employer. He would be utterly helpless before the whims and fancies of management changes and/or changing managements, as in the not too recent Ford Motor Co. shake-up when the old management team was released almost in its entirety and a new team recruited.

In conclusion, let us remember that we are not here dealing with the detailed quarrels between the Ford Motor Co. and the Foreman's Association of America, but rather to consider whether or not supervisory employees anywhere in our country should be subjected to group discrimination simply because they perform certain specific functions for their employer.

It is our contention that so long as the employee and employer relationship obtains all employees should be treated equally under the law.

STATEMENT OF DON PETTY, GENERAL COUNSEL, NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF BROADCASTERS

My name is Don Petty. I am general counsel of the National Association of Broadcasters, a nonprofit organization with a membership in excess of 1,750 radio broadcast licensees located in all parts of this country.

Since radio broadcasting is free to the listener, it, of necessity, is operated in the interest of the public. If it were not, people would not listen. So, at the outset, it should be clear that my suggestions are objective and of importance equally to the public generally and to those in the radio broadcast industry.

Industrial disputes frequently involve not only statistics, wage rates, hours of work, and other details concerning employment, but also questions of power and authority—all of which vitally affect all segments of American life.

Abusive practices by either a handful of labor leaders or a small minority of employers should not be used as an argument against the enacting of adequate laws in this field. For without equitable and effective laws, collective bargaining will not become an integral part of American society.

Therefore, it is respectfully submitted that any legislative approach to the field of labor-management relations must be concerned with: (1) Safeguarding the public welfare against those labor-management disputes which trespass upon the normal functioning of our economic system; (2) recognizing collective bargaining as a method of determining disputes, rather than as a privilege or favor to be granted to any segment of society; (3) protecting the freedom of collective bargaining where such method is the desire of the majority of employees; (4) establishing of the area within which collective bargaining may function; (5) creating adequate procedural machinery. Accordingly, I offer the following amendments to H. R. 2032.

1. Obligation to bargain collectively.—The collective-bargaining process is founded upon the responsibility and good faith of both parties. These cannot be established by legislative fiat. However, legal barriers to prevent irresponsible acts or those in bad faith will do much to establish the boundaries of collective bargaining.

The obligation to bargain collectively in good faith is a mutual obligation. If it is necessary to make it an unfair practice for employers "not to bargain collectively and in good faith," it is equally essential that labor organizations be charged with the same parallel responsibility.

In the present bill the obligation to bargain in good faith is imposed only on management. I know of no good reason why this obligation should not be mutual. Therefore, I suggest that title I of H. R. 2032 be amended by adding the following section:

"SEC. 112. Section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, as amended by the addition of subsection '(b)' is further amended by adding thereto the following paragraph: '(4) to refuse to bargain collectively with an employer for whose employees said labor organization is the recognized bargaining agent.' "

2. Supervisors.—During the past several years the arguments for and against application of sections 8 and 9 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 to supervisory employees have been thoroughly aired. I have no desire to retrace that ground at this time. In this matter I support a practical approach which has often been suggested. Employers should not be obligated to bargain with a union representing supervisors which also admits to membership nonsupervisory employees. It is obvious that to permit representation of supervisors by such a union is to invite intraunion pressure directed toward influencing vital managerial decisions which all foremen are continually making. This unrealistic situation not only creates conflict but is inconsistent with the efficient production of goods and services. In addition, the term "supervisor" should be clarified. Therefore, I suggest that title I have the following sections added:

"SEC. 110. Section 2 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 shall be amended by adding thereto paragraph (13) which shall read as follows: '(13) The term "supervisor" means any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibility to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action.'

"SEC. 115. Section 8 (5) of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 shall be amended to read as follows: '(5) to refuse to bargain collectively with representatives of his employees subject to the provisions of 9 (a): Provided, That no employer shall be obligated to bargain collectively with a labor organization seeking to represent a unit of supervisory employees or a unit which contains supervisory employees if said labor organization admits to membership nonsupervisory employees.' "

3. Employer petitions.—Administrative decisions under the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 permitted an employer to file a petition only when confronted with conflicting claims of majority representation. The Labor Management Relations Act of 1947 permitted an employer petition when confronted by a single request for recognition. There is no legitimate reason why this procedure should not be included in the new legislation.

The basic purpose of the procedure set up under section 9 of the Wagner Act was the peaceful settlement of disputes over recognition. While strikes for recognition were not made unlawful, the hope was that their use would be discouraged. If a union requesting recognition does in fact represent a majority, it should not object to an election. If it does not so represent the employees, then it should not request recognition unless it is willing to stand the test of an election, nor should it be permitted to bargain for the employees.

The argument that in some instances an employer petition may be a "stalling" procedure, runs not to the validity of the procedure, as such, but to administrative delays which have often beset many representation cases. The remedy is a more expeditious operation of the administrative machinery rather than an abolition of a fair and desirable procedure. Therefore, I suggest that the following section be added to title I:

"SEC. 116. Subsection 9 (c) of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 shall be amended as follows: '(c) Whenever a question affecting commerce arises concerning the representation of employees the Board may investigate such controversy and certify to the parties, in writing, the name or names of the representatives that have been designated or selected. In any investigation, the Board shall provide for an appropriate hearing upon due notice, either in conjunction with a proceeding under section 10 or otherwise, and may take a secret ballot of the employees, or utilize any other suitable method to ascertain such representatives. A petition initiating proceedings under this section may be filed by a labor organization or by an employer when said employer has been confronted with a request for recognition by one or more labor organizations.' "

4. Interference, restraint, and coercion.—The acceptance of collective bargaining obviously does not mean that all employees must pursue this process of employee-employer relations, but it does mean that workers have the statutory right and freedom to join unions if they choose.

Under the provisions of the Wagner Act and the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, employers are not permitted to interfere with, restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of their right to self-organization. The Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 also placed a substantially similar obligation on labor organizations.

I believe such a prohibition is good. The principle of self-organization cannot exist side by side with coercion, whether it comes from an employer or from a union. To my mind there is no substantial difference between the threat of an employer to discharge an employee because of unionization and the threat of a union leader to force the discharge of an employee if he does not join the union. Both methods are equally repugnant to the spirit of the Wagner Act.

Mass picketing is another type of coercion which has no place in industrial disputes. If peaceful picketing is to be regarded as a form of free expression, certainly mass picketing falls completely without that definition. These and other forms of coercion should be prohibited.

To cover these situations, I suggest that the following section be added to title I:

"SEC. 113. Section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, as amended above by the addition of subsection (b), is further amended by adding to subsection (b) thereof the following paragraph: '(5) to coerce employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed in section 7.'"

5. Freedom of speech.—Under the American concept, freedom of speech is not a right to be granted to one group and taken from another. It is inherent in all—free from abridgment by Government. Any legislation which discriminates between employee and employer in the field of free speech and expression is not only contrary to the American concept, but will invite conflict within our own society.

The right of free and open discussion is the cornerstone of our type of government. Only the most pressing and fundamental considerations have been allowed to impose limitations on that right. Early administrative interpretations of the Wagner Act attempted to do so by stringently curtailing the right of an employer to express his opinion on the subject of unionization. In later years, judicial decisions gradually brought about the adoption of a more liberal policy, one more consistent with constitutional and statutory requirements. And in section 8 (c) of the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, Congress gave statutory expression in the field of labor relations to the constitutional requirements. This clause provided, in effect, that no statement by a representative of management or labor should be regarded as coercive unless it contained a threat of reprisal or a promise of benefit. In my opinion, it is essential that a similar clause be included in the proposed statute. Therefore, I recommend that the following amendment be added to title I:

"SEC. 114. Section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following subsection (d): '(d) the expressing of any views, argument and opinion or the dissemination thereof, whether in written, printed, oral, graphic, or visual form, shall not constitute an unfair labor practice under any provisions of this act if such expression contains no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit.'"

6. Secondary boycotts.—While the present secondary-boycott provisions of H. R. 2032 probably were intended to apply to situations arising in such service industries as radio broadcasting, the legislative intent should not be left in doubt. The word "services" should be inserted in the proposed definition. Therefore, I recommend that section 106, subsection (b) be amended as follows:

"(b) Section 2 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 is amended by striking out paragraph (11) thereof and by adding two new paragraphs (11) and (12):

"'(11) The term "secondary boycott" means a concerted refusal, in the course of employment, by employees of one employer to use, produce, manufacture, perform, transport, distribute, or otherwise work on articles, materials, goods, services, or commodities because they have been or are to be manufactured, produced, distributed, rendered, or used by another employer.'"

Within the fabric of the law—Wagner Act, Taft-Hartley Act, and the now-proposed Labor Management Relations Act of 1949—interpreted by court and agency decisions, there is a definite set of rules covering employer action. However, H. R. 2032 regards the possible transgressions of unions as being relatively few. In fact, the proposed statute restricts such proscribed union tactics to only two limited type of secondary boycotts arising out of jurisdictional conflict. This limited approach, in my opinion, fails to recognize the great potential harm and genuine unfairness of destructive secondary boycotts, and will create employee-employer strife.

As it stands, the bill continues as unfair the use of secondary boycotts in only two instances: (1) Where a secondary boycott is used as a weapon by one labor organization to force an employer to deal with it rather than with another labor organization already certified or validly recognized; or (2) where the essential issue involved is a jurisdictional controversy between two unions. While I approve of these provisions, I believe there are other situations where justice, fair play, and the public interest demand protection from secondary boycotts.

One involves what has been called a secondary organizational strike. In its simplest terms it is this: Company A's employees are not represented by any labor organization. The employees of Company B, which sells to or buys from Company A, goods or services, are represented by the X union. The X union advises Company B that it will call a strike unless it brings pressure to bear on Company A to sign a contract with the X union. If Company B is compelled to utilize its influence and Company A is compelled to submit, the latter will have been forced to sign a contract with the union regardless of the wishes of its employees. The result reached in this example is not only unfair to all concerned (even, for example, leaving Company A open to possible charges of illegal assistance under section 8 (1) of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935), but it is contrary to the spirit and purpose of the original Wagner Act. Section 7 of that act guarantees to employees "the right to self-organization * * * to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing." By no stretch of the imagination can the unionization of the employees of Company A, in the example above, be regarded as "self-organization"; nor was the union 'of their own choosing." The company, because of pressure and because it was economically unable to resist, "chose" a union for them.

Another problem arising from the secondary boycott not covered by the provisions of H. R. 2032 has to do with economic pressure placed on one employer by a labor organization to compel another employer to utilize services of employees who are not needed. This is an obvious type of uneconomic "make-work" arrangement which has no legitimate place in our economic society. Resulting higher costs are a cancerous growth within labor and management alike.

A final problem arises when the secondary boycott is used to induce an employer to breach previously incurred contractual obligations. A simple illustration will suffice: Company A and Company B deal separately with the X union. Company A also has a binding contract to provide for or receive goods or services from Company B. As a result of a dispute between Union X and Company B, the union requests Company A to refrain from dealing with Company B, threatening a strike if the request is not granted. Company A is thus faced with either a strike or the necessity of breaching a legally binding contract, thereby incurring legal liability. To permit such a result is patently unfair to Company A. Moreover, the public interest demands that contracts be honored and that, wherever possible, industrial disputes be limited to the actual disputants. Only in this way can injury and inconvenience to the public be kept to a minimum.

The above examples themselves demonstrate clearly the need for preventing the use of secondary boycotts in such instances. In the field of radio broadcasting, where there is the legal necessity of providing continuous and uninterrupted service, the need for protection from the unregulated use of the secondary boycott is even clearer. There are no backlogs of inventory accumulations in radio. Work stoppages terminate all operations. The station's audience disappears, and when it resumes operations, audiences must be rebuilt. By law the broadcaster must provide service to his listeners, and so, he is entitled to protection by law from damaging secondary boycotts. News, political broadcasts and entertainment—they are all a necessary part of American life which should be given at best a minimum of protection from secondary boycott action. Therefore, I recommend the following amendment to H. R. 2032:

"Add to subsection (d) of section 106, which adds subsection (b) to section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, the following additional paragraphs: '(3) to cause or attempt to cause employees to engage in a secondary boycott to compel another company (i) to be deprived of rights grants under any existing contract or agreement; (ii) to bargain with a particular labor organization as the representative of his employees; (iii) to hire employees for services that are not performed or are not required to be performed in the operation of the business.' "

7. Injunctions to prohibit secondary boycotts.—Whatever bans are placed on secondary boycotts, they should be enforceable by injunction proceedings. In making this recommendation I am fully aware of the long history of violent hostility of organized labor to the use of injunctions in industrial disputes. Organized labor has raised its criticism of the statutory use of injunctions on the grounds that it resulted in unequal availability of remedial action. Thus, so the argument runs, if the use of preliminary restraining orders is not permitted where an employer commits an unfair labor practice, such procedure should not be available when the union violates the law. This line of reasoning does not take into consideration the realities of the usual situation.

Let us examine them. If an employer discharges an employee because of union activity, and that fact is proved, the remedial order under the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 and the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, includes, among other things, back pay and an offer of reinstatement. The purpose of those statutes was to restore the situation to the status quo ante as well as to prevent future violations. That purpose can be achieved. Now, on the other hand, let us take the case of a secondary boycott. The immediate result of the union's unlawful economic pressure is complete or partial cessation of the employer's operations. In any industry the immediate loss to the employer can, in dollars and cents, be substantial. In a service industry such as radio it can be ruinous. However, the broadest construction of the remedial powers given to the National Labor Relations Board under subsection 10 (c) of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 (which is revived by the present bill), would permit no more than an order against the union requiring it to cease and desist. For the radio industry, as well as others, such an order has little value. Station owners would be forced to submit to unlawful pressure because of the inadequacy of the remedy. By the time that cease and desist order was forthcoming, the employer would have suffered irreparable loss for which he could not recover any compensation. Therefore, I recommend that the following amendment be added to title I:

"SEC. 111. Subsection 10 (b) of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 is amended by adding the following paragraph: '(1) Whenever it is charged that any person has engaged in an unfair labor practice within the meaning of paragraphs (1), (2), or (3) of subsection 8 (b), the preliminary investigation of such charge shall be made forthwith. If, after such investigation, the officer or regional attorney to whom the matter may be referred has reasonable cause to believe such charge is true and that a complaint should issue, he shall, on behalf of the Board, petition any District Court of the United States (including the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia) within any district where the unfair labor practice in question has occurred, is alleged to have occurred, or wherein such person resides or transacts business, for appropriate injunctive relief pending the final adjudication of the Board with respect to such matter. Upon the filing of any such petition the District Court shall have jurisdiction to grant such injunctive relief or temporary restraining order as it deems just and proper, notwithstanding any other provision of law: Provided further, That no temporary restraining order shall be issued without notice unless a petition alleges that substantial and irreparable injury to the charging party will be unavoidable and such temporary restraining order shall be effective for no longer than five days except upon consent and will become void at the expiration of such period. Upon filing of any such petition the courts shall cause notice thereof to be served upon any person involved in the charge and such persons, including the charging party, shall be given an opportunity to appear by counsel and present any relevant testimony: Provided further, That for the purposes of this subsection District Courts shall be deemed to have jurisdiction of a labor organization (1) in the district in which such organization maintains its principal office, or (2) in any district in which its duly authorized officers or agents are engaged in promoting or protecting the interests of employee members. The service of legal process upon such officer or agent shall constitute service upon the labor organization and make such organization a party to the suit.'"

8. Union security.—The recognition of a legitimate right, on the part of employees, to afford their union and its members security against interference should not be confused with a monopoly control over a person's right to work.

The underlying premise of collective bargaining is majority rule. Representation itself is predicated upon the fact that the majority of employees, within an appropriate unit, desire collective bargaining with their employer, through the agency of a selected union. A combination of employees for mutual protection is one thing, but such combination for the purpose of erecting monopoly barriers and exerting monopoly practices is another.

The closed shop is not necessary to effective union security. Throughout their existence, virtually all CIO unions sought only a union shop and not the closed shop. So too with some AFL unions. The weight of evidence covering abuses of the hiring hall version of closed shops so vastly outbalances the benefits derived by unions that closed shops should be prohibited.

The maximum form of protection by statute should be the union shop. Under that full protection is afforded the unions as continued employment requires union membership. However, full opportunity is granted employers in the selection and hiring of new employees, and full opportunity is maintained for American men and women to secure employment without having previously been required to pay initiation fees to a union for the privilege of being permitted the right to work.

Consequently, it is recommended that title I of H. R. 2032 be amended by adding the following sections:

"SEC. 118. Section 8 (3) of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 is amended as follows: '(3) by discrimination in regard to hiring or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization: Provided, That nothing in this Act, or in any other statute of the United States, shall preclude an employer from making an agreement with a labor organization (not established, maintained, or assisted by any action defined in Sec. 8 (a) of this Act as an unfair labor practice) to require as a condition of employment membership therein on or after the 30th day following the beginning of such employment or the effective date of such agreement, whichever is later; Provided further, That no employer shall justify any discrimination against an employee for nonmembership in a labor organization (a) if he has reasonable grounds for believing that such membership was not available to the employee on the same terms and conditions generally applicable to other members, or (b) if he has reasonable grounds for believing that membership was denied or terminated for reasons other than the failure of the employee to tender the periodic dues and the initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership;'

"SEC. 119. Section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, as amended above by the addition of subsection (b) is further amended by adding thereto the following paragraph: '(7) to cause or attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an employee in violation of subsection 3 (a) or to discriminate against an employee with respect to whom membership in such organization has been denied or terminated on some ground other than his failure to tender the periodic dues and the initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership;'"

9. Featherbedding.—Few will disagree with the proposition that an employer should not be compelled to pay for services which are not required, or to pay exactions for services not performed. Wasteful and uneconomic featherbedding increases costs and leads to reduced buying power. A provision to cover such situations was included in subsection 8 (b) of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947. Therefore, I recommend the following amendment to Title I of H. R. 2032:

"SEC. 117. Section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, as amended above by the addition of subsection (b), is further amended by adding to subsection (b) thereof the following paragraph: '(6) to cause or attempt to cause an employer to pay or deliver any money or other thing of value, in the nature of an exaction, for services which are not performed or not to be performed.'"

10. Definition of the term "labor organization."—The Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 was criticized from some quarters because it allegedly utilized two varying concepts of the law of agency, one for labor organizations and another for employers. Whether or not this criticism was justified is not at issue here. The same rules of agency should apply to each. Thus, that there may be complete equality in the responsibility of employers and unions for unfair labor practices, there should be included in the definition of the term "labor organization" the phrase "any person acting in the interests of said labor organization, directly or indirectly." Similar language appears in the definition of the term "employer" in paragraph 2 of section 2 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935. Therefore, I recommend that the following section be added to title I of H. R. 2032:

"SEC. 109. Paragraph (5) of section 2 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 shall be amended as follows: '(5) The term "labor organization" means any organization of any kind, or any agency or employee representation committee or plan, in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rate of pay, hours of employment, or conditions of work, and shall also include any person acting in the interests of said organization, directly or indirectly.'"

11. Separation of powers.—In 1946 Congress in the Administrative Procedure Act recognized the need for the separation of the legislative, executive, and judicial functions of government. The history of administrative agencies makes clear the danger inherent in failing to maintain such separation, which is for the protection of the citizen. Labor and management are equally affected by this problem, and should be equally concerned that the separation of the legislative, executive, and judicial functions be maintained. In order to insure that H. R. 2032 shall not, either as it now stands or as amended, be construed to prevent the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act from applying in full force and effect, I recommend that the following section be added to title IV of H. R. 2032 as sec. 406 and that the present sec. 406 be renumbered as sec. 407:

"SEC. 406. Nothing in this act or the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, as here reenacted, shall be construed to be in derogation of any right secured to any person under the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act."

I further recommend any implementation of the spirit and intent of the Administrative Procedure Act which may be necessary to maintain, within our Government, the principle of the separation of powers.

I appreciate the opportunity of presenting this statement. If I can furnish the committee with any additional facts, please call on me.

STATEMENT BY LESTER WASHBURN, INTERNATIONAL PRESIDENT, UNITED AUTOMOBILE WORKERS OF AMERICA, ON THE SUBJECT OF THE NEED FOR IMMEDIATE REPEAL OF THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT IN ITS ENTIRETY AND THE REENACTMENT OF THE WAGNER ACT

A little more than a year and a half ago the Congress of the United States embarked on a new, and what labor considered to be a dangerous experiment—that of detailed regulation of the relationship between labor and management with respect to the processes and details of collective bargaining, and including the control of its manifestations and the economic activities engaged in for the protection of the respective interests of each. This experiment is now known as the Taft-Hartley Act.

The passage of the law was preceded by fiercely partisan debate and much public discussion, both lay and professional. This was understandably so, since never before in our history had Congress attempted to deal on such a comprehensive basis with what is undoubtedly the most volatile and explosive of domestic matters—the relationship between labor and management.

Labor's position at the outset was that the law considered as a whole would discourage the association of employees in free labor unions for their mutual aid and protection and would discourage the practice of free collective bargaining. We felt it would not solve any of this country's basic economic problems. We saw in this law arbitrary class discrimination, government by injunction, and the substitution of litigation for good-faith collective bargaining and voluntary arbitration. We believed that it would increase the causes of strikes. At the same time we called it a slave-labor law because it prohibited certain types of strikes. We feared injection of political considerations into labor-management relations. We anticipated that many of the provisions of the law would be unduly cumbersome, if not wholly unworkable. We felt that some of its provisions could not stand the constitutional test. We thought that the law marked the beginning of wage fixing, price control, and compulsory arbitration.

All of us are agreed that, if the law did in fact or would in fact so result, it would be a bad law for everyone.

Of course, our original indictment of the law was comprehensive. But many of us did hope that our fears were only fanciful—that by some miraculous combination of conservative administration and favorable construction on Government's side, and common sense, restraint, and good faith on management's and labor's side, we would find that things were not so bad as they seemed.

But labor must now report that the experience under the law has, in our opinion, confirmed and reinforced these fears and predictions. This in spite of the fact that we still haven't felt the full weight of the law because of the preservation of certain contractual rights during most of the first year and in spite of the fact that employers generally have been advised to proceed and are proceeding with caution, either for political reasons or because of present prosperity, in utilizing those provisions of law which are most punitive and dangerous.

We do not set forth our conclusion either with a gloating spirit of "I told you so" or with any degree of satisfaction. It is not an occasion for joy to point the finger at that which bodes ill for all of us. But we believe the record speaks for itself. Here it is:

JURISDICTIONAL PROBLEMS AND DIFFICULTIES

Preliminary, one of the most troublesome questions raised by the law, and which has confronted both labor and management, is that of what parties and relationships are subject to its provisions and whether the same rules of law or administrative discretion shall apply to election cases, including elections for the union shop, as shall apply to unfair-labor-practice cases, regardless of whether the employer or the union is the alleged violator.

Under the Wagner Act, and after the early decisions of the United States Supreme Court giving wide scope to its application, the National Labor Relations Board quickly recognized the administrative difficulties involved in seeking to apply the law to all cases which, strictly speaking, might come within its jurisdiction. Today we see no such restraint on the part of the general counsel, who believes that the West Virginia bartender selling Milwaukee beer comes within the ambit of the law. This, of course, approaches the ludicrous, and even those who sponsored the law now find themselves in disagreement on this point; but these oft-repeated assertions by the general counsel have raised important and difficult problems. Outstanding among these is the question of the building and construction industry.

It is clear from the congressional debates what the authors of the law had in mind what they consider to be certain undesirable practices in that industry. But it is not clear even at this time just how far and in what way the industry has been affected. The Board, its trial examiners, the general counsel, the Federal district courts, and the attorneys for both employers and labor unions have failed to find a common touchstone for answering the question. In alleged boycott cases this difference of opinion has been particularly sharp, and in union-shop elections in this industry the procedure has been uncommonly complicated and delayed.

I refer you to the National Labor Relations Board's efforts to set up a pilot election in Wayne County, Mich., which, after 5 months of study and planning, was given up. Why? Because it was impractical and impossible and, at best, would only determine what everyone already knows—that this is traditionally a closed-shop industry for the mutual benefit of employees and employers, the preponderant majority of which would have it no other way. The same administrative problems in the trucking industry have caused similar complications and difficulties.

That these and similar questions of jurisdiction and scope of coverage have impeded and will impede collective bargaining is self-evident. That they lead only to uncertainty and confusion is equally evident. That wholesale evasions of the law and "bootleg" contracts have resulted and will continue to result is the accepted fact. And I am reasonably certain that on this phase of the discussion there are not many on management's side who will disagree.

DEPRIVATION OF THE PROTECTED RIGHT OF COLLECTIVE BARGAINING TO LARGE CLASSES OF EMPLOYERS

The Taft-Hartley Act was designed to remove from the beneficent coverage of the Wagner Act many employees, in number and class, who had previously been protected in their right to organize and bargain collectively.

The broad definition of the term "supervisor," with its five tests, which, according to Board and court decisions, are applied in the disjunctive rather than the conjunctive, is an outstanding example. As you know, the question of whether the old act did or should apply to foremen became a highly controversial issue, which was finally resolved by the United States Supreme Court in the Packard Motor Co. case in favor of the Board's conclusion that it did. Bearing in mind the nature of the present-day mass-production industry and the rather low position in the hierarchy of management held by foremen, there was, in our opinion, sound basis for the Board's holding that foremen, too, should have the protected right to form and join labor associations and bargain collectively with management through representatives of their own choosing.

The United States Supreme Court in the Packard case made this apt observation:

"Even those who act for the employer in some matter, including the service of standing between management and manual labor, still have interests of their own as employees. Though the foreman is the faithful representative of the employer in maintaining a production schedule, his interest properly may be averse to that of the employer when it comes to fixing his own wages, hours, seniority rights, or working conditions. He does not lose his right to serve himself in these respects because he serves his master in others, and we see no basis in this act whatever for holding that foremen are forbidden the protection of the act when they take collective action to protect their collective interests."

The question of dual loyalty referred to by the Court and raised by those who differed with the opinion might have been fairly resolved by a provision similar to that relating to plant guards, whose status as employees under the Taft-Hartley Act was not disturbed. Instead, again assertedly because of the question of dual loyalty, provision was made for their representation by labor organizations wholly independent of those who represented production workers. This is not to say that we are in accord with such treatment.

It has raised a host of new problems and has created obstacles to collective bargaining. For example, the recent strike of the independent plant guards' union at the Briggs Manufacturing plant in Detroit, with its consequent effect upon thousands of other employees, would not have happened had these guards continued as part of the over-all production unit. But the plant-guard method of approach at least would have preserved the rights of a great class of employees and would have encouraged rather this discouraged industrial democracy.

The first immediate effect of this treatment of foremen was the breaking of the strike of the Ford foremen's union and the discharge of some of its leaders. The foreseeable effect in the future—bearing in mind that no country has yet successfully devised a way of perpetually depriving workingmen of their rights to act in concert for their self-protection, and bearing in mind that, if they are not employees for the purpose of this law, there apparently is available to such foremen many devices which are otherwise forbidden to employees under the law—is, unless management will voluntarily recognize the unions composed of foremen and deal with them in good faith, strike and disaster.

One instance where the answer of a group of organized employees to management's contention that it need not recognize their bargaining representative because they are supervisory employees and not covered by the act was immediate insistence upon the signing of a closed-shop agreement, contrary to the provisions of the law. Through their economic strength such employees were able to secure that request.

This provision of the law has also raised important problems relating to working foremen, who, not being included in a collective-bargaining unit and not being subject to the union-shop provisions of the law, pose a continual threat to the standards of the union because of their wage competition. The practical answer to this has been to secure contracts which prohibit such foremen from doing any work within the jurisdiction of the union—a result which should have been avoided.

Another class of persons who have been excluded from the law is that large and growing class known as independent contractors. Here, too, legalisms have overcome common sense, and those who fancy themselves injured by the United States Supreme Court decision in the Hearst case prevailed upon Congress to overrule the Court. But the United States Supreme Court decision was one in favor of good-faith collective bargaining and industrial stability. The Court recognized that, in order to accomplish the purposes of the Wagner Act, the common-law definition and tests of what is a master-servant relationship could not be applied in certain cases because of the presence of an economic relationship and interdependence that brought the parties within the contemplation of the law. Congress repeated the same purposes and intents in the preamble and introduction to the Taft-Hartley Act, but then made them impossible of fulfillment by devices such as this.

There are very few truly independent contractors today in the economic sense. Many former employees have been put on their own by employers, on the surface at least, for the purpose of evading responsibilities of other laws of social beneficence, such as workmen's compensation and social security. This trend seems to be increasing. The time may very well come in some trades and industries when the independent contractors, so called, will be the instruments for the liquidation of the astute businessmen who created them.

Since the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, we have had one experience with this provision of the law which demonstrates its lack of wisdom. A large group of employers in the over-the-road trucking industry who had believed that by virtue of the Taft-Hartley Act they would be able to free themselves of union representation of the so-called independent contractors proposed to put the union and the independent contractors to the test. But wiser heads in the same industry very quickly pointed out that, were it not for the stabilizing influence of the union contract and union membership, it would be only a very short period of time before the independent would either dominate the industry or have to be discontinued entirely. Neither alternative was desirable—the first for obvious reasons, and the second because there is in this industry a real need for the flexibility of operation afforded by the use of the independent. The employers changed their minds, but today they live in fear that these independent contractors might change their minds, assume the role of competitive businessmen and take advantage of the law.

QUESTIONS RELATING TO UNION LIABILITY

Another change in the law which has frustrated good-faith collective bargaining and caused great difficulties is that relating to responsibility for acts of agents when considered in conjunction with the provisions relating to unfair labor practices of unions, and lawsuits against labor organizations for breach of contract.

As to the latter provision, I would like to make it perfectly clear that unions do not want nor do they seek immunity from liability for breaches of contract where they are properly chargeable with the same. They always have been liable without any such statutory provisions; and most unions, as most employers, have lived up to their contractual obligations. There have been some exceptions on both sides. A preliminary objection to the contract-liability provisions is that by its inclusion in the law it has created a climate which is unhealthy for the processes of collective bargaining and voluntary arbitration. These provisions have confirmed labor's fears that the real purpose of the law is to drive labor unions out of existence by inviting and making easier costly litigation.

A more basic objection grows out of the provision that unions shall be liable for the activities of their agents, regardless of whether the actions complained of "were actually authorized or subsequently ratified." There has been much debate, scholarly and otherwise, about the meaning of this last-quoted language, and over whether or not it changes the common-law rules of agency. However, assuming that it doesn't and that all that was intended was to repeal paragraph 6 of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, labor unions and their attorneys, recalling other sad experiences in the courts, have been compelled to devote an extraordinary amount of time in the negotiation of no-strike clauses and union-liability clauses.

The approach has not always been the same. In some cases no-strike clauses had been replaced by right-to-strike clauses. In some instances, the unions had been required to spell out in detail the actual authority of their officers and agents and to receive employer recognition of such limitations on authority. In some cases the language of paragraph 6 of the Norris-LaGuardia Act has been written right into the strike or liability clauses; and in some cases provisions have been inserted confining the parties to arbitration as an exclusive remedy for breach, coupled with a liquidated-damage provision.

All of this has resulted in negotiations at arm's length, in creating suspicions on both sides of the table, in spending more time on such provisions than should ordinarily be spent, and in delaying and embarrassing the processess of collective bargaining.

Nor is that all. The very processess of voluntary arbitration have been impeded, in that some employers much prefer to have the weapon of lawsuit rather than arbitration as a compelling inducement against possible breaches by a union, and would prefer to take their chances as defendants in a breach-of-contract suit brought by a labor organization rather than to submit to arbitration. Some unions are beginning to feel the same way. Yet, arbitration as a means of solving disputes during the life of a contract, and the viodance of complicated and lengthy court procedure in a difficult and sensitive field with a language all of its own, is one of the keystones to industrial peace.

UNION SECURITY

Passing now to the unfair-labor-practices provisions of the law, the most significant change in the definition of employer unfair labor practices is that which prohibits discrimination in respect to hire or tenure because of membership or nonmembership in a labor organization, unless pursuant to a union shop, as defined in the act. The definition of "union" shop departs materially from that found in the Wagner Act. In the first place, under the Wagner Act, a majority status "with or without representation election" was sufficient to enable the making of a union-shop contract, but under the Taft-Hartley Act an election must be held for specific authorization to enter into such agreement. This election is not the ordinary type of election with which we are familiar in our political life, where a majority of all voting is sufficient to elect, with the result that sometimes as little as 5 percent of the electorate can select an important public official, such as United States Senator. In that Taft-Hartley type of election, the union is required to secure the favorable vote of a majority of all eligible to vote. A nonvoter, and in one extreme case, a dead man, casts a negative vote by his mere absence.

Results of elections conducted by the National Labor Relations Board during one quarter, from April 1 to June 30, 1948, cast an interesting light on the necessity for the election provision. In close to 12,000 union-shop elections, approximately 98 percent have been won by margins ranging from 90 to 99 percent. Yet the holding of these elections has been attended by an unreasonable expense and delay and has burdened the Board in the other way important functions which have been submitted to its jurisdiction.

Secondly, there has been a material departure from the old law in the type of union-security provision which is permitted. Under the old law, preferential hiring clauses were legal. That is, the employer could be required to contract to first give to the union an opportunity to supply competent employees from among its members. If the union were unable to furnish qualified workmen within a limited period of time, then the employer could hire whomever he saw fit, such new employee being required to join the union within a stipulated period of time. Under the Taft-Hartley Act this type of preferential hiring has been eliminated. The only permitted requirement is that the new employee join the union on or after 30 days of employment. This change may not appear to be too significant to those of you who think only in the terms of the mass-production type of industry, drawing chiefly on the unskilled or semiskilled worker, and where collective-bargaining contracts through their seniority provisions, give the employee some type of security in rehiring after lay-off.

But consider for a moment the construction industry, the maritime industry, and some phases of the trucking industry, and the service trades, in which employees work on a day-to-day and job-to-job basis for many different employers. Employees in such industries, because of the very nature of the industry, enjoy no such thing as job security, though seniority lies in preferential hiring or the hiring hall. It is only in this way that they can be assured of fairly regular employment or reemployment and, incidentally, the only way the employer can be assured of a constant source of experienced and competent help. The repercussions for the employers in this type of industry are just as serious as for the unions and their members.

The west coast strike of the CIO maritime unions grows in part out of the union's unwillingness to forego this minimum of security.

Shortly after the passage of the law, Senator Taft, one of its authors, recognized the inequity of the situation as it applied to the maritime industry. This is not said in praise of the Senator's wisdom, but to point out that the law was so hastily conceived and thrown together, in an effort to satisfy so many different types of pressure groups, most of whom spoke for only very small segments of industry, that its authors had no idea of the incalculable harm they were doing to the majority of employers and employees.

Thirdly, the union-shop provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act have made the traditional union shop nothing more than a dues-collecting device for labor unions, and have taken from labor unions the right of self-government and self-protection by making discharge for nonmembership dependent only upon failure to pay initiation fees and periodic dues.

I believe it is not consistent with industrial democracy to say that union membership may be a condition of employment if that is the desire of a majority of the employees and if agreed to by the employer, but to impose, as a prerequisite to enjoyment of the benefits of compulsory membership, the acceptance of strike-breakers, stooges, provocateurs, thieves, disrupters, Communists, and the like.

On the immediate results of this provision have been the disputes which have arisen relating to the so-called reciprocal-firing clauses in which the union insists upon the right to request the discharge, for reasons other than union membership, of employees, union or nonunion, who are not acceptable to their coemployees. This surely does not lead to industrial peace, and emphasizes how the law has encouraged unions to seek greater participation in management affairs for their own self-protection.

Finally, the provision of the law which permits individual States to impose greater restrictions upon union-security clauses than are found in the Federal law departs entirely from the scheme of uniform regulation, results in depriving some unions and employers of rights and privileges afforded to other unions and employers, and seriously interferes with those uniform trade agreements on a national basis which have aided management in many industries to stabilize the labor-management relationship.

Labor submits that the entire manner in which the union-shop question has been handled, ranging from the necessity of election down through the types of security granted and the saving of States' rights, has created a condition which of necessity has led to instability in the collective bargaining relationship, has caused major dispute, and has added nothing to the stated purposes for which the law was passed.

UNION UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act relating to unfair labor practices on the part of labor unions open up a wide field of dangerous possibilities. With respect to this subject, it should be pointed out that the record of labor's attempts to organize and bargain collectively reveals conclusively that each industry involved viciously opposed the organization of its employees and refused to recognize and bargain collectively with the unions chosen by a majority of their employees and refused to make or sign collective-bargaining agreements with them.

The best examples relating to these matters can be found in the reports of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor on the subject Violations of Free Speech and the Rights of Labor, based on its investigations from 1933 to 1937 which exposed the vicious attempts of industries to destroy or block the organization of labor unions even to the extent of the use of blacklists, private police systems, armed guards, labor spies, and arsenals of guns, tear gas, and so forth.

It should also be remembered that the so-called mass-production industries, such as auto, steel, and rubber, for a period of 2 years after the passage of the National Labor Relations Act (Wagner Act) brazenly violated and refused to abide by its provisions.

The Wagner Act was adopted as a result of the above-mentioned Senate committee's investigations, not for the purpose of giving labor something, but solely for the purpose of guaranteeing to the wage earners the rights they already had and were entitled to and to protect them in the exercise of these rights.

These facts can lead only to one conclusion, and that is that the desire to bargain collectively and enter into collective agreements with employers is, for the most part, the desire of labor.

Employers generally would much rather have no agreement and no collective bargaining so they could return to the days of industry control of the Nation's economy by dictating wages, hours, and working conditions, together with their practice of arbitrarily fixing prices.

These sections of the Taft-Hartley Act relating to union unfair labor practices will be utilized to the fullest extent by employers to delay, hinder, confuse, and avoid collective bargaining or the reaching of an agreement with their employees, since it is crystal clear that it never was the desire of industry, for the most part, to bargain with labor. This fact cannot be denied in the face of the industry's present propaganda campaign to retain the Taft-Hartley Act.

The following is a brief analysis of some of the provisions which have been involved during the past year.

1. Coercion of employees in their right to refrain from concerted activities.—Section 8 (b) (1) making it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents to restrain or coerce employees in their right to either engage in concerted activities or to refrain from so engaging has been interpreted to apply to mass picketing and lawlessness on the picket line. These are usually police-court matters, but now, under the law, they become matters for complaint and hearing before the National Labor Relations Board and preliminary injunctions in the Federal courts with or without notice. So despite the accumulated wisdom of the years that ripened into the Norris-LaGuardia Act, we have again the Federal courts in the business of issuing injunctions in labor disputes. And since these activities are now defined as unfair labor practices, this provision, as all other union unfair labor practice provisions, becomes a ready device for forestalling collective bargaining, either by holding up elections until the unfair labor practice charges have been finally litigated, or by delaying bargaining for the same reason.

2. Union's refusal to bargain in good faith.—The provision making it an unfair labor practice to refuse to bargain collectively is, in my opinion, totally unnecessary, since that is the very reason for a labor union's existence. And while the provision may be harmless on its face, it provides a means for delay and procrastination on the part of employers who can file charges under this section and sit back and wait for a Board determinination rather than get on with the making of a bargain. The provision becomes particularly troublesome when considered in connection with section 8 (d) which sets forth the definition of "good faith collective bargaining." Ths definition embraces the serving of a 60-day notice prior to amendment or termination of an agreement, followed within 30 days by a notice to Federal and State mediation or conciliation services. The latter provision has become a laughing matter, since the 30-day notice is required even where the parties are making progress and it doesn't appear that intercession is either necessary or desirable.

One labor-relation consultant for management has advised me that, in his experience, the notice provisions have stirred up trouble, where none would otherwise exist, in that some unions after giving the 60-day notice and the automatic 30-day notice to comply with the law, have decided that as long as the law required notice to conciliation, they might just as well throw the whole problem into the Conciliation Service's lap and make a real dispute of it.

He points out that the serving of the notice has acted as a psychological prod, much like the commencement of a lawsuit. We all know that the average working man can be more easily induced to settle his claims before he actually signs a complaint and gets into court. This same average working man likens the requirement of formal notice to the Government to the commencement of a formal legal proceeding and reacts in similar fashion.

And bearing in mind the further provision of section 8 (d), which relieves either party from making a concession, one can fairly conclude that the net result has been to discourage rather than encourage good-faith collective bargaining.

As an example of the mischief which this provision has done, we can take the case of the strike at the Boeing aircraft plant in Seattle, Wash., which lasted from April 22, 1948, to September 10, 1948, and which has been prolonged by management's insistence that because of the union's failure to give a 60-day notice before striking, it has forfeited its rights under the law, its members were no longer employees by automatic operation of section 8 (d), and the company therefore was under no obligation to bargain with it. This despite the fact that the parties had been in negotiation for almost a year.

3. Secondary boycotts.—Section 8 (b) (4) (A) of the law is one which has given unions, employers, the Board, and the courts some of their most troublesome problems. This is the provision that is commonly referred to as the "secondary boycott" section, since it makes it an unfair labor practice "to engage in, or to induce or encourage the employees of any employer to engage in, a strike or a concerted refusal in the course of their employment to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, materials, or commodities or to perform any services where an object thereof is forcing or requiring * * * any employer or other person to cease using, selling, handling, transporting, or otherwise dealing in the products of any other producer, processor, or manufacturer, or to cease doing business with any other person." The language is broad and comprehensive, as well as cumbersome and difficult.

In referring to "an object" rather than ultimate purpose, there apparently is a complete departure from the usual rules of tort, and common-law conspiracy which have always distinguished between a legitimate ultimate and immediate means to accomplish that end. Even under the Sherman Antitrust Act, the United States Supreme Court has stated that the law permits of distinction between primary and secondary aims.

The Senate debates do not clearly disclose the real significance of the substitution of the language "an object" for the original language "for the purpose of." A difficult question of construction has thereby become more difficult.

Going on to the substance of the provision, we find disagreement between the courts, the Board and the general counsel as to what types of activities are actually precluded. One Federal court has held that the section really covers only boycotts against true neutrals, and not those allied in interest with the direct party to the dispute. This sounds sensible, but opens up a host of new questions as to what are neutrals.

This provision of the law is also carried over into section 303, which makes the same activities unlawful and provides that "whoever shall be injured in his business or property" because of violation may sue in Federal or any other court having jurisdiction over the parties for damages sustained.

A number of damage suits have been started under this section. The extension of this right to seek damages to "whoever shall be injured in his business or property" also opens up interesting vistas of how far the chain of causation shall be followed.

Additionally, the boycott provisions of the law are required to be given precedence in handling over all other cases, and the general counsel is required to seek immediate injunctive relief in the Federal courts, with or without notice and hearing, pending Board determination, the Norris-LaGuardia Act to the contrary notwithstanding.

This latter provision raises the pertinent question of why precedence and compulsory seeking of injunctive relief where the union commits an unfair labor practice should be the rule of law, while no such rule applies to employer's unfair labor practices.

The history of the Board shows that it has sought 22 injunctions against labor unions under these provisions of the law. Fifteen of those injunctions have been granted, three have been denied, two are pending, and two have been withdrawn. As against this record, the Board has secured or sought to secure two injunctions against companies' unfair labor practices. Only one, that against the General Motors Corp. has been granted.

One of the outstanding example of the lack of wisdom in this particular provision can be found in the Sealright case. In this case, General Counsel Denham secured an injunction in the Federal district courts against certain warehousemen who had refused to handle products which were transported from a struck plant to a dock which was being picketed by striking workers. General counsel argued that the mere presence of pickets in and of itself was for the purpose of encouraging others to stop their work within the language of the act, and, therefore an injunction should be issued. After the injunction was issued, a trial examiner rejected the theory of the general counsel and held that no unfair labor practice had been committed and that the stoppages of work which resulted were permissible under the contract between the union and the company. Yet the damage had already been done when the injunction was issued.

Additionally, the imposition of the obligation on the Federal district courts to issue temporary restraining orders or injunctions upon a prima facie showing have made the Federal courts mere appendages of the National Labor Relations Board, which makes the final and subsequent decision on whether or not a violation of the law actually occurred.

The net result of all these provisions is to effectively deter labor unions from taking what had hitherto been considered proper legal steps for protection of their legitimate interests. Under these provisions, labor unions have been and can be restrained from refusing to work on and from advertising to the public their aversion to goods and products made or transported by competitive nonunion labor. Those who complain most bitterly about the boycott have failed to comprehend a simple economic truism which was aptly phrased by the United States Supreme Court in the Thornhill case:

"It is recognized now that satisfactory hours and wages and working conditions in industry and a bargaining position which makes these possible have an importance which is not less than the interests of those in the business or industry directly concerned.

"The health of the present generation and of those as yet unborn may depend on these matters, and the practices in a single factory may have economic repercussions upon a whole region and affect widespread systems of marketing."

Just as in international politics we seek to quarantine the aggressor who threatens our peace or our economic security, just as in civic matters we seek to eliminate the slum and blight which threatens our health and our property values, so in the field of labor we seek to isolate those whose wages, hours, and working conditions, or employment practices, jeopardize those union standards for which we have fought and sacrificed for many years.

To tell a manufacture by law that he must aid and support his competitor, though doing so will seriously impair his own competitive position, is tantamount to appropriation of his property without due process of law. Similarly, to tell union men that they must work on, process, transport, or otherwise handle or perform any service on nonunion or scab goods, is asking them to be pallbearers at their own funeral.

Nor is it an answer to say that the law preserves their right as individuals to do those things. Unity of action is the cornerstone upon which union standards have been built; it is only through unity of action that they can be preserved.

And it should not be forgotten that union activities, in defense against the competition of nonunion labor, have been just as valuable and helpful to management as they have been to labor. Unions by this device have protected employers against unfair competitive practices based upon wage competition, just as effectively as they have protected themselves.

4. Unlawful payments.—Another provision of the law which is demonstrative of the mischief caused by the act is section 302, which makes it unlawful for any employer to pay or deliver any money or other thing of value to the representatives of his employees and for them to accept such payments. On a distinctly minor level, but nevertheless significant, insofar as a mutually cooperative labor-management relationship is concerned, is the discontinuance, because of these provisions, of payments made to union "sunshine" or union athletic activity funds out of the profits received by the employer from vending machines and canteens.

On the major level is the limitation and restriction upon welfare funds. Important among these is Government dictation of the way such funds shall be managed; and Government limitations upon the purposes for which such funds can be used. We have seen the immediate effect of these provisions in the mining industry, as well as in the music recording industry, where since the effective date of the law, until recently, new records could not be made by union musicians because of the previous royalty arrangement was for the purpose of creating employment for unemployed musicians, a purpose prohibited by law.

There is in these and other similar provisions not only impediments to good faith collective bargaining and industrial stability, but the actual intrusion by the Government over the scope of matters which may properly be the subject of collective bargaining. Sponsors of this law, who have been otherwise vigorously vocal in their protestations against excessive Government interference with business and in their defense of free enterprise, as distinguished from Government bureaucracy and regimentation, surely did not let their right hands know what their left hands were doing—and I use the words "right" and "left" in that order deliberately, and I believed accurately.

POLITICAL EXPENDITURES

Another substantive provision of the law which should be singled out for specific mention is that relating to the ban on political expenditures and contributions by labor unions. The United States Supreme Court has not yet had an opportunity to pass upon the full reach of the law; the one case in which it might have done so having been disposed of on the theory that the law did not comprehend the dissemination of political information on a partisan basis in regular union publications. We believe that the law is unconstitutional in its broader applications, but constitutional question aside, we also believe it is unfair and malicious. It appears obviously to have been an attempt to put labor up the creek and then take away the paddle. And attempted comparison with a similar restraint on corporations is about as realistic as saying that the law maintains the equality of political participation between Johnny Jones, laborer, and Mr. du Pont, industrialist.

This provision, and the law as a whole, have had a salutary effect. It has aroused labor politically as very few single acts have in the past.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY INJUNCTIONS

Section 206 of the law relating to cooling-off injunctions in cases where the President of the United States believes that the national health or safety may be imperiled has been invoked on several occasions. This not only represents the return to Government by injunction which played such significant political roles in the past, but the efficacy of the procedure is subject to considerable doubt. For instance, since September 3, 1948, the maritime unions on the west coast have been on strike, in spite of the fact that the national-emergency provisions of the law were invoked.

In the dispute on the atomic bomb project, the employer finally settled to avoid a strike; the union members voted to support their original demands in the last step of the procedure. The delay occasioned by invoking the law contributed nothing to the settlement, yet certainly must have interfered with the efficient operation of this important project.

Experience under the Smith-Connally Act during the war demonstrated that neither cooling-off periods, nor putting the last offer of the employer to a vote by employees would prevent strikes. On the contrary, the cooling-off period has usually been used as a warming-up period during which the union and the employer girded for the inevitable battle to come.

The fact is that strikes, and particularly those that involve thousands of employees and the public interest, are not called in haste. They are serious matters and involve great sacrifice. They are rooted in basic economic problems. Trimming the branches will not effect a cure.

PROCEDURAL PROVISIONS

1. Registration and financial reports.—The registration and financial information provisions of the law have placed additional expense and clerical burdens upon labor unions, have delayed their pursuit of remedies or elections before the Board, and have not, insofar as is now apparent, made any contribution to the objectives of the law.

2. Decertification and deauthorization.—The decertification and deauthorization procedures, together with the limitation against more than one election in a 12-month period, have delayed collective bargaining and have been used to frustrate genuine self-organization. Their full impact has not yet been felt because of existing contracts and certificates which have acted as a bar to such elections, but which will no longer have such effect in the near future.

3. Non-Communist affidavits.—The requirement of filing so-called non-Communist affidavits, aside from being a gratuitous insult to the preponderant majority of union officers, requiring as it does a special pledge of allegiance from them only because they are union officers; aside from being inconsistent with the American theory of a day in court for all, regardless of race, religion, citizenship, or political affiliation; aside from depriving thousands of workers of the processes of law because of the refusal of one such person to file an affidavit either as a matter of principle or because he will not falsely swear; aside from the fact that it can be so palpably and easily evaded; I say aside from these meritorious criticisms, this provision hasn't contributed one bit to good faith collective bargaining, industrial stability, or industrial democracy. On the contrary, it has been the direct nad immediate cause of break-down in collective bargaining and of strikes. For example, major strikes involving the CIO Farm Equipment Workers' Union, the CIO maritime unions, the AFL Brotherhood of Railway Clerks, and the Independent United Mine Workers, have been attributed directly to the failure of the leaders of these organizations to sign the non-Communist affidavits. It is a strange and dangerous state of affairs when private employers are encouraged to precipitate strikes by their Don Quixotic tilting at the chosen representatives of their employes. Yet the west coast maritime employers refused to bargain collectively with the representatives of the maritime unions, not because they denied their majority status, but because non-Communist affidavits had not been filed. So west coast shipping remained at a standstill.

4. Elimination of short-cut procedures.—The removal of short-cut procedures, the elimination of a review section, and the imposition of manifold new duties on the Board, including the requirement to grant priroity in the handling of certain union unfair labor practices, and the union-shop election requirements have resulted in delays in establishing bargaining rights and in affording protection against unfair labor practices of employers.

5. Economic strikers and their right to vote.—The provision of law which deprives economic strikers who are not entitled to reinstatement of the right to vote has seriously impaired the right to strike, in addition to presenting difficult administrative problems and delay to collective bargaining. An interesting side light on this is the recent case involving the Times Square Stores Corp., in which the Board pointed out that under the new law the general counsel has complete authority to determine whether or not a complaint shall issue. Therefore, where the general counsel has refused to issue a complaint on a charge that a strike was caused by unfair labor practices, the Board had no choice but to consider the strike an economic strike and to refuse to count the ballots of those employes who had been permanently replaced.

This latter case illustrates also the danger inherent in the division of authority and duties between the Board and the general counsel.

CONCLUSION

All that I have said represents only a part of labor's indictment of the Taft-Hartley Act.

And aside from the more or less specific counts of the indictment there remains the general, overriding fact, recognized by all who are actively engaged in representing one side or the other in labor-management affairs, that the past year has been marked by a complete change in the psychological setting. Good faith has been replaced by attempts to overreach; cooperation by antagonism, protection of mutual interests by unilateral aggression; and confidence by mistrust. This illustrates the truism that good faith cannot be legislated nor can injunctions or bayonets man the machines of industry.

I believe that we are not the only complaining witness in this matter. I am sure that management joins in some of our complaints. I hope that it will join in all. I know that those who have no particular ax to grind on one side or the other are not in accord with the type of solution offered by the Taft-Hartley Act and its proponents.

To illustrate, the social action department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference in a Labor Day message addressed to workers and employers had this to say about the Taft-Hartley Act:

"The chronicle of its day-to-day enforcement during the past year indicates that the measure was not sufficiently constructive and reinforces our conviction that the Congress ought to dig deeper in its inquiry into the underlying cause of industrial unrest. This time it ought to frame such legislation as will promote cooperation rather than give occasion for needless conflict. * * *

"We repudiate as ill-advised and discriminatory the efforts of those who not content with the disruptive effects of the Taft-Hartley Act are clamoring for further restrictions on the labor movement. We call attention in particular to the baneful influence of certain types of punitive legislation at the State level which are calculated to foster rather than diminish industrial strife, and which are designed whether willfully or not, to cripple the labor movement rather than reform it."

Therefore, in view of the foregoing statements and arguments, the international union, United Automobile Workers of America, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, strongly urges yqou, as a member of the Eighty-first Congress, to vote, support, and actively work for the immediate repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act in its entirety, and the reenactment of the Wagner Act.

STATEMENT BY ARTHUR J. PACKARD ON BEHALF OF AMERICAN HOTEL ASSOCIATION

I am Arthur J. Packard, of Mount Vernon, Ohio, and appear before you on behalf of the American Hotel Association, which includes in its membership approximately 75 percent of all the hotel rooms in the country. The American Hotel Association urges upon this committee the need for an amendment to the Federal law governing relations between labor and management which will confirm in statutory language the exemption of retail and service establishments whose business is primarily local in nature. I use the word "confirm" advisedly because we are asking no more than a confirmation of the practice which prevailed during all of the years that the National Labor Relations (or Wagner) Act was in effect and which has been the practice to date under the Labor-Management Relations (or Taft-Hartley) Act.

During the period of more than 12 years that the National Labor Relations Act was in effect, there were never any court decisions or official interpretations holding that hotels affected interstate commerce and were thus subject to the act. On the contrary, the National Labor Relations Board has consistently refused during that period to take jurisdiction of such hotel employers. Under the Labor-Management Relations Act, the jurisdictional language and apparent coverage of the law remained unchanged and to date there have been no court decisions or decisions of the National Labor Relations Board under that law as to whether or not hotels affect commerce and were thus within the jurisdiction of the Board.

However, disregarding the practice of the previous 12 years, the general counsel for the National Labor Relations Board has stated upon several occasions during the past year before congressional committees and subcommittees that in his opinion not only hotels, but practically all other types of business, large and small and local or otherwise, affected commerce and were thus under the jurisdiction of the Board. Although the National Labor Relations Board has had no case presented to it involving hotels under the Labor-Management Relations Act, the Board has handed down a substantial number of decisions in cases involving local businesses of various types, either service or retail in nature.

From these decisions it is impossible to discover any pattern by which the ordinary businessman could be guided. Many of the decisions have been by a divided vote of the Board, and as each decision is based upon a different set of facts it is almost impossible to establish any general rule from which a guide could be had. This uncertainty was most clearly expressed in the report of the Joint Congressional Committee on Labor-Management Relations filed this year, in which the following language appears:

"In declining to accept jurisdiction, the Board has stated a variety of reasons. In one case, the expression 'essentially local in character' is used; in others, 'too remote or insubstantial effect on commerce,' or 'predominately local nature of operations,' or 'operations inherently local'; and in many, it would not effectuate the policies and purposes of the act."

There are frequently dissents by one or two members, but the identity of the dissenting members changes from case to case. In some cases the number of employees is mentioned, but how much weight is given to that factor cannot be determined. It should be noted that the general counsel believes jurisdiction should be asserted in all of the cases cited.

"A review of the cases justifies the observation that the small-business man cannot know, and it will be some time before he can ascertain whether or not his business is subject to the jurisdiction of the Board. He does not know whether he can legally enter into a compulsory membership contract with a union without first insisting upon a union-shop authorization election. If he takes his case to the Board and jurisdiction is declined, he may or may not know where he stands. If his business is in a State having a State act he may find himself in a 'no man's land' if jurisdiction is declined on the basis 'that it will not effectuate the policies and purposes of the act,' for that, in effect, is a ruling that the National Board has jurisdiction but does not decide to assert it."

The need for a clarification is thus obvious and in amending the statute for the purpose of clarification there can be no better guide than an existing provision of another Federal statute. It has been in effect for over 10 years, has been subject to judicial and administrative interpretation and accomplishes the same purpose here sought, namely a clear division between Federal and State jurisdiction. The obvious pattern of such division should be, of course, to reserve to the States control over operations which are essentially local in nature and to give to the Federal Government control of operations which are interstate in nature and are thus beyond effective control by the States.

This logic of such division was recognized in the reports of the House and Senate labor committees at the time of the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act. Page 5 of Report No. 884, dated July 8, 1937, contains the following language:

"The bill carefully excludes from its scope business in the several States that is of a purely local nature. It applies only to the industrial and business activities of the Nation insofar as they utilize the channels of interstate commerce, or seriously and substantially burden or harass such commerce. It leaves to State and local communities their own responsibilities concerning those local and service and other business trades that do not substantially influence the stream of interstate commerce. For example, the policy in this regard is such that it is not even intended to include in its scope those purely local and business establishments that happen to lie near State lines, and solely on account of such location, actually serve the wholly local community trade within two States."

Page 9 of Report No. 1452, dated August 6, 1937, contains the following language:

"It [the bill] applies only to industries engaged in the production of goods for interstate commerce and directly affecting interstate commerce. It does not affect the purely local intrastate business."

The conference report made no changes in this aspect of the bill and the Fair Labor Standards Act, as enacted by Congress and still in effect, contains a specific exemption of "retail and service establishments, the greater part of whose selling and servicing is in intrastate commerce." We respectfully urge that a similar exemption be incorporated in any legislation recommended by this committee on the subject of labor relations and thus accomplish at one stroke two desirable objectives: (1) to render uniform the provisions of different laws insofar as such laws required a line of demarcation between Federal and State jurisdiction; (2) to confirm by statute an interpretation as to jurisdiction which has been accepted by all parties for a period of over 12 years but in which an element of doubt has recently been introduced by the chief enforcement official.

I will now try to outline briefly the reasons why the American Hotel Association feels that the hotel industry is essentially local in nature and should be regarded as such by the Federal authorities, whether for wage-and-hour purposes or for the purpose of regulating labor relations.

Dealing first with labor relations, we point out that in those States where labor-relations boards have been set up pursuant to State law, hotels have regularly been under the jurisdiction of such State boards and there has been not a single case where such State boards were unable to exercise effective control of labor relations in the hotel involved. It may well be that because of their widespread operations, interstate in character, some industries could not be effectively controlled by State labor-relations boards. However, no such situation exists in the hotel industry.

Where collective-bargaining agreements have been made, they are primarily contracts with individual hotels. In a few cities collective-bargaining agreements have been negotiated by groups of hotels with trades-councils unions but in no case have such negotiations extended outside of the city involved, and even there they do not affect all hotels but merely those which are grouped together for that purpose. Obviously, State labor-relations boards can exercise effective jurisdiction over negotiations which do not extend beyond the limits of a city, or in most cases beyond the limits of the individual hotel.

There have been no instances of widespread strikes or major labor disturbances in the hotel industry. Individual strikes have occurred but because of the fact that collective-bargaining negotiations are ordinarily on an individual basis, the strikes have not spread to large numbers of hotels in the same area or elsewhere, a situation which might well have been if the industry was primarily interstate in nature.

Hotels are service institutions which, regardless of size, are essentially local in nature. Basically the services furnished by hotels consist of food and lodging, and in their very essence these services are rendered entirely within the establishment. Hotels do not form a part of the distribution system which handles goods in commerce; they are not purveyors of merchandise except perhaps to the extent that they furnish meals to their guests.

The essentially local nature of hotels has always been recognized under the Fair Labor Standards Act. Section 13 (a) (2) of that act exempts retail and service establishments the greater part of whose selling and servicing is in intrastate commerce. Hotels have been held by court decision and administrative ruling to be included in this exemption. (See Wage-and-Hour Interpretative Bulletin No. 6.) We believe that at all times it has been the intent of Congress to exempt local businesses from jurisdiction of Federal labor laws, and not to disturb the well-established, harmonious, and universally approved method of handling labor relations in the industry. No demand exists on the part of either labor or management for a change. There has not been an iota of evidence produced before any congressional committee indicating any public demand for a change.

Accordingly, we urge this committee to recommend an amendment to the existing Labor-Management Relations Act or to incorporate in any revision of said act which may be recommended by this committee, a provision identical in language with section 13 (a) (2) of the Fair Labor Standards Act and thus establish for all time a clear-cut demarcation between Federal and State jurisdiction in labor-relations matters following thereby the pattern of demarcation already established in the Federal law governing wages and hours.

STATEMENT BY THOMAS KENNEDY, VICE PRESIDENT, UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA, BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE RELATIVE TO SUBSTITUTE S. 249

The proposals pending before this committee are the repeal of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 and reenactment of the Wagner Act with certain proposed amendments. The present bill represents an amendment in the nature of a substitute for S. 249, a bill originally submitted on January 6, 1949, by Senator Thomas of Utah, chairman of this committee.

During the past 18 months of its scatter-barrel application and interpretation by its general counsel, and his arbitrary and ruthless use of the weapon of injunction, there has developed under the Taft-Hartley Act a campaign of legal terrorism and abuse, all as was originally predicted prior and subsequent to its enactment. It is (and has proven to be) the "first ugly, savage thrust of fascism in America." It has sought to "create an inferior class of citizens, an inferior category, and a debased position politically for the men and women who toil by hand or brain for their daily subsistence to safeguard the future for their loved ones."

This committee has before it in filed statements, reports, exhibits, and in approximately 3,000 pages of oral testimony adduced in the past 10 days, a wealth of information on this law, its workings, and the burning necessity for its repeal.

The legal problems involved in, and the confusion growing from even an attempted interpretation of that statute can perhaps be tersely illustrated (with propriety, for this phase is not now in litigation) by poining to just one section alone, i. e. section 302, dealing with union welfare funds. The coal operator representative on the United Mine Workers Welfare and Retirement Fund (from Senator Taft's home State of Ohio), hiding behind this Taft-Hartley law, arbitrarily and capriciously refused to agree to activation of the 1947 fund, and after 9 long months of delay, finally filed suit in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, seeking to interpret that one section (among the hundreds of other sections contained in the act), and to prevent any distribution of the accumulated funds to the members of the mine workers. He filed one suit, and after an answer had been made, withdrew it. He filed another, and again after answer, withdrew that petition. He filed a third, and while it was pending, filed a fourth. The third action was decided against him, and he then dismissed the fourth—and all of this brought confusion to the industry, which could and should have been otherwise avoided.

Multiple illustrations of this maze and jungle of legal restrictions contained in the bill might well be made. The mine workers need not, however, burden the record with further detailed discussion of the wrongs and injuries, harshly arbitrarily, and by the use of midnight injunctions, wreaked upon it and its members. An appeal is now pending from the outrageous punishments inflicted upon the United Mine Workers and its members through the invocation of this law. We shall try our case, however, in the courts, and not in the halls of Congress.

Much has been said about the right to strike, and multiple suggestions made as to its modification, restriction, or prohibition. We submit that if it can legally be denied for 80 days, or 30 days, or 30 seconds, it is the denial of a basic and moral right of the American laborer inherent in a free people. As has heretofore been said by this union, this country has never suffered irreparable injury by a stoppage of work, for the limit of human endurance in the realm of industrial strife means inherently that "each strike and each lock-out carries with it the seeds of its own determination." Invocation of the injunction by Government, under express or implied powers, is to torpedo the rule of reason and prevent the free play of general collective bargaining as it should and would (absent restrictive and punitive legislation) be practiced by American labor and American industry.

Heat, passion, prejudice, and pressure never serve to bring about mature and constructive legislation. Our history is replete with illustrations of that fallacy. The present situation is one which demands affirmative, blunt, and quick action to remedy the legal wrong perpetrated upon labor by the Taft-Hartley Act, and at the same time fully justifies and requires a calm and dispassionate consideration on the reenactment of the Wagner Act plus such amendments, if any, as a broad study by a committee of labor, management, Congress, and the public, may, after reasonable study, desire and recommend.

This committee could be immediately created, after repeal, and enjoined to make report by a day certain, so as to allow this Congress to thoroughly review, study, and legislate in the interest of and for the benefit of all America. We so urge and recommend. The proposed changes in S. 249 substitute, for the most part should receive careful and calm consideration, and they could and should be incorporated in the field of study proposed. Their merits can then be more fully determined.

The United Mine Workers of America again reiterate their well-known position that the best interests of labor, management, our citizens, and our Republic can be furthered more through the immediate repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and by the application of the rule of reason, through real collective bargaining, voluntary conciliation and mediation, than it can be by any other process—and we rest upon this declaration.

STATEMENT BY W. FLOYD MAXWELL, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, LITHOGRAPHERS NATIONAL ASSOCIATION, INC., RELATIVE TO NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT OF 1949 AND LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT, 1947

Pursuant to permission granted on its application to the chairman, Lithographers National Association, Inc., a trade association of small-business men, files this brief for inclusion in the record of hearings held on the above legislation and respectfully requests the Committee on Education and Labor of the House of Representatives to consider, in connection with any revision of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, and in connection with the enactment of any new labor law, the following statement of its position with reference to the present law and the need for further legislative protection in order to establish equality of bargaining position between small-business men and national and international unions.

A TRADE ASSOCIATION OF SMALL-BUSINESS ENTERPRISES

Lithographers National Association, Inc. is a trade association whose membership is restricted to employers engaged in the operation of lithographic plants. The firms comprising its membership operate plants in the District of Columbia, Hawaii, and 31 States of the Union. This brief is on behalf of lithographers which operate approximately two-thirds of the lithographic production capacity in the United States and which employ approximately 70 percent of the lithographic labor force in this country. This association and its predecessor organizations have been in existence as recognized trade associations since about 1883.

SIZE OF PLANTS

The lithographic industry is an industry of small-business men operating small lithographic units, employing per plant about 10 to 300 lithographic production employees and probably average about 50 to 75 such employees to a plant.

LITHOGRAPHIC PRODUCTS

The production of the member plants of the association include many vitally needed articles of considerable importance to many other businesses and educational organizations. Without attempting to enumerate all the forms of lithographic printing, some of the more important ones are charts and graphs, maps, business forms, catalogs, seed packets, labels, folding boxes, insurance policies, advertisements, posters, greeting cards, checks, bill heads, looseleaf bookkeeping and accounting forms, tariffs for common carriers, construction manuals, installation manuals, school books, letterheads, and envelopes.

THE NEED TO PROTECT THE SMALL-BUSINESS MAN

As an organization of small-business men, we feel that in the enactment of labor laws and in the debate on the present law, the Congress appears to be giving some consideration to the public interest and some consideration to the relative positions of large aggregations of capital engaged in mass production and of large international unions but insufficient consideration to the need to establish equality in bargaining position between small-business enterprises and large international unions.

The lithographic industry is not all comparable to such basic or mass production industries as steel, automotive equipment, coal, rubber, and other industries where the employers are large companies of tremendous resources. We believe that questions of the need for protection of employer's rights should not be gaged by the strength and bargaining position of such large aggregations of capital but that more consideration should be given to the urgent problems and dire needs of the small-business man.

Change in market conditions.—In considering the position of the small-business man, we submit that the Congress must give special attention to the change which has taken effect and is continuing in the economic conditions of this country. Business is now definitely in a market more competitive than for several years and the small business will have its full share of problems in attempting to survive in such a market. Since there are many small-business enterprises, including many in this industry, of such limited assets that they cannot survive if they are faced with prolonged labor disputes, strikes, or constantly increasing costs, we submit that it is the obligation of Congress to see that the law is not in such a state that unnecessary and severe hardships and burdens are imposed upon the small-business enterprises.

RIGHTS OF EMPLOYERS

It is our purpose in this brief to point out first some rights of employers which we believe should be protected in the new law and some cases in which more protection is needed than is given in the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947. We refer particularly to the following rights:

(a) The employer's rights of free speech;
(b) The employer's right to operate free from secondary boycotts;
(c) The employer's right to give employment and to select his employees.

RESPONSIBILITIES OF UNIONS

In connection with the responsibilities which we believe should be established and maintained on unions, we propose to consider in this brief: (a) the obligation to bargain in good faith, and (b) the responsibility for maintenance of contracts entered into and for breaches thereof.

In connection with the rights of employers and the responsibilities of unions, we desire to direct the attention of the committee to some later observations in this brief on the proposals to nullify certain State laws, to remove restrictions on health and welfare funds, to remove protection of the public in national emergencies and to eliminate the so-called non-Communist affidavit.

EMPLOYER'S RIGHTS OF FREE SPEECH

While we feel that the employer's rights of free speech are guaranteed in the Constitution of the United States beyond any limitation thereof by the Congress of the United States or the National Labor Relations Board, nevertheless we desire to point out that, if there is omitted from House bill 2032 the protection of such rights as in the existing law, the matter will again become one of doubt. The omission will be interpreted as the intent of the Congress not to allow the employer the same rights of free speech as appear in the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947. As stated in that act, the tests as to what are proper exercises of the right of free speech are very simple, understandable and provide a means under which the small-business man can determine to what extent he may make representations to his employees.

In this matter, as in many others which are covered by provisions of the Federal labor law, the small-business man is not in a position to litigate close questions of law. The expense is beyond his means. Thus, in many cases a legislative enactment by the Congress which casts doubt upon the rights of the small-business man is an effective way of denying him the exercise of such rights. Certainly, the National Labor Relations Board, if House bill 2032 is passed without any affirmation of the employer's right of free speech, will revert to a more harsh theory in determining to what extent he may exercise such right. We emphasize again the difficulty under which the small-business man operates under Federal labor law today. He is not in the position of a large enterprise engaged in mass production which can maintain thoroughly trained personnel departments, staffed by experts in labor law, who can pass upon every statement made, and, we submit, is entitled to receive from the Congress, a clear and unmistakable statement of his rights and a clear, plain, unequivocal statement of the standards under which he may operate and exercise such rights. Even the cost of defending such rights in a proceeding brought by the National Labor Relations Board is a tremendous burden upon small businessmen, and the law should be so drafted that such cases will be unnecessary except in the rare and unusual instances of flagrant violations of law.

Since we are discussing under this point a right not peculiar to the collective-bargaining process but a right guaranteed to the small-business man under the Constitution of the United States, we submit that the Congress in any revision of the labor law should make it very clear that the Congress does not mean in any way to abridge any of his constitutional rights nor to require him to litigate before the National Labor Relations Board or elsewhere to maintain such rights.

SECONDARY BOYCOTT

The pending House bill 2032 is designed to eliminate the provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, which gave to the employer and to members of the general public some protection against secondary boycotts.

Secondary boycotts in jurisdictional disputes.—We submit that instead of limiting the protection against secondary boycotts to apply only to cases of jurisdictional disputes, which is the general effect of House bill 2032, the provisions in the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, should be strengthened in order that this threat to the economic life of small-business enterprises may be removed.

The provisions of House bill 2032 against secondary boycott in cases involving jurisdictional disputes are inadequate in that the bill supplies no adequate method of enforcing the prohibition which it establishes and provides no reasonable protection to the business enterprise which is injured by such a secondary boycott. While the bill provides that it would be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization to cause or promote a secondary boycott to compel an employer to bargain with a particular labor organization if another labor organization has been certified as representative of the employees, or if the employer was under order of the National Labor Relations Board to bargain with another organization, or if the employer was operating under a collective-bargaining contract and if no quesiton of representation could be appropriately raised, nevertheless, the bill does not provide any prompt remedy against the union which engages in such unfair labor practice. The proposed law provides for a compulsory arbitration of jurisdictional disputes but does not contain any efficient remedy against the union which may ignore the final jurisdictional arbitration award of the National Labor Relations Board or of an arbitrator appointed by the Board to decide such jurisdictional dispute.

The employer, against whom such unfair labor practice is committed even after the arbitration, could only file a charge of an unfair labor practice with the National Labor Relations Board and then wait for 1 or 2 years while the Board issued and processed its complaint to final decision. If the union did not then elect to obey the Board but preferred to challenge the matter by appeal to the circuit court of appeals, the employer would then have to wait until that court finally decided the issue. The plain and unmistakable fact is that the small-business man operating with limited resources just cannot survive through those years of litigation, if the secondary boycott is continuing against him while the issues are being litigated.

Injunction is the only effective remedy against secondary boycotts.—The only effective way of protecting the small-business man from a secondary boycott, even the restricted type of secondary boycott which is declared by House bill 2032 to be an unfair labor practice, is to allow an injunction to be issued to prevent the continuance of such boycott. The union should not be allowed to continue the boycott during the period in which the matter is being presented to arbitration and certainly there can be no doubt that the boycott should be enjoined if continued after the award of the arbitrator.

NLRB injunctions against employers.—We realize in presenting the foregoing argument in favor of injunctions against unfair labor practices by unions that there has been urged upon the Congress the theory that in no case should any officer of the Government be allowed to seek or secure an injunction against a labor union, regardless of the irreparable injuries which such union might be causing by engaging in unfair labor practices.

In this connection, we want to point out, however, that the National Labor Relations Board has as a principal part of its business the power and obligation to issue injunctions against employers, and it performs such obligations by issuing 200 or more of such injunctions every year of its life. Of course, the injunctions issued by the National Labor Relations Board are generally designated as "orders" or as "cease and desist orders" but, in force and effect and except for the name, they are injunctions.

Other secondary boycotts.—There are, however, many other secondary boycotts forbidden under the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, which apparently will be permitted under House bill 2032 in cases where no jurisdictional disputes are involved. Against this type of boycott, the small-business man urgently needs not only the protection given in the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, but additional protection.

Secondary boycott as means to organize.—The secondary boycott is commonly used by unions as a short cut to organization of plants. Rather than engage in the work of persuading the employees of employer "A" to join their organization, it has become a simple matter for the union to impose a secondary boycott on the products of employer "A" thus denying him access to the channels of commerce and forcing employer "B" to discontinue handling the products of employer "A".

Against this type of secondary boycott, the small-business man needs not only the protection granted in the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, but he needs to have the provisions of that act clarified to make such protection clearer and more effective. This is illustrated by the following provisions taken from contracts negotiated in this industry since the enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, from which it will appear that it has become a common practice of the union in this industry to maintain, notwithstanding the law, its alleged right to boycott and to find devices to make effective such secondary boycott.

The following are examples of clauses which employers in this industry have been forced to accept in collective-bargaining contracts, even since the enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947:

"The company agrees that the union and its members have the absolute right to refuse to execute work received from, or destined for, any lithographic employer with whom the Amalgamated has a strike or a lock-out, and the company agrees not to request its employees to handle such work."

"The employers further agree they will not request their employees to execute work received from or destined for any lithographic employer with whom the Amalgamated has a dispute."

Coupled with these clauses or similar clauses to the same effect, there is usually a provision which gives the union the right to terminate the contract forthwith on breach of this provision by the employer. Of course, there is frequently included in the contract also a statement to the effect that the clause shall have effect only to the extent permitted by law which leaves the small employer the prospect of litigating the clause if the effect of the clause under the law is later challenged.

We further submit that the use of secondary boycott as an aid in organizing plants is certainly an undemocratic method of organization. Regardless of the wishes of his employees, if an employer is barred from the channels of commerce by a secondary boycott, then he is compelled to coerce his employees into joining the union which is engaging in the secondary boycott or the union on whose behalf some second union is engaging in a sympathetic secondary boycott.

We submit that instead of removing the present restrictions against secondary boycott, the provisions in the existing law should be strengthened to cover the situation illustrated by the foregoing contract provisions and that it should be made unmistakably clear that such clauses are not permitted under the law.

Sympathetic secondary boycotts.—We desire, however, to point out that even in the cited clauses, the union has reserved the right, in effect, to invoke a secondary boycott only in the cases of a dispute between the union and another employer in the lithographic industry. If the provisions of the present law were eliminated as now proposed in House bill 2032, the unions could go even beyond the right they attempt to reserve in the foregoing clause. They could then engage in sympathetic secondary boycotts under the provisions of House bill 2032.

If the type of products produced by this industry are kept in mind, such as labels, for example, the members of the committee can readily see the extent to which pressure could be placed on employers in the lithographic industry to refuse to produce goods for other enterprises with which some union had some kind of a dispute. In such cases, we submit that the secondary boycott is not any necessary adjunct to collective bargaining, but is, in effect, a form of economic warfare designed to injure innocent third parties and should therefore be completely prohibited.

As small-business men, the members of this industry should be required to bargain with the representatives of their employees only on matters relating to wages, hours, and working conditions under which the employer's shop operates. They should not be compelled to let the union determine whose goods may come into their plants nor to whom their products may be sold and delivered. When an employer is denied the opportunity to ship his goods in commerce and to have them further processed or handled for him by other employers, there is invoked against him a sentence of economic death. That is the effect of the secondary boycott. By closing the channels of commerce, the secondary boycott gives the union the arbitrary right to force employers out of business or to require them to accede to unsound, uneconomic demands, and to deal with only those suppliers and customers who are approved by the union. This becomes a "White List" which is as objectionable as a "blacklist."

We therefore respectfully submit that instead of eliminating the provisions of the present law governing secondary boycott, such provisions should be strengthened by the Congress.

EMPLOYER'S RIGHT TO SELECT HIS EMPLOYEES; THE CLOSED SHOP AND THE CLOSED UNION

The third right of the employer which we desire to emphasize and which we urge be maintained in the law is the employer's right to select his employees. Under existing law, the closed shop is definitely forbidden, but union security is provided by authorizing a union shop. Under House bill 2032, the closed shop is not only restored but all State laws which have the effect of prohibiting discrimination in employment in favor of union members or have the effect of prohibiting any requirement that employees as a condition of employment first join a union are nullified.

We submit that no problems of union security require the closed shop, and that this is particularly true when there is a closed union or when membership in the union and the right to work at a certain craft are limited and restricted by severe apprenticeship requirements and limitations.

The closed shop establishes labor monopolies.—We appreciate that the argument is generally made that the antitrust laws should not apply to labor unions because the service of an individual is not a commodity. This argument overlooks the fact, however, that under the closed shop system, the labor union is a monopoly. Whether the labor monopoly is to be regulated under the existing antitrust laws or under other laws, it must be recognized that every monopoly must be subject to regulation in the public interest.

To the individual employee, as well as the small employer, the matter of the closed shop is of tremendous importance. The right to work is the right to live. When any organization is given the right to determine when, where, or how a man can work, if at all, that organization is given very drastic control over the individual, inconsistent with our democratic form of government.

In skilled crafts such as those employed in lithographic production, there is necessarily a training period of some appreciable length. In many jobs the employer is automatically restricted in selecting employees by the skills required for the job. The union, by its constitution and by its contracts in this industry, has established a low ratio of apprentices to journeymen. By maintaining such restrictions on number of apprentices and by being permitted to use its economic strength to force the closed shop on this industry, the union would maintain a definite control of production. A closed shop and the limitation of apprentices would control the expansion of the industry and may limit it so that many persons who otherwise could be employed in this industry will be denied such opportunity of employment. By thus inducing an unnecessary scarcity of labor and of particular skills, the union can promote a kind of economic waste for which the public must pay in higher prices and less production.

The actions of almost a score of the States of the Union in forbidding the imposition of any requirement that employees must be members of the union before employment is just another example of the American feeling against monopolies, even labor monopolies. The need to protect employees' rights to organize and bargain collectively does not require the closed shop nor the establishment of labor monopolies. The Members of the committee and of the Congress must recognize that history has shown us that monopolies, whether of labor or industry, tend to exercise against the public the full force of power which monopoly gives them. For this reason it is the established policy of this country that monopolies are to be avoided and prohibited and that, in the cases such as public utilities where monopoly is deemed to be inevitable, then they are to be regulated to avoid and prevent the abuse of monopolistic power and to protect the public.

Many members of this association operate their plants in States in which the State legislature has, by formal enactment, forbidden the closed shop. We submit that the Congress of the United States should not lightly or casually overrule the considered judgment of these State legislatures and that therefore the provisions of House bill 2032 which is designed to nullify a large number of State laws should not be enacted by the Congress of the United States. Only the most overwhelming national necessity would appear to justify the Congress of the United States in thus overriding the actions of these State legislatures. No such overwhelming necessity exists in this case. In fact, it is neither necessary nor desirable to promote monopolies of labor.

THE MUTUAL OBLIGATION TO BARGAIN COLLECTIVELY

Under the existing law, the duty to bargain is a mutual, reciprocal obligation of the employer and of the union. In our opinion, the proposed change in House bill 2032 by which the unions are relieved of all obligations to bargain with the employer is not well founded. This inequality is so apparent and so obviously unjustified that prolonged argument should not be necessary to establish that the present law should be maintained on this point.

The international unions, as well as their various local units, should be under obligation to bargain collectively with the employer and as a condition of bargaining should be required to accept full responsibility for the contract if it maintains the right to veto agreements acceptable to local unions. At the present time, the international unions, by policies expressed in their constitutions, or adopted at national conventions and by policies imposed on national officers, determine the terms and conditions of the contracts and compel the local unions to agree with the employer on these terms and no others. This control of collective bargaining by the international union is usually made apparent on the face of the contract by clauses such as the following:

"This agreement is subject to the approval of the international president. Such approval does not, however, under any circumstances, make the internationalresponsible for the observance of this contract, or any breach thereof."

The bargaining relations in the lithographic industry are in general between employers and the Amalgamated Lithographers of America, an affiliate of the Congress of Industrial Organizations. This union, formerly an affiliate of the American Federation of Labor, is a mature union of many years experience in collective bargaining. It claims a membership of approximately 20,000 lithographic employees.

Techniques of collective bargaining in the lithographic industry.—The collective bargaining in the lithographic industry is not on a national or industry-wide basis but is by individual employers with the local unions or by small groups of lithographic employers in metropolitan areas. In general, the international union prescribes the terms under which the local union may contract with the individual employer or the area group of employers. The international union thus has a complete control over the collective bargaining but is under no obligation to assume any responsibility. In many instances, individual employers or groups of employers have, through negotiations, come to complete agreement with the local union with which they are dealing but have been unable to complete the contract because of the refusal of the international union to sanction the bargain made by the local union.

We, therefore, submit that instead of relieving unions of the obligation to bargain collectively as is proposed in House bill 2032, there should be added to the existing law a requirement that the international union, if it controls collective bargaining in its industry, must become a party to the contract and accept responsibility therefor. In the alternate, the international union should not be permitted to prevent a local union from executing a contract, the terms of which have been accepted by the local union in collective bargaining with the employer.

The present inequality in bargaining strength between the international union and the small business enterprises which compose the lithographic industry is illustrated by other techniques used by the international union in addition to the above-mentioned technique of prescribing the terms of the contract and vetoing agreements accepted by local unions. By reserving to itself the right to veto any such agreement, the international union can force any dispute between it and the employer (even though there may be no dispute between the employer and the local union) to a strike and immediately thereafter the international union could, if House bill 2032 is adopted, employ the secondary boycott. By applying the secondary boycott to a customer of the employer whose plant is on strike, the international union can prevent that customer from receiving and using the products of the employer even though such products were completed before the strike was called.

In a similar manner, the secondary boycott could be employed, if authorized as now proposed under House bill 2032, to prevent employers who are engaged in making lithographic plates or supplying other raw materials or finished or semifinished products to the employer whose plant is on strike from continuing to supply for such employer. The small-business man subjected to this kind of economic force could not survive against it.

The international union, in the course of forcing a group contract on an area and refusing to accept any other terms, can carefully select small individual units which are to be called out on strike, permitting the competing units to continue to operate. This method has been employed in this industry. By this method of selection of the individual plants against whom a strike may be called, the international union has in its hands a weapon and a bargaining strength far superior to the strength of any small lithographic enterprise. The small lithographic enterprise of limited assets and resources could not survive a long strike of this sort, and could not resist successfully such secondary boycott.

The law should establish an equality of position which would permit the small-business men, who are now under restrictions which prevent them from presenting a united front, to engage in a common lock-out or other common defense in order to meet these tactics of the international union.

In the economic conditions which are present today and which are anticipated to continue in the near future, this inequality in bargaining position, unless corrected promptly by remedial legislation, could easily result in the complete domination of the industry by the international union and in the elimination of any small enterprises which the international union desires to put out of business.

Therefore, we submit that there is needed a strengthening of the present Federal labor law so as to permit employers, particularly those engaged in group or area bargaining, to unite and to use all necessary economic force and strength to bring themselves to a position of equality in bargaining with the international union.

UNION RESPONSIBILITY

As indicated in the foregoing discussion of the obligation to bargain, unions should not only be required to bargain collectively but also to accept responsibility to adhere to the bargain thus negotiated.

We know of no other field in human relations in which one party is entitled to insist that the other party assume contractual obligations without assuming some obligations under the contract also. It is of the very essence of a bargain that both parties who agree to the bargain be bound by it.

Obviously, neither party is effectively bound unless there is some adequate method of enforcing his obligation to abide by the conditions of the contract. In all other fields of contracts, when a situation arises in which one party refuses to abide by his obligation, the other party has recourse to the courts.

In all other contracts, any corporations or organizations which act through agents or employees are bound to see that such agents or such employees live up to the duties and obligations assumed by the corporation or the other organization under its contract. There is no reason why the unions, including the international unions, should not accept the obligation to see that their agents and employees do not engage in breaching or nullifying the contracts entered into with employers in collective bargaining. The provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, which imposed certain responsibilities on unions for their own acts, and for the acts of their agents and employees, should be maintained in the law. The provisions of the existing law which permit recourse to the courts, especially the Federal courts, for suits by and against unions should be maintained and preserved in the law. The international union which dominates the bargaining should be compelled to become a party thereto and accept full responsibility therefor.

We appreciate that it is frequently urged against the foregoing argument that unless there is preserved the right to quit work, then employment becomes involuntary servitude. We submit that this theory was never well founded and was certainly well destroyed years ago, particularly in a decision by Mr. Justice Brandeis in the case of Dorchy v. Kansas (272 U. S. 306), in which he said: "Neither the common law, nor the fourteenth amendment, confers the absolute right to strike."

The right to strike is, of course, a right which may be waived by the parties in a collective-bargaining contract, and when so waived the parties should be compelled to adhere to their contract.

This responsibility for actions in violation of a contract or in violation of law should apply to actions which promote illegal secondary boycotts, and the same right of recourse to the courts should apply in such cases. Particularly, there should be the right to hold the organization responsible for the acts of its agents and its employees since it is only through agents and employees that an organization such as a labor union or a corporation may act. As noted above, the right to injunction against acts which cause irreparable injury should be maintained in this field as in all others.

In general, the unions should be required to accept the same degree of obligations under a contract as the employer and to the same degree should be subject to the same means of enforcing the contract or securing relief for breach thereof.

NULLIFICATION OF STATE LAWS

House bill 2032 proposes to nullify certain State laws which forbid the closed shop or the imposition by contract of a requirement that before employment a prospective employee must be a member of the union. As we have dealt with this subject under the heading of the closed shop and the employer's right to select his employees, no extended argument will here be made.

We do, however, believe it is desirable to point out that the whole development of the law in this country has until recent years been to allow the local community, and the sovereign State, to work out their problems individually as each might determine. We believe that this method should still be followed. Except in cases of utmost necessity, such as in cases where it is necessary to override State laws in order to promote free flow of commerce between the States, the Congress should not overturn or nullify the laws of the States. In enacting into law the provisions of House bill 2032, the Congress would be overriding State laws which relate directly to the rights of individual citizens of such States to secure employment and would be authorizing procedures under which those citizens may be debarred from employment in their own States contrary to the provisions of State laws. Since this is no isolated example of one single bit of legislation in one State, but is a matter on which almost a score of State legislatures have adopted laws favoring the citizen and his right to work, we submit that the Congress should permit those laws to remain in full force and effect.

THE SO-CALLED NONCOMMUNIST AFFIDAVIT

We believe that the provision in existing law which requires union officers to file the so-called non-Communist affidavit has thoroughly established its usefulness and should be maintained in the law.

In support thereof we suggest to the committee that the employer who is engaged in collective bargaining has the right to know whether or not the leadership of the union which is bargaining with him is bargaining in good faith on demands made for the benefit of employees or is bargaining on demands made in the execution of a program designed to overthrow our constitutional form of government and impose a totalitarian state upon us.

The individual worker is entitled to know whether the leaders representing him are Communists or otherwise in favor of overthrowing the Government of the United States by force or violence. The attitude of the individual worker on this is well demonstrated by the history of decertification elections. In 35 decertification elections held in the period from January 1 to May 15, 1948, the nonfiling unions lost 30, or 86 percent of the elections.

The general public has the right to know who are public enemies.

We submit that this provision has already resulted in much good to the public in general and particularly to members of labor organizations in that it has aided in eliminating from many unions leaders who were unrevealed Communists or otherwise in favor of overthrowing the Government of the United States by force and violence.

We see no objection to requiring the employer who seeks to invoke the processes of the National Labor Relations Board to file a similar affidavit. In fact, we believe that anyone who turns for help to the Government of the United States and any of its agencies, whether the National Labor Relations Board, the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, or the courts may well be required, as a condition of the assistance which he seeks, to advise the Government that he does not advocate and is not engaged in any effort to overthrow the Government by force and violence.

HEALTH AND WELFARE FUNDS

We object to the provisions of House bill 2032 designed to repeal the provisions of existing law with reference to payments by employers to health, welfare, and similar funds.

We believe that the problems involved in the establishment of health, welfare, insurance, or pension programs are so complex that they should not become a part of collective bargaining. These matters involve important actuarial problems: compliance with State insurance laws; compliance with tax laws, State and Federal; investment of trust funds under applicable statutes; and are frequently complicated by multiple unions and multiple plants of a single employer, sometimes in more than one State.

If, however, these matters are to remain in the field of collective bargaining, then we submit that the provisions of the existing law should be strengthened rather than repealed. In our opinion, there should be a requirement that every such program be actuarially sound and that before any contributions are deducted from the pay of employees by the employer or payments made by the employer himself, the specific benefits to be paid from the fund should be unmistakably set forth. If the employer is to participate in such a fund, the requirement of the law should be for joint administration in every detail thereof and for impartial arbitration in the event of the failure of the parties to agree upon the benefits to be paid, the methods of handling claims, the insurance companies to be selected, the investment of the funds, or any one of the innumerable important details involved in such a program.

NATIONAL EMERGENCIES

While no strike or series of strikes in the lithographic industry are likely to be considered as national emergencies which endanger the public health and safety, nevertheless the members of this industry, as members of the general public, are interested in the statutory provisions dealing with national emergencies. We earnestly recommend to the committee that no change be made to weaken the provisions of the existing law which protect the public from the dangers involved in national strikes which may injure the public health or safety.

We urge that the rights to injunction so frequently invoked within the past 18 months by the President of the United States be maintained and be clearly stated in the statute.

We recognize that the argument has been made that the President has inherent rights to secure such injunctions and to take measures to protect national health and safety from threatened danger. We suggest, however, that such rights were not recognized until after the enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, and we believe that the repeal of those provisions will remove such rights. In other words, we submit that the President does not have such inherent powers. The power, and the duty, to protect the public welfare rest on the Congress under the provisions of section 8 of article I of the Constitution of the United States.

We believe the Congress is embarking on a dangerous course if it accepts the theory of such inherent powers in the Chief Executive. We respectfully remind the committee that, as stated in the tenth amendment to the Constitution, the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. Acceptance of the doctrine of inherent powers, or of the power to take such action as a crisis or emergency may appear to require, would destroy the constitutional reservation of the rights in the people.

RIGHTS OF INDIVIDUAL EMPLOYEES

Finally we urge that there be maintained, as now provided in the existing law, the right of the individual employee to refrain from joining a union or engaging in union activity. The individual employee has more need for protection against coercion and intimidation than has the organization of employees. The employee should be permitted to decide for himself whether he will join or not joint any union and whether he will work or strike. We should be protected against mass picketing and violence designed to keep him from exercising his right to work.

CONCLUSION

We therefore respectfully urge on the committee that the existing law be maintained except for such amendments as may be needed to establish more clearly the prohibition against secondary boycotts, the responsibility of unions, particularly international unions, and proper control over the trust funds collected for health, welfare, insurance, or pension programs.

SUMMARY OF STATEMENT BY WALTER J. MUNRO, COMMISSIONER OF CONCILIATION, UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE, ON FEBRUARY 16, 1949, RELATIVE TO S. 249

Appearing before the committee as a former member of the Conciliation Service, Mr. Munro was invited to make some observations on title II of the Thomas bill, S. 249.

Title II establishes the United States Conciliation Service within the Department of Labor and provides for the appointment of a Director of the Service, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, who will work with and under the direction of the Secretary of Labor. It provides the procedure to be followed by the Conciliation Service, and it establishes as the policy of the United States the inclusion of a provision for voluntary arbitration in labor-relations contracts.

Mr. Munro stated that he had been appointed as Commissioner of Conciliation in the Department of Labor in September 1942 and resigned from that position March 1, 1947. He said in those 4½ years, covering the war period, he worked under the Director of the Conciliation Service and under the direction of the Secretary of Labor. He said he was stationed at Minneapolis, Kansas City, and Chicago, and from time to time worked throughout the territory, including Des Moines, Milwaukee, Cleveland, Ohio, and at times Detroit.

He said that since 1947 he had been associated with the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, and particularly with A. F. Whitney, its president, on matters pertaining to public relations. He made it clear that in appearing before the committee he did not speak for the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen nor for President Whitney, but solely as a former Commissioner of Conciliation in the United States Department of Labor.

He said that title II of the Thomas bill, entitled "Mediation and Arbitration," which establishes the Conciliation Service within the Department of Labor, is the broad, straight highway that leads to industrial peace. He said that the experience of the Service from 1913 down through the war years, to and including 1947, did no tjustify the abrupt transfer of the Division of Conciliation from the Department of Labor, as was done in 1947 by the Eightieth Congress when it enacted the Taft-Hartley Act.

He said that he thought that this action on the part of the Eightieth Congress was hasty, probably a mistake, and as far as he could find out was certainly on the basis of information or assertions or testimony that was very shallow or very slim when measured against the performance of the Service, particularly during the war years. He said that he thought that perhaps the Eighty-first Congress might well review the evidence and reconsider the subject in justice to all conciliators and the fine work which they had done through the years.

He was asked by Senator Donnell if he had read or heard the testimony given by Mr. Ching (present Director of the Mediation Service under the Taft-Hartley Act). He said that he had. Senator Donnell then asked him: "Would you be kind enough to give us your view?"

Mr. Munro said that respect for the Conciliator or for the Conciliation Service is something that does not originate with management or with labor, that it originated within the mind and within the attitude and the make-up of the Conciliator and is conveyed to the parties with whom he comes on contact in helping them, as a friendly third party, to effect a settlement.

Mr. Munro said that the organic act of the Department of Labor imposed upon the Secretary of Labor the obligation to pursue those things which would result to the welfare of labor. He said that in his conception the way to do that was to do it in such a just way, such a fair way, and in such a right way that it would not injure at any time any manufacturer. He said that he thought he could, as Secretary of Labor, be faithful to the power imposed by the Government under the organic act in the Secretary of Labor, and do it in a way that you would almost think he was working in the interest of the manufacturer. He said he thought he could do exactly what the Congress intended the Secretary of Labor to do and do it in the interest not only of labor, but to the benefit of labor, business, the farmer, and all society.

He said also that the organic act specifically empowered the Secretary of Labor to act as a mediator or a conciliator, and that the Secretary of Labor had done so impartially and effectively from 1913 through 1947.

He challenged the statement that Mr. Ching made in his testimony that: "The experience of the present Service has been that dozens of the most able mediators who found the doors of many employers closed to them for years under the

He said that in 4½ years as Commissioner of Conciliation he had never encountered a closed door, and that in all of his experience he had never heard of a closed door to the Conciliation Service, with the single exception of the J. I. Case Co. of Racine, Wis. He suggested that this statement by Mr. Ching be investigated and an opportunity provided for Mr. Ching to sustain it with facts. He said that the Conciliation Service within the Department of Labor would provide the cooperation of the Secretary of Labor and the Under Secretary of Labor and the Assistant Secretaries of Labor, and that this cooperation could well prove highly effective.

He said he thought that the transfer of the Conciliation Service from the Department of Labor in 1947 was a terrible reflection on the 250 conciliators who had done such a magnificent job; that it was a reflection on Dr. John R. Steelman, who at one time was a Commissioner of Conciliation, for many years the Director of that Service, and at present the assistant to the President of the United States. He said he thought it was a tremendous reflection on the marvelous Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins. He said that he thought Congress did not intend this reflection, but the transfer did carry that reflection and that it had disturbed the morale of the Service.

Asked by Senator Pepper if he thought there would be more and better industrial peace under the Thomas bill than under the Taft-Hartley Act, he said that that was true without any question.

He spoke of the fine cooperation which had existed between the Conciliation Service within the Department of Labor and with the State conciliation service in Minnesota and he complimented Senator Humphrey, who, as mayor of Minneapolis, had cooperated with the Conciliation Service in preserving and developing industrial peace in that area during the war years. He also complimented Senator Thye, who was at that time Governor of Minnesota, who likewise cooperated splendidly with the Conciliation Service.

In conclusion he said that an investigation would show that the Conciliation Service deserved to remain in the Department of Labor; that in his opinion it should have a larger appropriation and provided with more people because it was the avenue that runs directly to industrial peace and not the one that runs to the divorce court with a lot of trouble. He was referring to the National Labor Relations Board and the many opportunities provided in the Taft-Hartley Act leading to the National Labor Relations Board.

Mr. Munro's testimony before the committee was consistent with the plank in the Democratic platform which urged the strengthening of the Department of Labor and the return of the Conciliation Service to that Department. It was consistent with the position taken by the President of the United States prior to, during, and since the campaign, and endorsed the position taken by Secretary Tobin in the administration bill S. 249, now before the committee for consideration.

His testimony was in violent opposition to the position taken by Mr. Ching, present Director of the Federal Mediation Service, as established under the Taft-Hartley Act.

AMERICAN HOSPITAL ASSOCIATION,
Washington 6, D. C., March 15, 1949.

HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY,
Chairman, Labor Subcommittee, Committee on Education and Labor,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN. The American Hospital Association respectfully urges that the present exemption of nonprofit hospitals from the National Labor Relations Act be retained. The present act (sec. 2 (2)) contains the following provision:

"The term 'employer' includes any person acting as an agent of an employer, directly or indirectly, but shall not include the United States or any wholly owned Government corporation, or any Federal Reserve bank, or any State or political subdivision thereof, or any corporation or association operating a hospital, if no part of the net earnings inures to the benefit of any private shareholders or individual, or any person subject to the Railway Labor Act, as amended from time to time, or any labor organization (other than when acting as an employer), or anyone acting in the capacity of officer or agent of such labor organization."

It is our sincere belief that collective bargaining cannot apply in its usual sense to hospitals. A hospital is not a commercial enterprise; it is a public-service institution. There are no profits to bargain with; collective bargaining rules for industry as applied to hospitals can only be at the expense of the patient, and hospital costs have already increased substantially because of inflationary costs of materials and salaries.

The majority of the hospital beds in the United States are owned and operated by units of government and, as such, along with other agencies of government, are exempt from the National Labor Relations Act. However, the voluntary nonprofit hospitals perform in their community a similar function. This function is so important that it cannot be interrupted without jeopardy to the lives of sick people. Where a strike may be injurious to a commercial enterprise, it could be disastrous in a hospital.

The American Hospital Association includes in its membership more than 4,000 hospitals of all kinds—long-term hospitals, such as those for mental cases, tuberculosis and chronic disease, and short-term hospitals for general medical and surgical care. These hospitals may be owned by governmental units, such as city, county, State, and Federal, or by voluntary agencies, such as churches, religious orders, nonprofit corporations and associations, and a comparatively small number of proprietary hospitals which operate on a commercial basis. In our membership we include nearly 90 percent of all of the general hospital beds of the Nation. Our primary aim is the improvement and safeguarding of the quality of hospital care so that it may be made adequately available to all citizens.

Of the 1,425,000 hospital beds in the United States, approximately 832,000 are in long-term hospitals, nearly all of them operated by units of government. The remaining 592,000 hospital beds are for general medical and surgical cases, the type of care required by the average citizen when he needs to go to his community hospital. Of these approximately 592,000 general beds, about 258,000 are operated by units of government—city, county, or State, and some Federal. Some 36,500 beds are in proprietary hospitals which frankly operate on a commercial basis. The remaining 334,500 beds are in hospitals owned and operated by churches, religious orders, nonprofit associations, and corporations. Approximately 51 percent of the general hospital beds of the Nation are in nonprofit hospitals.[1]

However, these nonprofit hospitals take care of 76 percent of the people who require hospital care. In 1947 total admissions to governmental hospitals were 3,587,000. But, in the same period, 11,578,000 persons were admitted to nonprofit hospitals.

Thus the burden of general hospital care in this Nation is carried by nonprofit hospitals. This group includes many of the teaching hospitals in which doctors, nurses, and other health personnel are trained. It includes many large institutions in urban areas. It also includes innumerable small hospitals in small communities which depend on the hospital as a community service in time of need.

It is unnecessary to point out the danger of interruption of hospital service. Many hospitals have duplicate power plants which could instantly supply electricity within the institution if the outside source of power should fail. Interruption of hospital service would immediately place the lives of sick persons in jeopardy; as we have said, it could be disastrous.

Yet there have been a very few occasions when hospital service has been interrupted in a community because of the attempts of overaggressive labor organizers to call strikes in order to gain recognition of their union. In such cases, some

[1] The 1947 census of hospitals of the American Medical Association shows the following classification of beds:

Classification	Government	Voluntary
Long term:
Mental	662,452	18,461
Tuberculosis	70,041	11,287
Special	19,323	28,689
Institutions	20,505	2,011
Total long term	772,321	60,448
Short term: General	257,884	334,569
Admissions to general hospitals	3,580,422	11,084,773

employees have been called out on strike in order to force other employees to join a union. The community has reacted in these instances by rallying immediately to the support of the hospital. Volunteer workers have joined with employees who refused to go out on strike, and in every case, hospital services have been maintained and the strikes have been unsuccessful.

We believe that such labor activities have been due to a misunderstanding of the basic principles involved in the collective-bargaining processes and in a failure to understand that the position of nonprofit hospitals is different from that of commercial industry.

The fact is that the unique character of the nonprofit hospital makes collective bargaining impossible, in the usual sense of the term as applied in industrial enterprises. The management of nonprofit hospitals is usually in the hands of trustees who are prominent citizens of the community which the hospital serves. It is the responsibility of these trustees to conduct the hospital in such a manner that it provides the utmost of service to the community in the most efficient manner possible. Protection of the patient is, of course, the cardinal principle of hospital service. Thus, funds which come to the trustees of the hospital, either from patient income, charitable contributions, gifts, or endowments, must be divided equitably so as to provide adequate service to the community at reasonable cost to the patient and without injustice to the employee.

Thus collective bargaining in a hospital pits the employee against the patient; demands of employees are inevitably met at the expense of sick people. But while employees can be represented in collective bargaining, the sick people cannot be, except as the trustees represent them and the community as a whole. This is one of the difficulties of collective bargaining as applied to any public service.

In the normal collective-bargaining situation, labor and management sit down to bargain over the distribution of the profits from the commercial enterprise. But the hospital is not a commercial enterprise and there are no profits to bargain for. If labor's demands increase, they do so by adding to the cost of hospital care.

As a matter of fact, the constant increase of costs of hospital care reflects a continuing increase in the cost of wages and salaries. A recent survey of a representative county in Indiana showed that in the past 10 years the total amount paid for hospital wages and salaries had increased three times. Ten years ago wages approximated 50 percent of the total cost of hospital care; they now constitute 60 percent. This is an indication that hospital salaries have increased in keeping with living standards and costs, and that nonprofit hospitals, on the whole, have been fair and equitable in their distribution of the hospital dollar between wages to employees and services to sick people.

We fully recognize that exemption from the National Labor Relations Act imposes a responsibility upon hospital trustees and administrators to be fair in their dealings with employees. We believe that the record of hospitals shows that this responsibility has been fairly met and any other attitude would be contrary to all tenets of those who assume responsibility for providing hospital service to the community. We are proud to say that there has been a minimum of labor difficulty in the hospital field. The American Hospital Association is active in promoting the best personnel practices. Working conditions in hospitals are probably more favorable than in many commercial industries. There is no seasonal unemployment; hospital employment is stable and permanent, providing a maximum of security. And the humanitarian motivation of hospital service tends to provide satisfactions which are not possible in commercial enterprise.

The unique position of hospitals has been recognized in many of the State labor laws which have exempted nonprofit hospitals from their provisions. There have been occasional legal decisions and informal rulings holding that hospitals are not engaged in trade and commerce to the extent necessary to bring them within the jurisdiction of labor laws. Community resentment at labor activities in hospitals has been frequently demonstrated. We believe that the essential character of the nonprofit hospital has been generally recognized and accepted.

However, we believe that it is better to have the law clarified in a situation where such clarification is easily possible. Under the old Wagner Labor Relations Act the impropriety of collective bargaining was pretty well recognized, but the uncertainty of the situation in the minds of overeager labor organizers occasionally created difficulties for hospitals which threatened deterioration in service and jeopardy to the community. The existing law clarified the situation so that there can be no such doubt. We respectfully urge that in any revision of the National Labor Relations Act there should be no return to the confusion which existed under the provisions of the previous law and which might be seriously increased if Congress failed to show clearly that it approves of the services which nonprofit hospitals render to the people of the Nation.

Respectfully submitted.

Hon. JOHN LESINSKI,
Chairman, Committee on Education and Labor,
House of Representatives, Washington 25, D. C.

DEAR MR. LESINSKI: In response to the recent invitation of Senator James E. Murray, chairman, Committee on Expediting Hearings, to this company to submit a written statement for consideration by the United States Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare of our views on Senate bill 249, and the subjects currently being covered by the public hearings of the committee thereon, we respectfully offer you the following:

In our own experience we have encountered abuses of good labor-management relations which we believe any constructive legislation on that subject should attempt to correct. We list them and comment briefly on each herewith:

1. Misrepresentation of fact as to the effect of a forthcoming election.—In the local area it is a common occurrence for a union in advance of an election to determine a collective bargaining representative to issue statements to the effect that "if you are against the union, it is not necessary for you to cast a ballot." This is a misrepresentation of fact by which a union seeks to secure a majority of the votes cast and thus determine the election contrary to true majority sentiment. It is a false representation of the rule of law governing all elections by secret ballot under the democratic process that the votes of those eligible to vote but not voting are presumed to be cast in agreement with the majority of those actually cast. It is not enough that legislation leave the employer free by counterstatement to combat such misrepresentation. Where there is proof of such fraudulent inducement to remain away from the polls, the result of any election procured by such means should be invalidated.

2. Demands in collective bargaining that the employer agree categorically not to resort to any remedies provided by laws, State or Federal, regulatory of union practices.—By demands of this kind, enforced by threat of strike, Ford Motor Co. and RCA-Victor have been forced to write the provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 out of their labor relations. This result, it is submitted, is directly in the face of public policy. This company resisted such a demand in 1948 only by its willingness to suffer strike rather than put the law of the land on the shelf. Duly elected legislators are as much the representatives of organized labor as any agents sent to a collective-bargaining table. Indeed, they are more so, being constituted representatives, and the Constitution, as the basic law of the land, being the underlying foundation of all contractual dealing. In a conflict of requirements of these two sets of representatives, there can be no question which is overriding. Such demands by labor unions should be declared unfair labor practices, and forbidden.

3. Inclusion of plant guards in a bargaining unit of production and maintenance workers.—Experience has uniformly demonstrated the impossibility of the maintenance of plant safety and discipline through men themselves subject to union disciplinary measures. This essential function of industrial operations should not be crippled by a conflict of loyalties. The 1947 act forbade the National Labor Relations Board to certify a unit combining rank-and-file employees with plant guards, but in units functioning under old certifications, or without certification by NLRB, unions have proven adamant to requests that it be agreed plant guards be excluded from the unit.

4. Retention of bargaining rights by unions not qualifying before NLRB.—The employer is now faced with an insoluble dilemma if confronted with a union which has not and will not qualify with NLRB. If he bona fide believes it represents a majority of his work force and negotiates a contract, even if he has taken the precaution of certification by an impartial tribunal, though one lacking legal jurisdiction, as a State labor relations board, he may then, in midterm (see Kaiser-Frazer Parts Corp., 80 NLRB 158, case No. 20–RC–233) find a rival certified to him by NLRB, and be under a double obligation, his legally enforceable contract with one, his legal duty to bargain with another.

5. Demands for check-off of union dues by unions not entitled to union security provisions.—The Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 forbade union-security provisions in contracts except after determination of employee sentiment by NLRB measures. Nonqualifying unions were unable to resort to those measures, to justify union-security demands. However, with parties free to agree on check-off of union dues, amicably, and to make the check-off renewable automatically from year to year, maintenance of membership by unions was a foregone conclusion. Few men, the cost of whose union membership was deducted from wages by check-off anyhow, would bother to terminate membership. Thus the act's silence on one point effectively defeated its own declared policy in another section, and unions not qualifying before NLRB are as strong in membership as ever, through check-off. The very freedom of employee sentiment which the act purported to protect has thus been sacrificed.

We would very much appreciate the committee's consideration of these points.

Respectfully yours,

ILLINOIS ASSOCIATION OF MERCHANDISE WAREHOUSEMEN,
Chicago 5, Ill., March 16, 1949.

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: We are opposed to the proposed labor-relations bill; we urge that it be defeated and that the present Taft-Hartley law remain in effect as passed by the last Congress.

The Taft-Hartley law should not be changed. It has resulted in a diminution of strikes and man-days lost due to strikes, and it has improved the relations between employer and his employees. It has equalized the rights of employers and employees, which the National Labor Relations Act, as originally passed, had not done.

The new bill restricts the ban on secondary boycotts and on jurisdictional strikes without any justification. The restrictions as contained in the Taft-Hartley law should remain. The public and third persons should not be involved because of a dispute between a union and an employer or because of a dispute between two unions.

The provision of the closed shop should not be removed. The right to work should not be limited to only members of a participating union. The right not to belong to a labor union is as important as is the right to belong to one under our system of government.

The proposed legislation would eliminate a number of proper safeguards now contained in the Taft-Hartley law. All of these should be retained and may only be done by a retention of the Taft-Hartley law as it now reads.

Among these provisions which should be continued is the requirement that labor unions and their representatives file affidavits of non-Communist affiliation. The National Labor Relations Act gives the labor unions and their representatives certain rights which they may exercise against employers. It is no more than right, therefore, that unions and their representatives should be required to file affidavits that they are not affiliated with an organization which advocates the overthrow of existing governments by force.

The right of free speech on the part of the employer should be retained. Labor unions and their representatives under the National Labor Relations Act have had full freedom in this regard, but unfortunately the employer has not had such freedom until the Taft-Hartley law was enacted. He should have such freedom so long as he uses no threat or coercion and makes no promises of any benefit.

The definition of collective bargaining as contained in the Taft-Hartley law should by all means be retained. Employers should have freedom to reject a proposal made by a labor union and should not be required to make a counter proposal if the exigencies of his business dictate that he follow that course.

Economic strikers who have quit their jobs to enforce their demands and who have been permanently replaced should in all fairness lose the right to vote in an election in the plant in which they quit their employment.

One of the principal objections to the original National Labor Relations Act was that it was one-sided. It imposed no restrictions on labor unions and their representatives. The Taft-Hartley law equalized that condition. Unfair labor practices may be continued by both employers and employees and should be subject to the remedial processes of the National Labor Relations Board. It would be tragic to remove the restrictions upon labor-union conduct or to limit those restrictions to the few which are contained in the proposed legislation.

Employer should be free from continual organization in his plant. There should be a time when a union may not petition for an election; and, therefore, the restricting of elections to one a year as contained in the Taft-Hartley law should be continued. So also should be continued the provision that an employer may himself file a petition for an election, even though but one union is seeking representation. Prior to the enactment of the Taft-Hartley law, when but one union sought representation, the employer was absolutely helpless in the matter and could not bring matters to a finality by himself filing a petition. The union, if its representatives believe that they could not muster a majority, continued the agitation in the employer's plant and refrained from filing a petition for certification, resulting in continued agitation in the employer's plant and disruption of his business.

There should be a limitation upon the filing of charges, and the 6-month provision as contained in the Taft-Hartley law should be retained. Under past practices, prior to the Taft-Hartley law, charges could have been filed and not disposed of; and finally, when a complaint was issued because of an alleged unfair labor practice, such charges, no matter how old, had been added to the charge which resulted in the complaint being issued. In many cases, evidence available at the time of the filing of the earlier charges was no longer available.

Suits in the Federal courts by and against labor unions should be retained. In years gone by, labor unions looked upon an agreement with an employer as merely a scrap of paper. Under the Taft-Hartley law, such a contract has achieved the dignity to which it is entitled and has obligated labor unions to change their thinking with respect to the efficacy to such a document.

The right of an employer to adjust a grievance with an employee directly, without the interference of the union should be retained, and the provision of the Taft-Hartley law in that regard should be continued.

The 60-day cooling-off period prior to the termination date of an agreement for the purpose of negotiating charges should be retained. Labor unions should not be empowered to strike without giving the employer an opportunity to consider their demands. In the interest of harmonious relations between an employer and his employee, the existing provision in the Taft-Hartley law should be continued.

We believe that the Taft-Hartley law has not been in effect long enough to justify any change being made. We believe that much of the agitation against it is ill-founded and that, after an experience of several years more, most of the objections now existing against the Taft-Hartley law will be found to have been unfounded.

Very truly yours,

WARD CASTLE, President.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT OF 1949

MONDAY, MARCH 21, 1949

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10 a. m., Hon. Augustine B. Kelley (chairman) presiding.

Mr. KELLEY. The meeting will please be in order. The Chair wishes to read into the record an excerpt from a letter received from the Crucible Steel Co. of America. The Chair has a purpose in reading this. It is signed by Mr. French, assistant to the president, who appeared before this subcommittee. He said he—appreciated the intelligent and very evident interest shown by the members of the committee in the very important issues which were involved in the testimony.

He continues, in his letter to me dated March 18, 1949:

It is a pleasant experience for a citizen to be treated in such a very pleasant and courteous fashion, and I believe that more citizens would be interested in testifying as to their opinions on proposed legislation, if they realized that Members of Congress are most interested in learning the sincere viewpoint of the electorate.

Would you please be so good as to transmit my thanks to the other members of the committee, in case this is practical.

Mr. KELLEY. The first witness this morning is Mr. James Carey, secretary-treasurer of the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

TESTIMONY OF JAMES B. CAREY, SECRETARY-TREASURER, CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. CAREY. Chairman Kelley and members of the committee, my name is James B. Carey. I am secretary-treasurer of the Congress of Industrial Relations. Mr. Arthur J. Goldberg, general counsel of the CIO and the United Steelworkers of America, has prepared a detailed and documented analysis dealing with the experience of the CIO under the Wagner Act and the Taft-Hartley Act and also containing our observations relating to H. R. 2032. I ask leave of the committee to file and to include in the record this statement and analysis of our general counsel. On behalf of the entire membership of the Congress of Industrial Organizations I strongly urge that the committee report out H. R. 2032 with the minor technical amendments contained in general counsel Goldberg's statement which has been filed with the committee.

In view of the detailed analysis of the law which has been presented to the committee by our general counsel I would like to confine myself to certain more general propositions. In the first place, I should point out that this committee is not considering the present law in a vacuum. Last November we had an election. In that election the issue which loomed largest and which was discussed most extensively was the legislative history of the Eightieth Congress. The Democratic Party went to the people to denounce the record of that Congress and to urge the people to repudiate the record of that Congress.

But the Democratic Party went to the people on no mere negative program of repudiating the Congress which had so wantonly disregarded the needs of our people.

In the recent elections the Democratic Party proposed a concrete program of social legislation to which the name the Fair Deal has been given.

Of all the issues involved in the record of the Eightieth Congress the most high-lighted was the labor issue. Through the length and breadth of the land the Taft-Hartley Act—the most prominent work of the Eightieth Congress—was debated and discussed. The Democrats made that law an issue. The Republicans defended it.

The people have spoken. They have made it clear that the Taft-Hartley Act is not sound labor legislation and that it must be erased from the statute books in the public interest. It seems hardly necessary to stress this matter before this committee. I am confident that the members of this committee are fully aware of the key significance of the Taft-Hartley Act in the recently concluded election.

Today the second-guessers and the Monday-morning quarterbacks are busy manufacturing tortured reasons to explain that the Taft-Hartley Act had nothing to do with the elections. They have even trotted out new polls in their desperate anxiety to misrepresent the popular will with respect to the Taft-Hartley Act. They are again using this discredited device.

Some of those soothsayers go further than merely attempting to misrepresent the attitude of the general public. They have even dared to suggest that union members, by and large, actually favor the Taft-Hartley Act. This is simply not true.

Make no mistake about it. The workers of this land are determined to see this law go. They are not fooled by loaded questionnaires prepared by the well-paid lobbyists of powerful corporations and monopolies. They are not taken in by fast-talking radio commentators who assume that union members are incapable of reasoning for themselves. They cannot be stampeded or intimidated by propaganda and employer pressure to surrender their convictions.

The workers of this land know this law and know what it means. They have seen the law in operation. They have seen how it has destroyed harmonious collective bargaining relations. They have seen how it has served as an incentive to induce employers to provoke strikes.

They have seen what the law has meant in terms of employer attacks on established contract standards.

In the 20 months in which that law has been on the books the workers of this country have learned some bitter lessons about labor relations.

They have learned what it means to have free collective bargaining destroyed by arbitrary restrictions and regulations. They profoundly resent a law which prevents them from agreeing with their employers on matters such as pensions, welfare funds, check-off and union security. They have seen the various groups in our national life who pay the greatest lip service to freedom of contract, hypocritically support measures which in the labor field make these concepts a fiction.

They have experienced one-sided injunctions and have asked themselves whether the oppressive old days are to return when the Government stacked the cards against them in their efforts to secure a better life through collective bargaining.

They have seen the entire collective bargaining process turned into an obstacle course of technicality, legalism and ambiguity.

They have seen employers revert overnight from attitudes of cooperation and good will to arbitrary, arrogant and antiunion positions.

They have seen the grievance machinery transformed from a device to promote harmony and good relations into a cold automaton which can only say "No."

They have seen the very arguments about the rights of the individual which were used to combat the 8-hour law, minimum wage laws and collective bargaining under the Wagner Act, again used to justify exploitation and individual bargaining.

They have looked at the clock of history and seen under their very eyes how it was turned back by the reactionaries in our country who never remember and who never learn.

I say to you that it is a piece of disgraceful deception to contend that the workers of this country have any illusions about the Taft-Hartley Act.

The workers of this land demand that this law and all its works be eliminated and that the administration bill reenacting the Wagner Act, with certain amendments, be restored as the law of the land.

The issue before this committee is not limited to its domestic aspect. The Taft-Hartley Act has had a terrific impact on our foreign relations. It is unfortunate that our foreign relations are considered by many persons merely a struggle against totalitarianism. The struggle with totalitarianism is part of the larger field of aiding the world to recover the economic balance that alone will assure ourselves of decency, peace, and the opportunity to provide our people with a higher standard of living. The Taft-Hartley Act has provided a main obstacle in this endeavor of ours.

This committee and the Congress must understand that the struggle with communism is taking place at the level of the workingman throughout the world and nowhere else. American labor has been engaged in the effort to point out to the workers of other countries that an atmosphere of free speech, free press, and free assembly is the most conducive to human happiness and well-being. The Communist Party, therefore, seizes upon the Taft-Hartley Act as a concrete illustration that the forces of reaction in America are gradually destroying the American labor movement. There is not any question about that. I have been in Europe on many occasions. Three of my journeys carried me into the Soviet Union. I know what is happening.

The Communists use the Taft-Hartley Act as a major vehicle for propaganda that is directed toward preventing the American labor movement from giving any leadership to the workers of other lands. A great deal of my time in Europe when I go over there is devoted to an attempted defense of our democratic way of life. I do not have, however, the opportunity to discuss these things until after the Communist Party has had its full opportunity of publicizing the Taft-

Hartley law among workers everywhere, as evidence of the reaction in this country.

Briefly stated, the real bona fide labor leader of Europe and his associates have difficulty in understanding how the American people can aid them, when they cannot even defend themselves against the conspiracy of American big business-men and the reactionary Eightieth Congress that produced the Taft-Hartley law.

All over the world millions upon millions of men who have dedicated themselves to the view that human beings can have abundance with freedom, are looking at the United States. Any failure or half-hearted contribution by the Eighty-first Congress to dispose of the Taft-Hartley law for all time, will give aid and comfort only to the Communists. It will provide corresponding discouragement for the anti-Communist leaders in the labor movements of this and other lands.

We cannot let these men down. We cannot talk out of one side of our mouth in foreign affairs and out of another side in the domestic field. By reenacting the administration bill we will tell these millions whose eyes are upon us that we mean what we say and that we are fully prepared in a domestic field to carry out the promises of our policies in the foreign field.

I should like, in conclusion, to read a message to the chairman of the committee from President Murray whose illness prevents him from being here today:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LESINSKI: Your committee now has under consideration your bill, H. R. 2032, to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act and to reenact the Wagner Act with certain amendments. I strongly urge that this committee take favorable action on this legislation as rapidly as possible.

The Taft-Hartley Act was passed in an atmosphere of prejudice and hysteria. The reactionary sponsors of that law successfully gambled on the emotionalism which was drummed up in connection with the postwar wage strikes. In addition to the appeal to prejudice the Taft-Hartley forces were helped by certain other factors.

They recognized that few laymen would be in a position to analyze and expose the trickery and complex legalism which riddled the law. They hoped—and they were successful in this—that the very complexity of the new law and its confusing character would make it difficult to refute its promises and to uncover its traps.

They were also aware of other things. They knew that only those intimately familiar with the labor scene and with the experience of employer practices in the Nation's factories, mines, and shops would be able to perceive how many of the innocent-sounding provisions of the law would work out in practice. They treated the law as though it were a series of doctrinaire pronouncements divorced from the reality of industrial life.

We both know that these enemies of sound labor relations today have been stripped of their weapons. All our people recognize today that the Taft-Hartley Act permitted our labor policy to become party to emotionalism, hysteria, and bias.

Almost 2 years of the Taft-Hartley Act and the gradual elimination of the tensions brought by a postwar period have brought understanding and wisdom.

The working people of our country and the labor organizations which represent them have achieved a truly remarkable victory in the realm of education and enlightenment. They have brought home to all of our people the iniquities of this law. They have made it clear that the law represents the triumph of organized antiunionism and its congressional spokesmen. By dint of patient explanation and education we have made the people of our land understand the bitter lesson which this law has taught us, that it is a deadly weapon, loaded against labor.

The members of this committee are fresh from the people. Some of them have themselves experienced the iniquities of this law. You who have been through an election, who have debated this law on the hustings, know that the vast majority of people of good will in this land have no use for the law and have come to recognize its dangerous effects.

This is a mighty achievement, this process whereby the issues involved in labor legislation have been removed from the realm of abuse, emotion, and prejudice into the realm of logic and understanding.

It is a fine thing for the public welfare and good government when reason protects our voters against the assaults of unreason and bias. I am confident that you will give your approval to the legislation under consideration because your committee embodies this new approach of fairness and reason.

Sincerely yours,

PHILIP MURRAY,
President, Congress of Industrial Organizations.

Mr. Chairman, will Mr. Goldberg's statement be part of the record as requested?

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it will be placed in the record.

Mr. CAREY. Thank you, sir.

(Mr. Goldberg's statement will be found in the appendix following the close of today's testimony. See p. 1367.)

Mr. KELLEY. The Chair wishes to announce that we have as guests some distinguished gentlemen from Italy, Mr. Claudio Rocchi, head of the political and economic section of the Italian Republican Party, and Giovanni Canini, vice secretary of Italy's largest union confederation, sitting over at my left. They are here as guests of the ECA.

Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Carey, on page 2 of your formal presentation, I want to read from the fourth or fifth paragraph down:

They have learned what it means to have free collective bargaining destroyed by arbitrary restrictions and regulations.

Would you mind for the benefit of the committee to relate some of those arbitrary restrictions and regulations?

Mr. CAREY. The arbitrary restrictions made complicated or actually prohibited by the Taft-Hartley amendments to the Wagner Act, such important subjects as welfare funds, questions of union security, and many other questions, including pensions and check-off and such, and make it difficult, and, in fact, impossible to negotiate in an atmosphere of free collective bargaining those provisions that were becoming the growing practice in American industry brought about through bargaining between management and labor.

Mr. BAILEY. Going ahead to the next paragraph, you say:

They have experienced one-sided injunctions and have asked themselves whether the oppressive old days are to return when the Government stacked the cards against them in their efforts to secure a better life through collective bargaining.

Are you referring there to the practice following the First World War, where not only the Government, but big business as well, started out to break all the labor organizations, and fairly well succeeded in the early twenty's? I remember it led to an armed march of the miners in West Virginia, as the result of issuing mandatory injunctions and injunctions in ex parte proceedings. Is that what you mean?

Mr. CAREY. That is correct, sir. And I might say in the law as we understand it the only mandatory injunctions are directed against unions.

Mr. BAILEY. And not against the employer?

Mr. CAREY. There are no mandatory injunctions directed against the employer under this legislation.

Mr. BAILEY. And further to the bottom of the page, you say:

They have seen employers revert overnight from attitudes of cooperation and good will to arbitrary, arrogant, and anti-union positions.

In that connection, I would like to remind you of the cross-examination of Mr. Wilson, of General Electric, when he appeared before the committee last week. I read into the record a paragraph from the existing contract between the UEW and General Electric, a paragraph that provided for the arbitration of all points on which they could not reach amicable settlement. It pointed to the fact that in two instances in which they had agreed to arbitration, after the arbitration award had been granted, they went to court to have the arbitration award set aside.

There is no redress from the employees in a case of that kind. That is a flagrant, unfair labor practice on the part of General Electric, and there was nothing that the employees could do about it. They could not get an injunction against the company for practicing unfair proceedings.

Mr. CAREY. Yes. Our office receives considerable mail indicating the extent to which employers who in the past had fair records in dealing with labor, now under this law become extremely difficult to deal with. In fact, we even have some employers who, after finding that it is better to get along with their unions, make an effort to make it appear almost a crime for management to establish harmonious relations.

Mr. BAILEY. You recall, Mr. Carey, in the agitation leading up to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, their war cry was "Joint responsibility under contract."

Mr. CAREY. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. In this instance that I recited, the General Electric openly violated the contract because they could get away with it under the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. CAREY. Yes; and there was another war cry, and that other one was also designed by the publicity representatives of the National Association of Manufacturers, that the fight must be labor unions against the public interest. And I might offer for the record a document of the National Association of Manufacturers published on June 25, 1946, where they set forth their whole program in agitating for the enactment of antilabor legislation, in which they contend that the Case bill did not go far enough. They set forth the use of the publicity mediums of the United States. And we have the record indicating the extent of expenditures made by the NAM to create the hysteria to bring about the enactment of the Taft-Hartley law.

They cited in this communication signed by the then president of the National Association of Manufacturers their success in having OPA destroyed. They even state in this that—

> We also knew that the public was strongly in favor of extending price controls without restrictions.

They say:

> At first businessmen * * * were reluctant to testify for industry at the House hearing on OPA. By the time of the Senate hearing, however, NAM's vigorous campaign had raised such public question about the desirability of OPA that Senators were overwhelmed with requests by industry to appear in opposition. Thus NAM's willingness to fight industry's battle was the action that really broke the ice and kept OPA from being extended unamended for a year.

Then they go on to say:

The fight for labor legislation presented a different problem. Superficially it might appear that management, through the NAM, should have become the foremost sponsor of the Case bill, since it contained many constructive provisions. As a matter of fact, the core of the Case bill grew out of the recommendations of the management's allegation to the President's labor-management conference last fall—a meeting in which NAM played a leading role.

Although NAM constantly pointed out the merits of the Case bill, both in formal testimony before congressional committees and to Members of Congress individually, it was decided that NAM should not spearhead the fight * * *.

Then it gave the reasons. And then they set forth the program they had in bringing about the enactment of the antilabor legislation.

It would seem, Mr. Chairman, that in view of this and the other activities of the NAM, they certainly should be required, as labor organizations and other groups are required, to register as people interested in directing the course of legislation and seeking enactment of legislation.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it will be accepted and made a part of the record.

(The communication referred to is as follows:)

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MANUFACTURERS,
New York 20, N. Y., June 25, 1946.

PRESIDENT'S REPORT

To the Board of Directors of Member Companies in the NAM:

Political expedience dominates the councils of the Nation today. Industry must repulse demagogic attacks on our enterprise system, by adhering to common purposes, policies, and strategy.

Exercising its responsibility for leadership of industry in this cause, NAM presents herewith a statement of our policy and strategy on the two major issues facing the American public today—the extension of OPA's price controls, and the placing of responsibilities on labor unions that are commensurate with their power.

NAM investigations have shown that price control is not a means of preventing inflation, but simply of disguising it. In fact, by restricting production, price controls actually have been feeding the flames, leading us toward a more serious inflation than would have occurred if controls were abandoned quickly.

There was a tendency within industry to blame this upon poor administration of the act, but NAM's study showed that with more than 8,000,000 items to be controlled even the best administration could not fail to have the effect of restricting production.

For these reasons, and because NAM is convinced that the principle of price control is inconsistent with the peacetime operation of our entreprise system, NAM concluded that it had no alternative except outright opposition to any extension of OPA. We realized that prices might go up temporarily if price controls were eliminated, because the inflation disguised by Government subsidies, black markets, deterioration of quality and other offshoots of OPA would become immediately apparent. We knew, however, that this would be true whether price control were eliminated in 1946, 1947, or at any subsequent time. We also knew that the public was strongly in favor of extending price controls without restrictions. We knew that the left-wingers—and many others who had not studied this problem exhaustively—would heap abuse upon us. But we felt strongly that the long-range interest of the American public must be placed ahead of any transitory public relations advantages for NAM.

At first businessmen, even though their production was being stifled by price controls, were reluctant to testify for industry at the House hearing on OPA. By the time of the Senate hearing, however, NAM's vigorous campaign had raised such public question about the desirability of OPA that Senators were overwhelmed with requests by industry to appear in opposition. Thus NAM's willingness to fight industry's battle was the action that really broke the ice and kept OPA from being extended unamended for a year.

The fight for labor legislation presented a different problem. Superficially it might appear that management, through the NAM, should have become the foremost sponsor of the Case bill, since it contained many constructive provisions. As a matter of fact, the core of the Case bill grew out of the recommendations of the management delegation to the President's Labor-Management Conference last fall—a meeting in which NAM played a leading role.

Although NAM constantly pointed out the merits of the Case bill, both in formal testimony before congressional committees and to Members of Congress individually, it was decided that NAM should not spearhead the fight for the Case bill for two reasons. First, though the Case bill would have been a long step in the right direction, it alone would not have brought about the full measure of industrial peace which our country so desperately seeks. If NAM had vigorously advocated the Case bill, a continuation of the vicious labor situation in this country after its enactment would have justified serious loss of confidence by the public in the recommendations advanced by management.

Secondly, today's issue is a struggle between organized labor on the one hand and the public interest on the other. If NAM had plugged for the Case bill with the fanfare of newspaper advertising, radio broadcasts, and widespread public relations efforts, after the fashion of our OPA fight, it would only have confused the issue in the minds of the people, leading them to believe that today's conflict is between organized labor and management, which it most certainly is not.

The President, placing the will of the CIO above the will of the people, vetoed the Case bill. This should demonstrate the need for vigorous teamwork by industry if this battle ever is to be won. Moreover, the fact that the House and Senate passed the Case bill in the first place dramatizes the fact that this is basically a battle between powerful labor leaders and the public interest.

It does not always take full-page advertisements and network radio programs to get results. For four long years NAM has worked vigorously for legislation which would inject some reason into the operation of the myriad Government agencies which have sprung up in the past decade. In many cases these agencies have been acting as prosecutor, judge, and jury, following rules of evidence and juridical conduct of their own contrivance.

Many organization—notably the American Bar Association—joined with NAM in the fight. The recent passage of the adminishrative law bill by Congress is, indeed, an encouraging conclusion to NAM's efforts, and evidence of the soundness of the strategy pursued.

There are many battles still to be won in our over-all struggle against the creeping tide of compulsory statism. The battle to reduce huge Federal expenditures is at hand. The battle for labor laws written in the public interest remains to be fought again. You and your directors are needed in this fight. The stakes are freedom itself.

Sincerely yours,

R. R. WASON, President.

Many manufacturers throughout the Nation, conscious of the vigorous public leadership which NAM has contributed to the fight to end OPA's price controls on manufactured goods, have asked me why NAM has not used the same dramatic technique in its advocacy of the Case bill. This report seeks to give an unequivocal response to such an inquiry.

The report has been sent to other officials of your company for verbal presentation to your board of directors. Because the subjects are of such keen interest to industry, it is felt that you, too, will want to review this report. It is our purpose to extend this practice, and to send you periodically similar discussions of NAM policy and strategy on major matters. Your comments on the desirability of this procedure will be much appreciated.

R. R. W.

Mr. BAILEY. I have one more question, Mr. Carey. On page 3 of your presentation you say:

> The issue before this committee is not limited to its domestic aspects. The Taft-Hartley Act has had a terrific impact on foreign relations.

In this connection, I listened in on a radio forum last week in which I believe you participated, along with President Green, and there was considerable said about the necessity for making labor unions strong because they were the first line of defense against communism. I notice you have touched on it in this paragraph.

I have only about a minute and a half left. I would like for you to take the time to enlarge on that. That is on page 3, about half way down the page.

Mr. CAREY. As I stated in my testimony, I have traveled extensively in Europe, and I had three visits to the Soviet Union. There I studied the structure of the trade-unions and found they were regulated by government, their right to strike was limited, and the miserable conditions under which the people live in that country was ample evidence of the nature of their unions. The Taft-Hartley Act, with its provisions, is only an attempt to sabotage the American trade-unions, to make the unions instruments of Government, to limit the right of workers to withdraw their contributions to an enterprise, and to regulate the internal affairs of a union. It is difficult to explain to a worker in Europe that the American Congress is willing to assist and help workers in other countries improve their standards of living and at the same time attempt to suppress the democratic rights of the people, the workers, in forming their unions. It is hypocrisy for people to condemn them and at the same time sponsor legislation to create the same conditions that exist in Europe under the pretext of governing the American trade-unions.

So, the American Federation of Labor and the CIO, and all the other unions, without exception, are opposed to the vicious, punitive legislation of the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. BAILEY. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. You have 9 minutes, Mr. Irving.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Carey, of course it has been testified here that the NAM had nothing to do with the subject matter in this bill. I think last Friday it was testified to. Do you have any comment to make on that?

Mr. CAREY. This letter, Congressman, indicated the plan they had in mind, and it provided the explanation to the employers, as to how the NAM was going to bring about the enactment of the anti-labor legislation. In fact, we recognized that, and we heard about the letter. We did not read that letter in any of the newspapers of this country. It was part of this great conspiracy, so we took the simple device of sending the NAM a letter and requesting a copy of that communication. We told them we were aware of its contents, and we received it, and we are still looking for a time when the newspapers of this country, and the commentators, will investigate the real source of the Taft-Hartley amendments, and how they were brought about.

The NAM, through all its members, indicated the attitude it would take, and set forth in detail the amount, the millions of dollars they had spent in the publicity campaigns, how they sent material to teachers in the schools of our country explaining the need for this labor legislation in the public interest, and how their lawyers assisted in drafting the provisions, and whipped up the hysteria in this country. They are incorrect in saying they had a small part or no part in the enactment of this kind of legislation.

Mr. IRVING. From my own experience, I know there was information among the employers long before this act was adopted, or even the work begun on it, and the attitude was that they were going to teach labor a lesson, and were going to take care of them very shortly. I know that from my own experience. One thing that we have confronting us in this committee is the testimony of many employers and many other people that the act has been helpful and has been good, and it has increased the membership and wages have gone up higher than before the adoption of the act, and so forth. I have tried to explain my views on the matter, that the act has never fully been used for reasons that, at first, no one could understand the act, and no lawyer knew what it meant. We have a very fine labor lawyer in my district, and he is recognized as one of the outstanding labor lawyers in the country, and he could not interpret the many things in the act.

Then, I believe that the campaign, along in the early part of 1948, the word went out to soften up on the Taft-Hartley, the workings of it, and not to put it into full use.

Then, of course, after November 2, there was a great deal of thought given to the fact that the act might be repealed.

Could you say whether this act has been fully used, and what your opinions are as to why it has been more or less negative to a certain extent, although I realize it has hurt many unions in many places?

Mr. CAREY. Mr. Congressman, I agree with you that this act has not been fully used. It was apparently designed to provide an opportunity when labor is in difficulty, growing out of mass unemployment, and to make it weaker than our economy will permit labor to be today, and we will feel the terrific impact of this legislation, fully enforced; however, I would not care to indicate that this law, as it is administered today, is a mild bit of legislation.

We hear statements made that labor is faring very well under this legislation, but that is just not so. This legislation makes it extremely difficult to organize new workers. I have heard statements about comparing the number of elections that were won today by labor as against before the Taft-Hartley. A great number of those elections are elections that are required under these amendments covering workers already organized. We are not making the headway in organizing new workers in other plants which have been unorganized that we have made before, but Counsel Goldberg, on page 3 of his brief, indicates the number of elections in which the number of people participated, and the year before the Taft-Hartley, and in the first year of the Taft-Hartley operations, which indicates the terrific beating that workers are taking today under the way the Taft-Hartley Act is being administered. I stated earlier in my testimony, or in reply to a question, that the chief counsel of the National Labor Relations Board is making it a virtual crime for workers, through their unions, to get along with employers. I am sure that Senator Taft would take issue with that, in his way of interpreting the law. He contends that the agreement arrived at between the longshoremen on the west coast and the longshoremen's employer association is illegal and against the law because of the hiring-hall provisions of that agreement. They had had a long struggle there, in part brought about by the hysteria created, that gave comfort to some of the longshoremen employers who wanted to weaken the employees; but the real issue there was a decent collective-bargaining contract that would provide relations between the employers' association and the union. Finally, through the help of the National CIO office, we worked out a sound agreement between the Warehousemen's Union and the employers' association. We have stability guaranteed by that collective-bargaining contract, underwritten by the national CIO in that particular area.

Mr. Denham has decided that it is unfair to have management and labor get along together, so he has decided to reopen a hearing, a hearing that was first called for in the early stages of this dispute by a petition from the employers' association. And now the employers' association wants to have that petition, that charge, dismissed; and Denham wants to reopen it and declare that that contract is not in accordance wih the law.

May I read for the record a letter addressed to Robert N. Denham, Esq., general counsel, National Labor Relations Board, Washington, D. C., under date of March 17, 1949, in regard to the International Longshoremen's Union, case No. 20CB19, and so forth.

DEAR MR. DENHAM: The shipping industry on the Pacific coast is now operating under collective-bargaining agreements recently negotiated which have so far operated successfully. It would be extremely unfortunate from the standpoint both of the industry and of the public if the present harmonious employer-union relationships were to be upset by an order of the National Labor Relations Board requiring a change in hiring practices. Waterfront Employers' Association of the Pacific Coast and the Pacific-American Shipowners' Association therefore join with the International Longshoremen and Warehousemen's Union and the National Union of Marine Cooks and Stewards in asking that the proceedings against those two unions now pending before the Board be dismissed.

Very truly yours,

WATERFRONT EMPLOYERS' ASSOCIATION OF THE PACIFIC COAST.
PACIFIC-AMERICAN SHIPOWNERS' ASSOCIATION.

Signed by Brobeck, Phleger, and Harrison.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. IRVING. Thank you?

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. I am sorry I missed your testimony, Mr. Carey, and for that reason I will refrain from discussing or going into that part of it.

However, I would like to ask you a question or two. You perhaps have read the testimony of Mr. Morgan, and some of the other witnesses who have disclosed the persons responsible for the Taft-Hartley law, I presume; have you not?

Mr. CAREY. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. And, from a study of that testimony, I believe the record is uncontradicted that labor receives no consideration at any time through the—I mean when the act was being written by the Eightieth Congress; is that true?

Mr. CAREY. That is true. And, furthermore, Mr. Congressman, labor was indicted under that arrangement. These very same people a short time ago were considered soldiers of the production line; and today these workers and their unions are considered enemies of our Nation, and the law is an insult to the dignity of every working man in this country.

I also might say, Mr. Chairman, that that legislation and the procedure under which it was drafted destroys the confidence of the American people in our democratic processes, and it creates ill feeling on the part of workers as to the processes of our Congress, when agents of employers can come down and usurp the role of legislators in drafting and presenting legislation of that nature. We sometimes wonder whether or not this country is moving in a direction of having corrupt legal procedures.

Mr. PERKINS. And I also presume that you read Mr. Morgan's statement where the Republican National Committee paid him $7,500 for his technical services in the drafting of the Taft-Hartley law, and where he further stated that Representative Halleck, from Indiana, and ex-Representative Hartley determined the policies, and he, just from a technician's standpoint, provided the language for those policies.

Mr. CAREY. Yes, sir; that is true. I also read that.

Mr. PERKINS. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Carey, I have a question here. I am like the fellow who was looking for an honest man with a lantern a good many centuries ago; I have had a searchlight out trying to find an answer to the question in regard to the Taft-Hartley law, under section 8 (b) (4) (D) as to jurisdictional disputes between crafts, which is forbidden as an unfair labor practice—that is, forbidden to labor unions as an unfair labor practice—and under section 10 (k) there is a provision for an award to be made in a craft dispute.

The question that I want to ask in regard to those two sections is whether or not there is any provision in the Taft-Hartley law where an award can be enforced by the union to which it was made: that is, the union that won the award?

Mr. CAREY. Sir, that is one of the reasons why the Taft-Hartley amendments to the Wagner Act are not sound labor legislation, because those provisions can only be understood by a lawyer, and I have difficulty, quite frankly, in even following the paragraphs titled or numbered 10 (c), (b) subsection 259, and the various other devices put in there, which I have stated was designed to create confusion.

Quite frankly, I have heard a great deal about the large number of jurisdictional disputes in the labor movement, and it was cited that most of them are in the building-construction field. Most generally, it is a hazy field as to whether you import or export building materials across State lines, and the law is not designed to cover the building-construction field. There were a great number of provisions put in that law; and, quite frankly, they lifted the worst provisions out of the 237 pieces of antilabor legislation that was put in the hopper of the Eightieth Congress, and designed as highly complicated, confusing, and unworkable propositions.

We made studies and provided a very detailed report, and presented it in the record prepared by our general counsel; and, I think, perhaps the lawyers can have a considerable amount of fun. In fact, I might say, Congressman, there are people today who are building a career out of these Taft-Hartley amendments. They get paid to do nothing else but serve corporations, to use this Taft-Hartley bill, and bring out the "sleepers" that it contains. Jerry Reilly is one, and we have a great number of others who have a lifelong career under the lawyers' full-employment bill in this kind of legislation.

Mr. JACOBS. I take it you are not familiar with any such provision where such a law could be enforced?

Mr. CAREY. It is not enforceable, as we understand. One lawyer might say it is enforceable, and another might say it is not; but, as we understand, it is not enforceable under the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. JACOBS. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. Mr. Carey, it has come to my attention during the 6 weeks that we have been listening to arguments about labor relations, both under this act and the Wage and Hour Act, that this country has a problem to solve in its economic field—up to this time it has not been solved—and that is the inequality between the millions of workers south of Mason and Dixon's line, and those millions above Mason and Dixon's line, where you have two different standards of living.

A great deal has been said about the Taft-Hartley Act and what it has done in labor relations.

In the last 3 or 4 years, your national organization and your international organization have done considerable work south of Mason and Dixon's line, attempting by contracts and collective bargaining to raise the standards of those millions of people. Have you had success in that field?

Mr. CAREY. We have had success in a measure, despite the operations of the Taft-Hartley provisions of the law. That makes it virtually impossible in some areas, and difficult in most areas; but, I might say it is not just in the South; it is in many parts of this country where, through the provisions of this law, the Government appears, and is, in many instances, behind the employers in preventing the free organization of workers.

A textile-workers' representative will appear and give detailed testimony regarding the efforts to organize in the South, and the obstacles confronting them as contained in this law.

Mr. WIER. Were you having some success up to the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act in your relationships, not only as to the workers but as to the community and as to the people of the South, in the operations of organizing workers?

Mr. CAREY. Yes, sir; I might say that, despite the activity of the NAM, the workers of this country and the union representatives do not believe that the attitude expressed by the NAM and those that appeared in support of the Taft-Hartley law before congressional committees seeking further amendments represent, by and large, the attitude of the American employers. We were having throughout this country, through the order of democratic process and collective bargaining under the Wagner Act, an improving relationship with the American employers; we had growing organizations in the South, and a greater degree of national unity brought about through the accomplishments of labor and management working together, and eliminating our economic problems.

Mr. WIER. Would you agree with the evidence which has been presented to this committee in that field that the process of organization of the workers and the collective bargaining has improved the living and economic conditions considerably in the South?

Mr. CAREY. It has, yes, sir; but it has a long way to go as yet.

Mr. WIER. In the last 2 years, or the last year and a half of the Taft-Hartley Act, particularly under that clause, there was a lot of stress laid on that clause here by employer groups that reverts back to the right of free speech by both parties since the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Have your organization groups encountered a revival of free speech on the part of the employer, or what is your reaction to this free speech interpretation of Denham in the Taft-Hartley Act? Is it free speech?

Mr. CAREY. Mr. Congressman, anyone who reads the American newspapers, or who would review the reports of the NAM, would see that it indicates the employers have enjoyed free speech beyond any question in this country. They have pretty much influenced the editorial policies as well as the news columns of our papers, and they have employer spokesmen on the radio today, day in and day out, and they have had free speech in their contacts with the workers, and there has been no question of it at any time.

Mr. JACOBS. Will you yield to a question?

Mr. WIER. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Was one of those commentators Fulton Lewis?

Mr. CAREY. I would say the one I had in mind was Fulton Lewis. I read the report received from the textile workers indicating their experience under the Taft-Hartley provisions and also the change that has taken place from the Wagner Act days to the Taft-Hartley bill.

Since June 1947, opportunities for the organization of unorganized textile plants have decreased noticeably. In the 18 months that preceded the act, the Textile Workers Union of America participated in 337 elections for 127,419 workers. Of these, we won 174 elections for 63,034 workers and lost 165 elections in plants employing 64,385 workers.

But since June 1947 we have participated in only 205 elections covering 65,444 workers. Of these, we won 122 elections covering 24,046 workers, and we have lost elections in 83 textile plants employing 41,398 workers.

And this is at a time when this union has increased its organizational activity and its efforts in organizing the workers in the textile mills of the South.

Mr. WIER. Let me ask you this as a final question, Mr. Carey:

It is only by experience that we get the answer. You cannot battle legislation or acts of life. Do you have plenty of activity now in your organization to attempt to interpret and process questionable acts, as well as the law, under the rules and regulations of the Labor Board? What has been the experience of the CIO generally in attempting to get action and process complaints, grievances, and unfair labor practice charges against an employer through the National Labor Relations Board?

Mr. CAREY. If the complaint that is sought is directed against an employer, it is almost an impossible proposition to receive action by the Board.

Mr. WIER. Why?

Mr. CAREY. They contend that the reason the delay is extended is because there are so many cases before the National Labor Relations Board at the present time, and they are required under the law to process and give priority to the employer complaints, and they do just that.

Mr. WIER. Does the law say that?

Mr. CAREY. The law says that—at least, it is administered in that way. There are certain cases required under the law where the question of boycott is involved, and other matters of that nature, that it be done that way. So the long delay makes the Board, in the opinion of the workers, not an impartial Government agency as designed, but to protect the employers that are interested in preventing organization of unorganized workers. The Board, as has been administered under the Taft-Hartley law, is a vicious instrument to do injury to the labor movement, and the chief counsel of that Board, Counsel Denham, looks upon his position as being just that. He himself admits the unfairness, but he contends he cannot do anything about it. He says it is true, it is unfair, but he has to carry out the provisions of the law, regardless of what that may do to the labor-relations situation. In fact, in talking with Denham about this longshoremen's situation, he admits that it would be better for the Board to stay out of the case on the west coast, where the relationship to stabilize the situation has been brought about through collective bargaining, but he contended to me that he has to enforce the law, and the law takes priority over the objections that the management and the union have in that instance, and his action may result in a labor dispute out on the west coast, where collective bargaining under the agreement has about reached harmonious relationships.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman's time has expired?

Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. You are a representative of the CIO?

Mr. CAREY. Yes, sir, and I am secretary-treasurer of the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

Mr. SMITH. And anything you say represents the opinion of the international CIO?

Mr. CAREY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH. How many international officers and people who are on the international pay roll are here in the room this morning?

Mr. CAREY. Those that are expected to testify, sir, and perhaps some additional ones. In fact, most of them who are here will appear as witnesses, but I have no accurate number of the people who are here.

Mr. SMITH. This gentleman is not going to testify, is he?

Mr. CAREY. He is a staff assistant, our counsel, Arthur Goldberg. I might say that he is here available to answer any questions you may have.

Mr. GOLDBERG. I believe the Congressman was not here to hear my response to a question by the chairman of the committee. I said I would be glad to answer any questions, but there were so many witnesses—however, I would be glad either to testify or not to testify.

Mr. SMITH. I do not care how many witnesses are here; that is your right, but there has been a good deal of attention paid here in the past about Mr. Wilson bringing down three or four of his employees, and that was what I was talking about. If you want to bring a hundred, it is all right with me.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. Congressman, I have no objection to Mr. Wilson bringing down his associates. My objection to what Mr. Wilson said is quite different than his presence here.

Mr. SMITH. I am putting it simply on a qualitative basis as to how many people come here to represent——

Mr. CAREY. I do not think, Congressman, I made any statement suggesting the employer representatives be limited; in fact, I might say there has never been a time in the history of the labor movement where the workers objected to the employers being represented, and there has never been a case where a worker was fired because he joined an association of employers. The employers have free activity to engage in the activities they are engaged in, and we are asking the Government to protect the rights of workers to engage in that same free activity of self-association without interference.

Mr. SMITH. And you do not object to the employer having the right of free speech?

Mr. CAREY. We certainly do not; but I object to the people implying the employers were ever denied the right of free speech.

Mr. SMITH. Do you believe in the hiring halls?

Mr. CAREY. I certainly do, sir.

Mr. SMITH. That is a policy of the CIO?

Mr. CAREY. No, sir; that happens to be a method found by the employers and by the unions to meet the situation peculiar to the waterfront problems, and if the employers and the unions find that the most desirable way to meet their problems, I do not think those of us who are not involved in those particular difficulties should impose our views.

Mr. SMITH. You are familiar with the bill under consideration here now, I believe?

Mr. CAREY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH. Do you know who wrote it?

Mr. CAREY. I have an idea.

Mr. SMITH. Who?

Mr. CAREY. I think the National Association of Manufacturers did most of the work, associated with——

Mr. SMITH. I am talking about the present bill, the Lesinski bill.

Mr. CAREY. The Lesinski bill was written to meet the commitments made to the people of this Nation in the last campaign. The Lesinski bill is not a complicated or difficult bill.

Mr. SMITH. Did you have anything to do with the writing of it?

Mr. CAREY. I made speeches all over the country——

Mr. SMITH. I asked you whether you had anything to do with the writing of the present Lesinski bill.

Mr. CAREY. No, sir.

Mr. SMITH. Do you know where it was put together?

Mr. CAREY. I have an idea it was put together in the administration circles.

Mr. SMITH. Which is their right, is it not?

Mr. CAREY. I would think so, certainly; but, sir, may I point out that there is quite a difference between hiring lawyers, working for nongovernmental organizations involved in the preparation of legislation, as against having people associated with government prepare legislation.

Mr. SMITH. I imagine that is rather a matter of personal opinion.

Do you believe in jurisdictional strikes?

Mr. CAREY. No, sir.

Mr. SMITH. Do you believe in secondary boycotts?

Mr. CAREY. No, sir.

Mr. SMITH. Do you believe in financial reports of unions?

Mr. CAREY. Pardon?

Mr. SMITH. Do you believe in financial reports of unions to their members?

Mr. CAREY. They all make them. Certainly, I do.

Mr. SMITH. Do you think that is all right in the field of legislation?

Mr. CAREY. No, sir.

Mr. SMITH. You do not think that is right?

Mr. CAREY. No, sir, it is unnecessary. I am required under the law to make a detailed financial report, and I have been doing it for years.

Mr. SMITH. Do you mean to tell me every member of the CIO union throughout this country received a copy of your financial statements?

Mr. CAREY. No, sir, no more than every citizen of the United States gets a copy of the budget of our Government; but I do say this, sir——

Mr. SMITH. That is available, though, is it not?

Mr. CAREY. And so are the reports.

I am required to make the report to the executive board, the members of the CIO, in such a way they are easy enough for them to understand, and I have been doing it, and I might point out the business administration union in this country—and I cite an example—CIO is superior to the business enterprises and it would be no difficulty to look into it to see where or whether there is any manipulation of funds. One thing we are proud of is that you, or any other member of this committee, can cite a racketeer in the CIO, and I might cite instances where other groups which receive less attention than labor unions, could not produce as good a record as that.

Mr. SMITH. Do you believe in the closed shop?

Mr. CAREY. Certainly. I believe that every citizen of the United States, every person living in the United States, should be a citizen, and I believe they should have all the rights and privileges, and I certainly believe every one who accepts the benefits of collective bargaining should be a member of the union; and I think through the operations of that provision management would be dealing with the union where all the workers affected by the actions of the union would be able to give expression and have a voice in the affairs of the organization.

And may I add, Congressman, that the simple reply to your questions about jurisdictional strikes and boycotts, I would not want that to be misunderstood to mean that you can abolish boycotts or jurisdictional strikes by legislation any more than you can abolish divorces by legislation, and bring about the elimination of head colds by passing a law. There are some situations that have to be dealt with on a practical and human basis.

There are some boycotts that are justified and should be engaged in, and there are some that should not be engaged in; but like patent disputes, it would be unfortunate of this Congress to say, "We hereby outlaw disputes growing out of disputes over patents."

Mr. SMITH. You think the Eightieth Congress was out of step with public opinion in this country?

Mr. CAREY. I think the Eightieth Congress was out of step with public opinion of this country, and I think a great mistake was made when they interpreted editorials as representing the ideas of the people. I think they are particularly out of step if they think the people want any provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. SMITH. Do you think the Seventy-ninth Congress was out of step?

Mr. CAREY. Yes, sir; and I think——

Mr. SMITH. And if the Eighty-first does not repeal the Taft-Hartley they will still be out of step?

Mr. CAREY. Yes, sir. I think they will not redeem the confidence of the people if they do not repeal the Taft-Hartley Act and restore the Wagner Act, with a few amendments brought about after consideration.

That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Carey, what do you think about placing the Mediation and Conciliation Service in the Department of Labor—do you think it should be there, or should be an independent agency?

Mr. CAREY. Sir, as an administrator—and I am required to assist in the administration of the affairs of a free and substantial organization—I would say that they should have the Conciliation Service under the direction of a department of the Government, and under the direction of a Cabinet member, as I would suggest every agency of Government should have some orderly process in dealing with questions like the question of authority on the floor. It is question, I think, which has been kicked about and made a political football. Certainly the Conciliation Service made a splendid contribution to this country under the Department of Labor. Congress, in its wisdom, placed it there in the first instance, and I think that is where it properly belongs. I do not think an employer, at the present time, as head of the Conciliation Service, is sufficiently familiar with it to say that could not be conducted in a very beneficial way. I think the Department of Labor would be the proper place to have the Conciliation Service, and we could have a splendid record of achievement for that branch in that way.

However, the CIO believes that is a matter to be dealt with by the administration.

And I might point this out: It might be a jurisdictional dispute of the kind raised just previously, and I do not think the Taft-Hartley Act governs it, however.

Mr. KELLEY. Of course, one of the things the Eightieth Congress did was to weaken the Labor Department, and practically destroy the Conciliation Service as it existed. The proper approach would have been for it to strengthen it instead of to weaken it; is that not right?

Mr. CAREY. That is particularly true, because in the world today there is a campaign going on to destroy the confidence of working people in democratic institutions, and during that period the Eightieth Congress should have directed its activities toward strengthening the Department of Labor, and thereby strengthening the confidence of the American people in the Government.

We set forth on pages 33 and 34 material regarding that particular question in the brief prepared by Arthur Goldberg.

Mr. KELLEY. Did you read the report of the Committee on Executive Expenditures in the Eightieth Congress, when they had Mr. Denham before them, and they discovered Mr. Denham was taking jurisdiction over the smallest of companies in the United States where they had labor disputes, in companies with three or four employees, and he had decided that it would come under his jurisdiction because the articles which they bought to sell were bought outside of the State? There was a great deal of surprise manifested by that committee at the time, but it just goes to show that on one side of its mouth the Congress was talking about curbing the authority and the jurisdiction of administrators, and then, out of the other side of its mouth, it gave to Mr. Denham, chief counsel, more authority and more jurisdiction than had been given before to any Administrator, and they did not discover that until after the bill was written. Are you familiar with that?

Mr. CAREY. I am, sir, and Denham goes even further, beyond the broad discretionary powers he has under the law, and commits abuse after abuse, and he is, I understand, one who believes he is a czar of management-labor relations in this country.

Mr. KELLEY. He is, under the bill; there is no appeal, is there?

Mr. CAREY. But there is no need in our democracy for such a thing as that. Czars are quite foreign to our concept of our way of life. The people should live together.

Mr. KELLEY. One of the purposes of the Taft-Hartley bill that was told to us so frequently when we were considering the bill in the committee, and I think it has appeared in the newspapers, and the commentators have expressed an opinion about it, was that the purpose of the bill was to free the rank and file members of labor unions from the influence of their labor officials or labor leaders.

Mr. CAREY. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY. The elections that were held under the Taft-Hartley bill for decision on the union shop definitely proved that not to be true, because about 98 percent of all of the elections—and they had to be elections of the majority of the membership, and not of those present—98 percent voted for the union shop, which certainly was convincing argument enough that the rank and file members were satisfied with their leadership.

Mr. CAREY. Yes, sir; and it is suprising too for a labor leader to give expressions on matters pertaining to labor, a labor leader has to win an election supervised by the Government; but Gerard Reilly or Charles E. Wilson, or anyone else, can come down and express views about labor situations and internal matters of trade-unions without having the kind of credentials a labor leader is required to have and I think by and large even Senator Taft would admit that that provision about shop elections is a mistake and should be removed. He has already stated that. And I think a 98 percent vote in Federal-conducted elections would be sufficient indication of hypocrisy involved in this kind of legislation as to whether workers need protection from their unions. The workers in this country pretty much support their unions and by and large the workers in this country honor and respect the labor leaders, and you could put in a goldfish bowl all the difficulties that go on because of labor leaders, and I say that from my own personal knowledge. You can be sure if there were any difficulties, Westbrook Pegler would have published them and they would have been contained in a great number of papers in the country.

Mr. KELLEY. Is that not true with a great number of members of organization, and even nonorganized groups, that they followed some leadership in the days before labor organizations became so widespread, and the open shop was the prevailing thing in industry?

Who controlled those men? The industry bosses did. They followed that leadership. If they do not follow the leadership of their own group, they will follow leadership of subversive groups. Do you think that is true?

Mr. CAREY. I do.

Mr. KELLEY. That is all the questions I have.

Mr. IRVING. Will you yield?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes. I have a minute left.

Mr. IRVING. There is one thing that has been bothering me, and that is at the time of the passage of the bill and veto of the President, and so forth, he predicted the bill would lead to strikes and dissension. It has been brought out that these results have not come about. My opinion is that labor members and labor leaders in general are law-abiding citizens, and they thought the best way to handle the situation, rather than to involve themselves in things like that, was to exercise their constitutional rights and try to change the Congress and the lawmakers, and that is the reason for those particular results not developing, and there is a possibility if the law stays on the books, and unemployment becomes prevalent, that we may have more of that situation.

Do you agree that possibly that was the attitude of labor, that they were going to go about this in a constitutional manner and try to eliminate the law—or the worst features of it—by electing more reasonable people to the Congress of the United States?

Mr. CAREY. Yes, sir; and they still have that idea in mind. I might say there has been a great deal of misinformation put out that the Taft-Hartley law is responsible for the splendid relationship that exists, say, in the steel industry and other industries of mass production, in mass production industries, and they take credit for that; but the contract negotiated in the steel industry that brought about and guaranteed the harmonious relationship between management and labor was a 2-year contract negotiated before the Taft-Hartley Act and, in fact, the Taft-Hartley Act would make illegal the negotiations of that same contract today, because it would prohibit the same kind of security provisions that is in that contract.

I would like to indicate a feeling of gratitude as an American citizen to the American workers in their patience in following the proper procedures in dealing with their problems, because they should be commended and I think the American working force in this country have a record of producing in war and in peace beyond any other section of the American society.

You take the legal profession, the medical profession, or the educational profession, or any other, and they would not have a record of production similar to the American mass-production worker in this country, and I think they deserve not antilabor legislation but a better approach in assisting them and meeting their problems.

Mr. KELLEY. The Chair wishes to announce that we have some distinguished gentlemen who came in as guests, and I am going to introduce them to the audience and the committee:

Mr. Claudio Rocchi, Mr. Giovanni Canini, and Mr. Pasquale Montanaro, who are leaders of the Italian labor movement.

Also Mr. Giulio Pastore, representative of the Italian Government.

Will you gentlemen please rise? [Applause.]

Mr. Velde, do you have any questions?

Mr. VELDE. I have no questions.

Mr. KELLEY. That is all for Mr. Carey and Mr. Goldberg.

Mr. Goldberg, do you want to make a statement?

Mr. GOLDBERG. Mr. Chairman, I do not have a statement, but I should like to sit here with Mr. McDonald, the secretary-treasurer of the United Steelworkers of America, with your permission and, as I said, I would be glad to answer any questions.

Mr. KELLEY. I want to thank you, Mr. Carey, for appearing this morning.

Mr. CAREY. Thank you very much.

Mr. KELLEY. We will now hear from Mr. Buckmaster, president of the United Rubber Workers.

May I present Mr. G. L. Patterson, general counsel for the United Rubber Workers, who will accompany Mr. Buckmaster.

You may proceed, Mr. Buckmaster.

TESTIMONY OF L. S. BUCKMASTER, PRESIDENT, UNITED RUBBER, CORK, LINOLEUM, AND PLASTIC WORKERS OF AMERICA, CIO

Mr. BUCKMASTER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my name is L. S. Buckmaster. Since September 1945 I have been and am now president of the United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum and Plastic Workers of America, International Union, which is affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations. I am also a vice president of the CIO, and a member of the executive board of the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

At the outset of my statement concerning legislation which is pending before the Congress of the United States, I want to express my sincere appreciation for this opportunity to express my views.

The Congress of the United States is considering bills which have been introduced in both the Senate and the House of Representatives to repeal the Taft-Hartley law and reenact the Wagner Act with certain amendments. The organization which I am privileged to represent expressed its opposition to the passage of the Taft-Hartley law by appearing before the Senate Labor Committee at the time that law was being considered by the Congress. Our opposition to the passage of the Taft-Hartley law was based primarily upon the ground that the Taft-Hartley Act would hamper and eventually destroy free collective bargaining, that it was unworkable, and that it undertook to punish labor by the imposition of unreasonable and unwarranted penalties and restrictions. Two years of experience with the Taft-Hartley law has more than confirmed the views which my organization expressed when that law was under consideration by the Congress.

The views which I am going to present to you here today are based upon the experience of a union which has not felt any of the crushing blows of the Taft-Hartley law that some unions have. The rubber workers' union has been able to utilize the facilities of the National Labor Relations Board because our organization filed the required financial statements and affidavits within 90 days after the effective date of the Taft-Hartley Act on August 23, 1947. Consequently, the rubber workers' union has been able to petition for certification of representatives, to intervene in cases filed before the National Labor Relations Board by rival organizations, and to file unfair-labor-practice charges. Except for one unfair labor charge filed by an individual against one of our local unions, which was dismissed, the rubber workers' union has not been charged with unfair labor practices. This union was a party defendant to a lawsuit filed by one employer for the recovery of $500,000 because certain individual employees of a local union were claimed by the company to have engaged in unauthorized strike action 1 hour before the 60-day notice period required by the Taft-Hartley law had expired. Fortunately that suit was voluntarily dismissed by the employer in the interest of promoting better relationships. This union has not been on the receiving end of any injunction issued under the Taft-Hartley law. These things are mentioned to you so that you will know that the views which I express are founded upon careful consideration of the effect the Taft-Hartley law has had upon collective bargaining and industrial relations and not because the rubber workers' union has suffered from the many penalties that it might have suffered under the Taft-Hartley law.

The mere fact that we have not suffered the penalties of injunctions, unfair-labor-practice charges, or claims for damages does not mean that we have not felt severely the impact of this law. On the contrary, almost every function of our organization has been hampered and made more difficult by it. We have experienced the effect of these useless restrictions in the attempted organization of unorganized workers, in the actual process of collective bargaining, in the administration of collective bargaining agreements, and in the administration of the international union and the local unions.

Because of the fear that this punitive law has created in the minds of many workers, which I shall discuss more fully later, it is far more difficult to persuade employees of the advantages of self-organization and collective bargaining.

In the actual process of collective bargaining we find repeated instances of employers injecting the provisions of the law into the labor contract. In this connection, I might say that the technicalities created by the Taft-Hartley law encourage many employers to insist upon additional restrictions which the law doesn't require.

The impact of the law is also apparent in the handling of union affairs. It didn't require a law to make this union publish its financial standing. Long before the Taft-Hartley law was passed we furnished to our members and the public a quarterly and yearly report of all our receipts and disbursements. The requirements of the Taft-Hartley law respecting financial reports have taken an endless amount of time of local union officers, international representatives, and international officers, which might have been used to a much better advantage in the handling of labor-management problems and in the creation of improved labor relationships.

The law has also operated to disrupt peaceful relationships. In one case where we had enjoyed a collective-bargaining relationship over a period of 10 years or more, we had to take the time and spend in excess of $1,000 in the defense of a claim that a craft union should be carved out of the long-established industrial unit. An election was ordered; the result was a tie. So the question is still unsettled, rivalry prevails in the plant, relations are seriously affected and will likely continue to be. Why? Only because the Taft-Hartley law encourages a carving up of established and stable bargaining units.

It is my considered judgment that the Congress of the United States will make a great contribution to the public welfare and to the establishment of sound labor-management relationships by promptly repealing the Taft-Hartley Act and reenacting the Wagner Act with the amendments which have been proposed in the administration bill. In an economy such as ours free collective bargaining is essential. So long as the Taft-Hartley Act remains on the statute books, free collective bargaining is impossible.

The administration bill takes into account the fact that labor organizations consist of human beings and consequently make mistakes. Machinery is provided by the amendments to the Wagner Act contained in the administration bill to handle the several abuses of which some labor organizations have been guilty. The administration bill contemplates the use of machinery to correct situations which result in interference with interstate commerce. The administration bill does not undertake to punish labor as the Taft-Hartley Act does.

An attempt has been made by certain representatives of industry in their testimony before this committee and the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare to create the impression that the Taft-Hartley Act has made labor leaders more responsible. One witness pointed to several concessions that were made by his company in negotiations with the Rubber Workers Union in 1948. An inference at least was created that this union would not have negotiated with that company except for the existence of the Taft-Hartley Act. In order to keep the record straight, I should like to say that the Rubber Workers negotiated a wage increase with the big-four rubber companies in 1948. We negotiated to improve vacations, severance-pay provisions, and other improvements. We succeeded in doing this in spite of, not because of, the Taft-Hartley Act. The fact of the matter is that we could have engaged lawfully in strike action against the big-four rubber companies in 1948 instead of following the procedure of tedious and prolonged collective bargaining and that strike action could have been lawfully taken because the required notices in the Taft-Hartley Act had been given and our contracts could have been canceled. It was not the Taft-Hartley Act that brought about a settlement with the big-four rubber companies which employ in excess of 100,000 people whom we represent, but it was because we bargained out our differences to a conclusion. We could have struck those plants lawfully in spite of all of the restrictions of the Taft-Hartley Act. Under these circumstances it cannot be said in connection with the settlements we made in the rubber industry in 1948 that the union was made more responsible because of the Taft-Hartley Act.

This subcommittee might also be interested in knowing that in 1946 and in 1947 we negotiated wage settlements and other improvements with the same big-four rubber companies without strike action and before there was any Taft-Hartley Act to create this so-called responsibility.

The Taft-Hartley Act is a bad law because it hampers and restricts collective bargaining, because it is not designed to correct some abuses of organized labor but is calculated to punish and destroy organized labor. If you gentlemen had had the experience of sitting around the collective bargaining table with four of the big rubber companies in 1946 and 1947 and then again in 1948, as I did, you could make a comparison; you could see how collective bargaining was hampered. Prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act we had established a rather broad pattern of maintenance of membership and automatic check-off of union dues. In 1948 the same companies which had previously granted maintenance-of-membership and automatic check-off clauses in collective bargaining, could not grant them even though they wanted to. The law had stepped in and imposed needless and unnecessary strait-jackets upon both the union and the employer. The company could not grant a maintenance-of-membership provision because we had not petitioned for elections to be conducted in 41 plants scattered all over the United States from coast to coast among a hundred thousand employees. Moreover, the laws of some States in which plants were located were more restrictive and as you know the Taft-Hartley law surrenders to the State laws on union and security matters. Since these elections had not been conducted we could not enter into the same kind of a contract we did before even though the labor-management relationships under the maintenance-of-membership arrangements had improved substantially in the years immediately prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Moreover, the automatic check-off could no longer be granted because of the restrictions on this subject, despite the fact that the automatic check-off had become a satisfactory arrangement.

Untold difficulty was encountered in the collective-bargaining process because the law provided that individual employees who were enjoying the benefits of collective bargaining but were having a free ride could short-circuit the established grievance procedure and settle their own grievances. On this subject a tremendous amount of time, effort, and energy was expended to come within the provisions of the law and yet preserve grievance procedures which had been carefully worked out over a period of time.

The uncertainty of the law with respect to notice of termination of contracts created endless problems. Over a period of several years the rubber industry and the rubber workers' union had agreed that the general wage scale should not be subject to arbitration and that this subject could be opened for negotiation when conditions warranted doing so. The rubber industry recognized for years that the union had a right to strike over the general wage scale if we got into a disagreement when that subject was reopened during the life of the contract. The fact of the matter is that since VJ-day there has been no major strike in the rubber industry over a disagreement on the general wage scale during the life of an agreement, even though such strikes could have been conducted.

Compare this record with what has happened in industries where wages are frozen for the life of the agreement. You find that considerable strike action occurs the moment those contracts expire. Where the right to strike over a wage dispute was preserved under a wage reopening clause of the labor contract, few, if any, strikes occurred. Where the wage scale is frozen for a long period of time and the right to strike over a general wage demand is suspended for the duration of the agreement, strikes result as soon as the agreement permits.

Section 8 (d) (4) of the Taft-Hartley Act, in my opinion, which casts considerable doubt upon the legality of strike action until the agreement expires, contributes to industrial disturbance and encourages strikes.

The uncertainty of the notice provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act created grave doubts whether we could lawfully strike under a wage-reopening clause if the remainder of the contract continued in effect. Based upon the history of collective bargaining in the rubber industry, it should be quite apparent that this provision of the Taft-Hartley Act will eventually operate to encourage strikes at the end of contracts rather than eliminate them.

The provision requiring an election to authorize the union to negotiate a union-security provision encourages strikes. The most serious strike we had in the rubber industry since the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act was because one of our local unions won an election by an overwhelming majority authorizing union security and the employer had refused to grant it thereafter.

I have found a deep-seated resentment among hundreds of the members of the rubber workers' union to the encouragement which the Taft-Hartley Act gives to the use of injunctions. This is particularly true since the law authorizes one man, the general counsel of the NLRB, to seek injunctions against unions on behalf of the Government. We all know that an injunction never settles anything in connection with a labor dispute. It only creates a legal contest, the effect of which is to engender resentments and hatreds which exist for many months and even years after the dispute is settled. The injunction discourages collective bargaining and arbitration, which, after all, are the means by which industrial disputes are ultimately settled.

It has always been shocking to me that a destructive statute such as the Taft-Hartley Act should have been passed immediately after World War II. The act made it appear as though organized labor should be punished severely, probably destroyed, after an unprecedented job of productivity which it had done during the war years. Labor and management had learned a lot of things as a result of their experience during the war. Union security had been a national policy. The Taft-Hartley law made union security as difficult as possible. Automatic check-off during the war was a national policy so far as the rubber industry was concerned. The Taft-Hartley law made an automatic check-off a crime. Labor and management were encouraged to set up sensible grievance procedures during the war.

The Taft-Hartley Act encouraged injunctions. Labor and management were encouraged to set up arbitration procedures. The Taft-Hartley Act did nothing to encourage its continuance. All of the know-how which labor and management had gained during the war years to attain sensible, sound, stabilized industrial relations were scrapped by the philosophy, purpose, and effect of the Taft-Hartley Act.

There is one broad general aspect of the Taft-Hartley Act which I believe deserves comment. I do not know whether the Members of Congress have perceived this fact or not. Those of us, however, who are close to the labor-management scene know that it exists. For years the workers felt that the Government policy was to encourage the process of collective bargaining. The passage of the Taft-Hartley Act has created a fear—a dangerous fear, I think. The publicity given to the Taft-Hartley Act and its administration has confused the minds of the workers of this country. They feel that collective bargaining is no longer encouraged as a national policy. They feel that the national policy is to discourage collective bargaining. The things that they hear most about, the things that they see printed, are those things which indicate that the Government is punishing unions, issuing injunctions against unions, and discouraging collective bargaining.

The workers of this country have the feeling that the protections which were afforded them by the Wagner Act no longer exist. We know that, in our economy as it is constituted today, chaos would exist in labor-management relations if collective bargaining were not well established. The administration bill undertakes to reestablish the national policy of encouraging collective bargaining. It imposes upon employers and labor unions certain restrictions which are not intended to punish either management or labor but are designed and intended to create machinery for the handling of disputes so that the commerce of our country will not be interfered with.

There is another aspect of the Taft-Hartley law to which our attention should be directed. Section 13 of title I provides—

> Nothing in this act, except as specifically provided for herein, shall be construed so as either to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way the right to strike, or to affect the limitations or qualifications on that right.

The supporters of the Taft-Hartley law frequently referred to this section in their effort to show how fair to labor the Taft-Hartley Act is.

In their frequent references to this alleged preservation of the right to strike, they conveniently omitted any reference to a booby trap in another section of the law which makes the right to strike a farce or a sham.

The Taft-Hartley Act contains a booby trap in the representation section. I refer you to section 9 (c) (3), which contains the simple sentence, "Employees on strike who are not entitled to reinstatement shall not be entitled to vote." I am sure that other witnesses have referred to this provision. The right to strike set out so boldly in section 13 is rendered meaningless by the sentence just quoted from section 9 (c) (3).

Where employees decide that strike action is necessary to gain their economic demands, even where they have complied with all of the detailed procedure required by the Taft-Hartley Act, they can lose their jobs permanently. Assuming that a union has done all of the things required by the law and has followed meticulously all of the notice requirements and has terminated its contractual relationship with the employer and it is unable to negotiate a satisfactory wage settlement or is unable to negotiate satisfactorily a new labor contract, employees who go on strike do so at their own risk.

The sentence contained in section 9 (c) (3) has been interpreted by the National Labor Relations Board in the Pipe Machinery Co. case to mean that an employer may advise economic strikers during their strike that if they do not return to work on or before a date fixed by the employer they will be replaced by permanent employees. Furthermore, the striking employees are prohibited by the law from engaging in mass picketing to prevent strikebreakers from taking their jobs. Consequently, the right to strike under the Taft-Hartley Act has become a nullity, a hollow right, a right which does not actually exist.

In addition to all of the other reasons which have been given to show that the Taft-Hartley law is a bad law, this indirect invasion and destruction of the right to strike should be enough to justify the repeal of the law.

Gentlemen, there is no democratic substitute for free collective bargaining. Without free collective bargaining, you have either domination of labor-management relations by Government or by management. I have always felt that collective bargaining is the great bulwark of democracy in an industrial economy such as ours. The Taft-Hartley law threatens to undermine and will eventually destroy collective bargaining.

Before the Taft-Hartley law, organized labor performed a production job during the recent war which stands as a monument to the effectiveness of free collective bargaining. After the war and before the Taft-Hartley law was passed, industry, labor, and the public enjoyed a period of prosperity unequaled in the history of our country because labor was free and collective bargaining was free.

This Eighty-first Congress will make a monumental contribution to the public welfare by passing the administration bill.

That completes, Mr. Chairman, the prepared statement which I have.

Mr. BAILEY (presiding). Mr. Buckmaster, on page 8 of your presentation, speaking of the booby trap in the representation section of the Taft-Hartley Act—that is, section 9 (c) (3)—do you not think that employers in many instances have taken advantage, and will in the future if the Taft-Hartley Act remains on the statute book, take advantage of this clause which says employees on strike who are not entitled to reinstatement shall not be entitled to vote? Do you not think that that will be used as a strikebreaking provision in case we have increased unemployment in this country?

Mr. BUCKMASTER. Mr. Chairman, I think very definitely that will be used. I think, as has been stated by other witnesses, that industry generally did not attempt to put into effect all of the restrictive provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act for pretty well-known reasons. But there have been some few exceptions in that record; that is, we know that in the oil-workers' strike, in the typographical-union difficulties, and in the packinghouse-workers' strike, we did find there employers who were quite willing to take full advantage of these provisions which I have mentioned here, and to try to destroy the unions involved in those situations. And I am firmly convinced that, if this law is permitted to remain on the statute books, there will be more and more employers, with the encouragement of organizations like the NAM, who will take full advantage of the vicious provisions of this law. I think they are just holding back, and have been holding back until a favorable time came. I have reasons to believe that.

Mr. BAILEY. Will you not agree that the recent decision by Mr. Denham, of the National Labor Relations Board, in which their ruling was to the effect that men employed in a plant that was struck were denied the right to participate in a collective-bargaining election, but giving the same right to the employees who have been brought in, who might be referred to as strikebreakers, giving them the right to vote, that this is an effective means to destroy all labor unions?

Mr. BUCKMASTER. I think very definitely it is. Now, the fact that they have not used it yet in this country to any great extent does not mean that they cannot use it, and the way has been paved for them to use it.

Mr. BAILEY. In other words, their attempt to regulate has resulted in the power to destroy; is that right?

Mr. BUCKMASTER. That is what I firmly believe, Mr. Congressman. I think these two provisions to which I made reference there, hooked together in a strike situation, can be used to destroy any labor union, no matter how powerful it is, because if the rules on mass picketing as they have been interpreted by the legal counsel are enforced, then no union can prevent strikebreakers from being employed to take the place of people who are out on strike. And then, if they enforce the other provisions, when it comes to a settlement of the situation, that settlement might be brought about in many ways, because we have decertification proceedings instituted by the strikebreakers and rule out the union which has held the bargaining right, and the people who are on strike, contrary to the way it is under the old Wagner Act, no longer retain their status as employees, because they have been permanently replaced. Under the old Wagner Act, as I understand it, people out on a legitimate strike, where they are not out in violation of the law, retain their status as employees, and they were entitled to the protection of the Government in getting back on their job after the strike is settled.

That would no longer be the case under this law. They lose their rights as employees and thereby lose their employment if the employer sees fit to make use of that. That is all he has to do.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Buckmaster, on page 10 of your statement, I notice the paragraph in the middle of the page which says:

> The provision requiring an election to authorize the union to negotiate a union-security provision encourages strikes.

Do you not think that, if the employees are bound by that election, the employer should be bound by it, too?

Mr. BUCKMASTER. I certainly do, if it is to accomplish any good purpose.

Mr. IRVING. In order to be fair—and these fellows are supposed to be fair—if the employees participate in the election and have to be bound by the results, I think it would be fair that the employer be bound by the results, too, instead of having this provision to defeat the union shop security provision after the election has been held.

Mr. BUCKMASTER. I think that, if this provision of the law was intended to have any good purpose, then, in accordance with the principles of majority rule which we observe in this country, they should be compelled to observe the results of this election. That provision has created a lot of trouble, as I have pointed out. I mentioned only one instance where it gave us a great deal of difficulty, but the people, because this law is hard to understand, get the idea that if they participate in an election on the union-security question before a Government agency, and if they win out by an overwhelming majority, which they nearly always do, then that should mean something, that should bring some benefit to them. But it is just a hollow victory. It does not mean anything. And then, when the employer goes against their understanding of their right to enjoy this union security, that immediately creates a conflict between the employer and the people in the union, and no amount of explanation can make those people in our union understand that that was just a sham and did not mean anything and that they did not gain anything by going out and voting that day.

Now, the American people like to believe, when they participate in an election directed by their Government, that it is going to mean something and is not just going to be a picked skeleton without any meat on its bones.

Mr. IRVING. In other words, you would think that this November 2d election would mean something?

Mr. BUCKMASTER. Some people, I think, believe that that does not mean anything, either. But we think it does.

Mr. IRVING. In other words, that provision, then, is just another one of the one-sided provisions that protect the employers and do not protect the employees, as I understand it.

Mr. BUCKMASTER. It is not only one-sided, but it is another one of those provisions which, without accomplishing any purpose for either labor or management, takes a lot of the time of our representatives and our local union officers and our shop stewards, preparing for those things. And it also takes money.

Mr. IRVING. And it is discouraging to union members and union officials, too, I imagine.

Mr. BUCKMASTER. It is discouraging.

Mr. IRVING. I know you are not a building tradesman, and I see none on the schedule as witnesses here. But I understand that Senator Taft was dubious about the building and construction industry being covered by the law. But it has been pretty well covered either by Mr. Denham or the language of the law, anyway. To my knowledge, there has been only one election held in the building and construction industry, and that was up in Pennsylvania. Of course, the election resulted in a union shop, or whatever you might call it. They found it very impractical to go on construction jobs and hold elections where an employee might be working for one contractor today and another one tomorrow and another one the next day.

However, the effects of the law have been felt definitely in the construction industry.

My understanding of the law—and I am getting into the craft, although perhaps you do not understand it from the point of view of that industry, but I notice you mentioned it in your statement—is that if eight laborers were on a job doing carpenter work or boilermaking work, they would be the only ones entitled to vote in that election. And naturally, if they wanted that work, they would all vote for their having jurisdiction over that work. It seems to me that that is a rather unusual procedure for settling jurisdictional disputes in any industry. It is very unfair, of course.

Mr BUCKMASTER. I think it is, too. You refer to this reference I made to the act's encouraging the carving out of craft unions, out of established bargaining units.

Mr. IRVING. Yes; I refer to that. Of course, the crafts are already carved out in the building trades. But it sets up a confusion there. As I understand it, any craft that happens to be on the work are the only ones entitled to vote on that work, or whether they have jurisdiction over that work.

Mr. BUCKMASTER. That is right.

Mr. IRVING. And, from a selfish point of view, if one union or even just a few employees who happened to be on that work wanted the work of another craft, they could win it by this so-called election. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. BUCKMASTER. That creates many problems in the administration of that plant, in that relationship between all the employees and the employer.

Mr. IRVING. Then, again, if the employer wanted to take advantage of the economic situation whereby he was employing a lower grade of craft, he could do that very successfully.

Mr. BUCKMASTER. I suppose so.

Mr. IRVING. Or, if he favored another craft, even though the rates were comparable, he could show discrimination in favor of one craft over the other, if he happens to have a personal dislike for that craft or its representatives or for any other reason, or if one had more pressure or more strength than the other. It does not seem to me that it solves the situation that it is supposed to solve in any manner.

It think that is all.

Mr. KELLEY (presiding). Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. I did not get an opportunity to hear your testimony. I just wanted to ask you one or two questions. I notice here you say the Taft-Hartley Act is a bad law because it hampers and restricts collective bargaining, because it is not designed to correct some abuses of organized labor.

Would you mind naming them?

Mr. BUCKMASTER. What I mean by the statement is that in my opinion the primary purpose of the law is not just to correct abuses, as many of its proponents have said, but it is to punish organized labor. I understand that you could get another meaning out of it.

Mr. MCCONNELL. That is right. Yes; I did. I wondered what you meant there.

Mr. BUCKMASTER. But it does set out to correct some so-called abuses. But I do not believe that is the purpose of the law. It was widely publicized that that was the main purpose of the law, just to correct abuses.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Do you favor the enactment of H. R. 2032?

Mr. BUCKMASTER. Yes; I do. I understand that that bill preserves the rights which labor had under the Wagner Act, and that that bill does offer machinery, or set up machinery, which will help to correct labor disputes, and that it also helps to correct some of the so-called abuses by labor, in a more effective manner than does the Taft-Hartley Act. That is, I do not think you can correct these abuses of labor by getting out injunctions. You can set up some other machinery which would be much more effective and much more democratic.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Do you think the President has the inherent power, as the Attorney General states, through the injunctive process or possibly some type of military process, to enforce a sort of truce in a national-emergency strike?

Mr. BUCKMASTER. Not being a lawyer, I would hesitate to venture an opinion on that. When lawyers fall out about it, I do not think I should venture into that field, because I am a layman. I do not know. I think there has been a lot of controversy about it.

Mr. MCCONNELL. All right, sir. That is all. Thank you.

Mr. KELLEY. Thank you very much, Mr. Buckmaster.

Mr. BUCKMASTER. Thank you.

Mr. KELLEY. If there be no objection, I offer for inclusion in the record statements by Clark C. Sorenson, director of personnel, Harris-Seybold Co., of Cleveland, Ohio; Farrell Dobbs, national chairman of the Socialist Workers Party; Donald L. Jordan, president of the Johnson-Carper Furniture Co., of Roanoke, Va.; John C. Juras, president of the Iroquois Foundry Co., of Racine, Wis.; Tyre Taylor, general counsel, Southern States Industrial Council; L. B. Bewley, chairman of the legislative committee, Associated Industries of Alabama; E. J. Kessler, representing the personnel directors' club of the Manufacturers Association of Lancaster City and County, Pa.; Harold W. Story, vice president, Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co.; and A. F. Whitney, president, Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen; also letters from Bryant H. Prentice, Jr., general personnel manager, Kraft Foods Co., Chicago; Joe Wood, an employee of Paragon Electric Co., Two Rivers, Wis.; and Harry W. Naubert, personnel manager, St. Paul & Tacoma Lumber Co., Tacoma, Wash.

Without objection, they will be inserted in the appendix following the close of today's record.[1]

This committee will stand in recess until 1:45 p. m., when the first witness will be Mr. David McDonald.

(Whereupon, at 12:15 p. m., a recess was taken until 1:45 p. m. of the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

(Pursuant to recess, the subcommittee reconvened at 1:45 p. m.)

Mr. KELLEY. The meeting will please come to order, and we will hear Mr. David J. McDonald.

Mr. GOLDBERG. Mr. Chairman, I will appear with Mr. McDonald, if there is no objection.

Mr. KELLEY. That will be all right.

TESTIMONY OF DAVID J. McDONALD, SECRETARY-TREASURER, ACCOMPANIED BY ARTHUR GOLDBERG, GENERAL COUNSEL, UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA

Mr. MCDONALD. My name is David J. McDonald. I am secretary-treasurer of the United Steelworkers of America, an organization representing almost a million members in the basic steel and steel-fabric industries, on whose behalf I am appearing today. I urge you to act favorably on H. R. 2032, the bill which is before you and which repeals the Taft-Hartley Act and reenacts the Wagner Act with certain amendments.

There has been filed with the committee by Arthur J. Goldberg, who is general counsel of my union, the United Steelworkers of America, a detailed analysis of the Taft-Hartley Act and of our experience under the act. He has also presented for the committee an analysis of the Wagner Act and the amendments which the bill adds to the act. In addition, he has proposed certain technical changes in the bill.

Since this detailed statement has been filed, I will not burden the committee with any elaborate exposition of the evils of the Taft-Hartley Act and the advantages to all of our people of the Wagner Act with the proposed amendments.

I think there is a tendency to overlook the fact that the Taft-Hartley Act and the Wagner Act are based upon fundamentally different philosophies.

I think we in America must choose between the philosophy of the Wagner Act and the philosophy of the Taft-Hartley Act.

---

I would go a step further; I think we in America have chosen.

We have chosen the philosophy of the Wagner Act. This choice is plainly reflected in the recent election. It is reflected in the growing resentment of people everywhere over the continued failure of Congress to act upon the mandate of the election and erase the Taft-Hartley Act from the books.

Those who would divert our labor policy from the path of the Wagner Act either do not understand or misrepresent the nature and scope of that act. I am convinced that they have completely ignored or concealed the magnificent contribution of the Wagner Act to the making of a better America.

Let me tell you something about the law and the way the law has operated in the struggle to unionize the steel industry.

Organization of the steel industry began in 1936 when the Steelworkers Organizing Committee, of which I was also secretary-treasurer, was formed.

This was not the first time that efforts were made to unionize the steel industry.

The Homestead strike of 1892 was followed by the adoption of a policy on the part of Big Steel against unions.

Two historic efforts were made to turn back this policy and bring the benefits of unionism to the basic steel industry. Both of these efforts were made under the leadership of the old Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel and Tin Workers.

The first unionization campaign occurred in 1908–09 when, after a 14-month strike, unionism was eliminated from the entire basic steel industry.

Ten years later in 1919 the second attempt to unionize the industry took place.

The third attempt to unionize the industry took place after the Wagner Act was passed. Sometimes it is difficult to realize how new industrial unionism is in our basic steel industry.

Think of it. Organization commenced in 1936 in the basic steel industry. By the time the Taft-Hartley Act was passed in 1947, the Steelworkers Union held collective-bargaining contracts with over 2,000 employers covering over 1,000,000 employees.

In 1935 and 1936, the basic minimum common labor rate in the industry was 47 cents per hour.

Before the Taft-Hartley Act was passed, the Steelworkers Union had negotiated general increases totaling 55½ cents an hour with only one major strike. It has, in addition, received inequity increases which averaged more than 6½ cents per hour. It raised the common labor rate before the Taft-Hartley Act from 47 cents per hour to $1.09 per hour.

Under the Wagner Act the union secured contractual overtime. It obtained for its membership shift differentials for the second and third shifts. It obtained in many establishments holiday pay.

Prior to the Wagner Act vacations were usually no more than 1 week after 5 years of service, if any vacation at all was granted. Under the Wagner Act a vacation program was worked out under which employees received 1 week's vacation for 1 year's service, 2 weeks for 5 years' service, and 3 weeks for 25 years' service. In addition, the Wagner Act made possible such gains as reporting pay and severance allowances.

Today, as a result of the Wagner Act, workers in our industry enjoy a system of seniority. The old evil system under which supervisors bought and sold jobs for a price has been abolished.

Today every worker knows what his rights are, and those rights are protected through a grievance procedure and arbitration machinery. Thousands of grievances are filed every year and disposed of in an orderly and fair fashion.

In an agreement with the United States Steel Corp. and the other basic steel companies, we have provided for arbitration machinery for the life of the agreement. This arbitration procedure is a model of its kind and marks a great step forward in labor-management cooperation in the interest of industrial peace. Similar arrangements are in effect with the Aluminum Co. of America and thousands of other companies.

As a result of the Wagner Act and as a result of the organization of our great union, it was possible for the union and the employers in the industry to agree upon a program for the elimination of wage-rate inequities and the orderly classification of jobs. This pioneering program has converted a chaotic and an inequitable wage structure into one based on reason and fairness.

Bear in mind that the benefits which I have described, and others as well, have been achieved throughout the entire basic steel industry with the exception of only two companies. These companies have from the beginning fought the U. S. S. W. Union and resisted bona fide unionism.

Let me make clear just how the Wagner Act has operated to promote the growth of our union.

The Wagner Act has two major parts: one dealing with unfair labor practices and the other dealing with industrial elections.

The unfair labor practice provisions are very simple. They outlaw company unions: they forbid discrimination because of union activity: they require collective bargaining, and they prohibit employer interference with and restraint of the right to self-organization.

Every one of these provisions has served an important purpose in the unionization of the steel industry. The coercion provisions, for example, have operated to take away form employers a method of forcing employees out of unions or discouraging self-organization.

Most valuable have been the provisions against company unions. The most effective weapon which was used to fight bona fide unionism was the company union or the employee representation plan. Virtually every major producer in the industry fought to beat down the threat of unionism with a company union.

The prohibition on discrimination gave men the courage to join unions. It made them confident that if the employer discriminated against them or blacklisted them, redress would be furnished by their Government.

The utility of the collective-bargaining provisions is too obvious for comment. It was these provisions which, as interpreted by the Supreme Court, led many employers in the industry to agree to sign collective-bargaining contracts.

The election provisions were no less important that the unfair labor practice provisions in bringing unionism to the basic steel industries. It was under these election provisions that polls were made in virtually all of the establishments in Little Steel. It was under these provisions that the largest and most far-flung industrial elections that were ever held on the face of the earth were conducted.

Are all these accomplishments something to be ignored, repudiated, or put aside?

On the contrary, it is these accomplishments which emphasize that this law is indispensable to a sound and free America.

I would like to digress here just a moment from my prepared statement to bring to your attention the agreement between Carnegie-Illinois Steel Corp., and the United Steelworkers of America, CIO, for the production and maintenance employees, dated April 22, 1947, at Pittsburgh, Pa., which was exactly 2 months before the Taft-Hartley Act went into effect.

This is a joint agreement arrived at through collective bargaining and, incidentally, these sections were proposed originally by management. I will not read it all. I will just point out some high lights, and submit it if I may.

> The company and the union encouraged the highest possible degree of friendly, cooperative relationships between their respective representatives at all levels and with and between all employees. The officers of the company and the union realized that this goal depends on more than words in a labor agreement; that it depends primarily on attitudes between people in their respective organizations and at all levels of responsibility. They believe that proper attitudes must be based on proper understanding of and regard for the respective rights and responsibilities of both the company and the union. They believe also that proper attitudes are of major importance in the local plant where day-to-day operations and administration of this agreement demands fairness and understanding. They believe that these attitudes can be encouraged best when it is made clear that company and union officials, whose duties involved negotiation of this agreement, are not antiunion or anticompany, but are sincerely concerned with the best interests and well-being of the business and all employees.

That is in a labor agreement. In the next paragraph of that section, it reads:

> Accordingly, the company and the union, as evidence of attitude and intent, have agreed that during the life of this agreement officials of their respective organizations shall meet on the third Tuesday of each third month from the date of this agreement, in the city of Pittsburgh, Pa.

Quarterly meetings, we called them, where the top management of the United States Steel Corp. sits down with the officers of the steelworkers' union to appraise the operations of the agreement, and to meet and discuss their mutual problems. It is an atmosphere we have been working to create in America, and which we did create jointly before the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act.

This goes on and says:

> By such an arrangement the parties are afforded concrete evidence of a sincere attempt to accomplish the goal of cooperative good industrial relations and of their purpose to find ways to overcome difficulties or influences interfering with the attainment of their goal.
> By such arrangement the parties believe that they, as men of good will with sound purpose, may best protect private enterprise and its efficiency in the interests of all, as well as the legitimate interest of their respective organizations within the framework of a democratic society in which regard for fact and fairness is essential.

Unfortunately, however, we have not been able to follow through on all our quarterly meetings. We have only had two of them since the date of the enactment, April 22, 1947, and the basic reason is that there has been so much confusion brought about by the Taft-Hartley it can be embarrassing for both sides to get together.

We have also been required to spend so much of our time on joint conferences and taking care of problems brought about by the Taft-Hartley Act that we have been unable to find adequate time to meet the situation or to get into the problem which we should discuss, as is indicated in this agreement.

This is not only in existence with Carnegie Steel Corp., but it is also in existence with every subsidiary of the basic steel corporations.

And, gentlemen, in putting my organization firmly behind the administration bill, I do so because it embodies the basic principles of the Wagner Act, because the Taft-Hartley Act nullifies so many of these principles, and because the Taft-Hartley Act threatens to make possible low standards and depression.

In putting my organization behind the administration bill, I do so knowing that it represents the objective of our entire membership. My duties bring me into contact with that membership throughout the length and breadth of the land. I have discussed the Taft-Hartley Act and the Wagner Act with members of our organization in all parts of the country. I know the thinking of these men, and I tell you that they are resolutely determined that the administration bill become the law of the land.

In my capacity as secretary-treasurer of the union, I have had an oportunity to observe at close range the workings of the Taft-Hartley Act. Let me briefly summarize what we of organized labor have experienced.

We have found in plant after plant that the Taft-Hartley Act has interfered with free collective bargaining. We have found that even among employers of good will the act has created serious obstacles to harmony and to mutual agreement on important matters in the collective-bargaining field.

I have mentioned previously this business of check-off cards, and how the Taft-Hartley Act is delaying us. This is the sort of thing we have gotten into, when we should be using our time to better advantage.

Here is the type of check-off cards which, because of the Taft-Hartley Act and little Taft-Hartley acts, we have to literally negotiate with hundreds of employers.

Here is one, our Form 500, which must be signed in several places by a worker, authorizing the deduction of union dues. The top half has to be signed, the bottom half has to be signed, and there is still another section on the back.

Special information must be given because of the requirements of the Taft-Hartley Act, and it took us—believe me—it took us 11 months to get an agreement on this check-off form with the basic steel industries.

We negotiated originally with the United States Steel Corp., and our lawyers and myself, and our other representatives, had to visit hundreds and hundreds of companies to negotiate either similar check-off cards, or some other card which fit the purposes.

That is one.

Here is another one, check-off card, Form 501. This is for use only in the States of Georgia, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia.

Here is one, check-off, Form 502, to be used by members of local unions in the State of Arkansas. Sometimes it is the same company which is involved.

Here is one for local unions in the State of Iowa.

Here is one for local unions in the State of Michigan.

Here is another form, 100E, to be used for new members obtained in local unions covered by the agreement negotiated before June 23, 1947.

And then here is one for all members in local unions where new agreements are being signed after June 23, 1947.

Here is another form, 100F, which we use down in one particular company in Philadelphia, the Baldwin Locomotive Works.

And here is one for the Aluminum Co., and so on, and so forth.

It meant hours and months of meetings and conferences. Before that it was a very simple matter. We did not have to use the time of management in industry, nor our own time to go into the awfully detailed ramifications. We agreed, as representatives of the employees, that a check-off provision would be incorporated in the collective-bargaining agreement, and that was that. And, believe me, this takes effort on the part of the men employed in the mill to see to it that a million people are contacted and signed up. And it certainly takes up some of the time of management of the mills. The country is crying for steel, and the fellows have to divert their activities to do this sort of job.

(The documents referred to were received and filed for reference.)

Mr. McDonald. We have found that the complexities and the legalisms of the Taft-Hartley Act have created greater and greater difficulties in collective bargaining.

A most significant result of this law, in my opinion, has been that it has armed employers with new weapons against organization. It has placed the employer in a position of being a powerful competitor of the union in the organizing process. In practical effect the law has changed Federal policy from one of encouraging self-organization into one of discouraging self-organization.

Every industry has within it a group of employers who are bitter enemies of the union representing the employees in that industry. These employers frequently are regarded by other employers in the industry as chiselers determined to drive down standards and to engage in unfair methods of competition. Some industries have many such employers and others have few. In our industry we have our quota of such employers. The Taft-Hartley Act has given these employers a new lease on life.

They are encouraged to provoke strikes because the law gives them so many strike-breaking weapons. The statute turns over to these employers a new incentive for wrecking the established collective-bargaining relations and reverting to individual bargaining. The activities of these employers who have never surrendered their hope of restoring open-shop conditions to certain sections of our industry are a constant threat to employers who are determined to live in peace with the union, which I have already mentioned. The example of their antiunionism inevitably corrupts the relationship between other employers and the union.

The Taft-Hartley Act has been a triumph for those employers, but it must be a short-lived triumph if we are to avoid repetition of such evils as the Little Steel strike and the Memorial Day massacre.

The Taft-Hartley Act, in my opinion, ignores every fundamental principle which a sound labor statute should embody. It is elementary that a labor statute should be clear and simple so that those who are to live under it can understand its terms and be guided by its rules.

The Taft-Hartley Act is not clear and it is not simple. Every provision is ambiguous. Ever since the law was passed, it has been impossible to obtain a simple statement as to what the law means, as to what is permitted under it and what is prohibited. I know this from my own experience. It was difficult to get any sort of agreement—which I have already mentioned—on the type of check-off card which is permitted under the law. It was difficult to get any sort of agreement on the scope of the law, on the question of whether certain types of union security were permitted and a host of other questions.

It is not only that each provision of the law is confusing. All of the provisions of the law taken together form a complex and bewildering mass. It is not a labor law. It is written like a lease or a mortgage.

A good labor-relations law must rest upon the principle that he governs best who governs least. It should leave to the parties a maximum scope for free dealing, unhampered by arbitrary restrictions such as those which are containing in the Taft-Hartley Act.

Sound labor-relations laws must deal with representative situations and not with the quirks, the unusual, and the unrepresentative. The Taft-Hartley Act is a heterogeneous collection of provisions dealing with unusual and unrepresentative situations. These provisions are so broad, however, as to make unlawful completely legitimate and desirable activities on the part of labor unions.

Finally, a sound labor law must be consistent. It cannot pretend to encourage self-organization on the one hand and on the other place in the hands of employers effective means for completely destroying self-organization.

The Taft-Hartley Act violates these and other basic principles of sound labor legislation which are embodied in the Wagner Act. I trust that this committee will act favorably on this bill. Under this bill the principles of the Wagner Act are restored and under this bill labor and industry can enter into a new era of industrial peace and achieve a sound and workable system of labor relations.

I have here a few copies of the audit report of the United Steelworkers of America. It is a complete break-down, simply put together, and is a statement of the financial operations of the United Steelworkers of America. It was made by Main & Co., certified public accountants, Pittsburgh, Pa. They are one of the outstanding accounting firms in America.

(The document referred to was received and filed for reference.)

Mr. McDonald. This we did: We started this in 1942 and incidentally if you gentlemen who have been around here for a number of years will go back to your files you will find a copy of the financial statement of the United Steelworkers of America in those files. We send them to every Member of Congress, as well as to our membership.

That is the regular audit report which we do voluntarily.

Now, however—and I want to specifically bring this matter to your attention—there is another financial report which, I think, all labor unions are required to file, and which very few people pay any attention to—that is, I should say they do not know about it; they pay attention to it of course, but they do not know about it.

We are required by the tax laws, the Federal laws, to submit once each year to the Internal Revenue Department a complete accounting of all of our financial activities, not alone for the international union, but for every local union of the United Steelworkers of America. Each union is required to do that. We notify all of our locals once each year, and we gather up these complete financial details, and we submit them to the collector of internal revenue in the city of Pittsburgh for proper filing here in Washington. We are required to do that, and we gladly comply with that law. This, of course, is not the Taft-Hartley; this is the Federal statute on taxation, the Internal Revenue Department.

Thank you, gentlemen.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to inquire if when Mr. Goldberg appeared here with Mr. Carey at the morning session, he submitted for inclusion in the record this formal statement?

Mr. GOLDBERG. I did, Congressman Bailey, with the permission of the chairman. That was offered into the record.

Mr. BAILEY. In that case, I would like to ask you a question.

In your rather exhaustive analysis of the Taft-Hartley law you finally arrived at the conclusion that the law was unwise and unworkable. Page 9 of your formal presentation.

Mr. GOLDBERG. I think that is a fair inference from the statement I filed.

Mr. BAILEY. I am reading now from your statement:

> As a matter of fact, there are increasing signs that employers recognize that the law was unsound and unwise. An editorial in Business Week of December 18, 1948, a prominent organ of the business community, acknowledged that "Few businessmen are wasting time deploring the eminent doom of the Taft-Hartley Act." This periodical concedes that the law is an unsound law. Summing up it states:
> "What was wrong was that the Taft-Hartley Act went too far. It crossed the narrow line separating a law which aims only to regulate from one which could destroy.
> "Given a few million unemployed in America, given an administration in Washington which was not prounion—and the Taft-Hartley Act conceivably could wreck the labor movement.
> "These are the provisions that could do it: (1) Picketing can be restrained by injunction; (2) employers can petition for a collective-bargaining election; (3) strikers can be held ineligible to vote—while the strike replacements cast the only ballots; and (4) if the outcome of this is a 'no-union' vote, the Government must certify and enforce it.
> "Any time there is a surplus labor pool from which an employer can hire at least token strike-replacements, these four provisions, linked together, presumably can destroy a union."

Would you care to comment on those four proposals made in this editorial?

Mr. GOLDBERG. I think this editorial represents one of the significant admissions that has been made by spokesmen of business of the potential behind the Taft-Hartley Act.

The thing that is important to me is that we have only had 9 or 10 unfair-labor-practice cases decided under the Taft-Hartley Act. You see, most of the business under the Board, under the Taft-Hartley Act, has been with representation cases. It is only now, as you may have noticed in the press, that the unfair-labor-practice cases, the cases that go to the vitals of the Taft-Hartley Act, are now being processed.

This demonstrates—and a careful reading of the Taft-Hartley Act can prove—that there is present in the Taft-Hartley Act the mechanism by which the traditional rights of American labor, which employers pay lip-service to as a part of our enterprise system, can be destroyed.

Let me illustrate it very simply: Part of the example that is contained here, which is an example which is used in the Senate, and which even Senator Taft had to admit was a correct statement of the law—it can be demonstrated under the Taft-Hartley Act that any illegal strike can be converted into a legal strike. The Taft-Hartley Act contains a provision that if you have a perfectly legal strike, and the men are out on strike for their economic demands, for wages, hours, or working conditions, that if you have a petition for an election filed by the group of men who have been hired as strikebreakers in that plant, the only people who can vote in such an election are strikebreakers, and the strikers cannot cast any ballots.

That is in the law. If you count the strikebreakers' votes, and you do not count the strikers' votes, it is perfectly obvious as to who is going to win the election. The strikebreakers are going to win that election. If they win the election through some sort of organization they may choose to organize that moment, and the Board has to certify, and that moment a strike gains that certification, it is illegal, so that the strikers who started out with a perfectly legal strike can no longer strike; their strike is illegal, and what has been a legal strike turns out to be an illegal strike.

Now, the injunctional provision against that strike then is a 10 (1) injunction, a mandatory injunction. In other words, the Board must enjoin that strike. The general counsel must come in and get an injunction because it is an injunction against the Board's certification, and you have what this article points out.

Mr. BAILEY. Will you permit an interruption?

Mr. GOLDBERG. Surely.

Mr. BAILEY. You make the Government a strike-breaking concern?

Mr. GOLDBERG. And you give the Government no discretion in the matter. The Government must break that strike. So I think, Congressman Bailey, we should note this. This article and the illustration I have given is not solely given by Business Week. Even Senator Taft, one of the authors of the law, has admitted, if you will look at the record of the Senate hearing, that this is a result which cannot come about under the Taft-Hartley Act and that this result cannot be defended by anyone who is interested in fair treatment for people who work for a living.

Mr. BAILEY. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. Naturally, much of the testimony has been repetitious. I have tried to pick out occasionally some specific point that I thought had not been touched upon. I notice that you refer, Mr. McDonald, to State laws similar to the Taft-Hartley law. Would you say in a great many instances that they are due to the confirmation of the State legislatures in passing these laws?

Mr. MCDONALD. This climate has been created by the Taft-Hartley Act being in existence, and a lot of State legislatures are sort of parroting the Federal Congress in enacting equally iniquitous, if not more iniquitous, laws.

Mr. IRVING. I brought this subject up because in the hearings on the minimum wage law, we had a number of agricultural groups testifying against the minimum wage and fair labor standards and also as proponents of Taft-Hartley. I noticed a piece in this morning's paper where the mayors, I believe, and managers of business organizations of many cities have stated that there were agricultural oligarchies in control of most of the State legislatures, and that they had maintained archaic legislation and laws which prevented the cities from advancing and taking care of their business in a proper way. I thought that possibly had something to do with the laws that they are passing in various States. The legislatures are made up of many rural people who misunderstand or are misinformed about these subjects.

Mr. MCDONALD. I think that is absolutely true, that a lot of these people from rural areas are not informed about these subjects. I do not know anything that is more difficult to get over to the public at large than labor's story. I recall specifically that when Mr. Goldberg testified before the Senate committee on the Thomas-Lesinski bill, his paper amounted to 112 pages, and there were two little paragraphs carried by the news services. It is most difficult for us to get our point of view across to these rural groups, and it is equally easy for those who want to continue such laws as the Taft-Hartley law to get their point of view across.

The lobby spends millions of dollars in State legislatures. They have all sorts of brochures, and so on, which are fed not only to the State legislatures, but to the public at large in those areas, that completely distort the situation and completely distort labor's point of view. It is mere selfishness on the part of those people.

Mr. IRVING. In your general view, is it true that there has been a distinct effort to keep labor and the farmers and other people apart?

Mr. MCDONALD. I think so. I think undoubtedly there has been a distinct effort to create the divergence of opinion between labor-union members and working men who are not even labor-union members and the farming population.

Mr. IRVING. And where these people do find out the facts, they are sympathetic?

Mr. MCDONALD. That is right.

Mr. IRVING. I know that they are subject to a barrage of propaganda. I happen to have lived on a farm myself for a number of years, and I got the Farm Journal, I believe, that was, I think, sponsored or published by Mr. Pugh of the Sun Oil Co. I never read any more of an antilabor publication than that one.

Mr. MCDONALD. That is right, Mr. Congressman. Those things go on all the time.

Mr. IRVING. And, of course, it was anti-New Deal, anti-Roosevelt, and anti-every other kind of social legislation.

Mr. MCDONALD. That is the sort of thing which one can expect from Mr. Pugh and a lot of people who think like him in America.

Mr. IRVING. The State legislatures are usually underpaid. The quality of men who go to make State laws sometimes is not of the highest type, and they are not always too interested in legislation they pass. I think that possibly is responsible for a good deal of the anti-closed-shop and antiunion legislation. I know it has been my experience, too, in the Middle West where we have a lot of farmers, of course, and a lot of agricultural people, and I do not condemn them or criticize them, because when they understand the situation they know that when labor is well paid, it benefits them directly.

Mr. McDonald. I think you are absolutely correct. And insofar as the legislators are concerned, perhaps there ought to be a CIO of legislators, so that we could get them wage increases and some other benefits.

Mr. Irving. I will say the State laws do not always represent the actual ideas of the whole population of a State.

Mr. McDonald. That is right.

Mr. Irving. I think that is all.

Mr. Kelley. Mr. Perkins?

Mr. Perkins. Nothing, Mr. Chairman. I will give my time to Mr. Jacobs.

Mr Kelley. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. Jacobs. In regard to union decertification, Mr. Goldberg, is there not one more step in that process, that in the event the decertification election results in no union, the employer is relieved from negotiating?

Mr. Goldberg. For a year's time. If the union is decertified, he does not have to deal with any union for 1 year. We can all see what the consequences of that might be. There would be no protection for the employees in the plant.

Mr. Jacobs. Now, coming back to these editorials. I was quite interested in that. I have a habit of cutting them out and saving them a lot of times. Are you familiar with the editorial of Life magazine on November 29 of last year?

Mr. Goldberg. I do not remember it specifically, Congressman Jacobs.

Mr. Jacobs. Well, since we are in it, maybe we should just as well read some of that into the record at this time. It is an editorial of Life magazine, November 29, 1948:

> The truth is that labor as a whole doesn't mind the T-H Act as it has worked out during the present period of relatively full employment. What it does fear is that the law might have a different effect in a time of rising unemployment when a loose labor market could conceivably enable management to take advantage of certain Taft-Hartley gimmicks to bust the unions. * * * Under the Wagner Act when you went on strike, you * * * had * * * a vote (in representation elections) but now you lose your vote. In a loose labor market, the loss might be disastrous. An entire union local might be permanently replaced by nonunion men, and a local would thus lose any right to vote on its own fate.

Are you familiar with the article in Fortune magazine of November? These came out right after the election.

Mr. Goldberg. I might say it is the first time I have heard Life magazine talk as I talk, but I agree with the statement made in Life.

Mr. Jacobs. If you get Life magazine right after the election and read it, you will find that statement appearing in an editorial.

Mr. Goldberg. I think the date, Congressman, is rather significant. That was a November date. Business Week is December. I wonder if they are getting some courage now and not making those same statements?

Mr. JACOBS. In the November edition of Fortune magazine there is this citation:

> In straight economic disputes, strikers permanently replaced by nonunion men are ineligible to vote in NLRB elections. The reason hit hard at the stubborn trade-union notion that the worker has the property right to his job. And where the labor market is loose, it gives the employer a handy weapon over any union that calls such a strike. The reintroduction of injunctions; the outlawing of secondary boycotts; the NLRB decision giving State laws precedence over Federal—all indicate how rapidly gains won by labor can be taken away.

Now, I think that while we are reading into the record these statements, perhaps it might be well to call this to our attention. I wonder if you read this? In 1947, I do not have the exact date here, a quotation from Westbrook Pegler on the closed shop said this. I cannot give you the exact date, but I have the article here if anyone wants to see it:

> The closed shop was a method of compelling workers to join unions for their own immediate good, for the good of them all. It was a way to prevent employers from bringing in temporarily distressed hands to undercut the going wages and to force the free riders, or slackers, to pay into the union treasuries a fair price for the benefits and wages which the unions had won or claimed to have won.

I might say that while I do not have the exact quotation, at the close of that article he warned against the abolition of closed shop. This was while Taft-Hartley was being considered.

Now, having gotten that into the record, I would like to ask Mr. McDonald this question: You mentioned Iowa in regard to check-off cards. Was not Iowa the State that enacted a law whereby you had to get the worker's wife's signature before you could have the check-off?

Mr. MCDONALD. Yes. There are several of them. In Iowa you must have your wife sign, and then you must go to a notary public and swear to your signature.

Mr. JACOBS. The folks who were up here from my State in support of the Taft-Hartley Act came back after it was enacted and issued a joint manifesto in which they said that the Taft-Hartley law has emancipated the worker from the union boss. I think that if we are objective we probably will admit that there are some union officials who do not carry on in an exemplary fashion. I do not mean you but there are some that do not.

I would like to direct this question to Mr. Goldberg. Is there anything in the Taft-Hartley law that prevents, in your judgment, a union official from exercising his economic power to oppress a member of his union, like depriving him of union status, and so forth?

Mr. GOLDBERG. No. I do not find anything in the statute that relates to that.

Mr. JACOBS. Then you would not agree with the statement that it has been enacted for the purpose of emancipating the worker from the domination of the union officials?

Mr. GOLDBERG. I think that was propaganda. That was not really a statement. That was propaganda under which the law was attempted to be sold.

Mr. JACOBS. You are familiar, are you not, Mr. Goldberg, with the fact, though, that there are situations where union officers have used power that has been invested in them by, we will say, turning and withdrawing the union status by revocation of charters, and so forth?

Mr. GOLDBERG. I am sure that union people are human beings and there are as many malcontents among union officers as there are among any class of officials who represent people. I do not think they are all perfect.

Mr. JACOBS. In other words, you find human nature pretty much the same wherever you go?

Mr. GOLDBERG. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. Are you familiar with the investigation that the American Civil Liberties Union made here about 6 years ago in regard to democracy in trade-unions?

Mr. GOLDBERG. In a general way, Congressman, I am. I believe I read about it at the time.

Mr. JACOBS. You never read the article itself?

Mr. GOLDBERG. I probably did read the article at the time it was published.

Mr. JACOBS. I see. It is in pamphlet form.

Mr. GOLDBERG. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. From what you recall of that, do you feel that the findings and recommendations of the American Civil Liberties Union were fairly objective?

Mr. GOLDBERG. I do not quarrel with the objectivity of the article. I think my quarrel at the time—I could not call it a quarrel, but my point of disagreement—was that perhaps you take situations like that and you distort them out of all proportion to their occurrence in the union field. I think maybe they were devoting themselves to a particular study, but I think by and large those are unrepresentative situations.

Mr. JACOBS. In other words, you feel that they are exceptional when viewed in the background of the entire labor union?

Mr. GOLDBERG. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not feel it would be proper for some rather broad, corrective legislation to be passed, such as requiring unions to elect their officers by ballot rather than to permit the international union to put a local union under trusteeship and hold it under trusteeship over a number of years?

Mr. GOLDBERG. Of course, I do not believe that every time you have an abuse, you need legislation.

Mr. JACOBS. I do not think so, either.

Mr. GOLDBERG. I think the force of public opinion in the few cases that exist of that character can be brought to bear and correct the situation, and I think, by the way, since the publication of that article—if I recall correctly, it was some years ago—the few situations which existed have been corrected.

Now, by and large—I speak out of some knowledge here, because I have copies of all the constitutions of the CIO unions—we have some 40 unions. Every one of those unions provides for regular, periodic elections, democratically conducted, every one, without exception. There is not a union in the CIO that does not provide it. We would not charter a union that did not provide for democratic elections, and we would revoke charters of unions that attempted to prevent democratic elections.

Mr. JACOBS. In the instance that I was speaking about, where they abused it the most, they have a very democratic constitution and by-laws. They just do not follow it.

Mr. GOLDBERG. You know, the local unions themselves are given a great deal of responsibility.

Mr. JACOBS. If it happens to be a union that controls the work pretty generally, do you not think the members might be coerced into not exercising their rights of free election?

Mr. GOLDBERG. I think ultimately the people have to be the guardians of their own liberties.

Mr. JACOBS. Then you feel that no legislation should be enacted along that line at all?

Mr. GOLDBERG. I feel this way, Congressman. It is a pretty broad statement to say no legislation should be enacted. But I would say that the unrepresentative situation, in my opinion, is not an appropriate technique for legislating a sound system of labor relations. That is what happened when the Taft-Hartley Act was enacted. We got a few unrepresentative situations, and then a statute was enacted which caused hardship in a lot of representative situations.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, let us analyze that a minute. I do not know whether it would be true or not. But I have heard, or read, and I have never heard it denied, of one union where over half of the local officers were appointed by the international. I do not know whether this is true or not. But it has never been denied as far as I know.

Now, let us take the majority of organizations. They elect their officers. I think that is true.

Mr. GOLDBERG. That is true.

Mr. JACOBS. As a matter of fact, in a lot of them, the members would not hold still very long if they could not elect them.

Mr. GOLDBERG. Mr. McDonald can testify to all that.

Mr. JACOBS. But there is the case where the union officers have a sufficient amount of power because of contracts with employers. I know of some that have international contracts, not through the local, but international contracts, who exercise a great deal of power, and they deny the right of election. I could cite one case in particular that I know about where for over 16 years members were denied the right to elect their officers. And there was a tremendous feeling in that local union. Now, where is it going to hurt the union that does elect its officers? If you elect the officers in your organization, you are not going to be affected by it at all. If we just merely stood by and said that you shall follow your constitution and have an election, and if you do not, there may be an appeal to the Board, it is not going to affect your organization. But it is going to help this other organization over there, where they do not.

Now, in view of that, what is your objection to it?

Mr. GOLDBERG. Of course, I think that question with propriety ought to be perhaps directed at the union involved.

Mr. JACOBS. They would say no. There is no question about that.

Mr. GOLDBERG. But again, I say that if there is a union—and I have heard some small percentage of unions may have committed an abuse of that character—we get into a statute in which we attempt to regulate a large area of union conduct, and then we get into many, many complications that do not relate to the question of collective bargaining. The real philosophy that I have about those things is this. Perhaps we ought to study that problem that you think about and analyze what ought to be done under it. But in a collective-bargaining statute it ought not to be encumbered with a lot of other things that do not relate to promoting collective bargaining between management and labor. That is the purported purpose of this statute, and it seems to me that that is what the subject of legislation ought to deal with.

Mr. JACOBS. You may have a point there. On the other hand, we are trying to assist the union in organizing, and if we have some unions which abuse the democratic processes that have fallen into their hands by virtue of their organization, it seems to me that nothing would be simpler than for us, not to write their laws, but to say that whatever their laws are in regard to elections, they shall follow, and if they do not, there should be a simple remedy for the local to go before the Labor Board or some appropriate tribunal. I do not know whether it should be the Labor Board or not. I am at a loss as to why there should be any objection to that on the part of organizations that are democratic.

Mr. GOLDBERG. Of course, it seems to me—and I suppose this thought has occurred to you many times—that there is probably ample recourse right now for such abuses.

Mr. JACOBS. Oh, yes; there is. I have handled them myself. But it is an inadequate remedy. And you know it as a lawyer. It is a long, tedious, expensive remedy. It is usually tried before a judge who does not know anything about it. Do you not agree with that?

Mr. GOLDBERG. I was going to say that. With respect to long, tedious, and expensive remedies, proceedings before the Board such as we found last year are long, tedious, and perhaps expensive, too.

Mr. JACOBS. They have been bogged down with a lot of unnecessary representation elections, and one thing or another; is that not correct?

Mr. GOLDBERG. Yes. Maybe, however, your suggestion would bog them down with some of these things and prevent collective-bargaining cases from getting hearings.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not think they are prevalent.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not think it would have a beneficial and salutary effect, in that many of them would start complying with their constitutions and laws, rather than not to have a complaint brought up?

Mr. GOLDBERG. Of course, I think that the open light of publicity in those isolated situations which exist is probably the best remedy.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, ordinarily that is a pretty good remedy. On the other hand, I have seen a lot of evidence in my experience where certain employers saw and liked that kind of union. Frankly, in the one I was telling you about, when they finally came out of captivity, the members were working for 34 cents an hour less than the free locals in the adjoining districts. And the people who were in charge of that local were hotsy-totsy with the employers. There were no hard feelings there at all.

Mr. GOLDBERG. I would not be surprised.

Mr. JACOBS. Under those circumstances, they did not get very much publicity. I might say this. I handled their charter case for them, and because they did not have a quarter with which to litigate it, I advanced them some money, and the leading newspaper in the community played me up on the front page and took my hide off because I happened to advance them a little bit of money when they could not even get a postage stamp to write for a document. So I do not find that the light of publicity is necessarily available to those people. In most unions where they are denied their democratic rights. I think that they are the forgotten people, to a great extent, in this whole field.

Mr. GOLDBERG. I cannot quarrel with many things that you say, Congressman, about that. But the real point of difference, if there is one, is the difficulty of encumbering a collective bargaining statute with collateral consideration. I think when you approach it fundamentally, that was the big mistake that was made in the Taft-Hartley Act. They took a fairly simple statute, and as all of the labor witnesses have testified, they made it so complicated that they cannot understand it, with collateral things, and I think that is a danger.

Mr. JACOBS. I think I can agree with you. In other words, I have often expressed it in this manner, and I believe you as a lawyer will agree with me, that all the Wagner law ever did was to wipe out an exception in the common law whereby the common-law principle of duress was made applicable to the labor contract, and by exception it was not applicable to the labor contract in the past. And that was about what the Wagner Act did, and about all it did. That was relatively very simple legislation that was brought in. Now here is another fundamental principle, the fundamental principle of the right of men when they form a union to govern themselves, and if we give the right to them, I believe we are warranted to make a simple law that says that they have a right to select their officers and appeal to the appropriate tribunal to enforce that right. I do not think that it will have to be used in so many cases, but I have seen men broken on the rack who were denied those rights. And I might observe to you that one of the weapons that was used, that when the suit was brought, not only for the right to elect officers but to collect back money that had been taken out of the treasury and carried off, criminally taken, the international president revoked the pensions of the old members of that local union——

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to ask if he thinks the mass of the voters in the Republican Party have anything to do with determining the policy of the party?

Mr. JACOBS. It is all right with me if they never get elected.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. GOLDBERG. May I point this out, Congressman Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. Yes.

Mr. GOLDBERG. You know the hostility and the bitterness that was engendered in the Taft-Hartley Act by singling out labor for repressive measures. Now, there is this possibility. If you take your concept and develop it——

Mr. JACOBS. May I ask you one question at that point? Do you think the suggestion I have made with regard to requiring elections according to the laws of the union is antilabor? Do you consider it so?

Mr. GOLDBERG. No. I think every good union has precisely what you suggest.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you consider that suggestion as being antilabor?

Mr. GOLDBERG. I have not said that.

Mr. JACOBS. I know you have not. But I am asking you, do you?

Mr. GOLDBERG. I said this, that labor people could properly resent being singled out in the field of voluntary associations for abuses that might exist in many voluntary associations, and maybe this is a problem that ought to be considered generally.

Mr. JACOBS. You may be right.

Mr. GOLDBERG. There are all kinds of voluntary associations in which labor unions form an important part.

Mr. JACOBS. We do know, do we not, that the man's membership in the union is of more value to him economically than his membership in any other organization except his Government?

Mr. GOLDBERG. I think it is very valuable.

Mr. KELLEY. Your time has expired.

Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. I would like to pursue this line of discussion just a little further. That is, this matter of administratorship and trusteeship, and so on, of local unions. Now, I want to say in the beginning that I quite agree with you that a labor-management relations act should not be burdened down with collateral provisions, just muddying the waters, particularly as it applies to the inner organizational structure of the unions. But I would like to address myself, as long as this discussion has been going on this way, to the status of the workingman in this particular type of thing. I believe it was Mr. McDonald who testified that in the CIO there are some 48 constitutions that he has read, and they all provide for elections. Likewise, they also provide that where there is malfeasance in office, for the option of the international executive board to step in and take over until such time as the matter is straightened out; is that correct?

Mr. MCDONALD. Yes; that is correct. In the United Steelworkers of America we have such a provision. We exercise it on very rare occasions, and then only after undue provocation. Sometimes a fellow defaults in some manner or fashion of a very serious nature, and we have to take over custodianship for a short time. But on the general subject of democratic procedure in our organization, we have at least 50,000 elected officers in the United Steelworkers of America. We have 2,500 local unions. We have a minimum of 20 officers and officials in each of those local unions.

Mr. BURKE. I quite agree that administratorship and trusteeship, which ever name we prefer to call it by, is not desired. The international officers who might be called upon to use it do not care to use it, and the constitution usually limits them in its use; is that not correct?

Mr. MCDONALD. That is correct. We do not want to use it. Sometimes for the protection of men who form that local union, we must exercise it.

Mr. BURKE. Then it derives the right of the use of that administratorship from the locals themselves; in other words, they themselves make their constitution and make their bylaws and give the officers that right?

Mr. MCDONALD. That is right, Mr. Burke.

Mr. BURKE. Now, on the subject of the Taft-Hartley Act itself, I admit I am in a little deep water with a lot of these legalistic arguments. But I think on the over-all general principle, I have felt since the time the Taft-Hartley Act was first introduced in Congress, when the Taft bill and the Hartley bill were introduced, that those bills were intended to accomplish the purpose of destroying labor unions where they could and minimizing the collective-bargaining power where it was not possible to destroy the union, and they did it in two ways. First of all, the bills drawn were obviously in an atmosphere, or climate, of hatred and desire for retaliation. But they attempted to accomplish their purpose, as I saw it, in two ways. One was the legalistic way that you have been talking about, setting up a veritable mine field of booby traps, legalistic booby traps, for labor unions; and the other is this. I feel that propaganda was written right into the law. I feel that on the subject that you talked about on the matter of financial reports of unions, it is true, is it not, that unions have been required to make these financial reports to the Government for several years?

Mr. McDonald. Yes, Mr. Burke. In my testimony I attempted to describe that process. All unions under the Federal taxation laws are required to file financial reports with the Department of Internal Revenue, the international unions as such, the local unions as such, and we do it. I imagine that every union in America does it. That is not under the Taft-Hartley Act, sir.

Mr. Burke. Is is not true that labor unions generally have felt that as far as financial statements were concerned, the only place that they cared to conceal or in any way keep from the public is the case of a small, struggling, weak, newly organized organization, so that the employer, by not having that knowledge, would not be in a position to tear them down?

Mr. McDonald. Yes, I think that is correct, sir.

Mr. Burke. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Kelley. Mr. Wier?

Mr. Wier. I want to follow this along a little bit here. Mr. McDonald, you represent a very large, substantial organization; is that not true? It is one of the largest in the country?

Mr. McDonald. I think so, the United Steelworkers of America.

Mr. Wier. You have, I presume, 8,000 or 9,000 unions scattered from Maine to California and from the Canadian border to the Mexican border; is that correct?

Mr. McDonald. From Nova Scotia to California and from Vancouver to Florida, about 2,500 local unions.

Mr. Wier. The laws under which all of these unions and the laws under which the international officers function are drawn up at duly constituted conventions of all those locals, is that not correct?

Mr. McDonald. That is correct, sir, and our last convention had about 3,300 delegates in attendance.

Mr. Wier. And those laws and policies that are set up by conventions are for all the local unions and officials?

Mr. McDonald. The constitution covers all the locals of the United Steelworkers of America. It is the general body of law that guides us. For purposes of our collective bargaining process, we have another body selected by the membership at large called an international policy committee, which has to do with the making of wage scales, agreements, and so forth.

Mr. Wier. Now, I anticipate that there is not a representative sitting out here today in a large labor organization who has not had the same experiences that perhaps you as president of the Steelworkers have had in our democratic functions and policymaking of our international and local unions. I think you will agree that the war cry of the mass of the voters was for union responsibility: is that not correct, at the time of the Taft-Hartley Act? Was it a demand by employers for union responsibility?

Mr. McDonald. They attempted to propagandize the people of America that union responsibility was a required thing, when, as a matter of fact, union responsibility in my associations with unions has always been an active and existing thing.

Mr. Wier. And I think that you perhaps have experienced the same problem that practically every other international union has experienced, and that is in some communities, where you have a local union operating under your constitution and bylaws, a group of officers will be elected who feel that they are on a level with the international and sometimes on a higher level.

Mr. McDonald. Yes, of course. We select the paid representatives of the United Steelworkers of America from the most skillful men who arise in the local unions.

Mr. Wier. When one of these local unions—and this is a point that is involved—when one of those local unions, whether it is in Pittsburgh, Milwaukee, San Francisco, or San Antonio, takes it upon itself through its elected officials to start declaring policy and start to experiment in their own philosophy with the welfare of 2,000 or 3,000 people, and flaunt the advice, the policies and the laws of the international union, and to some degree the membership of their own unions, what remedy is there to apply to acts of irresponsibility like that?

Mr. McDonald. We have a procedure of thorough investigation. Usually that matter is brought to our attention by the complaint of a member or the complaint of a representative of an organization. We send several of our elected representatives, members of our international executive board, into the area, make a thorough and complete study of the situation, bring all parties at interest into a meeting, render a decision as to what remedial steps shall be taken, and if either side involved in a local controversy does not like that decision, it may appeal to the meeting of the international executive board for adjudication of their point of view. We have a thorough and completely democratic, exhaustive procedure which goes all the way to an appeal to the international convention.

Mr. Wier. Now, this same set of officers that you are having difficulty with in San Antonio, Tex., has violated your contract on two occasions and continues to tell the international about their rights under the international. The question I want to ask you is this. Do you feel that your international or any international should not take it upon itself to clean that situation up, and outlaw it?

Mr. McDonald. Of course, sir, it is an absolute responsibility. An international union such as the Steelworkers Union must give complete protection to every single member, and a thoroughly irresponsible action on the part of an officer or a group of local union officers in San Antonio, Tex., may not have only a bad effect upon those who are employed in that immediate plant, but it may have a bad effect upon members of the organization, employees, in some other plant. Suppose they did something which completely distorted the existing wage scale, or breached the contract in some violent fashion: it might certainly have an effect upon the competitive situation of that employer as regards another employer. We would have to be extremely careful about that.

Mr. WIER. Let me ask you this question. If, for example, within the provisions of the proposed law before this committee there was a citation by which the local union reserved this right of autonomy and it was mandatory for that union to hold an election in which the same officers would be reelected by the membership, what would happen in your international and local unions?

Mr. MCDONALD. If you did that and we had a Federal law to that effect, we could possibly have complete turmoil. We would have absolutely no supervision. We would not be able to control inequitable situations. You would make it possible for racketeers to take over the United Steelworkers of America, chiselers of all kinds and descriptions to get control, and you would destroy the very basis, I believe, or the germs of destruction would be planted in an organization. We would have a tremendous policing job if they could simply defy the law and the constitution of the organization, defy the general wage policy of the organization. Nothing but confusion and turmoil would be the end result.

Mr. WIER. One more point. You represent a large organization in the heavy industries, and one of the points that has been brought out here by management has been this question of the elimination of foremen and supervisors. What has been your experience under the Taft-Hartley Act of drawing a line of demarcation between those eligible in your group and those who, it is maintained by the Taft-Hartley Act, cannot be members and represented by your local? Have you had any trouble with that?

Mr. MCDONALD. We have had a few difficulties in that situation, but I think that it is a problem which can easily be resolved by joint agreement between management and labor. With a number of the important steel companies, we have agreed upon a line of demarkation, and some of the companies have approached the problem in a very sensible fashion, and there is no dispute at all existing. In other situations, you find companies chiseling and trying to lower and lower and lower the line of what is a foreman or what is a supervisor, the idea being to take away people from the bargaining unit, and constantly remove them.

Mr. WIER. I was just going to ask you that last question.

Mr. KELLEY. You have 1 minute remaining.

Mr. WIER. I have just one question.

In your negotiations recently, since the Taft-Hartley Act, did that provision of the Taft-Hartley Act remove from your former membership a substantial number of workers who formerly were covered under an agreement with management?

Mr. MCDONALD. I do not think it did insofar as basic steel is concerned. You see, sir, most of our agreements which are now in existence were negotiated before the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act. The basic steel agreement with the United States Steel Corp. was enacted on April 22, 1947, and practically all the other agreements came into being on or about that date.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. McConnell?

Mr. McCONNELL. I was interested in your statement that the Government should keep out of labor-management relations. I noticed also it says here that a good labor law must rest upon the principle that "He governs best who governs least."

Mr. MCDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCONNELL. That is a very good principle. Now, I do not know how far you are willing to carry it. What labor laws with the Government involved in them would you repeal, then?

Mr. MCDONALD. I beg your pardon, Mr. McConnell?

Mr. McCONNELL. How many Government laws dealing with labor would you repeal, then? How far would you follow that principle?

Mr. MCDONALD. Let us get rid of the Taft-Hartley Act at this time, and I will be satisfied, at least until that measure is out.

Mr. McCONNELL. In other words, you only want to follow your principle a certain tiny distance; is that right?

Mr. MCDONALD. No. I think that is an awfully long distance, to get rid of the Taft-Hartley law. I think it is a law that is an iniquitous thing. It is designed to smash labor unions. It has no right to be on the statute books of the Federal Government. It is designed to depress the standards and conditions of the working people of America, and right now I will settle for that one—getting rid of it.

Mr. McCONNELL. But you would not change any other labor law? You would leave the Government in them?

Mr. MCDONALD. We are dealing in this situation with a labor-relations law. There are certain laws——

Mr. McCONNELL. They are all labor-relations laws. They all affect labor relations. I do not know a labor law that does not.

Mr. MCDONALD. This is the law which has to do with the labor relations between employers and employees, Mr. McConnell.

Mr. McCONNELL. They all affect relationships between employees and employers. Now, how far would you go? You just want to repeal one?

Mr. MCDONALD. I want to repeal right now the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. McCONNELL. That is the only one you want to repeal?

Mr. MCDONALD. That is correct, sir.

Mr. McCONNELL. Then suppose we alter that statement just a little and say that you only want to have the Government in certain types of labor-management relationships.

Mr. MCDONALD. No. I think my statement is very applicable. A good labor-relations law must rest upon the principle that he governs best who governs least. And I am talking about the Wagner Act being that sort of law.

Mr. McCONNELL. You would have to have a Government that governed least, then, if that is the case. When you talk about free labor, I am willing to consider the principle of free labor, but let us follow it all the way through. How far are we going to go on that? How free should labor and management be in their relationships?

Mr. MCDONALD. Just as free as the Wagner Act, plus the several amendment to which we have agreed, permit it to go.

Mr. McCONNELL. I have heard the advocates of many types of laws in different fields who would bring the Government into the relationship of individuals, and I believe your organization is one of those that advocates legislation to bring the Government into many of our fields.

Mr. McDonald. Oh, yes.

Mr. McConnell. Setting up more and more Government agencies to regulate the economic lives, and so on, of our people. Now, how far do we want to go on this "least government" idea?

Mr. McDonald. Those which we advocate are those which are designed to help those who are least able to help themselves.

Mr. McConnell. In other words, you do want the Government to come into various parts of the labor-management relations field?

Mr. McDonald. To the point that labor-management relations—to the extent of the Wagner Act plus the amendments which we have instituted, plus providing some protection to those people who need protection.

Mr. McConnell. But other laws have an effect on labor-management relationships. Now, you do not mind them being in there? You just have a distinction here; is that correct? It is not a general statement, but a statement that is of a certain particular distinctive type?

Mr. McDonald. In this situation, it refers to the Wagner Act.

Mr. McConnell. Are you opposed to every single provision in the Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. McDonald. I am opposed to all those provisions in the Taft-Hartley law which have a restrictive, or bad, influence upon decent labor-management relationships. And we have filed already with this committee a statement of 127 pages. We have filed another statement with the Senate of 112 pages, which specifically spells out our objectives step by step.

Mr. McConnell. All right. Now, are you opposed to every single provision in the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. McDonald. I do not think that I could properly answer that with a yes-or-no answer. I can only answer it in the way that I have indicated by saying that those sections which are iniquitous, we want to get rid of. If there is any section which is any good at all, from our point of view, all right, we will let it stay in.

Mr. McConnell. Don't you know?

Mr. McDonald. Of course, I know, sir.

Mr. McConnell. Then tell me what provisions are not bad in the Taft-Hartley Act. Let us get at it another way.

Mr. McDonald. How in the world, Mr. McConnell, can I pick those out? Every provision in the Taft-Hartley Act is related to some other provision. I just cannot talk in a vacuum on this thing, and I certainly, sir, cannot attempt to quote verbatim 239 pages of testimony.

Mr. McConnell. Are there any good provisions to be preserved in the Taft-Hartley Act? I just want to get at this from every angle.

Mr. McDonald. I want the Thomas-Lesinski bill, and I do not want the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. McConnell. Are there any provisions that you would preserve in the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. McDonald. I do not think so. The whole idea is basically wrong; the whole genesis is wrong. It was conceived in sin, and it should die.

Mr. McConnell. In other words, you are so completely against it that you could not change your opinion in any way? You are opposed to the whole act?

Mr. McDonald. Sir, if I were permitted to use the language I am thinking perhaps you would understand.

Mr. McConnell. That is what I meant.

Mr. McDonald. It does no confounded good, and you can supply any adjective which you desire in place of "confounded."

Mr. McConnell. In other words, your mind is as closed in that respect as the minds of labor leaders were closed when we were even asking them for suggestions before the Taft-Hartley Act was written; right?

Mr. McDonald. We have made certain suggestions. My mind is not closed. I hope I never have a closed mind.

Mr. McConnell. You said you wanted no part of the act.

Mr. McDonald. That is right.

Mr. McConnell. It is entirely evil. So that is a closed mind.

Mr. McDonald. I disagree with you, sir. I am sorry.

Mr. McConnell. Now, how about coercion? Are employers the only ones who coerce people?

Mr. McDonald. Oh, no. Employers are not the only ones who coerce people.

Mr. McConnell. Do unions coerce people?

Mr. McDonald. No.

Mr. McConnell. Do they coerce employees in any way, or union members?

Mr. McDonald. Not to my knowledge. The United Steelworkers of America, which I represent——

Mr. McConnell. In other words, the employer is the only one who ever coerces anyone?

Mr. McDonald. Oh, no. I would not say that. I think there are a lot of bodies in America which coerce people at times.

Mr. McConnell. And unions never coerce any workers?

Mr. McDonald. The United Steelworkers of America opposes coercion in every manner or fashion by an employer and by anybody else.

Mr. McConnell. So do I. That is right. But you are going to take it out as far as the union is concerned in the law? You are going to say that it is not an unfair labor practice for a union to coerce a union member or employee, but it is an unfair labor practice for an employer to coerce a worker.

Mr. McDonald. That is right.

Mr. McConnell. But it is not an unfair practice for a union or a union leader or any of his workers or any union member to coerce another employee? You are going to drop that out?

Mr. McDonald. We do not coerce people. It has no place in the act.

Mr. McConnell. But employers do?

Mr. McDonald. Some employers do.

Mr. McConnell. And no union or union leaders or no union members coerce any other worker?

Mr. McDonald. We do not engage in any coercive activities whatever.

Mr. McConnell. But the employer does?

Mr. McDonald. Some do. Not all.

I do not know whether you were here, Mr. McConnell, when I read that statement from the existing agreement with the United States Steel Corp.

Mr. McConnell. You say you are for H. R. 2032?

Mr. McDonald. That is right, sir.

Mr. McConnell. What is your opinion about the inherent right of the President in national emergencies, to compel the employees to maintain the status quo?

Mr. McDonald. That is a very involved legal problem, and if it is all right with you, Mr. McConnell and Mr. Kelley, I would like to defer that to Mr. Goldberg.

Mr. McConnell. That would be perfectly all right. I understand that. I would like to ask Mr. Goldberg to do that.

Mr. Kelley. You have one-half minute to answer it.

Mr. Goldberg. Mr. Congressman, our position with respect to that is this. We do not think that there is any inherent power in the President to injunctions. We have stated that very emphatically, and that is our position. We think that the provision in the statute that calls for the President to ask the parties to observe the status quo is within the power of the President. It is given by the Congress. And I can tell you for the CIO that we will carry out the wishes of the President.

Mr. Kelley. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Smith?

Mr. Smith. I yield my time to Mr. McConnell.

Mr. Kelley. You have 10 minutes more, Mr. McConnell.

Mr. McConnell. I would like to ask you a little more in that connection. The Attorney General, who is the top legal man in the administration, has stated that the President does have the inherent power. That might involve the injunctive process or it might involve seizure or some type of military process. And you disagree with that, definitely?

Mr. Goldberg. I am exercising my prerogative as a lawyer to disagree with the Attorney General in that respect.

Mr. McConnell. Now, assuming that the Attorney General is correct and acts on that presumption, is it not likely that you would have this happen? I will read that section on page 17 of the act:

> After a Presidential proclamation has been issued under section 301, and until 5 days have elapsed after the report has been made by the board appointed under this section, the parties to the dispute shall continue or resume work and operations under the terms and conditions of employment which were in effect immediately prior to the beginning of the dispute unless a change therein is agreed to by the parties.

If the President should have this inherent power which could force the parties to continue or resume work, do you not have there a real slave labor provision?

Mr. Goldberg. I do not think so, because I think it is very apparent from this bill, and particularly the references to the Norris-LaGuardia and Clayton Acts that no power exists to get an injunction. That being so, this provision is a public policy declaration in the traditional American way in which the President, with the exercise of his high powers and high prestige as President, calls upon the parties to maintain the status quo, and I have indicated to you, Congressman, that as a matter of policy, the CIO, which has considered this provision, will carry out its obligations to the public and to the President of the United States.

Mr. McConnell. What do you think of the saving provision section in that connection, section 404? It says:

Nothing in this act shall be construed to require an individual employee to render labor or service without his consent.

Of course, it does not say anything in this act about the inherent powers of the President. If he should exercise it, does that saving process amount to anything?

Mr. Goldberg. Of course, Congressman, you never say anything in legislation about the inherent powers of the President. Whatever inherent powers the President has, he has under the Constitution.

Mr. McConnell. Yes.

Mr. Goldberg. But as I understand this statute, which is the statute we are considering, it says that the provisions of the Norris-LaGuardia Act shall apply to all of the provisions of this act, except provisions to enforce labor board orders, under section 10 of the act. And I think it is perfectly consistent. As I read the statute, it does not contain any slave-labor provisions or any provisions comparable to those in the Taft-Hartley Act which prevented people from striking under a Government injunction.

Mr. McConnell. My own personal opinion would be, for what it is worth, that I would be very sure of that section before giving approval of H. R. 2032.

Mr. Goldberg. Let us look, Congressman, at section 401. I do not know how the drafters of the statute could state it more plainly:

"An act to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of the courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes" (Norris-LaGuardia Act), approved March 24, 1932. * * * And sections 6 and 20 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes" (Clayton Act) * * * are continued in full force and effect in accordance with the provisions of such acts; except that the provision of such act and such sections shall not be construed to be applicable with respect to section 10 of the National Labor Relations Act.

I say, as a lawyer reading that section, that it very plainly says that no one can get an injunction except under section 10 of the National Labor Relations Act, which is the provision that called for the circuit court of appeals to enforce board orders. And I frankly am not very much concerned with this opinion that the Attorney General gave, because I think that the statute vitiates any possibility of any exercise of so-called inherent powers to get injunctions in this type of situation.

Now, whatever constitutional powers there are in the President's office, he has by virtue of the Constitution, and there is nothing that could legislatively be done to take them away.

Mr. McConnell. I am just pointing it out as a caution to you, because other lawyers have made that statement to me. I am not a lawyer, but other lawyers have stated that they view that with some distrust.

I have no further questions.

Mr. Kelley. Mr. Smith, you have 5 minutes remaining.

Mr. Smith. I have no questions.

Mr. Kelley. Mr. Werdel?

Mr. Werdel. I have only one question I want to ask.

Mr. Goldberg, did you go to school at the University of California at Berkeley?

Mr. GOLDBERG. No. I went to school at Northwestern.

Mr. WERDEL. As I view this national emergency situation, in the event of labor disputes there is a possibility in my mind about four procedures. One would be compulsory arbitration with Government enforcement. That is Hitlerism. Certainly we would not like that.

Mr. GOLDBERG. I would agree with you, Congressman.

Mr. WERDEL. The second would be the Government's taking over plants, which we do not like.

Mr. GOLDBERG. Yes.

Mr. WERDEL. The third is the limited use of injunctions for a cooling off period. That is what some of us tried to put in the Taft-Hartley Act, which you do not agree with.

Mr. GOLDBERG. Not only do I not agree with it, but it has been demonstrated that it will not work.

Mr. WERDEL. Let us assume that we would get into a difficult situation where the workers in an important industry believe that they are correct, and the management believes that it is correct, and they square off. Do you believe that the provision of the Lesinski measure will be adequate to settle it?

Mr. GOLDBERG. Yes, Congressman, and I will tell you why. We had the most curious situation during the war, where we had no restrictive legislation of this particular type. The labor organizations and the business organizations of this country agreed upon a policy at that time of no strikes. That was an agreement. And it worked very effectively, as we know.

Now, you have heard a declaration from me which does not represent my personal declaration; it represents the declaration of the CIO, that, having endorsed this bill, we are going to abide by it. I read the testimony—unfortunately, I was not present—of President Green, what President Green said, that he would comply with the spirit of this statute on maintaining the status quo when the President called upon us in any situation which is covered by the statute. That is a real national emergency. That does not mean any strike is a national emergency, as we all know. And we would not want to classify every strike as a national emergency.

I say again, using the best way, which is the way of publicity and voluntary action, we will have far better results in coping with real national emergencies than we would have if we attempted to enjoin people into compliance. And I say that not argumentatively. I say that with all the sincerity I can command.

Mr. WERDEL. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. McDonald, I believe in your statement you said that the philosophies of the two bills, or the two acts, are entirely different.

Mr. MCDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. The Wagner Act had a philosophy entirely different from that of the Taft-Hartley Act. I presume the difference was that they were founded on different premises.

Mr. MCDONALD. That is right, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. Would you care to explain that?

Mr. MCDONALD. I believe that the Wagner Act was designed to encourage the organization of men into labor unions of their own choosing. I believe that the Taft-Hartley Act was designed to prevent the organizing of men into labor unions of their own choosing, and I further believe that the Taft-Hartley Act's basic design is aimed at the destruction of those labor unions.

Mr. KELLEY. I assume, then, that the Wagner Act started out on the premise that labor and management could be friendly.

Mr. MCDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. And the Taft-Hartley Act assumes that labor and management are enemies.

Mr. MCDONALD. I think it is Marxian, really, in concept, in that it creates a definite distinction. It attempts to create a class conflict in America. The Wagner Act attempted to do just the opposite. It encouraged friendly relationships, as indicated, Mr. Kelley, by the type of relationships we have been aiming for in the steel industry, as I indicated in the statement that I read to you.

Mr. KELLEY. It has been stated repeatedly in the last 2 or 3 years that the rank and file of the membership of organized labor did not know anything about the Taft-Hartley Act, and that a lot of them were satisfied with it. The only people that were grumbling about it were the labor leaders. Now, have you ever taken a poll of the membership of the steel workers to determine how the rank and file felt about it?

Mr. MCDONALD. We have not sent out a questionnaire, such as some companies have sent out. But I have been in almost every district of the United Steelworkers of America since this law was enacted; I have been in district conferences with fellows right out of the mill. I have been in local union meetings, and the records are replete with statements from those fellows as to what an awful thing this Taft-Hartley Act is. As a matter of fact, I came back from St. Louis to be here. I attended a district conference in St. Louis, Mo., on Saturday. And there I talked with fellows who have come out of the mills. They came to me, I did not need to seek them out, saying, "When are we going to get rid of this thing, Dave?" explaining how it was affecting them adversely in their plants.

Everybody is confused. Management is confused. The negotiating committees are confused, by the ambiguity of the act. They do not know what they can do and what they cannot do. And as a result, I do not know when these fellows in these local situations will be able to get agreements renegotiated. Things of that sort are bothering them all the time.

Senator Taft would say that the act means one thing. Mr. Hartley would say that it means something else, and so on and so forth. We have a great new body of law being built up by the National Labor Relations Board. Everybody is mixed up and confused about this time. And that goes right down to our local union people.

Mr. KELLEY. It is my experience, and I rub shoulders with a great many of them.

Mr. MCDONALD. Yes, of course you do, sir. You come from an industrial area, and you have reason to contact these people.

Mr. KELLEY. I find this, also; they feel that the Federal Government has selected them out as a group and legislated against them.

Mr. MCDONALD. That is right.

Mr. KELLEY. And restricted their liberty.

Mr. MCDONALD. That is correct, sir. They feel that the Federal Government is lined up with unfair employers to beat down their wages and destroy their working conditions. And you, sir, you know full well what conditions were in western Pennsylvania, just to cite one section of the country, a few years back, before unions came into being. I think perhaps with your own eyes you saw the degradation to which working men were forced in the coal mines and in steel mills and every place else.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not think I could ever wipe out that memory.

Mr. MCDONALD. No, sir; I am sure I cannot. If I seem to be heated a bit, it is because I can remember them very distinctly, the thud of falling iron pots on steelworkers' heads and coal miners' heads. We have wiped that out in America, and let us never go back there. Let us get rid of this iniquitous Taft-Hartley Act, which can be used by unfair employers whenever they so choose, to again start the club-swinging and the shooting and the rioting and that sort of thing. Reenact the Wagner Act with these few provisions which we have suggested so as to restore the climate that we have been working to build in America, as outlined in that Carnegie-Illinois agreement, friendly, cooperative relationships. Make this democratic capitalistic system of ours really work.

Mr. KELLEY. That is all, Mr. McDonald and Mr. Goldberg. Thank you very much.

Mr. MCDONALD. Thank you very much.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Johnstone, of the United Automobile Workers.

Mr. Johnstone, are you going to read all your statement?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. No, I am not.

Mr. KELLEY. How about these other statements that have come along with yours?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. I am going to read about four pages, and then ad lib on it.

Mr. KELLEY. There are three statements here.

Mr. JOHNSTONE. There is only one statement, Congressman Kelley, and the rest are exhibits.

Mr. KELLEY. Do you want these inserted in the record?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. If you please.

Mr. KELLEY. All right. That will be taken care of.

You may proceed.

Mr. JOHNSTONE. Thank you.

TESTIMONY OF T. A. JOHNSTONE, ASSISTANT DIRECTOR, GENERAL MOTORS DEPARTMENT, UNITED AUTOMOBILE WORKERS, CIO

Mr. JOHNSTONE. My name is Thomas A. Johnstone. I am assistant director of the General Motors department of the UAW–CIO, an organization of over 1,000,000 members, and I speak for them today.

I would like to express the regret of the president of our organization, Mr. Walter P. Reuther; he is unable to be here today because of his injury. He is still under a doctor's care. I would like also at this time to introduce my associates. I would like to introduce our general counsel on my right, Mr. Irving Levy, and Mr. Don Montgomery, chief of our Washington bureau. As we proceed, they may participate in the discussion and answer questions. By citing the actual cases of which the UAW-CIO has first-hand knowledge, we will show you how the Taft-Hartley Act has operated and is today operating, to make industrial relations worse, not better.

First, it seems to us obvious that in enacting the Taft-Hartley Act, the Eightieth Congress mistook the symptoms of labor unrest for causes of that unrest.

The causes were, first, attempts of employers to hold down wages while prices and profits before and after taxes were rising, and, second, the action of Congress itself in prematurely destroying price controls, priorities, and allocations of scarce necessary commodities such as building materials, steel, and other items.

Profit-hungry employers and Congress together set loose a spiral of inflation. Workers' real wages, their power to buy the goods they produced, shrank faster than workers could win wage increases to catch up with rising prices.

Aided by Congress, the believers in the trickle-down theory of prosperity won out over those who believed that healthy lasting prosperity can be based only on purchasing power in the hands of wage earners, farmers, and professional people, on buying power put in their hands day by day and week by week in payment for work performed, goods produced, and service rendered.

When, as was inevitable in the postwar period of inflation, free American workers attempted to bargain peacefully and reasonably for wage increases to keep up with the soaring cost of living—and even for a small share of record-breaking profits, employers too often attempted to deny these demands and to push down the standard of living—the buying power—of their employees. Denied wage increases, these free workers had no choice but to put their economic strength against the economic strength of employers. They exercised the right to strike to which the Taft-Hartley Act later paid lip service in section 13 but denied in section 9 (c) (3) and other provisions. To the extent they succeeded—and they were not as successful as they could have been if employers had not been reimbursed for their strike losses by the carry-forward, carry-back provision of the tax laws—they protected the living standards of the Nation. Moreover, labor, by its action, toned up the very markets in which American employers and farmers must sell most of their goods if they are to be sold at all.

But Congress misread the wage disputes and the costly strikes of 1945–46—costly in terms of wages and delayed production but less so in profits. Sitting in judgment, Congress overlooked the cause, which was an inflation set loose in part by its own acts, and attempted to pin the blame on labor, to punish labor with the Taft-Hartley Act. In the words of Senator Wayne Morse, the Eightieth Congress missed the apple and hit the boy.

Today the fact that in the past 2 years many of the American people have been priced out of the market for hard and soft consumer goods, for new houses and new cars, makes it imperative that, as proposed in H. R. 2032, American wage earners be freed to bargain effectively for wage increases, for social security and pensions. They must be protected in the exercise of that right, as was done under the Wagner Act and as is proposed in H. R. 2032.

Only as this is done, along with other steps for which the American people voted last November 2, can we establish a balance among wages, prices, and profits that will make it possible for wage earners, farmers, and professional people to buy back an economically healthy share of the goods and services they produce.

Repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and reenactment of the Wagner Act, as amended by H. R. 2032, are in the interest of farmers, manufacturers, and businessmen as much as in the interest of wage earners. Early enactment of H. R. 2032 is a practical step in restoring the market for the products of American farms and factories. Neither farmers nor businessmen can sell their goods and services at fair prices and profits unless American wage earners are able to bargain and to get enough wages and security to be good customers year in and year out at a high standard of living that rises at least as fast as technology improves.

We are a long way from that healthy balance today. Only the extra demand for ECA and the biggest peacetime military budget in history keep the market up. Should the cold war end and peace break out, we would all be faced overnight with the problems of achieving such a balance as a part of our productive process—or creating substitutes for such a balance by large public works and relief measures to be paid for out of taxes.

It is high time for Congress to restore genuinely free collective bargaining—to let labor do what it can toward achieving and maintaining the healthy economic equilibrium essential to stable prosperity.

Were the Taft-Hartley Act to remain in force, and were the Eighty-first Congress to set idly by while our economy continues another vicious cycle of a short boom and a long bust with resulting large-scale chronic mass unemployment, the full evil of the act would come into play. The act is an arsenal of weapons, made ready for the use of short-sighted, antilabor employers, whenever they deem the time right for a return to the industrial warfare of the pre-Wagner Act days.

As other witnesses have demonstrated to this committee, the Taft-Hartley Act, in its purpose, its construction, its machinery, and its administration, is a one-sided law. It is loaded to give summary action against labor and to afford employers the immunity of delay. In its attempt to prevent effective political action by workers through their unions, it is unconstitutional. It is vindictive in intent and effect. It is unfair. It is unjust. It is filled with legalistic booby traps—with whereases and aforesaids and provided-howevers. It is unworkable. It should be repealed as provided in H. R. 2032.

There are some people of good will, not too well informed about labor-management relations, who believe that the Taft-Hartley Act is good in spots. Like the addled egg served to the visiting preacher, which, he said, was good "in spots," the Taft-Hartley Act is bad in so many spots that for all practical purposes it is bad all over.

Let us dispose of it and make a fresh start, going back to the Wagner Act, which was fair in purpose, intent, and provisions, and start over again from there, with those substantial amendments provided in H. R. 2032.

By providing that the General Counsel "shall forthwith" move to obtain injunctions against labor but not against employers, the Taft-Hartley Act has been and is being used to weaken and destroy union strength and effectiveness, to put the force of the Federal Government and the courts behind strike-breaking, union-busting actions by employers, acting singly and in groups.

At this point, in passing, let me compliment the members of this committee for having done a perfect service in exposing the real authors of the Taft-Hartley Act, Mr. Gerald Morgan and others. We have personal knowledge of some of his associates.

The act expressly permits scabs to vote in National Labor Relations Board elections while expressly barring strikers from voting in such elections.

The act sets up the alien undemocratic requirement that in union-shop elections a majority, not of those voting, but a majority of all those eligible to vote, is required to legalize a union shop. And then, after such a majority has so voted, the union must still bargain with the employer to win a union shop. As has undoubtedly been pointed out by earlier witnesses, this test has not been met by any Member of Congress and probably by no members of any State legislature, county, or board, or city council in America.

All these vicious provisions and others, as applied in the 18 months since the law became effective, have had the effect, unforeseen by the act's sponsors, of bringing about in union members a renewed sense of the value of unions.

Ninety-seven percent of all union-shop elections have been won by overwhelming majorities.

Votes were cast by as high as 98 percent of the members eligible to vote in such elections.

In the Ford elections, with the Taft-Hartley Act, State laws and the Ford management placing every possible obstacle in the way, 88,943 voted to continue the union shop, the company challenged 924 and only 1,214 voted against. This was a 98 percent majority. It was a 90 percent majority of all those eligible to vote. In seven States, Ford workers were not permitted to vote because of State laws prohibiting the union shop.

Incidentally, I would like to take this opportunity to mention that General Motors, which I service day after day, makes a fine distinction between union-shop elections and representation elections, in that all of the representation elections are conducted on plant property, and the corporation offers no objection.

On April 17, 1940, there were elections conducted in 55 plants of the General Motors, and they stated to the National Labor Relations Board and went publicly on record that there was no loss in production and that there was no loss in output. They do not want the General Motors, the G-M workers, to have free and unfettered opportunity to express themselves in union-shop elections. The restrictions which apply there do not apply to representation elections.

The Taft-Hartley Act has aroused labor as never before to an active interest and participation in political action and brought about such a degree of unity among all labor with results that the Members of this Congress know. In this respect, the Taft-Hartley bazooka has backfired upon its nominal sponsors and supporters.

Perhaps the best summation of the effect of the Taft-Hartley Act was contained in an inadvertent admission by Senator Ball's watchdog committee of the Eightieth Congress.

In polite but understandable language, the watchdog committee, created by the Taft-Hartley Act itself last March, 1948, answered—industrial strife.

Concluding a study of how the act had caused 10 years of peaceful union-management relations to be broken by a strike in the Murray Corp. plant in Detroit, the committee said (from p. 177, March 1948

Report of Taft-Hartley watchdog committee created to study effects of the act):

> With passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, the company and the union each feel that its relations with the other are on the threshold of a new era.
> Efforts of the company to regain exclusive control of what it conceives are the rights of management and to restore a balance and equality to the bargaining relation will be vigorously resisted by the union as a challenge to its power and authority, a threat to its very existence.
> There is unquestionably to be a readjustment of the relations between the parties during the next few years, a new concept of the functions of union and management in the industrial economy.
> Achievement of this evolutionary cycle without open strife will be a severe test of collective bargaining.

The committee's conclusions in plainer language:

The Taft-Hartley Act opens the door to a "new era" very similar to the old era of 1920–37, when refusal to deal with unions was the prevailing pattern in American industry and business.

The act encourages employers to attempt "to regain exclusive control of what it conceives are the rights of management."

Unions, with four times the membership they had in the old era, will "vigorously resist" these efforts by employers, "as threats to their very existence."

The Taft-Hartley Act will thus bring about industrial strife because such a change to a "new era," frankly intended to resemble the old era, cannot come about in collective bargaining unless unions surrender to the demands of employers that they be allowed "to regain exclusive control of what they conceive to be the rights of management."

Now, we present cases within UAW experience showing the evil effects of the Taft-Hartley Act. They are typical of many. In a period of recession or depression, they would become the pattern for weakening and destroying unions and the practice of free collective bargaining that has developed since passage of the Norris-LaGuardia and Wagner Acts.

The first case shows a comparison between the speed for employers and the action for workers, in which there was real speed, yet propulsion, so far as the employers were concerned, and never-ending delay insofar as the unions were concerned. These case histories are placed side by side. One is in the Perry-Norvell Shoe case, in which 3½ months were occupied, 107 days, to be exact. The employer obtained an injunction against the picketing that was going on after a strike had been called. The trial examiner found there was no violation of the contract and dismissed the complaint; but, nevertheless, the strike was broken in 3½ months, on the basis of the employer complaint.

The other case is the Dorsey Trailers case in which a strike occurred in November 1946, and 846 days later, 2 years, 4½ months to be exact, we were and are without redress. In this case we have the story of an industrial "tobacco road." Sworn testimony shows in the Dorsey Trailers case that the chief of police and the assistant superintendent of Dorsey Trailers hied a thug to beat up a union representative for $50. The thug whom he hired subcontracted the job of beating the union representative, Jim Hardin, of our organization, to two others, for $20 apiece. The organizer was badly beaten, and he was hospitalized. One of the thugs later appeared in court and pleaded guilty for himself and one other of his helpers, and he was told by the "judge"—and I put "judge" in quotes—that he had been fined $104.50, but that his fine has been paid. We say "justice delayed is justice defied," and we have not gotten justice in that case yet.

Compare the treatment given to us in the Dorsey Trailers case with the streamlined disposition of the Perry-Norvell Shoe case, where the employer filed a complaint.

If you will turn to the next exhibit, this has to do with Dumont Laboratories, Passaic, N. J., Television producers. It is a throw-back to pre-Wagner Act, anti-union days. In this case the employer propagandized his employees under the so-called free-speech provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, and he stated to his employees, in part:

> It is our honest belief that the restrictions that would be imposed by a union contract would not only directly affect you in connection with the matters which we have discussed, but would also directly affect the company and indirectly you as a part of Dumont by hampering efficient production and our ability to maintain and continue to improve the standards of employment that has made Dumont a good place in which to work.

That is the sort of fruit which was strewn by the so-called free-speech provision of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Today the Dumont workers are without union representation; they are without the protection of a contract; and thanks to the Taft-Hartley guaranty of free speech to employers for the intimidation of employees with poverty propaganda such as Dumont, riding the crest of the new television boom, thrust upon the Dumont workers by the employer.

Case No. 3 concerns Autopulse Corporation, Ludington, Mich. The company made threats of discharges or withdrawal of paid vacations, and made other charges to the employees prior to election. We had had 7 years of good labor relations with that organization through local 174 in Detroit, and it completely reversed its policy when it moved to Ludington, Mich. They fired workers who attended a union meeting on November 26, and workers later were told that if they voted "no," it would be easy to get paid vacations, and they would have steady work, and that if they voted "yes," immediate large layoffs would follow, and employees would be bossed by union big shots, et cetera.

To date, 14 months after 28 employees were fired following their attendance at a local union meeting, the National Labor Relations Board has not even set a hearing on the unfair labor practice charge which we have filed. We intend to show that the act is unworkable.

In Case No. 4 we cite a situation in the Ford Motor Co. as respects the union-shop provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. In 1947 Ford Motor Co. and our organization signed a contract providing for a union shop to continue until June 15, 1949, if and to the extent permitted by law.

And in a letter which the management sent to all hourly rated workers in February 1948 it told the workers that the union-shop clause in the 1947 contract would expire July 15, 1948. That was not strictly in accordance with the truth, unless management was speaking their minds ahead of negotiations.

The Ford Motor Co. demanded we petition for our union-shop elections on a plant-unit basis, and we have Ford plants in 25 different cities outside of Michigan, as well as the River Rouge plant.

It also told the National Labor Relations Board that elections could not be held and would not be held in the plant unless the company designated the places of balloting, a restriction which the National Labor Relations Board refused since it, and it alone, is responsible for conducting the elections.

In spite of that, we won by 88,943 affirmative votes. There were 91,081 workers who voted there, as I said earlier.

This, we say, and similar votes of confidence indicate beyond any question that workers want unions, and they want to have the union shop, and it indicates those sponsors of the Taft-Hartley Act who said workers did not want unions and did not want to have the union shop are incorrect. Today even Senator Taft would like to forget this backfiring provision of the law dealing with union-shop elections.

Case No. 5 shows that after 7 years Campbell, Wyant & Cannon Foundry, Muskegon, Mich., changed its attitude completely insofar as union security was concerned. This company had a contract with the union dating from August 31, 1941, and it provided for maintenance of membership. The check-off was incorporated in the union provisions March 18, 1946. Contract discussions began April 27, 1948, and the company objected to talking about union security and check-off at all. They refused to bargain on this issue, and they forced a strike which lasted for 79 days. At the end of those 79 days they granted the union-shop clause that had previously been in effect.

That strike, 79 days in length, shut down the Hudson Motor Car plant in Detroit, and it caused lay-offs in Ford and General Motors, all unnecessarily; but due to the encouragement lent by the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Case No. 6, the Sealed Power Corp., Muskegon, Mich.; they had union-shop and check-off provisions, but in 1948 the company objected to these provisions, even though we had an election there which showed 87 percent of the eligible employees, and 93 percent of the valid votes cast, favored the continuance of union-shop conditions in the plant.

After much delay, local 637 was able to win renewal of the union shop and check-off provisions.

Another instance of Taft-Hartley trouble-making.

Case No. 7 deals with the Packard Motor Car Co. We have had relations with Packard since the early days, since 1937, and we have had exclusive bargaining rights for all units covered.

In 1948 we were confronted in negotiations for renewal of a contract that the word "exclusive" be stricken from the contract, and certain provisions providing that an employee must take his grievance up with the company supervisor first; and then take his grievance to the union steward, but only after obtaining permission from his supervisor.

We renewed our 1948 contract without that provision, but the company is intimating it intends to renew that provision in June of 1949.

That, we submit, is an instance of the "new era," the dawn of the "new era," described in the 1948 Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations Report.

Case No. 8 is more recent. It has to do with Frank Foundry Corp., Muncie, Ind. And in this case the management cited new laws as a reason for terminating a contract that was then in existence.

They fired two union stewards, and they refused to negotiate on plant grievances, and they have shut down the plant. They charge the union with having gone on strike, and attempted to deny unemployment compensation to the workers in that plant. The Unemployment Compensation Commission found there was no strike, but nevertheless, in spite of the fact that the State agency found no strike was called or existed, the National Labor Relations Board and the general counsel, Mr. Denham, operating under the Taft-Hartley Act, for 10 months refused to recognize a lock-out—and it is a lock-out, purely and simply—and we still have our people discharged, and no collective bargaining in that situation.

Mr. JACOBS. Pardon me, but was that Frank Foundry you were talking about?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. Yes, sir; it was.

(The material referred to was filed for reference.)

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Powell?

Mr. POWELL. I have no questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Johnstone, I would like to ask you if you know Jerry Morgan?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. I am not privileged to have made Mr. Morgan's acquaintance, but I am privileged to know one of his associates, however.

Mr. BAILEY. You would not be referring to Gerard Reilly?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. I am referring to Gerard Reilly. We had an unfair-labor-practice charge filed against the General Motors Corp., and a hearing was held in Detroit in February of 1946, and contrary to usual practice, and contrary to usual procedure, and strange, very strange we thought, Mr. Reilly came out to conduct the hearing.

While the hearing was in progress he went out to have lunch with Mr. C. E. Wilson, the president of the General Motors Corp. He was sitting in a judicial capacity, and he thought it was proper to have lunch with Mr. Wilson. And it must have been interesting because he did not get back for the hearing that afternoon, and it was necessary that he give an explanation. He was then a member of the National Labor Relations Board. He is today getting a $3,000-a-month retainer as Washington lobbyist for the General Motors Corp.

Mr. BAILEY. I wanted to ask you if you are aware of the fact that he also represents the General Electric?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. Yes, sir; and the printing trade, as well.

Mr. BAILEY. And some other concerns?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. Yes; he is doing pretty well for himself, I think.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to ask you a question in that connection, Mr. Johnstone. As a member of the National Labor Relations Board he became familiar with all the gimmicks in the Taft-Hartley law so that when he severed his connections with the National Labor Relations Board he was an ideal man to employ as a company lobbyist?

I am wondering if that is not proof on its face that the Taft-Hartley law was written in favor of the employers, that he would be much more valuable to the employers than he would be, we will say, to a labor-union group?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. We strongly suspect that to be the case, Congressman Bailey.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to ask you just one other question. I want to speed up the hearing as much as possible.

On your presentation of case No. 1, you refer to the Perry-Norvell Shoe case, and the Dorsey Trailers case—particularly in reference to the Dorsey Trailers case. I believe the strike began on November 15, 1946, and some months or 6 weeks later, on the 17th of December 1946, the record shows that there was some violence resulting in some of the union representatives being severely beaten. And 3 or 4 days later, on the 24th of December, you filed an unfair-labor-practice charge. I note that that case is still pending, and probably will not be heard in court until probably the fall term of the United States court.

Do you mean to say that you have been unable to get any redress of grievance for this unfair-labor-practice charge?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. We have been absolutely unable to obtain any redress whatever at this time.

Mr. BAILEY. And the case has been on record for almost 3 years?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. Two and a half years; that is true.

Mr. BAILEY. Is it not true they can get a redress in mandatory proceedings—some of them, I believe, show 48 hours after the employer has asked for action they have been able to get action.

Mr. JOHNSTONE. The employer can, and he has.

Mr. BAILEY. And you cannot get it in two and a half years?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. We cannot get it in two and a half years.

Mr. BAILEY. And yet men have come in and testified the Taft-Hartley is not unfavorable to labor.

Mr. JOHNSTONE. And I would like to say those are not isolated cases. There is the J. I. Casco case, at Allison, Ala., and the Fairbanks Co. in Rome, Ga., has also refused to bargain with us.

We have shown the act is bogged down, and we have shown it is impracticable. We have at the present time an order from the National Labor Relations Board directing the General Motors Corp. to bargain with us on matters of insurance and social security. The corporation is not going to comply with the order. They have informed us on that.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you have any redress?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. We have asked the director of the seventh region of the National Labor Relations Board, Mr. Frank Bowen, what we could do, and he said we could not get action before August. And the same is true in other cases in which his attention has been called to failure of getting redress in different regions.

One of our representatives wrote the seventh region of the NLRB as to when he could expect action to be taken on a complaint, and was informed it would not be before August, at the earliest. And the same thing applies to our case.

Mr. BAILEY. In other words, action is discretionary with Mr. Denham, or whoever runs the National Labor Relations Board, to hear you whenever they get ready: is that right?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. Not only that, but I understand their staff does not permit, and the backlog of cases being what it is, they cannot get to it.

Mr. BAILEY. I believe that is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. I would say you made a rather misstatement when you said the act has bogged down. I think it has run rather true to form, and it is carrying out the idea it was created for, and I do not see how you can expect any better results from it.

Mr. JOHNSTONE. I will accept your correction, Congressman.

Mr. IRVING. The number of cases you have cited here would simply convince any reasonable person that the effect is just exactly as predicted and is being stated here as the effect would be in labor cases.

I am interested in the fact that some people are thinking further ahead even about our economic problems and our economic situation; a few years hence, maybe not that far hence, when we stop with ECA, and when we stop with perhaps our military production, or production for the military. We have quite a few people unemployed right at the present time, and I think we should be worrying about where we are going to find jobs for a lot of people, as well as trying to take jobs away from them.

I think I have no more questions to ask, or no more statement to make at this time.

Thank you.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. I have no questions, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Johnstone, I wanted to ask you about the Conciliation Service. Has your experience with the Conciliation Service been as satisfactory since they made the change, and the arbitrators are not Government employees? Do you understand what I am talking about? If you will recall a few years ago you would call for an arbitrator and you could get him from the Conciliation Service as a Government arbitrator; is that correct?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. That is true.

Mr. JACOBS. And about 1945, was it not, or about 1946, they did away with the Arbitration Section of the Conciliation Service, and the Government now will designate an independent arbitrator; is that not correct?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. I believe that to be the case, although I am not too well informed on that, and I will explain why later.

Mr. JACOBS. Has your organization used that Service enough that you would have an opinion?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. Yes; I have very definite opinions. I deal with General Motors, one of the most powerful organizations of capital the world has ever seen ,and they treat conciliators and mediators. Very frankly, conciliation has never been much of an asset in our dealings with General Motors Corp. You only get in General Motors what you are bold and big enough to take.

Mr. JACOBS. Have you used the arbitrators at all, in the Government service?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. No; we do not. We have our own arbitrator, insofar as contract provisions go, and insofar as contract negotiating, we have suggested on two late occasions that the corporation accept arbitration, and they have not done so. You will recall, I am sure, that when the Presidential Fact Finding Committee was established in late 1945 and began hearings in early 1946, that the corporation walked out on the fact-finding hearing and refused later to accept the report and recommendations.

Mr. JACOBS. Maybe Mr. Levy has had more experience along this line. I had something particular in mind, and I think your experience in General Motors has been such that it has not led you into what I want to know about.

It has been represented to me by some people, since the Government has followed the policy of designating private arbitrators rather than sending out an arbitrator from the Conciliation Service when parties want arbitration, that the experience has not been satisfactory, and that the arbitrator from a private concern does not give a firm decision, and does not feel as secure as the Government arbitrator did under the old system.

Have you had any experience along those lines?

Mr. LEVY. I am sorry, but in most of the UAW contracts we have a permanent arbitrator who is chosen, so we do not call upon the Government arbitrator in either event, except in the smaller companies——

Mr. JACOBS. I thought probably in the smaller companies you had had some experience.

Mr. LEVY. I personally have not.

Mr. JACOBS. I see.

One additional question in reference to the Frank Foundry: In short, you told us the company, in effect, had a lock-out, and the Indiana Unemployment Board awarded compensation; is that correct?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. That is true.

Mr. JACOBS. Whereas the company was contending it was a strike?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. That is also true.

Mr. JACOBS. Are you aware of the fact that the same contention was adjudicated against the company by the Appellate Court of Indiana in 1943?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. I am not, Congressman Jacobs.

Mr. LEVY. That is true.

Mr. JACOBS. I believe that is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. I just have one question. I notice here you have excerpts from testimony given before the National Labor Relations Board in the case of Dorsey Trailers, and the decision of the Review Board in the case of Frank Foundry.

Have those been admitted for the record?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. They have not, but we will offer them.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask that they be admitted for the record, the part of their testimony that includes excerpts from official report of proceedings before the National Labor Relations Board in the case of Dorsey Trailers, Inc., and UAW-CIO, No. 15C–1315, Dothan, Ala., June 12, 1947, and State of Indiana, Employment Security Division, Decision of Review Board, in the matter of case No. 48–LDR–2, Claimant, Irvin Anderson, et al——

Mr. KELLEY. Were those the supplements you had with you?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. We have them and we will place them in the record.

Mr. KELLEY. We will accept them for the record.

(The documents referred to will be found in the appendix following the close of today's record. See index for page numbers.)

Mr. JOHNSTONE. I would like to urge, if I might, that the members of the committee read the testimony in the Dorsey Trailers case. It is on a par with anything you could read in Tobacco Road, I can assure you.

Mr. BURKE. I quite agree with you. I have read it, and that is why I wanted to be sure it was included in the record.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. Let me ask you—due to the fact you represent a big mass production—the same question I asked Mr. McDonald, of the United Steelworkers.

I have heard it said here by quite a number of employers in mass production, and in big heavy-machinery production, that they are very much concerned with retaining the foreman section in the Taft-Hartley Act.

What has been your experience and your relations with management over the question of where a foreman starts and where he ends in trying to determine whether he is eligible for membership in your union?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. We do not take foremen into our union. They have their own separate organization, and we have always maintained separate organizations. Our experience, insofar as foremen's authority goes, shows they have very, very little. They certainly do not make labor-relations policy, and very few of them carry it out, insofar as day-to-day dealings on the floor of the shop are concerned. All of this talk about foremen having managerial authority is so much poppycock. It does not stand up when you begin to handle grievances in one of the larger corporations. We seriously doubt if they have it, in the first place.

Mr. WIER. Let me ask you the second question.

Have you had any difficulty with the section of the Taft-Hartley Act that qualifies a professional worker?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. No; we have not.

Mr. WIER. How far up do you go in admitting workers to membership in your union; where do you break off?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. We do take what you might term "professional people"—by that, I presume you mean artists and designers—we have some of those under contract in General Motors, and we have some in other organizations that are under contract with the United Auto Workers; but, so far as I can tell, we have not had any great difficulty on that score.

Mr. WIER. I guess that answers that, then.

That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. I have no questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Davenport, do you have any questions?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Johnstone, did you say your foremen had a separate organization?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. They have their own organizations, separate and distinct from the United Auto Workers.

Mr. KELLEY. The Foreman's League here last week, I think it was, said they represented so many thousand foremen throughout the United States, and were opposed to the organization of foremen, and one of the men was from the General Motors Corp.

Mr. JOHNSTONE. I think they have some sort of company-union organization among General Motors' foremen.

Mr. KELLEY. Company unions?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. It is a company-dominated organization, and it is designed to head off the organization of foremen by a bona fide organization.

Mr. KELLEY. Certified by the National Labor Relations Board?

Mr. JOHNSTONE. The NLRB.

Mr. KELLEY. That is all, Mr. Johnstone.

Thank you very much.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, may we also submit for the record the other documents that were filed with you; namely, the case histories beginning with the Dorsey Trailers case and going down to the Frank Foundry case? This report of the decision of the Indiana Employment Security decision on the Frank Foundry case, and the affidavit of one John Higgins, also in that case, which may be included in the record with Mr. Johnstone's testimony.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, they will be inserted in the record.

Mr. KELLEY. We have a letter from the Modine Manufacturing Co., of Racine, Wis.; a statement from Mr. Paul M. Herzog, chairman of the National Labor Relations Board; and a statement from Philip Gelfo, president of the Associated Master Barbers and Beauticians of America, Chapter 396, Washington, D. C.

Without objection, they will be received for the record.

(The documents referred to will be found in the appendix following close of today's record. See index for page numbers.)

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. O. A. Knight, of the Oil Workers International Union.

TESTIMONY OF O. A. KNIGHT, PRESIDENT, OIL WORKERS INTERNATIONAL UNION, CIO

Mr. KNIGHT. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my name is O. A. Knight. I am president of the Oil Workers International Union.

Mr. KELLEY. Pardon me. Are you going to read the entire statement?

Mr. KNIGHT. No, sir; but I am about to make a statement in connection with that.

I have been the president of the Oil Workers Union since 1940, being elected to that office after serving for 4 years in the oil industry as an oil-company employee.

I have with me Mr. William Hanscom, also an oil worker of long standing, who is a member of the International Oil Workers Union.

We have prepared a brief, and we have with it an exhibit; but in the interest of expediency, and due to the lateness of the hour, I would like to forego reading the brief, and to talk extemporaneously on first of all a question just raised by Congressman Wier with respect to the impact to that section of the Taft-Hartley Act which deals with foremen and, secondly, sketch the impact upon my own organization during the few months the Taft-Hartley law has been in effect.

We have had some very unusual and disappointing experiences under the Taft-Hartley Act as it refers to that section of the act, dealing with supervisory employees.

The second page of our brief has a statement in that connection, which I would like to read in detail.

The statutory definition of a supervisor and its treatment under the act, section 2 (11), is hampering peaceful labor relations. In order to avoid collective bargaining, and to reduce the size of the bargaining unit, many employers in the country are giving their craftsmen, gang leaders, leadmen, stillmen, operators, and other workmen classifications some of the statutory duties and authorities defined in the act. We had a case involving the Wasatch Oil & Refining Co., case No. 20–R–2250, where the Board excluded a pump mechanic merely because upon his employer's recommendation one of his fellow workmen was discharged and another employee engaged. In this same case the Board also excluded the stillmen.

I was employed at the time I first became a member of this union, and historically the union has bargained for men in that category who are actually leadmen in the same classification and the same spirit as craftsmen who work with helpers—but in this same case the Board excluded stillmen for whom we have historically bargained throughout the entire industry.

As a result of this decision the Magnolia Petroleum Co., at Beaumont, Tex., filed a petition with the Board to remove stillmen, treaters, and other operators from our unit merely because these classified employees have a minor degree of direction over the work of their assistants: however, this petition was withdrawn after we seriously threatened to engage in a strike to require the company to continue to bargain with us for these people, who, incidentally, had been originally included in the group certified by the National Labor Relations Board. Certainly, if we have to strike to protect our rights of bargaining, the purposes of the act are not effectuated because of this broad exclusion. In many of our contract negotiations, employers are presently endeavoring to remove from the bargaining unit substantially all employees above the grade of a laborer or helper.

A few years ago, before the Taft-Hartley Act, the National Labor Relations Board attempted to draw the line of demarcation between supervisors and other workmen too closely. In one case involving the Texas Pipeline Co., by following the Board's original determination of a supervisor, as contended by the company, we found that the unit was composed of approximately 87 supervisors and only 72 workmen.

The Board, after consideration and upon much effort on the part of our union, broadened the scope of the unit. But, we would like to point out that the definition as now used in the act, and as is being interpreted by the Board, would probably give effect to such a ridiculous unit. Certainly, the employees under such a circumstance would have no substantial bargaining power. We have a representation case before the Board involving the Rocky Mountain Pipeline Co., a subsidiary of Continental Oil Co., where out of a unit of 52 employees, the company contended that 27—over half—were supervisors under the act. The Board decided this case in favor of the company and excluded all operators and craftsmen who had helpers, even though they had helpers only occasionally. This case is reported in 79 N. L. R. B. No. 147.

We think it important to point out that unions are free to exercise their economic right to strike to require employers to bargain with them concerning the so-called supervisors, especially leadmen, gang leaders, stillmen, drillers, and craftsmen.

With respect to these stillmen, gang leaders, straw bosses, leadmen, and other minor supervisory employees, the Board has apparently disregarded the congressional intent and looked at the definition as a means of reducing the size and effectiveness of worker organizations.

The Senate Labor Committee report preceding the passage of this act stated in part:

> In drawing an amendment to meet this situation, the committee has not been unmindful of the fact that certain employees with minor supervisory duties have problems which may justify their inclusion in that act.
> It has therefore distinguished between straw bosses, leadmen, set-up men, and other minor supervisory employees, on the one hand, and the supervisor vested with such genuine management prerogatives.

The report further stated in discussing definitions of supervisors:

> In framing this definition the committee exercised great care, desiring that the employees herein excluded from the coverage of the act be truly supervisory.

Much debate was held on the Senate floor over this definition alone and all of the speakers clearly indicated that there was no intent to exclude anyone but genuine management supervisors.

We have discussed this problem with the executive secretary to the Board and pointed to the congressional history and legislative intent. He advised that the Board was aware of the history, but that the wording of the definition in the Act was to the contrary, and that therefore the Board was disregarding minor supervisors who are actual workmen if management designates them as supervisors.

In other words, management is the sole judge of who is a supervisor, and may exclude everyone from bargaining rights above the grade of a laborer or helper. Well over half of our membership are above these two grades. Through such an arbitrary definition and application, which is not imaginary, but is real, practically all craftsmen and operators may ultimately be excluded from the benefits of bargaining, unless they strike to protect their rights.

This problem can be and should be corrected by removing the exclusion of supervisory employees from the benefits of the Act, and is proposed in the Lesinski and Thomas bills.

From newspaper stories and from questions asked by certain members of the committee of witnesses here, it is evident that many of the people of our Nation have come to believe that the Taft-Hartley Act has not worked a hardship upon organized labor. I am here speaking for a union which has very definitely felt the full effect of the Taft-Hartley Act in a devastating and drastic way. I speak for an organization that has historically and traditionally believed in obeying the laws of the land, and which has obeyed the Taft-Hartley law in full.

In the early part of the year 1948 the Oil Workers International Union established a wage pattern in the so-called third round, at a figure of 17½ cents per hour increases in probably every company east of the Rocky Mountains.

The California contracts did not open up until some time later. In fact, they did not open up until September of 1948. Many of the companies operating east of the Rocky Mountains in the oil industry also operate west of the Rocky Mountains, and these companies east of the Rocky Mountains had instituted a 17½-cent increase that had become a general pattern everywhere except in California. Our union is well known in California; it has been in existence out there since 1917, and for over a quarter of a century there had not been a major strike in the oil industry in that entire section of the Nation.

On September 3, at midnight, the contracts from six of the major corporations and two small companies became open. Collective bargaining had been going on for a period of several months prior to that date, and the companies out there all were making an identical offer, in the sum of 12½ cents, or 5 cents an hour under the rates they had already agreed to east of the mountains, and in spite of the fact there was already existing in California a wage differential to the detriment of the California oil workers. They were receiving several cents an hour less than what was given east of the mountains even prior to the so-called third-round wages.

We had every reason to believe the companies would come through with a wage increase, but the dead-line date came around and they had not agreed to it, and many employees of the six major companies and the two smaller companies went on strike. At this point it became evident to us that not only the Taft-Hartley law was setting the stage insofar as laws were concerned, but the Taft-Hartley provisions had created an attitude in the courts and among many citizens that was not conducive to good labor relations when they had the law passed in the first place.

Four days after the strike started everything was going along in a peaceful manner, and injunctions were suddenly issued by the State courts against the Oil Workers Union, without any notice to the union, and without a hearing, and without us having an opportunity to be heard. These injunctions in every case limited the number of pickets. There were some cases where we could have four pickets on a gate, and in some instances we could have two, and everybody else was required to remain a couple of hundred yards back away from company property, from the gates of the company.

There was one case in particular where the gates were away from the extreme end, and that meant that it took them clear across the highway, where they could not get up anywhere near to do their picketing.

This same pattern of injunctions was followed by every company in the State that was on a strike. Their attitude was identical with respect to the wage increases, and in force it was expressed by the injunctions which they sought in the courts. And at almost the same time lawsuits were injected, the companies suing the union for alleged damages, and before this strike was over, we as a small organization, comparatively speaking, had been sued for over $30,000,000. In these lawsuits there was a very definite and very close resemblance to the Danbury Hatters case. The international union was named, the local union was named, and the leaders and then the lawsuits named "Doe 1" to "Doe 2,000," inclusive.

"Organization 1" to "Organization 10," inclusive.

"Organization A" to "Organization Z," inclusive, and in one extremely ridiculous case they had "Organizations Red, White, Blue, Green and Yellow," thereby making certain they had the field covered completely.

In the State of California, the law requires that when you file an answer in a lawsuit of that sort you not only pay a fee for the original person that you file for, but you pay a dollar a head on all of the John Does, and everybody else that is named; so, in order to get into the courts to properly defend our people, we had to pay thousands of dollars of financing fees, and we were a small union with a very small bank roll.

The National Labor Relations Board was not at all helpful in this situation. In fact, before I get through describing this situation I believe I can convince the members of this committee, and any fair-minded person, that the actions of the National Labor Relations Board, as it is constituted now under the Taft-Hartley Act, broke that strike, and I think I might as well go into that immediately.

Among the units involved in this case was a large Standard Oil plant at Richmond, Calif., the biggest refinery in the State, and the biggest group of men involved in this situation. Several months prior to this strike date another organization had filed a representation petition with the National Labor Relations Board. It had been laying in their files up there for months, but in the midst of the strike they ordered an election, and under those circumstances, in order to get our people in the position where they would have an opportunity to vote, we had to break our own strike and send them back to work, and in so doing, we tore the very heart out of our organization. Many of the people were not granted the opportunity to go back to work, and many have not gone back to work today, and the International Oil Workers Union is no longer the bargaining unit for that plant. A company union is the bargaining unit, exactly in accordance with the plan.

Mr. JACOBS. Was that the company union that had filed the representation?

Mr. KNIGHT. The company union had intervened. The machinists, I believe, filed it, and they did not even get a hatful of votes, and it was well known they did not have a hatful and that is why the petition had been laying up there all these months.

Directly, under the Taft-Hartley Act, there is a petition which has been discussed here, that being the mandatory requirement upon the part of the Board of processing company charges of unfair labor practices against unions. Such a case came up in a situation involving one of the plants, and the National Labor Relations Board immediately instituted action but, on the other hand, there were some very definite unfair labor practices against the union, and we were unable, and have been unable up to this date, to get any prosecutions. I would like to describe it. It was a condition such as that in Nazi Germany, in that concentration camps are involved. One of the major companies in California maintains a pipe line in the San Joaquin Valley, and they have stations scattered out about every 50 miles. They have homes for the workers for which the workers pay rent, and this group of people were on strike. The company went out and hired armed guards, big 6-foot huskies, and they put them in to guard their property, which was all right, but they were also conducting a concentration camp in each one of those areas. They would not let the workers or their families out without a permit from the plant superintendent. I have in my files, and I have submitted to the National Labor Relations Board, affidavits from three ministers who were refused opportunity to go into the plant and talk to their parishioners. The neighbors' children could not come in and play with these people's children, and they shut off the water they were paying for, and their sewers were naturally stopped.

Among the employees of the group, our steward, a man named George Arthur—understand, this is in the San Joaquin Valley, where it is hot—George Arthur was active as a union man, and he was subjected to a constant barrage of propaganda on the part of the company, exercising its free speech, and he was receiving letters, and was being contacted by foremen for two long months. The man worked day and night, and he finally went insane. He murdered his wife in that fit of insanity, and he almost murdered two of his children, and then he committed suicide under the concentration camp conditions.

We had brought this condition to the attention of the National Labor Relations Board, and submitted this unfair practice to them, and the affidavits of the ministers prior to the time this man went crazy. We asked them to prosecute an unfair charge and stop this, and they said, "Well, after all, it is mandatory that we process the charges against you. We recognize you have a charge here, but there are so many things before the Board right now that we just cannot get to it."

The Taft-Hartley Act in that instance certainly worked to the detriment not only of the people involved in that strike but to the detriment of all America, I believe.

On this question of free speech, throughout the course of this strike our people were subjected to all forms of pressure by the companies involved. Letters were sent to them, and many of them had pension rights and years of seniority, and they would set a deadline date, and say, "If you are not back by that time you will not get your pension." And, incidentally, some of the men, around 56 or 57 years of age, have never gone back to work. They had foremen calling at their homes day and night, and pressure was being put upon their wives, and every sort of unfair practice that could be instituted by companies was instituted against this group of men.

You have been discussing secondary boycotts here. I will say the oil industry was completely united in California in this situation. There was no law prohibiting them from helping each other. One spokesman was helping the group, and one company whose contract was in effect continued to operate the others by skimming the oil and spreading it out and giving it a little treatment. Another union of the CIO had a group of men manning the ships of one of these oil companies, and when they came into the docks and saw the pickets on the docks—our pickets picketing this company—they did not want to run through the picket lines, because it is part of the principles of a union man not to run through a picket line—their contracts were violated, and they are still off, and company unions are operating those ships. I think the president of that union is here and prepared to testify.

Railroad brotherhoods are in the same position. They did not want to run our pickets. And suits for millions of dollars were filed against them.

After this barrage of propaganda there were hundreds of our people cited for contempt of court. And I, myself, was cited for 60 counts of contempt, for being on the picket lines. I was not near the picket lines, but if the court had gone through with it I would have been fined $30,000 and would have had to serve 300 days in jail.

In one of these cases, although the international union had taken every possible action that it could take openly, by telegram, in the paper, and in speeches, to keep the people from getting involved in anything that might be in any way an infraction to the injunctions, the court, contrary to the condition of John L. Lewis a year ago, where he had failed to take action and therefore fined him, said, "You sent telegrams out, and therefore it is your fault." It was one of the situations where you are damned if you do and you are double-damned if you do not, under the Taft-Hartley Act.

I would venture to say there are six or seven hundred of our members right now who are not only off the job because the company failed and refused to take them back, but there is evidence of a black list in existence against them. When they attempt to find employment elsewhere all too frequently they are told, "You used to work for Union Oil or Standard, and you are one of the strikers."

In some cases they go in and they are choked off. That happened in the Coco-Cola bottling works out there. This situation, in my estimation, under the Taft-Hartley Act, was the proving ground for their plans. There is no question in my mind but what it was the intent of the oil industry, and perhaps industry generally, to use the same formula they are using in California, throughout industry, but this strike situation broke just prior to the election, and at the time we had to tell our Standard Oil people to go in, the heart of our strike was gone.

Since the election I think the employers are sitting back and saying, "We will see what Congress will do with the Taft-Hartley Act, but here is our formula, and if we still have the Taft-Hartley Act the next time our contracts roll around, then we have the weapon that will certainly kill off unions."

Had it not been for the fact that fellow members of the Oil Workers Union and other unions throughout the Nation contributed very freely of their own funds out of their own pockets, the Oil Workers Union would undoubtedly have died in the California situation. We spent over $200,000 feeding people, trying to provide legal advice for them, legal counsel to get them out of jail when they were thrown in there on trumped-up charges.

Our people were subjected to all sorts of intimidation. State and county police were used in huge numbers. Tear-gas bombs were fired at these people. Many of them are young men just back out of the armed services.

To anyone who is at all in doubt as to the effect of the Taft-Hartley law, I suggest to him that he go out to California and talk to some of the oil workers out there. Not only the law itself, and the wording of the law, but the atmosphere that is created, the willingness on the part of the companies to attack a union that had as clean a reputation as any union in America.

On the other side of this situation, in my own case, the case of my own union, I wish to point out in conclusion that the companies we deal with have no need of the help of the Federal Government in handling situations of this sort. We deal with the industry that provided the individuals who entered into the cartel arrangements with Nazi Germany; we deal with the industry that was found guilty of aiding and abetting some of Hitler's aides here in the United States. That same company tried to make restitution by firing its principal officer at the time. I think you know to whom I am referring.

This is the company that was fondest of the industry that produced the company which was found many years ago guilty of monopolistic practices and fined $1,000,000 and ordered to dissolve. This is the greatest combination of wealth and power the world knows today.

Do they have to have a Taft-Hartley Act to defend themselves against a group of working people in a situation of that sort? I think not. And I would like to suggest that this piece of vicious, punitive legislation, ostensibly designed to stop racketeering—and I do not admit that there is such in labor unions, and I have not seen any evidence of it—I suggest that it has become the sword over the heads of organized workers throughout this Nation. I believe that the evidence which we have to submit in the California situation is sufficient to prove exactly that.

I would like, if I may, to have the committee insert into the record of this hearing not only our statement, but our exhibit A, entitled "A Union-Busting Plan—Oil Trust Style."

(The booklet referred to will be found in the appendix following today's record. See p. 1508.)

Mr. KNIGHT. Gentlemen, that completes my statement.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Powell?

Mr. POWELL. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. I have just one or two questions, Mr. Knight.

Have you succeeded in processing one single unfair labor practice against employers under the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. KNIGHT. We have not succeeded in one single case.

Mr. BAILEY. You have tried in a number of cases?

Mr. KNIGHT. We have tried in several; yes.

Mr. BAILEY. How does the Taft-Hartley law affect arbitration in your union?

Mr. KNIGHT. I am very glad you asked that question. We are a union that believes in arbitration. Every one of our contracts provides for arbitration, whereby the company selects an individual, we select one, and if they are not able to settle it, they jointly pick the third. It used to be, when we had access to fairly reasonable arbitration, and at reasonable costs, that we had very few of them. But under the new system, many of the arbitrators appointed by the Government charge rather large sums. We have one case where a gentleman in Ohio charged us over $1,000 to arbitrate a case. Because of that fact, I believe, we find management increasingly unwilling to settle complaints, and increasingly willing, on the other hand, to put them into arbitration, because they know that we cannot afford arbitration. We do not have enough money. We are not a big enough union.

The net effect is that a good many of our people are beginning to say, "Well, let us not have arbitration, and let us throw out the no-strike clause so that we can settle our grievances by economic strength," working exactly in the reverse of what was the intent of some of the Congressmen, I am sure, when they voted for the Taft-Hartley Act.

We are not having luck. We are not having any success with arbitration at present. We have even had an arbitrator recently in this new atmosphere created by the Taft-Hartley Act who in effect ruled that the employer has to live up to the contract when it is convenient, but that after all, he has to operate his business. And if it is not convenient for him to live up to it and to place the right man on the job at the right time, then he can put his foremen in and let them do the work.

I would be very happy to provide the members of this committee—I do not have it with me, but I can send it up—a copy of that particular award.

Mr. Bailey. What has been the effect of the so-called free-speech section of the Taft-Hartley Act? I believe you touched on it in your presentation.

Mr. Knight. Congressman, I have seen people here in the United States subjected to a propaganda barrage on the part of oil-company officials operating under their new liberties granted to them in the so-called free-speech section of the Taft-Hartley Act. They use it unfairly, very unfairly. They made attacks against the officers of the union; they made all of these threats against the people, and they were not talking to the union officials. They were not making the threats through them. They were making them directly, by telephone call and by letter and by personal contact with the employees.

Mr. Bailey. Do you think the employers of this country need any additional guaranty of free speech other than that guaranteed in the Constitution?

Mr. Knight. I definitely do not think they need any such addition.

Mr. Bailey. It should not be written in any statutory provision?

Mr. Knight. Definitely not. I think that if you have a continuation of the liberties that they have exercised in California against my union, they are definitely going to use it in just the same manner and to the extent that sooner or later, organized labor in this Nation just will not exist except in the form of company-dominated unions.

Mr. Bailey. Speaking of the injunction procedures, you are, of course, aware of the fact that the unions are subject to injunction proceedings.

Mr. Knight. Yes, sir; very much aware of it.

Mr. Bailey. Particularly in cases where the public interest is involved. Do you think that this section of the act will be of benefit to labor?

Mr. Knight. I think from our own experience we have found out two things, in the first place that it is not operative only when the public interest is involved and, second, that it is very detrimental to labor. In the strike situation in California, for instance, there was no question of the public interest being involved; there was not any squawk on the part of the public at the time these injunctions came out. The public was not aware that they were being asked for, and neither was the union. These injunctions were granted without even giving us an opportunity of a hearing, without our being notified. The first thing we knew, there they were.

Mr. Bailey. At that poit, may I ask you this question: Do you think that a mandatory injunction is justified in any instance without a hearing?

Mr. Knight. Definitely, no. I think that people are entitled to a hearing.

Mr. Bailey. Do you not think that any procedure written into a statute that contravenes our constitutional guarantee of the right of trial by jury is un-American?

Mr. Knight. I think it is not only un-American, but unconstitutional as well, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. If there was no other reason why I would oppose the Taft-Hartley bill, I would do it on that ground, that it contravenes our constitutional guaranties and has no business on the statute books.

That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KNIGHT. I agree with you. I oppose the Taft-Hartley Act on that basis as well as on many others which I mentioned here.

Mr. POWELL (presiding). Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. This apparently was not a case of a very, very strong union, financially and otherwise, overpowering the weak employer?

Mr. KNIGHT. Well, the oil industry has some twenty billions of dollars. At the time we went into this strike, we had less than $40,000 of uncommitted moneys in our treasury. The oil industry has demonstrated its power throughout the world. It is doing it now. The Oil Workers International Union, although it has, without the hampering effect of the Taft-Hartley law, done a very effective job of collective bargaining, still is no match for the $20,000,000,000 Oil Trust of the United States.

Mr. IRVING. There has been expressed some concern here for powerful unions working on small employers, and that they need to be protected, and I wanted to bring that out, that this is not exactly that kind of situation.

Mr. KNIGHT. Definitely not, sir.

Mr. IRVING. Also, it has been brought out here that maybe this business could not afford it: the profits were small, and they were not in shape to grant wage increases, and so forth, and that they would be forced into situations that would break the companies and put them into bankruptcy, and so forth. I wonder whether the profits of the oil companies are so low at this time that they could not afford to grant your requests?

Mr. KNIGHT. Well, sir, the oil companies, I think, head the list of all corporations in America with respect to the profit increases over the past few years. And I may say in addition, that it is very interesting to note that by utilizing their freedom to work together, the very oil companies that we struck last year made more money last year, in spite of the strike, than they did the year before. They were selling low-grade gasoline at high prices, and it was terrific stuff. It was terrible.

Mr. JACOBS. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. IRVING. Yes.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. If you will examine the report of the Chemical Banking & Trust Co. of the first week of June 1948, you will see that the first-quarter profits of the oil industry were 109 percent of what they were for the last quarter of 1947.

Mr. KNIGHT. Yes, sir.

Mr. IRVING. You were speaking of company unions, and so forth, and the practice of getting together on their wages, and so forth. I happen to know an instance where the construction work on a plant was going on and the people were locked out, or on strike, whichever you want to call it. The unions called it a lock-out and the employers called it a strike. The company for the company union, or the company, however you want to call it, had granted a 26½-cent increase for the company employees in that plant. The request for 25 cents an hour was rebuffed by this company for the construction workers, and the men were out 53 days, and finally settled for 15 cents an hour. The current topic among the members of this company union was that they could get a 26½-cent increase without striking, whereas the old-line craft unions were only able to get 15 cents an hour and were out on strike, or were locked out, for 53 days. That would tend to encourage the company unions in that fashion if they are able to come up with pretty good sized increases, where it tends to show that regular unions cannot compete with company unions in their wage agreements and wage negotiations.

I notice you said that they had gotten together on a 12½-cent-an-hour proposition there in California, and a little higher east of the Rocky Mountains. This, of course, happened to be east of the Rocky Mountains, and they were a bit averse to giving an increase of 26½ cents an hour to the employees in this particular plant. It is just a little inconsistent with their policy as you stated.

That is all.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. No questions.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Knight, I take it that you have used arbitrators, and I suppose through the years you used the arbitration service that was offered by the Government.

Mr. KNIGHT. Yes, we have.

Mr. JACOBS. And that was changed some few years ago. Can you tell me when that was?

Mr. KNIGHT. We were using Government arbitration up until, I think, the last year. We are still using it, for that matter.

Mr. JACOBS. The Department designates private arbitrators now.

Mr. KNIGHT. That is right. I think that change occurred about a year ago.

Mr. JACOBS. I thought it was a little longer ago than that.

Mr. KNIGHT. It might have been a little longer ago than that.

Mr. JACOBS. What has been your experience, aside from the expense, as to whether or not the decisions you get come with dispatch and whether or not they are firm decisions, as compared with the previous service?

Mr. KNIGHT. I think that there has been a——

Mr. JACOBS. And when I say "firm decisions," I mean that they call the thing as they see it.

Mr. KNIGHT. I tried to indicate during my original presentation that we have noticed a different trend. There is one arbitrator, in particular, who has done quite a bit of arbitration for us, and in most cases in the past we have found him fair and impartial. But he is exactly the man now who has rendered what we consider this very unfair decision to the effect that an employer must operate his business, and therefore he is bound by the contract only as long as it is convenient.

Mr. JACOBS. Particularly what I have in mind is this: Some people have represented to me, in the oil industry, that there seems to be a tendency on the part of these private arbitrators to try to throw a ruling this way one time and that way the next time, so as to be acceptable the next time they are needed as an arbitrator, rather than to come down and give you a decision so that you know what the decision is, and go on with your business. Have you observed anything of that kind?

Mr. KNIGHT. Frankly, no: I have not noticed that. We lose some and we win some.

Mr. JACOBS. Yes.

Mr. KNIGHT. Sometimes we wonder why the decisions go against us, but I have never felt that an arbitrator was counting them out, one for you and one for me.

Mr. JACOBS. Specifically, I will ask you this: Do you think it would be in the interests of labor peace to put arbitration back in the hands of the Government and have the Government furnish arbitrators?

Mr. KNIGHT. I would like very much to see that change made. I believe that if it is made—and it should be a function of Government—then certainly, in my opinion, the experiences of our union are going to be much more satisfactory to the working people.

Mr. JACOBS. They had been over a period of many years before this change came?

Mr. KNIGHT. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Now, I would like to ask you another question or two about your attempts to bring unfair labor practice charges against these companies. You file charges, I suppose, against the companies with the Labor Board?

Mr. KNIGHT. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Have they been processed to the point where they issued complaints, or are they still in the processing stage?

Mr. KNIGHT. They are still in the processing stage.

Mr. JACOBS. And this started when?

Mr. KNIGHT. This strike that I am talking about started last September.

Mr. JACOBS. September of 1948?

Mr. KNIGHT. September of 1948. And charges were filed in 1948, which have not yet been processed. Some of them were withdrawn at the end of the strike situation. That was one of the demands made by the company, that they be withdrawn. However, many of them had been in there well over 60 days prior to that time.

Mr. JACOBS. And was there ever a complaint issued at all on your charges?

Mr. KNIGHT. There were complaints issued against us.

Mr. JACOBS. No. On your charges.

Mr. KNIGHT. Not that I know of. I am not sure as to that. Our legal department was handling it, and I am not sure, but I do not think there was ever a charge issued.

Mr. JACOBS. You spoke of State court injunctions. Were there any injunctions issued under Taft-Hartley subsequent to the passage of Taft-Hartley?

Mr. KNIGHT. Yes. There was not an injunction issued. There was an injunction asked, and the courts had set a date for it. However, in the meantime, we settled the strike. We lost the strike. Let me put it that way. That is what it amounted to.

Mr. JACOBS. That is when you went back in so that your people could vote?

Mr. KNIGHT. That happened in one plant. And then a very short time thereafter, we had to go in and settle the rest of them, because we had lost the strike, or rather our major unit had lost the situation.

Mr. JACOBS. Yes. Now, this company unit that had been organized, had it been in existence before, or was it whipped together during the strike?

Mr. KNIGHT. It had been in existence before.

Mr. JACOBS. But the other union had filed a representation petition that had been laying up here with the Board for some time?

Mr. KNIGHT. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Did you say 6 months?

Mr. KNIGHT. I believe it was filed originally in March or April of 1948.

Mr. JACOBS. It would be approximately 6 months?

Mr. KNIGHT. Approximately, yes.

Mr. JACOBS. And then when this strike was called, the election was immediately called; is that right? Or did they have——

Mr. KNIGHT. I think the strike had been in existence for over 30 days before they lifted the petition and started the election procedure.

Mr. JACOBS. They sort of let it ripen a little, I guess.

Mr. KNIGHT. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. And then did they have a representation hearing before they called the election?

Mr. KNIGHT. I do not think so. There was one meeting trying to determine the eligibility list.

Mr. JACOBS. Was it a consent election?

Mr. KNIGHT. No, sir. It was an ordered election by the National Labor Relations Board.

Mr. JACOBS. Without a hearing?

Mr. KNIGHT. Yes, sir; and we protested it under those circumstances. But it was still held. Now, there had been a hearing held, I believe, prior to that time.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you know who pressed it? Do you know whether the machinists pressed it, or did someone else press the petition for election?

Mr. KNIGHT. Prior to the strike, sir, we had pressed it from the time that it was first instituted until the strike occurred. We had pressed it.

Mr. JACOBS. You had pressed it?

Mr. KNIGHT. We had tried to get it out. But we did not want it held while our people were out on strikes.

Mr. JACOBS. All right now. Now, after the election, did the Board move of its own volition, on its own motion, or did someone press it to get it out?

Mr. KNIGHT. If anyone pressed it, I do not know of it.

Mr. JACOBS. I see.

Mr. KNIGHT. I suspect that it was pressed by the Standard Oil Co.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Now, I am going to ask you about this case of where the seamen refused to go in by the picket line and pick up the oil. Was the entire industry struck in California? Or was this an unstruck company?

Mr. KNIGHT. This was a struck company, and pickets were on the docks.

Mr. JACOBS. The same company operated the boats?

Mr. KNIGHT. The same company that we were on strike against was operating the boats.

Mr. JACOBS. And were those the seamen on those boats?

Mr. KNIGHT. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. That refused to come into the dock?

Mr. KNIGHT. Yes, sir. And they were under contract with that company. The seamen had a contract covering the sailors on those boats. We had the contract covering the refineries.

Mr. JACOBS. Yes.

Mr. KNIGHT. We were on strike and picketing. The seamen refused to run our picket lines. They were taken off the ships in some cases, and I think in some cases rather forcefully.

Mr. JACOBS. Were you certified as the bargaining agent for the company as a refinery unit?

Mr. KNIGHT. Yes, sir. We bargained with them for years.

Mr. JACOBS. Was it in connection with that that the injunction was filed under the Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. KNIGHT. In connection with our strike?

Mr. JACOBS. Was it in connection with this refusal to cross the picket line?

Mr. KNIGHT. By the seamen? Oh, no.

Mr. JACOBS. Thank you, Mr. Knight. That is all.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Knight, there has been given during the testimony in all these hearings a great deal of testimony to the effect that the labor unions have done a job on the Taft-Hartley Act by calling it names, such as slave-labor law, and so on. Of course, the slogans that were used, such as the emancipation of the workers, and all that sort of thing, were purely public information as far as this testimony went. But do you not think that the experiences that you have had, particularly in this California situation that you described, would bring the words "slave-labor law" out of the realm of the figurative, if it ever were in such a realm, and put it right squarely into the literal?

Mr. KNIGHT. Our experience has proved to me, at least, that we were perfectly justified in everything that we said against the law, and we were justified in saying that it would wreck our labor unions. Maybe we could not find words quite bad enough to use in connection with this company. We certainly cannot find words bad enough to describe the situation that developed in California under the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. BURKE. And that situtaion and the experience that you have described did bear out the statements that you made, that the Taft-Hartley Act in effect is a slave labor law, that it can be used as such, and it is for the purpose of breaking unions and destroying wherever possible to destroy, or to take the power down to an absolute minimum, where it is not possible to destroy?

Mr. KNIGHT. Yes. It not only minimized the power of the union, but it legalized the power to protect scabs and strikebreakers.

Mr. BURKE. On the matter of this arbitrator's decision, I was quite intrigued with the type of logic that was given out at that decision. Does that not seem to bear out the total philosophy of the Taft-Hartley Act, that ownership confers an exclusive right of decision in all matters pertaining to the business, without challenge by anyone?

Mr. KNIGHT. Yes. It goes right back to the old philosophy and doctrine that exists in the minds of many of our people, of the sanctity of property and the dollar, and to hell with the human rights. To me, that arbitrator's decision is right along the lines of those theories that have been in the minds of some of America's people for a large number of years.

Mr. BURKE. In other words, that can only be available to the employees for giving them a job, and giving them a place to work?

Mr. KNIGHT. Yes; definitely so.

Mr. BURKE. That is all.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. You and I have met before, Mr. Knight.

Mr. KNIGHT. Indeed we have, sir, under very happy circumstances. At that time, it seems to me that you in your way and I in mine were doing everything we could to fight exactly the sort of situation that developed in California.

Mr. SMITH. How many different places other than the San Joaquin Valley were these concentration camps, that you speak of, would you say?

Mr. KNIGHT. In every pipe line station of the Tidewater Associated Oil Co. I am not sure. I think there are 8 or 10 of them scattered out over 400 miles of territory.

Mr. SMITH. Do you know whether the company has ever issued any statement justifying this action on their part, locking up these pumping stations so that no one could get in or out?

Mr. KNIGHT. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. SMITH. Now, who is that pipe line owned by?

Mr. KNIGHT. It is owned by the associated division of the Tidewater Associated Oil Co.

Mr. SMITH. Where is their headquarters?

Mr. KNIGHT. Their headquarters is in New York City. However, the associated division has a headquarters on New Montgomery Street in San Francisco.

Mr. SMITH. You say the Tidewater Associated Oil Co.?

Mr. KNIGHT. Yes, sir; the Tidewater Associated Oil Co. I would like to furnish to you, Congressman Smith, if I may, copies of affidavits from three ministers who tried to get into these pump-line stations and were refused admittance by the armed guards at the gate.

Mr. SMITH. I would like to have them.

Mr. KNIGHT. I will see that they are provided for you. They are now on file in the courts of California and with the National Labor Relations Board.

Mr. SMITH. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY (presiding). Mr. Perkins, do you have something for the record?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, Mr. Chairman. I have a letter from a certain judge in Pikeville, Ky., who has had 25 or 30 years' legislative experience in the State senate in Kentucky, in which he sets out his views on the Taft-Hartley Act. The original is addressed to Representative Lesinski, and he sent me a copy. It particularly deals with the Communist oath, or the non-Communist oath, and he is opposed to that provision and other provisions. I would like unanimous consent to make it a part of the record.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it will be received for the record.

(The letter referred to is as follows:)

PIKEVILLE, KY., February 19, 1949.

MEMORANDUM ON LABOR LEGISLATION

I favor the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. This act is unfair to labor. The treatment labor received by the Labor Committees of the Eightieth Congress is such that the only way this wrong can be redressed is by an absolute repeal of the act.

The affidavit required of labor leaders, in which they must swear that they are not Communists so their unions can avail themselves of the services of the Labor Board is grossly unfair to labor and ineffective in handling the Communist problem.

An act of the Congress that assumes that labor is inclined to be communistic and thereby disloyal to the United States, cannot be defended. I note that it has been suggested that leaders of industry be required to make a similar affidavit, so that both labor and industrial leaders would be assumed to be disloyal to the United States. This would be an insult to both labor and management.

The affidavit provided for in the Taft-Hartley Act is not a proper or an effective approach to the control of communism. The problem should be handled in such a way as not to cast reflections on those who are innocent and free from such subversive influences.

1. I suggest the following as a direct and effective means of eliminating such communistic influence as may exist in labor union.

(a) Any person who belongs to any group, association, or party, that believes in or advocates a totalitarian form of government, and follows the party line of a foreign party or power, should be made ineligible to hold any office or position of trust in a labor union, whose members are employed in industry, engaged in interstate commerce.

(b) The Department of Labor should be required to make such investigations as are necessary to ascertain if persons, who are ineligible under paragraph (a) hereof, are holding office or positions of trust in any labor union covered by this paragraph. The files and services of the FBI, under proper restrictions, should be made available in these investigations.

(c) It should be made the duty of labor union covered by paragraph (a) to free themselves of subversive influences and to discharge and remove all such persons from office or positions of trust in such unions.

(d) If the investigation of the Labor Department should disclose that persons are ineligible to hold office or position of trust, in such labor unions, then it should be made the duty of the Labor Department, to take legal action in the United States district court, having jurisdiction of the offending person or persons, to remove them.

This can be done by petition, or by motion, with notice thereof to the offenders.

(e) Another title to the act should provide that any person belonging to any group, association, or party, that believes in or advocates a totalitarian form of government, and follows the party line of a foreign party or power, should be made ineligible to hold an office, or employment, in any department or agency of the Government of the United States.

Provision should be made for discharge and removal of any offender, who may be appointed or employed by such departments or agencies.

(f) It has been urged that labor has too much economic power. The exertion such economic power by labor as will obtain for labor a fair, reasonable, and equitable division of the earnings of industry is not inimical to the interests of the people or to industry itself. In the exertion of this economic power of labor to obtain its fair and equitable share of the earnings of industry, labor makes a contribution to the maintaining of our buying power, which is so essential to the prosperity and welfare of the people and industry.

2. Labor has an important position in our economic system. It has made a real contribution, through collective bargaining, in obtaining a fairer and more equitable division of the earnings of industry. It has been of great aid in maintaining our national purchasing power, upon which the prosperity and material welfare of the people and all business depends.

The position of labor in our economic system is clearly stated by J. MacCulloch, as follows:

"It is to labor and to labor only, that man owes everything of exchangeable value. Labor is the talisman that has raised him from the condition of the savage; that has changed the desert and forest into cultivated fields; that has covered the earth with cities, and the ocean with ships; that has given us plenty, comfort, and elegance, instead of want, misery, and barbarism."

In an address at Pittsburgh, Woodrow Wilson, in discussing the voice of America, said:

"The great voice of America does not come from the seats of learning. It comes in a murmer from the hills and woods and the farms and factories, and the mills, rolling on and gaining in volume until it comes to us from the homes of common men."

So long as the voice of America comes from the homes of the common people, and they are secure in their economic, social, and political life, these United States will remain the Gibraltar of the democracies of the world.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

E. D. STEPHENSON.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, I have here a statement by the Central States Petroleum Union that was sent to me by the confederated unions, on the question of arbitration, concerning which I was examining the witness, which I would like to offer in the record.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it will be received for the record.

(The statement referred to is as follows:)

STATEMENT BY HERBERT MYERS, SECRETARY-TREASURER, THE CENTRAL STATES PETROLEUM UNION, AND RESOLUTION ON FREE ARBITRATION AS ADOPTED AT CONFEDERATED UNIONS OF AMERICA, MEETING IN WASHINGTON ON FEBRUARY 27, 1949

The Central States Petroleum Union proposes to set forth its position on free arbitration, point No. 3 of a series of resolutions adopted by the Confederated Unions of America at a meeting held in Washington on February 27, 28, and March 1. The attached resolutions as presented are self-explanatory except that we feel that some information should be given to the Congressmen and Senators regarding our position on free arbitration.

Since 1919 the Standard Oil Co. (Indiana) has been party to an agreement first between the United States Government and the Standard Oil Co.; and since 1937, a three-way agreement between the union, the company and the United States Government whereby in all cases of dispute not settled at the bargaining table an arbitrator is furnished upon request by the Department of Labor whose decision is final and binding. This agreement is not a compulsory agreement, but a mutual one enacted each year when a new contract is signed. The value of arbitration to our union and to the company is apparent in that without the necessity of a strike practically everything that can be settled by a strike can be settled by this impartial arbitrator, even wages. The advantage of arbitration to the United States itself should be apparent to the lawmakers when it is recalled how much comment has been made by different people in the Government over the necessity of some system which would eliminate crippling economic strikes. We note that oil is one of the industries that could cripple our economy. We call to your attention that in the fall of 1945 an attempt was made to call such a crippling strike. During that time a wage issue was being decided by a United States Department of Labor arbitrator. We make no point of the fact that our particular set-up helped to break down this crippling strike. It is not the union's intention to feel proud of crippling some other union in their legitimate request. In this particular case we feel that had we been permitted to carry on with our arbitration before the strike was called, all oil workers would have benefited to the extent of possibly 4 to 7 percent more than the 18 percent granted by the oil panel, which 18 percent for some strange reason our arbitrator awarded us after holding our case an unduly long time. It should be unnecessary to point out to any person who wishes to avoid economic distress that a bargaining set-up, such as the Central States Petroleum Union, is the absolute answer.

Some strange reasoning was used just prior to the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act by some spokesman for labor in Washington, who stated that free arbitration was crippling collective bargaining. Our interrupted no-strike record since 1937, which should be in the files of the Department of Labor, should conclusively answer such a charge. There has been no reason for workmen or management to complain of the results of this particular set-up. Our wages, benefits and working conditions are far above any of our competitors with the exception of the last few years when the wages have become approximately equal. In working conditions and benefits the Standard Oil employees still lead. To expect a system such as ours to survive when the union and the company have the responsibility of selecting an arbitrator is to expect too much. It is plain to be seen that when an arbitrator called in at a fairly decent wage per day to settle an issue between the union and the company, knowing that we have need for arbitration services several times during the year, would be reluctant to antagonize either the company or the union lest he no longer be considered suitable by either party. As a consequence, numerous issues which are important in principle, if not in money, have been straddled to the extent that the arbitrator has not called the decisions as he saw them, but tried to pacify both parties. Under the old system where the Department of Labor in the three-way agreement furnished arbitrators on demand, neither the union nor the company had any voice in whom the arbitrator should be. Consequently, an arbitrator could come to our hearings, listen to the evidence and deliver his opinion without worrying whether or not he would be eligible to come again. Recently, while talking to some Government officials, it was suggested that arbitrators in the Department of Labor might play politics. We have only to say that from 1919 through 1945 none of the hundreds of cases that have been arbitrated show any evidence of political bias. Twelve years of this time was under Republican administration. We should like to go on record as stating that neither the union nor the company ever had cause to doubt the integrity of the arbitrators, and felt at all times that while they might make an honest mistake they themselves were honest.

Under the new system neither the union nor the company are pleased with the decisions as rendered, and it is greatly feared that this very successful form of labor-management relationship will come to an end; therefore, we would be forced to resort to strike tactics as other unions do in order to gain the results to which we have in the past been accustomed. We think a good illustration of the difference might be presented if organized baseball would quit hiring umpires and permit the opposing teams to hire men to call the plays for each game. Any baseball fan can spot the weakness of this at once. It is our contention that no arbitrator can call a case as he sees it when he is trying to make himself eligible for another job later on because it is too much to expect any union or any company to use a man who has given them a very costly decision if they have the say-so. We would dislike to see the Government in their interest of economy to compel litigants in courts to pay the charges. That is exactly what they have done to us in the matter of arbitration.

Another argument used in Washington 2 years ago on this matter was the savings to the Department of Labor by abolishing arbitration. This is a strange line of reasoning by a Government that will furnish conciliators who may spend weeks trying to persuade somebody to get together for the good of the national economy but have no authority to make them do so for the same conciliator could be assigned to hear a case with the Central States Petroleum Union versus the Standard Oil Co., sit there 1 day, listen to the case and settle it without more ado. It is difficult for use to comprehend how that costs any more money than conciliation. Since the abolition of free arbitration, a number of our small locals have used conciliators. We assume they are being paid a salary the same as the arbitrators were, and they meet a number of times with these locals and sometimes accomplish nothing, where under the old system they would meet once and settle the issue.

We respectfully request Congress to restore free arbitration under the jurisdiction of the Department of Labor.

RESOLUTION OF THE CONFEDERATED UNIONS OF AMERICA

Whereas there have been instances of discrimination against segments of American labor; and

Whereas new legislation is presently being formulated: it is hereby

Resolved, That the Confederated Unions of America at this time present to the Congressmen of each individual State these four points to be made a part of the new labor law:

(1) In deciding all cases under the National Labor Relations Act of 1949, the same regulations and rules of decision shall apply irrespective of whether or not the labor organization affected is affiliated with the labor organizations national or international in scope.

(2) Equal representation in the Department of Labor.

(3) Upon request of the parties in dispute, the Secretary of Labor shall furnish arbitrators—all cost of which is to be borne by the National Government.

(4) In the appointment of labor-management advisory committees for respective industries, equal representation must be granted all unions whether or not the union is national or international in scope.

Mr. KELLEY. That is all, Mr. Knight. Thank you very much.

Mr. KNIGHT. Thank you. I would like to thank the committee for the opportunity to appear.

Mr. JACOBS. I have here also a statement by the Woman's Guild of the Evangelical and Reformed Church, in regard to the Taft-Hartley law and the Wagner Act, entitled "Economic Justice—Keystone of Democracy," which I should like to offer for the record.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it will be received for the record.

(The statement referred to will be found in the appendix following close of today's record. See p. 1514.)

Mr. JACOBS. I have a resolution adopted by the New York chapter of the Association of Catholic Trade Unionists regarding the Taft-Hartley law and the Wagner Act that I would like to offer.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it will be received.

(The resolution referred to is as follows:)

RESOLUTION OF THE NEW YORK CHAPTER OF THE ASSOCIATION OF CATHOLIC TRADE UNIONISTS

Since its founding in 1937 the ACTU has had direct experience with a large number of trade-union members who appealed to it for help in stopping expulsion from their jobs by their union officials.

Most of these men and women deserved help because their only crime was to exercise their constitutional right to criticize abuses in the administration of their unions. Despite the justice of their position, however, and despite the efforts of the ACTU many of these good trade unionists were expelled from their unions and from their jobs. The union officials were able to do this because of agreements with the employers that all workers must be members of their union in good standing.

Appeals to higher bodies of the union often took years and were usually a foregone conclusion in any case. Appeals to the courts were often fruitless because of the customary reluctance of the courts to interfere in such cases, particularly when all appeals had not been exhausted within the union.

The result of such expulsions was, of course, to discourage almost all forms of opposition and criticism within the union. Without such healthy opposition and criticism democracy dies. We saw it die within these unions.

The Taft-Hartley Act tried to meet this problem by forbidding unions from forcing the expulsion of a worker from his job in a union shop for anything other than nonpayment of dues. This provison had several weaknesses—one, it prevented the union from exercising discipline against real antiunion elements; two, it made it possible for the union to retain its power to expel members unjustly, even though those members retained their jobs.

The ACTU cannot support any solution to this problem which would endanger the union shop or the closed shop: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the New York chapter of the ACTU appeal to Congress to incorporate within the new labor law which will surely replace the infamous Taft-Hartley Act a provision granting the National Labor Relations Board the power to review cases of union discipline when these cases involve expulsion from membership or other major penalty.

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to appropriate Members of Congress.

Mr. JACOBS. I also have a pamphlet entitled "Democracy in Trade Unions," issued by the American Civil Liberties Union, which I would like to offer for the record.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it will be received.

(The pamphlet referred to is reproduced in the appendix following close of today's record. See p. 1515.)

Mr. JACOBS. That is all, Mr. Chairman, with the exception that I have one of many anonymous letters that I have received. I would like to read two sentences, the opening sentence of each paragraph. The first is:

Representative JACOBS. Keep and strengthen the Taft-Hartley law.

The first sentence of the next paragraph is:

End other controls.

That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. The committee still has Mr. Curran, Mr. Green, Mr. Fitzgerald, Mr. Baldanzi, and Mr. Potofski. Now, the time of the committee has expired. If these gentlemen would be kind enough to submit their statements for the record, we will be glad to see that they are inserted at this point in the record.

I wish to say that the committee had an agreement with the officials of the CIO that we should run along today until the end of the day, and we could include the statements of those men that we did not hear in the record.

I am sorry that we did not reach you gentlemen, but we cannot help it.

Mr. BALDANZI. Mr. Chairman, my name is Baldanzi, and I have a statement. I fully understand your position and, with your permission, I would like to insert this in the record.

Mr. KELLEY. We will be very glad to put it in the record.

(Mr. Baldanzi's statement will be found in the appendix following close of today's record. See p. 1522.)

Mr. TISA. I am John Tisa, of the Food, Tobacco, Agricultural and Allied Workers Union of America, and I have a statement here I would like to present to the committee. If permissible, I would like to make a few remarks on them.

Mr. KELLEY. I am afraid we cannot hear the remarks, Mr. Tisa. We will accept the statement for the record.

Mr. TISA. The reason I ask that, Mr. Chairman, is that Mr. Strobel came and testified before this committee and attacked our union, and I think that we should be given an opportunity to contradict the statement.

Mr. KELLEY. We do not have the time. If I give it to you now, we should have to give it to everybody else.

Mr. TISA. Very well. This is the statement.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it will be accepted for the record.

(Mr. Tisa's statement will be found in the appendix following close of today's record. See p. 1527.)

Mr. CURRAN. Mr. Chairman, I am Mr. Curran of the CIO Maritime Committee. I am sorry the committee has used up its time. We would like to submit this statement for the record.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it will be received.

(Mr. Curran's statement will be found in the appendix following close of today's record. See p. 1534.)

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, my name is John Green, and I am president of the Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America. It is unfortunate that the committee's time has expired, because I believe that we have a story to tell.

Mr. KELLEY. You will have to leave it, Mr. Green.

Mr. GREEN. Nevertheless, I will submit the statement along with four exhibits. I want to impress upon you that the industry I am privileged to represent is a declining industry. We had a strike, and we had a taste of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. KELLEY. We will be glad to put it in the record.

(The statement and exhibits referred to will be found in the appendix following close of today's record. See p. 1538.)

Mr. STRAUS. Mr. Chairman, my name is Leon Straus, and I am vice president of the International Fur and Leathers Workers Union. I have no prepared statement. We came here prepared to testify.

Mr. KELLEY. You were not on the scheduled list.

Mr. STRAUS. No; I was not, Mr. Chairman. I would like to ask this committee to extend its hearings.

Mr. KELLEY. We cannot do that.

Mr. STRAUS. Is it possible for you to meet tonight so that my testimony may be submitted?

Mr. KELLEY. The committee is engaged tonight at 6 o'clock.

Mr. STRAUS. I may call to your attention, Mr. Chairman, that this committee went past midnight hearing an employer.

Mr. KELLEY. I am telling you that we cannot meet tonight. This has closed our hearings by the motion that we have.

Mr. STRAUS. Don't you think that we are entitled to a fair and just hearing, at least to the extent that the employers had?

Mr. KELLEY. You may submit a statement for the record.

Mr. STRAUS. I have no statement, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Can't you make one?

Mr. STRAUS. I would like to make one if the committee will hear me. I want to know why——

Mr. KELLEY. If you will give us a written statement, it will be inserted in the record.

Mr. STRAUS. But I haven't any, Mr. Chairman.

Mrs. PETERSON. I am Mrs. Peterson of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers and I was to appear today for Mr. Potofski, the president of our union, who could not come because of illness. I am very glad to present the statement for the record.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(Mr. Potofski's statement will be found in the appendix following close of today's record. See p. 1587.)

Mr. BULCKE. Mr. Chairman, my name is Germain Bulcke. I am vice president of the Longshoremen's Union of the Pacific Coast. I came to the committee in the hope that we would be able to present our testimony, because we are going into a situation now that is very serious. However, I realize that the committee's time is up, and I wish to say to the committee that it is unfortunate, because the committee should have the opportunity to hear what is actually happening now. The action of the Taft-Hartley Act is going to destroy the fishing industry of the west coast.

Mr. KELLEY. We will accept your statement.

Mr. BULCKE. I have a statement. I will put it in.

(The statement referred to will be found in the appendix following close of today's record. See p. 1590.)

Mr. NIXON. Mr. Chairman, my name is Nixon. I have a statement here for the United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers. We are particularly disappointed, because this committee sat until 12:30 one night last week listening to the president of the General Electric Co., castigate our union and attack our labor relations. We sat here all day in the hope that we could answer Mr. Wilson and could present our general statement on this issue which is, of course, of life and death importance to us. We would be glad to sit here until 12:30 tonight to wait to be heard. But it is most unfortunate in an issue of this sort that we cannot present our testimony. You and I know that putting it in the record is no subsitute for being able to answer the questions of the committee, to be able to answer the questions that may be in the committee's minds, because of Wilson's testimony.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, Mr. Nixon, we will have your statement inserted in the record.

Mr. NIXON. It is very unsatisfactory.

(The statement referred to will be found in the appendix following close of today's record. See p. 1611.)

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, my name is Lawrence Kelly. I am vice president of the American Communications Association, and I would like to again urge that this committee extend its hearings so that we can tell the story of what the Taft-Hartley Act has done to our particular union. We can prove on the record that this is a union-busting act, and that the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act is warranted, and the restoration of the Wagner Act.

Mr. KELLEY. Do you have a statement?

Mr. KELLY. I do not have a written statement. That is the reason.

Mr. KELLEY. We will give you permission to submit one, without objection.

Mr. KELLY. A written statement is no substitute.

Mr. KELLEY. I cannot help that now. I am sorry.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, my name is Edgar C. Brown. I am director of the National Negro Council.

Mr. KELLEY. Were you not before our committee?

Mr. BROWN. No. I made an effort to get before the committee, and I want permission to put into the record from the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Labor Department the names and the constitutions of 17 A. F. of L. unions which say that a member must be white, Caucasian, Christian, and 21. I want to know why it is we could never take this question up before this committee or the Senate committee, except after strong protest.

Mr. POWELL. Just a minute. It was taken up.

Mr. BROWN. I asked to be heard, and I have not been heard. I came in and begged to be heard, and I say to you that 13,000,000 Negroes are sick and tired of committees saying at the end of the hearing that it is always too late.

Mr. KELLEY. Wait a minute.

Mr. BROWN. The committee of Congress does not have time to hear anyone when the question of discrimination is to be exposed and a remedy outlined.

Mr. KELLEY. You cannot——

Mr. BROWN. It is a labor bill. We are asking for civil rights now.

Mr. KELLEY (gaveling). Regular order.

Mr. BROWN. The regular order always puts the Negro's spokesmen out of order.

Mr. POWELL. The question was taken up at a night session, and the amendments to the Taft-Hartley law were proposed, and I agreed that I would submit those amendments you are talking about in executive session of this committee.

Mr. BROWN. I am glad to know that, Dr. Powell. I did not know about it, and you did not ask me to be heard. I would like still to be heard, and I want to know whether I can have permission to put into the record the names of these 17 discriminatory A. F. of L. unions?

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BROWN. Thank you.

(The material referred to is as follows:)

STATEMENT OF EDGAR G. BROWN, DIRECTOR, NATIONAL NEGRO COUNCIL

Mr. CAMMER. Mr. Chairman, I have a statement for the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers. I would like not to submit it for the record but to join in the request that this committee sit tonight so that on this legislation, which so vitally affects the bread-and-butter interests of millions of workers, there ought to be an opportunity to present——

Mr. KELLEY. We have 175 requests right now waiting to be heard. If we opened this up again, we shall run into that. We have a rule here that we would close in 10 full days.

Mr. CAMMER. I am not asking that you extend it beyond today, Mr. Chairman. I ask that you sit tonight.

Mr. KELLEY. No; we cannot. We will take your statement.

(The statement referred to will be found in the appendix following close of today's record. See p. 1617.)

Mr. MOONEY. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the United Office and Professional Workers, we have a statement to submit. But, like these other unions, we have disputes before the Board on behalf of the Prudential agents, the Metropolitan agents, the John Hancock agents, and we have not been able to get Board action. We would like to have the committee hear these things.

Mr. KELLEY. There was testimony to that effect. All of your unions are part of the CIO and you should have your engagements cleared through them, the same as is done in the A. F. of L., so please do not blame us for not hearing you. You should have taken your problems down there and gotten your assignment for time.

Mr. STRAUS. Mr. Chairman, you have not even heard four or five who were on the list of the CIO today. There is no reason why you cannot meet tonight and hear their testimony.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, there is. There is all the reason in the world. You will have to ask the CIO.

Mr. MOONEY. I would like to submit this statement on behalf of the United Office and Professional Workers.

Mr. KELLEY. Very well.

(The statement referred to will be found in the appendix following close of today's record. See p. 1621.)

Mr. STRAUS. I would like to submit a statement, too.

Mr. WIER. I am getting more telegrams as a member of this committee asking, "Why don't you do something?"

Mr. STRAUS. That is right. That is what we want to know. Why don't you do something?

Mr. WIER. Let us do something.

Mr. STRAUS. It is now 3 months.

Mr. WIER. You fellows will have us holding meetings and meetings, and having hearings——

Mr. STRAUS. Yes. But when you hear employers, why not hear enough of the union representatives to answer them?

Mr. WIER. I want to get action on this bill.

Mr. STRAUS. So do we. You should have acted the first day you were elected.

Mr. IRVING. I would like to advise this gentlemen here that we did not hear Mr. Wilson or Mr. Mosher at their convenience. We necessarily had to recess this hearing to go to the House floor, and we took that opportunity to make up the time.

Mr. STRAUS. We are willing to wait your convenience.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes. But you want us to do——

Mr. STRAUS. And testify at your convenience, Congressman.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving is telling you that we could not sit that afternoon.

Mr. IRVING. So we did not favor them because they were employers. We made up the time that day that we were not able to——

Mr. KELLEY. Anyone who wishes may file a statement and it will be received for the record if received before April 1. The committee will stand adjourned.

(Whereupon, at 5:45 p. m., the hearing was closed.)

APPENDIX

The several statements and communications referred to in today's record are as follows:

STATEMENT BY ARTHUR J. GOLDBERG, GENERAL COUNSEL, CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS AND UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA

My name is Arthur J. Goldberg, and my address is 718 Jackson Place NW., Washington, D. C. I am general counsel of the Congress of Industrial Organizations and the United Steelworkers of America.

I wish at the outset to express my appreciation to the committee for this opportunity to file this statement with the committee.

It cannot be denied that there have been few issues in all our national history which have so dominated a Presidential campaign as the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. In the same way that the issue of free silver was the issue of the Bryan campaign in 1896, the Taft-Hartley Act was the issue in the recent elections. The party which was returned to power, the Democratic Party, made this a dominant issue in the campaign and went to the people on that issue, and the Republican Party which had sponsored the Taft-Hartley Act sought, somewhat evasively it is true, to defend its handiwork before the people. In every sense of the word, the election embodies a popular manadate to erase the Taft-Hartley Act from the statute books.

I am aware that the recent election and the issues presented in the election really obviate the necessity for persuading a majority of the committee that the Taft-Hartley Act must be eliminated.

However, a detailed presentation against the Taft-Hartley Act is made here not with a view to persuading a majority of the committee that that act must go, but rather for the following reasons:

1. Those who have sponsored the act and who continue to defend it insist that the attack upon the act is based upon slogans and generalities and not upon specific facts. They cannot deny the verdict of the people in the recent elections, but they constantly claim that there is no basis in fact for that verdict and that the Taft-Hartley Act is a good law. Indeed, many of the sponsors of the act and the majority of the Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations insist that the law has actually benefited labor. We present a detailed picture of the vicious effects of this law to refute the glib claims that nothing specific in the act can be condemned.

2. We think also it is important to detail labor's experiences under the Taft-Hartley Act, and to high light the evils of the law as a guide to this committee which now has before it certain proposals to amend the Wagner Act. The experiences of the Congress of Industrial Organizations under the law are elaborated here in order to assist the committee in its consideration of these proposed amendments.

The purpose of this testimony is to clarify the nature and operation of the law in order to prevent the revival of its evil concepts in other forms. We anticipate that those who are determined to foist this law upon our people will, either in open or disguised ways, strive through amendments to emasculate the Wagner Act and reenact the substance of this repudiated law.

This testimony is divided into two parts. Part I presents the views of the Congress of Industrial Organizations with respect to the Taft-Hartley Act, the Wagner Act which H. R. 2032 proposes to reenact, and the amendments which are contained in H. R. 2032. Part II presents a detailed analysis of the effects and impact of the Taft-Hartley Act upon labor-relations law and specific labor-relations situations.

PART I.—A. THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

In order properly to evaluate the Taft-Hartley Act, we cannot view the act as merely changing the preexisting rights and obligations of employers and labor organizations. The Taft-Hartley Act has in effect completely altered the course of labor relations in this country. It has strengthened the hands of the most antilabor groups in the employer community. It gave those employers who had grudgingly accepted the Wagner Act new hope of breaking unions. In its most fundamental aspect, it created great changes in our industrial mores with incalculable effects upon labor-mangement problems at every stage of the organizational process and collective-bargaining relationship.

A law such as the Taft-Hartley Act cannot be assessed solely in terms of the formal orders which issue under the act. Such a law molds antiunion attitudes and destroys the basis of sound labor relations even when it is not actively resorted to by employers. In addition, the law has been used by employers as a club to force unions to recede from legitimate and needed bargaining demands on the basis of strained interpretations by employer attorneys.

Moreover, in considering the full impact of the act, it is important to remember that this law has stimulated corresponding repression on the State and local levels. It is not merely the Federal courts who are issuing injunctions. In the State courts as well, we find that the issuance of antilabor injunctions limiting and frequently outlawing all picketing is now becoming routine under the Taft-Hartley Act. We find on the State level an increasing resort to troops and State police for strikebreaking purposes, and a growing tendency to use many of the instrumentalities of the Government to repress the organizational activities of the working people and to break strikes.

The Taft-Hartley Act can be demonstrated to be a bad law. But, bad as the law can be demonstrated to be, a full picture is still not available. This is so because employers—particularly some of the large and more powerful employers in basic industries—have deliberately refrained from exploiting to the full the act's antiunion potentialities, partially out of a fear of creating too vivid a recognition of the act's meaning and partially because industry has enjoyed the most prosperous profit period ever enjoyed in peacetime. This fact is made clear throughout the recently concluded Senate hearings on the administration bill. As a Republican Senator put it, "As one reads that testimony, he finds management witnesses confessing, under cross-examination, that the most restrictive uses of the Taft-Hartley law will come when unemployment becomes widespread in America."

In order to present to this committee an accurate picture of the impact of this law, we have submitted to all CIO unions a detailed questionnaire seeking information with respect to the effects of the law on organization and collective bargaining. The information contained in responses to this questionnaire fully supports the following conclusions:

1. The Taft-Hartley Act has hampered and obstructed the organization of the unorganized. Virtually every union response to the questionnaire made it clear that it is a difficult if not a hazardous process under the Taft-Hartley act. In a country where labor organizations only include one-third of those eligible for membership, organization of new members has slowed down to a rate where it scarcely equals the loss of members due to death and retirement from industry. A graphic illustration of this is supplied by the following chart:

	July 1946–June 1947	October 1947–September 1948	Percent [1]
Number of elections	6,920	4,085	60
Number of eligible voters	934,553	459,878	49
Number won by CIO	2,138	620	29
Votes for CIO	288,381	108,525	38
Votes of AFL	208,524	90,265	43

[1] This shows developments in October 1947–September 1948 period as a percentage of the July 1946–June 1947 period. For example, for every 100 elections held in the earlier period—before the Taft-Hartley enactment—only 60 were held in year of Taft-Hartley's existence. For every 100 eligible voters in earlier period, there were only 49 in the later period, etc.

Source: Annual and monthly NLRB reports.

The majority report of the Joint Committe on Labor-Management Relations has recently contended that labor-union membership has increased but its figures are completely misleading since it fails to distinguish between increases in membership in already organized plants and the organization of new plants.

No amount of juggling with figures can obscure the fact that the Taft-Hartley Act has made the organization of workers exceedingly difficult. The National Labor Relations Board has just issued an extremely significant statistical summary covering the month of January 1949 which corroborates this fact. The Board figures show that the number of unfair labor practice complaints issued by the agency during January doubled the monthly average for the past 7 years. The Board's experience during the month of January also shows that more employers were charged with the commission of unfair labor practices than in any 1 month since the effective date of the Taft-Hartley Act. The Board's records show that the staggering total of 357 charges of unfair labor practices were filed against employers during the month of January alone.

The Board's election figures likewise confirm the trend set forth in the election table above. During the month of January unions won 66 percent of the collective-bargaining elections conducted during that month. This compares with 73 percent won during the first year of the Taft-Hartley Act and with 81 percent won during the 12 years of the Wagner Act.

In short, our experience under the Taft-Hartley Act demonstrates that employers are using it with increasing effectiveness to blight the organization of the unorganized.

2. The act has forced unnecessary strikes. Three classes of strikes have been produced by the act:

(a) The act has had a powerful stimulus upon organizational strikes. A most significant index of the efficacy of a law promoting industrial peace is its effect upon organizational strikes, upon strikes for union recognition and for bargaining rights. Obviously unless a law provides a substitute for economic warfare by promoting organization and collective bargaining it has failed in a most fundamental way. Virtually every CIO union has been forced into strikes to obtain recognition and bargaining rights against employers who rely upon the weapons of the Taft-Hartley Act. A large number of these employers are using the act as a pretext for repudiating unions and evading collective-bargaining obligations.

(b) A second group of strikes attributable to the Taft-Hartley Act are strikes created by the terms of the law itself. Thus, the ink was scarcely dry on the law when strikes were precipitated by it in the automobile industry to achieve protection against the provisions of the law permitting law suits against unions for breach of contract as a result of acts neither authorized nor ratified by the union. The Nation-wide strikes in the printing industry were a direct flowering of the prohibition upon union security contained in the law. The printers were forced to strike to obtain a form of security which they had enjoyed for over 50 years and which the employers were perfectly willing to grant them.

Since the law has been in effect some 6 injunctions have issued under section 208, the so-called national emergency provision. These injunctions were issued in the atomic energy dispute, in the two mine workers dispute, in the longshore dispute on the west coast, in the longshore dispute on the east coast, and in the maritime disputes on the east coast and on the Great Lakes. No less than four of these disputes were precipitated by the Taft-Hartley Act.

The first emergency dispute in the coal industry in 1948 involved the miners' welfare fund. The complicated and ambiguous provisions of the welfare fund provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act gave rise to a dispute between the parties as to the proper method of activating the fund under the law.

In the second coal dispute a strike was precipitated over the union security restrictions in the Taft-Hartley Act.

The maritime dispute and the longshore dispute on the west coast were also precipitated as a result of the insistence by the employers that the law required that the hiring hall be eliminated. A second issue in the longshore strike was the employers' claim that "walking bosses" and ship's clerks are supervisory employees under the Taft-Hartley Act.

(c) A third type of dispute which has been stimulated by the Taft-Hartley Act are disputes over economic issues which could have been adjusted had employers not found the strike-breaking provisions of the act so inviting as to project an impasse into strike proportions.

A report has been rushed into print by the Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations, the chairman and some of the members of which, prominently identified with the act, failed of reelection. Before commenting at various points of my testimony upon the report, I think it instructive to point out that the committee chairman, on August 7, procured the passage of a resolution extending the period for filing the report to March 15 on the ground that such an extension was necessary in order to make an adequate evaluation of the operation of the act. The report which was filed at the close of the last session certainly shows the unfortunate effects of the haste which its chairman feared last August.

Thus, the joint committee's report cites lumped figures to show a decline in man-hours lost as a whole as a result of strikes during the period of operation of the Taft-Hartley Act. Such figures are most deceptive. In evaluating the effect of the Taft-Hartley Act it is obvious that it would be extremely dangerous to attribute virtues to the law in direct proportion to its success in repressing strikes. The fact that a law forces individuals to work against their will, to take "no" for an answer to a reasonable wage demand, is hardly something in its favor. The decisive question is the kind of strikes which are caused and the manner in which a law creates the opportunities for avoiding strikes. The Taft-Hartley law is bankrupt in this decisive test. On the one hand, it forces strikes and on the other it arms employers with the means for breaking them.

Moreover, a more careful study of facts should have demonstrated to the joint committee investigators that during the period of the operation of the Taft-Hartley Act relatively few contracts have been opened for wage negotiations. In a large segment of our basic industry contracts were signed immediately prior to—and in anticipation of—the Taft-Hartley Act. These contracts will reopen in the spring of this year.

3. The third basic result of the law has been to prevent the closing of the growing gap between workers' living costs and earnings, to make it easier for American industry to deny wage increases.

I am aware that the majority of the Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations in their precipitate vindication of the Taft-Hartley Act point to the fact that wage rates have risen but they studiously avoid any reference to prices or profits and fail to investigate the deterioration of the relationships between wages, prices, and profits.

In a triumphant demonstration that workers have enjoyed improved economic benefits under the Taft-Hartley Act, the joint committee published the following table (rept. p. 29) showing average hourly earning of industrial employees for 1946 and the first 9 months of 1948:

1947:	Rate	1948:	Rate
January	$1.161	January	$1.285
February	1.170	February	1.287
March	1.180	March	1.289
April	1.186	April	1.292
May	1.207	May	1.301
June	1.226	June	1.316
July	1.230	July	1.333
August	1.236	August	1.349
September	1.249	September	1.363
October	1.258
November	1.268
December	1.279

However, the picture of increasing hourly earnings furnished by the joint committee report is most deceptive when we compare it with the following table of changes in real hourly earnings for the same period (January 1947 to September 1948[1]):

1947:	Real hourly earnings	1948:	Real hourly earnings
January	$1.161	January	$1.167
February	1.17	February	1.178
March	1.157	March	1.184
April	1.163	April	1.17
May	1.186	May	1.17
June	1.197	June	1.175
July	1.191	July	1.177
August	1.182	August	1.185
September	1.169	September	1.198
October	1.18
November	1.179
December	1.174

Moreover, the figures relating to the worker's relative share of the Nation's wealth show that the operation of the Taft-Hartley Act has not improved his position. In the past few years the relative wage and salary share of income in manufacturing has been substantially reduced while profits have risen steadily.

In 1947 as compared with 1945, for example, profits constituted about 30 cents of each dollar of income received by manufacturing corporations, while in 1945 the profit share out of each dollar was only 21 cents. The wage and salary share over the same period fell from 74 cents to 68 cents. While final detailed figures for 1948 are not available, they show a continuation of this shift of the share of income away from wages and salaries towards profits.

The following table shows this trend very clearly:

Percent of income going to profits and wages and salaries in manufacturing [1]

Year	Corporate profit share	Wages and salaries share [2]
	Percent	Percent
1929	23	73
1939	21	76
1945	21	74
1946	23	76
1947	30	69

[1] Wages and salaries and profits both before taxes.

[2] In considering these percentages it is well to remember that each shift of less than 2 percent involves more than a billion dollars in income.

4. Finally, where established collective-bargaining relationships existed the Taft-Hartley Act has encouraged employers to cut contract standards and to become uncooperative and adamant in the settlement of grievances.

These, in my opinion, are the basic results of the Taft-Hartley Act. Further and related consequences of the law have been to encourage the revival of anti-labor employer associations, to increase the use of strikebreakers, to popularize injunctions, to stimulate violence against union leaders and their members, to undermine the right to strike and picket, to transfer from employees to the employer the right and the power to choose their bargaining agent, to revive company unionism, to encourage on an unprecedented scale discrimination against union leaders and members for union activity, to double the time required by the Board for processing of unfair labor practice cases, to make the Government and the employer censors over the internal structures and affairs of labor organizations, to destroy freedom of contract in collective-bargaining relations, and to substitute Government dictation for free collective bargaining, to invite antilabor State legislatures to pass and apply repressive legislation, to leave unions and employers completely in the dark as to the appropriate manner in which to reopen contracts, to impose upon union members serious restraints upon the exercise of political rights by making it a crime to engage in political activity through their unions and to endanger industrial peace by making bargaining rights depend upon the taking of a test oath of political orthodoxy.

Just as there has been a deliberate attempt to convey the false impression that objections to the law are not based on fact so there has been an attempt to suggest that the objections to the law stem from a narrow group. I think that the recent elections demonstrate the falsity of the charge that only union leaders object to this law. It is not merely unions and their leaders which find this law obnoxious. It is not merely the millions of union members as well as members of the public who oppose this measure. As a matter of fact there are increasing signs that employers recognize that the law was unsound and unwise. An editorial in Business Week of December 18, 1948, a prominent organ of the business community, acknowledged that "few (businessmen) are wasting time deploring the imminent doom of the Taft-Hartley Act." This periodical concedes that the law is an unsound law. Summing up, it states:

"What was wrong was that the Taft-Hartley Act went too far. It crossed the narrow line separating a law which aims only to regulate from one which could destroy.

"Given a few million unemployed in America, given an administration in Washington which was not prounion—and the Taft-Hartley Act conceivably could wreck the labor movement.

"These are the provisions that could do it: (1) picketing can be restrained by injunction; (2) employers can petition for a collective-bargaining election; (3) strikers can be held ineligible to vote while the strike replacements cast the only ballots; and (4) if the outcome of this is a 'no-union' vote, the Government must certify and enforce it.

"Any time there is a surplus labor pool from which an employer can hire at least token strike replacements, these four provisions, linked together, presumably can destroy a union."

More recently, the general counsel of the Illinois Manufacturers Association pointed out to an audience of employers (Daily Labor Report (BNA) No. 14, January 14, 1949) that employers would suffer no great loss and indeed would gain in some instances from a repeal of at least seven provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. The opinion of this lawyer envisaged no great loss to employers in the repeal of provisions covering, (1) union security; (2) suability; (3) multiplicity of elections; (4) 60 days' notice; (5) injunctions; (6) financial statements, and (7) anti-Communist affidavits.

The Taft-Hartley Act cannot be defended by anyone who is acquainted with the facts. It is not the attack upon the act which is not factual. On the contrary it is the defense of the act which is doctrinaire and blind to industrial realities.

I do not think that this country has ever seen a campaign of propaganda, concealment, and misrepresentation which matches that of the press and of the well-paid employer lobbyists to keep the millstone of the Taft-Hartley Act firmly bound around the necks of our working people. Operating on the old theory that if a lie is big enough and repeated often enough people will begin to believe it, employer groups, their paid lobbyists and the press have deliberately conveyed the impression that no case can be made against the Taft-Hartley Act and that only a few emotional labor leaders oppose the law. There has been a deliberate campaign to conceal from our people the case which has been made against this vicious statute.

Let me illustrate what I mean. There appeared before the Senate committee labor representatives, employer representatives, Government representatives, and a group of experts with long years of experience in the field of labor relations. I refer to such figures as William H. Davis, former chairman of the War Labor Board, of the National Defense Mediation Board of the Labor-Management Conference of 1941 and former Director of the Office of Economic Stabilization, whom one of the Republicans on the committee terms "one of the best qualified men in America" to speak on the subject of labor relations; William M. Leiserson, former Chairman of the National Mediation Board and former member of the National Labor Relations Board under the Wagner Act, and nationally known authority on labor relations; Professor Nathan P. Feinsinger, former general counsel to the Wisconsin Labor Relations Board, Associate General Counsel and public member of the National War Labor Board, Chairman of the Fact Finding Board in the steel dispute, teacher of labor law and nationally known arbitrator. All of these figures sharply condemned the Taft-Hartley Act and gave strong and explicit support to the Senate version of H. R. 2032. I think it significant that while the outstanding experts in the field of labor relations in this country all condemn the Taft-Hartley Act and favor the administration bill, yet little or nothing in their testimony is reported in the press. I think it also significant that these figures, of national stature, were not called to testify on the bill which became the Taft-Hartley Act when it was under consideration by the Eightieth Congress.

I think that the Senate hearings are extremely instructive for other reasons. Those who spoke against the administration bill are the very employer groups who from the beginning attacked the Wagner Act because it destroyed "the rights of the individual." These employer groups are the same groups which for years fought a running battle against the administration of the Wagner Act and were responsible for the Taft-Hartley Act. Now they pay lip-service to the principles of collective bargaining but still are fighting desperately to retain the Taft-Hartley Act because of their pretended concern for the rights of the individual.

Of course these reactionary groups are now aware that they cannot salvage the entire Taft-Hartley Act in its present form. They hope by making a pretended show of "reasonableness" and by conceding that certain features of the law are unfair and unworkable to salvage the basic provisions of the law. This technique of making strategic concessions should deceive no one.

Employer witness after employer witness appeared before the Senate committee and suavely assured the committee that "of course the Taft-Hartley Act is not sacred." Each one expressed willingness to endorse reasonable amendments. When pressed some of the employer witnesses could find no amendments which they considered reasonable. The concessions which some employer witnesses made in the interest of reasonableness are concessions with respect to provisions which, by a strange coincidence, have failed to accomplish their anti-labor purpose. Thus, most of the employer witnesses were willing to abandon the provision in the Taft-Hartley Act providing for employee votes to authorize negotiation of union-security agreements. The reasons for this particular concession are not mysterious. Experience in the use of this election device has established that in many industries it has actually served to promote union security agreements instead of discouraging them as the sponsors of the Taft-Hartley Act had hoped.

In the same way employer witnesses demonstrated their reasonableness to the Senate committee by acquiescing in the dropping of the provision for an election among the employees involved in emergency strikes to determine whether the employer's last offer would be accepted. Employers have now recognized that such a ballot cannot be used to divide the leadership from its membership and that the last offer may, in fact, become a floor for future barganing. They are, therefore, willing abandon it.

An employer witness even conceded that in the building trades the ban on the closed shop is unworkable and disastrous because it interferes with the supply of skilled labor.

On cross-examination some employer witnesses were forced to concede that other provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act are unsound such as the provision for suits for breach of contract, the provision making union coercion a Federal offense, the provision relating to who are agents of labor organizations.

The technique of the strategic concession, adopted solely for the purpose of salvaging the basic provisions of the law, has been adopted throughout by Senator Taft. In a letter to Senator Thomas, chairman of the Senate committee, on February 21, 1949, Philip Murray, president of the CIO, made the following charges with respect to Senator Taft's concessions with respect to the inadequacies of the Taft-Hartley Act:

"In the record of the hearings Senator Taft has made a long list of concessions and retreats with respect to the specific provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act and their operation in practice. These are some of his own repudiations of important provisions of his own law:

"(1) He has repeatedly conceded that the provision in the act permitting strikebreakers to vote in elections but denying that right to strikers is one-sided and is a strike-breaking provision.

"(2) He has conceded that even under his own theories some boycotts are justifiable and that the Taft-Hartley Act goes too far in this regard.

"(3) He has conceded that the provisions of the law which make it mandatory to obtain injunctions against unions but not against employers are one-sided and should be eliminated. This would presumably mean the elimination also of the correlative provisions providing for damage suits where such injunctions lie.

"(4) The closed-shop prohibition apparently no longer seems to Senator Taft to be a vital provision in the law. He appears willing to scrap it.

"(5) Senator Taft has admitted that the notice provisions of the law are poorly drafted and create difficulty and confusion in connection with wage reopening clauses.

"(6) Likewise he has recognized that the penalties which may be imposed upon unions and their members for violations of the notice provision are excessive.

"(7) He has expressed the view that the affidavit provisions are improperly drafted.

"(8) Senator Taft has indicated his disagreement with the formulation of the featherbedding provision of the Taft-Hartley Act.

"(9) He has recognized that the present free-speech provisions of the act go too far.

"(10) He has conceded that the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act imposing limitations upon political expenditures by unions are ambiguous.

"(11) He has conceded that the problem of welfare funds was not properly handled in the Taft-Hartley Act.

"(12) He has admitted that the enormous concentration of unreviewable power in the general counsel may be legitimately criticized.

"(13) He has admitted that the provisions for union authorization elections to obtain union security are unsound and should be deleted.

"(14) He has conceded that the present injunctive provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act dealing with so-called national emergency strikes permit of too broad an application.

"(15) He has accepted the provision in the Thomas bill authorizing emergency boards to make recommendations for the purpose of settling disputes, a power which is withheld from emergency boards created under the Taft-Hartley Act.

"(16) Not only has Senator Taft expressed doubts concerning the present powers of the general counsel but he has expressed a lack of confidence in the general counsel in a number of specific ways. For example, he has expressed disagreement with the general counsel as to whether small local business is covered by the Taft-Hartley Act. He has repeatedly insisted that the act must be amended to limit its scope.

"(17) Similarly, he has expressed lack of confidence in the general counsel with respect to the rulings of the general counsel that a member of a picket line is an agent of a union for purposes of the Taft-Hartley Act and that a failure of a union to comply with notice provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act is a refusal to bargain.

"(18) He has conceded that the provision for polling the employees at the end of the 80-day no-strike period with respect to the employer's last offer should be eliminated.

"These are some of the more salient concessions which Senator Taft has made."

Senator Taft, in commenting on President Murray's letter, has not denied that he has made the enumerated concessions, as well as many additional concessions, with respect to the inadequacies of the law. I think that these concessions by the very man who bears the primary responsibility for the law completely refutes the claims of those who insist that no case can be made against the law. The case against the law has been made by the sponsor of the law.

It seems to be the theory of Senator Taft and those who hope to save the act by strategic concessions that a labor statute is a legislative grab bag which may be filled or emptied at pleasure. A labor relations law is a complicated piece of machinery and we cannot eliminate the vital and important parts of it and assume that it will still be workable. On the contrary, even if we were to eliminate only those provisions which Senator Taft has conceded are unsound and unworkable what we leave remaining is not a statute at all but a meaningless hodge-podge of unrelated provisions. What is wrong with the Taft-Hartley Act is more than this or that particular provision. As all of the experts referred to above testified before the Senate committee, the evil of the Taft-Hartley Act lies in its approach and the particular provisions which Senator Taft is willing to abandon are merely symptoms of that basic evil in approach. We must wipe the slate clean and restore to the statute books a law embodying the Wagner Act approach.

The piecemeal dismemberment of the Taft-Hartley Act will not produce a sound labor relations statute. Nor will the technique of legislating on the basis of isolated and unrepresentative abuses yield sound legislation. The Senate hearings illustrate the manner in which this technique, which was used to create an atmosphere favorable to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, has been persisted in to retain the basic provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

President Murray, in his letter to Senator Thomas, previously referred to, has this to say with reference to this subject:

"The apologists for the Taft-Hartley Act prefer most of all to justify legislation affecting millions and millions of Americans upon the basis of an isolated and unrepresentative horrible example carefully dressed up and repeatedly trotted out to confuse and frighten the unwary.

"The repressive Taft-Hartley Act was itself passed through the use of this clever technique of seizing upon one or two unrepresentative fact situations to justify legislative provisions far beyond their literal reach. The hearings on the Taft-Hartley Act are replete with the use of this device. Now, in the present hearings, the same technique has been revived and warmed over. The shocking boycott provisions of the act are again justified by vague references to extreme fact situations which are not remotely typical of the boycotts in which workers normally engage. The same stock examples, now somewhat frayed, which were resorted to by Senator Taft in 1947 to justify his disastrous elimination of the closed shop are again trotted out.

"I do not know of any field of legislation outside of the labor field, where Congress would dare abridge the rights of millions of Americans on the basis of isolated and unrepresentative abuses. Senator Taft and some of his Republican colleagues would be outraged if the same technique were used to justify legislation invading employers' rights.

"It is, of course, obvious that the device of the horrible example is unfair and irresponsible. It results, as in the case of the Taft-Hartley Act, in imposing upon labor a myriad of unjust restraints—in a field where a minimum of governmental intervention is imperative. It means the very regimentation which Senator Taft professes to abhor in other connections."

Despite the barrage of newspaper propaganda to the contrary, I am positive that a fair and deliberate evaluation of the Senate testimony will corroborate the conclusion of the great majority of our people in the recent elections that the Taft-Hartley Act is a discredited law.

B. THE WAGNER ACT

I doubt whether there has been any statute passed by an American Legislature which has been as widely misrepresented and as little understood as the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, better known as the Wagner Act.

The purpose of the Wagner Act has been classically described by President Roosevelt. In his statement when he signed that act, he said:

"A better relationship between labor and management is the high purpose of this act. By assuring the employees the right of collective bargaining, it fosters the development of the employment contract on a sound and equitable basis. By providing an orderly procedure for determining who is entitled to represent the employees, it aims to remove one of the chief causes of wasteful economic strife. By preventing practices which tend to destroy the independence of labor, it seeks, for every worker within its scope, that freedom of choice and action which is justly his."

The purpose of the Wagner Act is to promote self-organization and collective bargaining with a minimum of governmental interference.

The thesis of that act is that the refusal by employers to bargain collectively with unions periodically causes strikes which interfere with the free flow of commerce. Congress found that these interruptions to commerce flow basically from inequality of bargaining power between the individual worker and his employer.

Congress therefore in the Wagner Act assured to the workers the right to "self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection."

It should be pointed out at the outset that the Wagner Act did not extend to workers rights which the Federal Government had theretofore denied them. As a matter of fact, the Clayton Act, passed in 1914, and the Norris-LaGuardia Act, passed by a Republican Congress in 1932, accorded to the workers of the Nation the selfsame rights which are embodied in the Wagner Act.

However, the Wagner Act went one important and necessary step further than prior laws protecting the right of self-organization and collective bargaining. The act implemented these protections in specific ways. These forms of implementation all flow from a central attempt to check abuses by the employer of economic power for the purpose of frustrating self-organization or defeating collective bargaining.

Thus, employers are forbidden by the act to use their economic power to interfere in the exercise by their employees of the right to self-organization. They are forbidden to discriminate against employees because of their union activities. The Wagner Act also makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer to bring into being or to control an organization of employees and of course makes it an unfair labor practice to refuse to bargain with a majority representative of the employees in an appropriate bargaining unit.

The Congress did not single out these particular unfair labor practices haphazardly or by accident. Abuses of economic power in connection with the specified forms of unfair labor practices had in 1935 a long genealogy of substance.

Today, as in the years prior to the passage of the Wagner Act, it is a commonplace for employers through coercion and intimidation to seek to alienate employees from labor organizations. Where this is not possible or advisable employers create and maintain company unions. Long years of labor history demonstrate that the company union is the greatest menace to self-organization and free collective bargaining. After the smashing of the railway shopmen's strike in 1922, company unionism became a stock device to defeat collective bargaining by placing at the bargaining table an alter ego of the employer in the form of a puppet labor organization.

The prohibition upon the use of economic power for discriminatory purposes also rests upon a long and bitter experience with such devices as the "yellow dog" contract and the blacklist. Perhaps the most common way of defeating unionism was the discharge of union leaders and the creation through the blacklist of a permanent economic ghetto under which union men were denied employment throughout an entire industry.

The bargaining obligation imposed by the Wagner Act is of course the key to the effectuation of the congressional purpose of achieving industrial harmony.

The enforcement provisions of the Wagner Act are not punitive. On the contrary, they are mild—too mild, if anything. The administrative phase of the proceedings results either only in remedial orders requiring the employer to cease and desist from the acts found to be unfair labor practices and to take affirmative action such as reinstatement with back pay, or the disestablishment of dominated unions.

Under the Wagner Act, Board orders do not have the force of law. The Board is required to obtain enforcement through a circuit court of appeals decree and an employer may correspondingly apply to a circuit court of appeals to review and set aside a Board proceeding and of course an appeal is possible by either party to the Supreme Court. I emphasize the fact that under Board procedure no sanction even remotely punitive is present. The employer is merely told not to do it again. It is only when he violates a decree that anything resembling a really drastic sanction, namely, contempt, becomes available.

The administrative procedure through which the Wagner Act functions is patterned after the procedure used with signal success for many years under the Interstate Commerce Commission Act. All parties are entitled to counsel and every procedural guaranty. The procedure is completely in accord with the requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act.

Although the unfair labor practice aspects of the Wagner Act have received great emphasis in public discussions, it is accurate to say that they are not the most important part of the Wagner Act. The most important parts of the Wagner Act are the provisions which deal with representation matters which center on section 9 of the act. This representation portion of the statute has as its purpose the resolution of questions concerning representation through elections or other means for determining a bargaining agent. In connection with its administration of this portion of the statute, the Board has worked out clear, simple rules familiar both to employers and labor organizations concerning the basic circumstances under which elections may be held such as when a contract is a bar to an election, what the appropriate bargaining unit is, what groups of employees are eligible to vote, etc.

Just as the Board's activities in connection with unfair labor practices have tended to overshadow its important contributions in connection with elections, so the contested cases have obscured the far greater volume of Board cases which have been settled through informal adjustment and consent. Only a small proportion, about 20 percent of the cases, decided by the Board under the Wagner Act were contested proceedings. Most cases were settled through voluntary adjustment and consent.

The Wagner Act became the law of the land in an effective and meaningful sense only in very slow stages, and even then not in all areas of our country. Certainly until the constitutionality of the act was established in 1937, there was very little compliance with its provisions. About 100 injunctions were obtained against enforcement of the act. The national industrial council of the National Association of Manufacturers, and the lawyers committee of the Liberty League supplied a steady stream of arguments in an attack upon the act. Immediately after the act was passed the NAM and certain of its affiliates counseled their members to disregard the law. As a La Follette-Thomas committee report puts it (No. 6, pt. IV), "the * * * evidence shows a well-defined deliberate opposition to a law enacted by the Congress of the United States. Even prior to the passage of the act, the association denounced the law as revolutionary and urged its members to take a stand against it * * *."

Employers' associations, such as the Associated Industries of Cleveland and the National Metal Trades Association conducted an organized campaign in defiance of the act. Both of these associations continued their strikebreaking services. Even after the act was declared constitutional the NAM issued a blueprint of a method whereby company unions could be disguised and so evade the requirements of the act. The National Metal Trades Association was found by the La Follette-Thomas committee to have continued its defense funds and maintained strikebreaking services in complete defiance of the Wagner Act. (See La Follette-Thomas committee Report No. 6, pt. IV, pp. 115–116).

After the act was validated, employer resistence increasingly took the form of evading specific provisions of the law. In addition, millions were spent by employers and their associations in a steady stream of propaganda deliberately misrepresenting the law and its provisions.

The propaganda against the act was transformed by the congressional spokesmen for employers into a legislative compaign to kill the act. There is an unbroken chain from the efforts of the Liberty League to kill the Wagner Act at its birth to the Taft-Hartley Act. Since the adoption of the Wagner Act there has not been a session of Congress which has not seen in some form or other a flood of bills to regulate or destroy the act and the Board. This legislative attack in itself encouraged large groups of employers to resist the law in the continuing hope that the efforts of a small antilabor group in Congress would ultimately prevail. As a matter of fact, there are employers in this country who never complied with the Wagner Act because they were encouraged to gamble on he repeal or amendment of the act.

In addition, the barrage of attacks upon the act served to stimulate a large variety of antilabor State laws which themselves hampered the effective operation of the act.

Two theories have nourished the attack over the years upon the Wagner Act from the days of the Liberty League until the present. The first is the so-called equalization theory, namely, that the act must be equalized so as to provide for unfair labor practices by unions. The answer to this contention has been supplied over the years in many forms. It is, as this committee itself pointed out when it reported out the bill in 1935, a "falsely conceived" mutuality agreement. Ample sanctions against abuses by unions exist in local law where unions impose injury upon others. As I will show in detail in my discussion of the operation of the Taft-Hartley Act, the Taft-Hartley Act's equalization provisions have not served the public welfare. They have merely extended to employers a convenient means of breaking strikes and added to existing local sanctions against unions an additional and unnecessary Federal sanction.

The crusade around the slogan "coercion from any source" is a crusade which has been led by those whose interest throughout the years has been in frustrating the growth of labor organizations.

In 1939, Senator Wagner courageously identified those who rallied behind the "coercion from any source" formula: "There is nothing new about this charge of 'interference.' It has been raised again and again by peole who have never lifted a finger to protect the legitimate rights of labor." (Source: Hearings before the House Committee on Labor, Seventy-sixth Cong., 1st sess., p. 288).

The second basic theory through which the attack upon the Wagner Act has been forwarded is the plea that "corrective" legislation must be necessary to protect the individual worker against the union. This was the argument made by the Liberty League at the birth of the Wagner Act. As a matter of fact, this same argument was made by counsel for an employer association at the hearings on the Norris-LaGuardia Act. The Taft-Hartley Act, if it has done one thing, has demonstrated that the claimed concern of certain employer groups for the rights of the individual is merely a disguised attack upon unions.

When the Taft-Hartley Act was passed the Wagner Act had barely begun to make itself felt as a law of industrial life in this country. Although the Wagner Act has been on the books since 1935, the injunction barrage of the earlier years, the effect of the war on normal labor relations, a deliberate campaign of resistance by certain and powerful employer groups, the effect of a number of antilabor laws in the States, all combined to deny full efficacy to the Wagner Act.

Resistance to the law by some employers served at least one purpose—it resulted in judicial clarification of the meaning of disputed terms. There have been about 700 court cases interpreting the Wagner Act. Today employers and unions know what the law means. It is a simple, clear guide in the field of labor relations—a field in which clarity and definitiveness is imperative for successful results. In this respect the Wagner Act in refreshing contrast to the Taft-Hartley Act which is ambiguous, confusing, and complex.

We live in a country whose labor force is the marvel of the entire world. Yet self-organization and collective bargaining have actually made headway against the most difficult odds. The reactionaries have through the years fought a tenacious and bitter battle to prevent self-organization and collective bargaining. The Taft-Hartley Act was pushed through by these reactionaries to carry out their destructive purposes.

There are those who would like to create the impression that employees no longer need the protection of the Wagner Act. This claim is completely without foundation. In the year 1947, the last year of the functioning of the Wagner Act, the Labor Board reported more charges of coercion, interference, and restraint by employers than at any time in the history of the act. Today, out of a labor force of some 60,000,000 in this country, only approximately one-fourth are organized. This percentage compares unfavorably with 48.2 percent for Great Britain, 35 percent for Italy, 36.8 percent for France, 33.4 percent for Norway, 36.6 percent for Sweden, and 31 percent for Denmark.

The public welfare requires that the Wagner Act be restored as the basic Federal labor law. Labor feels that there are imperfections in the Wagner Act. The enormous delays which are involved in the administration of the law frequently result in the denial, in effect, of the rights which it safeguards on paper. The lack of more severe sanctions has encouraged employers to gamble on violations. We must begin to explore the field of sanctions in order to make the law serve as a deterrent to antilabor conduct. However, despite its imperfections, the law represents a fair and temperate means of promoting harmonious labor relations. Neither labor nor management has a right to expect more from a Federal law. The law in no way interferes with the basic right of each of the partners to the collective-bargaining relationship to live, to flourish, and to grow strong. The fundamental error which was made by the Taft-Hartley Act was that it ignored this simple and indispensable foundation of sound labor relations.

C. THE PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

H. R. 2032, in addition to repealing the Taft-Hartley Act and reenacting the Wagner Act, provides for certain amendments. I should like to make it clear at the outset that the Congress of Industrial Organizations prefers an approach to the problem of labor legislation under which the Wagner Act would be immediately reenacted as a substitute for a repealed Taft-Hartley Act. We believe that there is an immediate present necessity for replacing the Taft-Hartley Act with a law which is fair and just. We are convinced that the Taft-Hartley Act should not remain on the books 1 day longer than is absolutely necessary. The effect which this law has had upon free collective bargaining has been so disastrous as to make imperative that the law be immediately erased from the statute books and that the Wagner Act be substituted for it as the law of the land.

I should make it clear that we do not oppose the amendments to the Wagner Act contained in H. R. 2032 in principle. The Congress of Industrial Organizations has expressed its willingness to endorse legislation within the spirit of the President's state of the Union message. The position of the Congress of Industrial Organizations was given on January 5 of this year by President Murray in a statement on the President's state of the Union message. With respect to the labor portion of that message, President Murray said:

"We hail in particular the President's plain and urgent request for the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and the reenactment of the Wagner Act. We feel certain that the Congress will heed the mandate of the election and the President's message in promptly achieving this objective. Once the Taft-Hartley law is repealed and the Wagner Act is reenacted, the CIO stands prepared to make constructive recommendations to the Congress in the field of labor-management relations. We are sure that both labor and management groups, meeting within the spirit and framework of the President's message, can reach substantial agreement, once the Wagner Act is restored, on any problems that may arise. This can be done with full recognition on all parts that to preserve our democratic freedoms government by injunction in the field of labor relations must be eliminated and wage freezing avoided."

Instead of approaching its problem in two steps, this committee has adopted a one-step approach through which amendments in keeping with the President's message are to be made at this time to the Wagner Act.

As I have indicated, the amendments which have been produced are in our view in keeping with the spirit of the President's message. While we would have preferred that the committee's proposals and consideration of them be deferred until after the passage of the Wagner Act and the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act because we believe such an approach would be in the public interest.

We do not oppose the proposed amendments in principle. However, we offer the following comments on the amendments and suggestions with a view better to effectuate their purpose.

(1) Illegal strikes and boycotts.—The bill adds to the Wagner Act a section (sec. 8 (b)) which makes it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization to cause or attempt to cause employees to engage under certain conditions in an illegal work stoppage or a secondary boycott, as defined in the bill.

The conditions under which a work stoppage or secondary boycott is made an unfair labor practice are, first, where another labor organization is the certified labor representative of the employees within the meaning of section 9 of the act; second, where the employer is required to bargain with another labor organization; or, third, where the employer is currently recognizing another labor organization not illegally established or maintained and has executed a collective-bargaining agreement with it which would constitute a bar to a question concerning representation.

The purpose of this new section 8 (b) is to outlaw strikes which force an employer to violate the law. Such strikes were referred to in the President's state of the Union message in 1947 when he said: "Strikes to compel an employer to violate the law are inexcusable. Legislation to prevent such strikes is clearly desirable."

There are certain problems involved in prohibiting concerted action which has as its object compelling an employer to violate the law. On the one hand we must recognize that since we are dealing with the exercise of a basic right we should narrowly define the area of the prohibition in order to meet precisely the situation which it is the purpose of the statute to correct. I believe that this test is met by the amendment as it is written. The chief danger, of course, is that an employer may recognize an unrepresentative labor organization and thus illegalize a strike by a union actually representing a majority of the employees. In my opinion this danger is obviated by the wording of subsection 8 (b) (1) (C), which requires not only that the employer recognize an organization which is not established, maintained, or assisted by employer action but that he must have executed an agreement with such an organization which would bar a question concerning representation.

The Labor Board has, of course, held in many cases that premature recognition of a labor organization or recognition of a labor organization without adequate proof of majority where a rival labor organization is also organizing the emplyees are forms of assistance outlawed by the act. In addition, the Board has recognized that agreements made under such and related circumstances do not constitute a bar to a question concerning representation. Therefore, as I read this provision of the law, a strike by a rival labor organization would not be illegal under any circumstances where an employer entered a contract with a labor organization which would not be a bar to an election.

Subsections (a) and (b) of section 8 (b) (1) bar strikes where there is an outstanding certification or an order of the Board to bargain with another labor organization. Here, too, of course, the language must be read in the light of the purpose of the entire section, namely, to prevent compulsion upon an employer to violate the law. Hence these sections would apply only where the certification or the Board order involved are currently valid obligations to bargain with a labor organization.

Most of the terms used in section 8 (b) and its three subsections are terms which have acquired meaning as a result of administrative interpretation under the Wagner Act. I assume that these terms have been written into this section in the light of this administrative background. The Labor Board has over the years developed an intensive body of interpretation of when the duty to bargain arises. That body of interpretation undoubtedly applies to section 8 (b). The statute obviously outlaws only those strikes in which a duty to bargain arises in the way specified in the three subsections and as the terms used in those subsections have been defined by the National Labor Relations Board under the Wagner Act.

I believe that the definition of secondary boycott contained in section 106 (a) of the bill should make it clear that the refusal of workers to cross a picket line does not constitute a secondary boycott.

H. R. 2032 makes it an unfair-labor practice for a labor organization to cause or attempt to cause employees to engage in a secondary boycott or a strike where such activity has the purpose stated in the bill.

Secondary boycotts are defined in the statute to include the pressures which are normally used by unions upon one employer in order to achieve an objective of the union with reference to another employer. However, the definition of secondary boycott does not make it clear that where the pressure is exerted upon the second employer through a picket line the refusal of employees to cross a picket line will not result in unfair labor practice charges. In order to insure protection to employees who refuse to cross picket lines it is proposed that there be added to the definition of secondary boycott the phrase, at page 6 line 5, of the statute, "but shall not include the refusal by any person to enter upon the premises of any employer (other than his own employer)."

The following examples will clarify the purpose and effect of the proposed amendments:

(a) Union is engagaing in a strike against employer A in order to compel him to do what is forbidden by the statute. The members of another union, for example the Teamsters, who are employees of employer B, refuse to cross the picket line. It is the purpose of this amendment to immunize the Teamsters Union from a secondary boycott charge which would be based on the fact that its refusal to cross the picket line is a concerted refusal in the course of the employment of the employees of one employer, employer B, to transport goods because they are to be manufactured or distributed by another employer, employer A.

It is also the purpose of this amendment to remove as a basis for an unfair labor practice charge against the union the fact that its activities have caused the employees of employer B, namely the teamsters' employer, to refuse to transport goods because they are to be manufactured, etc., by employer A.

(b) Where a union is engaged in a secondary boycott to compel an employer to do what is forbidden by the statute. Here, too, the refusal to cross a picket line under the statute as it is written may become an ingredient of an unfair labor practice against the labor organization engaged in the economic activity condemned by the statute as well as against the labor organization whose members refuse to cross the picket line.

It is submitted that it is unsound and unwise to make a refusal to cross a picket line result in an unfair labor practice either on the part of the labor organization whose members refuse to cross the picket line or on the part of the labor organization whose picket lines other employees respect.

(1) Employees who typically refuse to cross picket lines do not do so out of a desire to aid one or another labor organization involved in the dispute. Frequently members of labor organizations refuse to cross the picket line of organizations whose interests are hostile to them. The refusal to cross the picket line rests upon a fundamental unwillingness by a union member to become the instrument for destroying the effectiveness of any picket line.

If employees are required to cross the picket line of other employees upon penalty of committing an unfair labor practice, a vital blow is dealt to a basic labor right.

It is no answer to say that the picket line itself is established to achieve an illegal objective. The employee who refuses to cross a picket line does not do so to aid the illegal objective. He does so as a matter of principle. And the principle does not depend upon the purpose of the picket line. Employees should not be required to inquire into the purpose of a picket line before they exercise the traditional and time-honored right to respect it.

The principle of the statute is that third party employers should not be made to suffer in connection with their property rights where certain types of disputes occur between a labor organization and the employer. It falls equally that unions should not be made to suffer in the exercise of a right which not only involves property but which involves principle when it is completely innocent of any intent to intervene in a dispute. If we do not "conscript" neutrals we should be consistent and not "conscript" neutrals when the neutral happens to be a union.

(2) Many labor organizations have as a long-established rule under their constitution and bylaws the requirement of refusing to cross picket lines. Unless the statute makes an exception to that practice these long-established and important aspects of union discipline will be undermined. Once the refusal to cross a picket line becomes the element of a Federal offense under certain circumstances, this creates an entering wedge for the destruction of the entire practice. It is a serious interference with the internal affairs of unions.

(3) Many unions have by contract stipulated with employers that they will not be required to cross picket lines. These well-established and necessary contractual provisions should not be rendered nugatory even in connection with the simple type of dispute toward which the bill is directed.

(4) Even the Taft-Hartley Act recognized—in connection with strikes for union recognition—that a refusal to cross a picket line was not a secondary boycott.

(5) The act can adequately accomplish its objectives without destroying the right to refuse to cross picket lines.

I would like to remind the committee that contrary to the prevailing impression, the sanctions imposed for violation of this section are severe sanctions. In the event of a strike found by the Board to fall within section 8 (b), the Board could undoubtedly order the strike terminated and the employees returned to work against their will.

It could even order such forms of affirmative relief as damages or reimbursement to the members of the rival organization for lost wages. Also, since the conduct is made an unfair labor practice, section 10 (e) of the statute would undoubtedly apply. This section specifically provides that the Circuit Court of Appeals in which the transcript of the record is filed in an unfair labor practice case has jurisdiction to issue "such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper." Although the Board has rarely resorted to this provision of 10 (e) in order to obtain injunctive relief against employers, there is no question that a court would have power to issue such an injunction either upon petition of the Board or sua sponte.

(2) Jurisdictional disputes.—The act also makes it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization to cause or attempt to cause employees to engage in a work stoppage or a secondary boycott in furtherance of a jurisdictional dispute as defined in the statute.

The statute is clear in indicating that the type of jurisdictional disputes dealt with are those disputes in which a labor organization claims the right to do certain work in behalf of its craft jurisdiction and another labor organization claims the right to do the same work in behalf of its craft jurisdiction. Related provisions dealing with jurisdictional disputes make a refusal to abide by an award an unfair labor practice and establish machinery for the disposition of jurisdictonal disputes by the Board or an arbitrator appointed by the Board subject to certain defined standards.

This is not a problem with which the CIO is directly concerned. Other labor organizations more immediately concerned will undoubtedly desire to comment on it.

(3) Notice of termination or modification of collective-bargaining agreements and duties of employers and employees.—Section 108 of the bill amends the Wagner Act by making it an unfair labor practice for an employer or labor organization "to terminate or modify a collective bargaining agreement covering employees in an industry affecting commerce" unless the party seeking such termination or modification notifies the Conciliation Service of the proposed termination or modification at least 30 days prior to the expiration date of the contract or 30 days prior to the time it is proposed to make the termination or modification, whichever is earlier.

Section 204 of the bill imposes upon employers and labor organizations a duty to exert reasonable effort to make and maintain collective-bargaining agreements for definite periods of time concerning (1) rates of pay, hours and terms and conditions of work; (2) notice provisions; (3) abstention from strikes, lock-outs, "or other acts of economic coercion" in violation of such agreements, and (4) procedures for the peaceful settlement of disputes involving the interpretation or application of such agreements.

A second independent duty which the section imposes is that of participating in meetings undertaken by the Conciliation Service to aid in the settlement of disputes.

These two provisions are grouped together for purposes of discussion and analysis because they present the same problem. In the case of both these provisions the objective which is proposed is a desirable one but the sanction is questionable and completely unsuited to the objective. The Congress of Industrial Organizations believes that it is desirable that the Conciliation Service have notice of all proposed changes which might lead to a strike. However, I believe that the sanction, namely, to make the failure to give such a notice an unfair labor practice, is exceedingly dangerous.

The statute would impose upon the conduct involved consequences wholly out of proportion to the character of the offense. There are thousands of unions who do not have paid or full-time secretaries. When a dispute arises, the sending of a notice to the Conciliation Service may be completely overlooked. The failure to send a notice may be purely a technical lapse.

However, should a union fail to take this step, an otherwise legal strike would become an illegal strike which would justify the discharge of the strikers and probably a suit at law. An employer could certainly rid himself of the union by firing a majority of the strikers where the union inadvertently had failed to give the required notice and then engaged in a strike.

In contrast, if an employer desired to terminate or modify a contract and failed to give the required notice, the sole Labor Board sanction would probably be a cease-and-desist order requiring him at some indefinite time in the future to refrain from such conduct.

It is not only that this section confronts a union with serious consequences for a technical lapse or that it has a disproportionate impact. We should consider further that the duty of the union under the section runs not to the employer but to the Conciliation Service. Certainly an employer should not be placed in the position where he may with impunity break a strike because a union technically violated a duty to the Government. I would therefore propose that instead of making the failure to notify the United States Conciliation Service a violation of the National Labor Relations Act that this section (section 108) be placed in title II and that it be merged with the duties of employers and employees, section 204, to which I now address myself before considering other additional aspects of the notice provision.

As in the case of the notice provision, the Congress of Industrial Organizations does not disagree with the objective of section 204 which is to encourage the making of agreements containing the four types of provisions indicated above. However, again, as in the case of the notice provisions, the section contains certain dangers which it seems to me flow from collateral sanctions which may be imposed upon a violation of the prescribed duties. Here, too, as in the case of the notice provisions, the sanctions are not commensurate with the violation involved.

Should an employer or labor organization decide that one of the four items specified in this section is unsuited to a particular collective-bargaining agreement and hence fails to make "a reasonable effort" to make an agreement concerning that item, a situation might arise in which an action could be brought for damages. Or should a union engage in a strike because of its rejection of one of the named items, a court might term the strike an illegal strike.

It seems clear that all that was intended by this section was to encourage entering agreements for definte periods covering the four named subjects. By imposing a duty to make such agreements, the section in effect creates a new and special type of bargaining obligation which may be extremely difficult to comply with and the violation of which may lay the basis for collateral consequences which are plainly not contemplated. Moreover, this section may be interpreted as a limitation upon the collective-bargaining obligation of the Wagner Act and as exhausting the subject matter of collective bargaining for purposes of the statute.

The basic purpose of both these provisions is to educate the parties into methods of dealing for the purpose of safeguarding the public interest. It is not intended to provide either employers or unions with weapons of industrial warfare. I therefore suggest that section 204 be amended in the following respects:

(a) That it be made the public policy of the United States that employers and employees and their representatives take the actions indicated in that section.

(b) That there be included within this redrafted section 204 the notice provisions as a new subsection (b) and that the present subsection (b) be made subsection (c).

(c) I would specify that notice need not be given in the event of a contract modification of a type which by the terms of the contract precludes an interruption of production.

(d) I would make it clear that the notice provision does not require a new notice in the event of the extension of a contract for periods less than 60 days.

(e) I would delete the phrase "other acts of economic coercion" as a synonym for a strike. It suggests that a strike for a legitimate objective is per se coercive and may, therefore, have consequences which are not intended by the bill.

I know that at this point there are those who will insist on the stereotyped judgment that the proposal to amend these sections and to remove even a suggestion of an illegally enforceable duty shows labor's unwillingness to accept a law with teeth. Teeth are useful but here, as in connection with the emergency strike situation, we should not adopt a policy of teeth for the sake of teeth. Those who are so enthusiastic for tough sanctions frequently overlook the fact that sanctions must serve some purpose.

In connection with this notice problem, as well as with the problem of encouraging the making of certain types of agreements, I am convinced that tough sanctions—even as tough as the unfair labor practice sanctions—would simply defeat the salutary purpose of these provisions.

In conformity with the above suggestions, the following changes should be made in the bill:

1. The present section 108 and the heading under which it appears should be eliminated. (Subsequently in my testimony I propose a new section 108 dealing with restrictive State laws.)

2. The present heading, Duties of Employers and Employees, which appears at page 14, line 11 of the bill, should be changed to read, Public Policy of the United States With Respect to Collective-Bargaining Agreements.

3. Section 204 should be amended to read as follows:

In order to prevent or minimize labor disputes affecting the free flow of commerce or threatening consequences injurious to the general welfare, it is the public policy of the United States that—

(a) employers and employees, and their representatives in any industry affecting commerce exert every reasonable effort to make and maintain collective-bargaining agreements for definite periods of time, concerning (1) rates of pay, hours, and terms and conditions of work; (2) adequate notice of desire to terminate or change such agreements; (3) abstention from strikes, lock-outs, in violation of such agreements; and (4) procedures for the peaceful settlement of disputes involving the interpretation or application of such agreements;

(b) where there is in effect a collective-bargaining contract covering employees in an industry affecting commerce, the party to such contract desiring to terminate or modify such contract shall notify the United States Conciliation Service of the proposed termination or modification at least 30 days prior to the expiration date of the contract, or 30 days prior to the time it is proposed to make such termination or modification, whichever is earlier: Provided, That this provision shall not require the notification of the Service of a proposed termination or modification of a contract where such contract or its terms or conditions have been extended for a period less than 60 days and notification has been made of a proposed termination or modification of the extended agreement: Provided further, That this provision shall not require the notification of the Service of a proposed modification or termination of a contract where the party desiring such termination or modification may not, under such contract, take economic action in support thereof;

(c) employers, employees and their representatives in any industry affecting commerce participate fully and promptly in such meetings as may be undertaken by the Service for the purpose of aiding in a settlement of any dispute to which they are parties.

4. Section 205 should remain as it now appears with the exception of the heading, which should be eliminated since the subject matter of section 205 is covered by the proposed new heading over section 204.

5. In the event present section 108 is retained and not merged into section 204, it should contain the two provisos suggested above in proposed section 204 (b), and it should be made clear by appropriate amendment that the section applies only where the failure to give the notice is willful.

(4) National emergencies.—Sections 301 and 302 of the statute deal specifically with the steps which may be taken in the event of a so-called national emergency work stoppage. These sections provide that the President may issue a proclamation that such an emergency exists because a stoppage of work resulted or threatens to result from a labor dispute "in a vital industry which affects the public interest." It authorizes the President to issue a proclamation to that effect, and to call upon the parties to refrain from stopping work or to return to work if the stoppage has occurred.

After the issuance of the proclamation, the President is authorized promptly to appoint an emergency board to investigate the dispute. The Board thus appointed is given power (a) to seek to induce the parties to reach a settlement, and (b) in any event within a time period to be determined by the President but no more than 25 days after the issuance of the proclamation to make a report which shall include findings and recommendations.

The parties to the dispute are required to continue or to return to work after a proclamation has been issued and until 5 days have elapsed after the report has been made by the appointed Board. During this period of time the parties are required to maintain the terms and conditions of employment which were in effect immediately prior to the beginning of the dispute unless there is voluntary agreementt on a change.

It is my understanding that this provision of the statute does not provide for injunctions; that its sanctions are the prestige of the President and the force of public opinion.

I think that I should make this point very clear. I know that there are some lawyers who will theorize that because the statute contains, in section 302 (c), language that "the parties to the dispute shall" continue to work or resume operations after the Presidential proclamation that a duty is created which is enforceable by an injunctive sanction. The argument runs that courts will read an injunction into the section by ruling that Congress could not have intended to create a duty without a remedy. Such a contention will base itself upon such a case as Texas & New Orleans Railroad Co. v. Brotherhood of Railway & Steamship Clerks (281 U. S. 548), in which the Railway Labor Act of 1926 was construed to impose a duty legally enforceable through an injunction. In this case the court ruled that section 20 of the Clayton Act was not applicable. Reference should also be made to Virginian Railway Co. v. System Federation of Employees (300 U. S. 515), in which the Supreme Court held that the Railway Labor Act, as amended in 1934, imposed a legally enforceable obligation upon carriers despite the Norris-LaGuardia Act on the basis of language comparable to that in this provision.

However, I think that this statute was intended not to provide for injunctions, and that any argument to the contrary must yield to the fact that the drafters, in section 401, contemporaneously expressly stated that the Norris-LaGuardia Act and the Clayton Act are continued in full force and effect with an exception in the case of section 10 of the National Labor Relations Act.

If this statute provided otherwise and contained a provision for a injunctive sanction, the CIO would oppose it and oppose it vigorously. Our reasons for opposing injunctions are well known.

(a) An injunction imposes involuntary servitude upon the workers. It crushes the right to strike. What Abraham Lincoln said in 1860 with respect to the right to be free of involuntary servitude and the right to strike is fully applicable today:

"I am glad to see that a system of labor prevails under which laborers can strike when they want to, where they are not obligated to work under all circumstances, and are not tied down and obliged to labor whether you pay them or not. I like a system which lets a man quit when he wants to, and wish it might prevail elsewhere. One of the reasons why I am opposed to slavery is just here."

(b) An injunction places the Government on the side of the employer without giving labor an opportunity to present its position.

(c) The labor injunction, as Justice Brandeis said long ago, seeks "to endow property with active militant power which would make it dominant over men."

(d) Although our judicial system is supposed to dispose of individual cases and punish individuals for particular wrongs committed, the injunctive device permits a Federal judge to pass judgment against large groups of men involved in a complicated economic struggle and enmesh them in dragnet restraints.

(e) The effect of an injunction is not lightened; it is increased when the Government is empowered to obtain injunctions rather than private individuals. The struggle against the injunctive evil has been a struggle against the intervention of the Federal Government in the disputes through the judiciary. And the three major injunctions which were obtained in this country in labor disputes and which form the landmarks of the injunctive evil were all injunctions obtained at the insistence of the Government: the Debs injunction, the injunction in the coal strike during the last war, and the railway shopmen's injunction in 1922.

(f) The use of compulsion always seems to be an easy way to settle a troublesome problem. Injunctions do not settle labor disputes. On the contrary, they inflame labor disputes as our experience under the Taft-Hartley Act shows. And they embitter the workers of the country and convince them that their Government is prejudiced against them.

The Norris-LaGuardia Act was the culmination of nearly two generations of bitter debate. The American worker regards this law with profound confidence and is determined that its principles should not be compromised. Because this provision respects the integrity of the Norris-LaGuardia Act we endorse it.

There has been a deliberate attempt, rooted in partisan politics, to confuse the nature and purpose of sections 301 and 302. In his letter to Senator Thomas, President Murray exposed those political maneuvers in the following fashion:

"Part of the desperate campaign to save the Taft-Hartley Act involves an attempt to score political points—to obscure the fundamental issues which are involved in this legislation by improvising synthetic issues purely for purposes of avoiding a defense of the act.

"Nowhere is this best seen than in the furious but essentially mock debate with respect to the so-called emergency strike issue.

"As I see it, those who are opposed to the bill have conveniently split into two camps: Those who insist that the bill is bad because it contains no injunctive provisions to save the country from 'paralysis,' and those who insist that the bill is objectionable because it does contain injunctive provisions which threaten basic freedoms. It is a curious thing that those who condemn the bill because it lacks injunctions and those who condemn it because they believe it to contain injunctions never find an occasion to engage in a public debate in the course of the hearings on their sharply divergent viewpoints. These Senators never attack each other. They find it strategically far more convenient to attack the bill, and the combined purpose of their attack is to suggest that the bill places the country either at the mercy of a tyrannical President or of workers free to strike without injunctive restraint.

"I think it can fairly be said that the entire issue with respect to the President's inherent powers has been deliberately confused by opponents of the Thomas bill. The fact is the bill contains no injunctive provisions and it is not the purpose of the bill to employ the device of the injunction in strikes affecting the national health or welfare. Secretary Tobin made this plain in his sponsoring testimony.

"Those who attack the emergency provision of the bill apparently hope to conceal the fact that the Taft-Hartley Act 80-day injunctive provisions and the supporting procedures have completely and utterly failed. The record and the testimony of such witnesses as William H. Davis and Cyrus Ching show clearly that the Taft-Hartley injunctive provisions serve to cause strikes and to prevent settlements and make no constructive contribution in any way to the protection of the national welfare.

"Efforts to shackle labor with the injunction as a means of settling disputes invariably coincide with periods of great national tension. The first of such efforts occurred in 1893, when the Debs injunction became the spearhead of a vast antilabor crusade against American working people. The threat that the injunction would become a tremendous means of repressing the American labor movement haunted our people. The Clayton Act was finally put on the books to avert this threat.

"The second injunctive drive occurred during and after the First World War, when sweeping strikebreaking injunctions were issued in the coal industry and in the railroad industry. These and other injunctions which followed again produced a legislative defense in the form of the Norris-LaGuardia Act.

"The Taft-Hartley Act represents the third attempt of organized antiunionism and its congressional spokesmen to utilize the tensions and readjustment of the postwar period to foist upon the American people the injunction as a means of smashing strikes. This third historic attack on labor must be stopped.

"It is an ironic circumstance that those who insist upon permanently introducing injunctions into our national life do so on the ground that the public must be protected. But it degrades the public interest to assume that we protect it by forcing workers to work against their will for the profit of private employers. The public interest demands, above all, that we have a free America, and this third devious attempt to restore Government by injunction must be exposed because a free labor movement is a vital part of a free America."

As a final comment on this portion of the bill and the controversy surrounding it, I point to the fact that every nationally known expert in the field of labor relations who testified before the Senate committee condemned the Taft-Hartley emergency strike provisions and endorsed sections 301 and 302 as infinitely superior.

(5) United States Conciliation Service.—The bill restores the Conciliation Service to the Department of Labor. We believe that this is a sound step and in the public interest.

The removal of the Service from the Labor Department under the Taft-Hartley Act did not result from any demonstrated defects in the functioning of the Service in the Department of Labor. On the contrary, the Conciliation Service was transferred as part of a systematic attempt to weaken the Labor Department and in direct violation of the Republican Party's pledges to build the Department and to strengthen it.

I do not wish to be construed as being critical in any way of the present Federal Mediation and Conciliation Director. As a matter of fact, I believe that he has rendered distinguished public service, and I hope that he will continue to render it as head of the Service within the Department of Labor.

I do not believe that the transfer to the Department should depend upon issues of personality.

Unparticularized claims have been made that employers lack confidence in a service housed in the Department of Labor. It is my considered judgment that these claims are completely without foundation and that under the present Secretary of Labor the Department will make an effective contribution to the public welfare as a part of the Department of Labor.

(6) Restrictive State laws.—The provision dealing with restrictive State laws is imperatively needed as a clarifying measure. Union security and the check-off are protected by the statute because they are devices which, when embodied in collective-bargaining agreements, limit or prevent strikes. It is unsound to provide for the protection of interstate commerce and at the same time to permit threats to such commerce to arise by virtue of the operation of local laws. It is equally unsound to extend bargaining rights to the right to bargain with respect to union security and the check-off but to make those rights turn upon the particular State in which the individuals subject to the agreement happen to reside. Why should a Tennessee or Virginia employer enjoy defenses to a refusal to bargain which are not available to an employer in New York or Pennsylvania? And why should an employer in interstate commerce who complies in good faith with the Federal law and negotiates a union-security contract be held guilty of an unfair labor practice under State law when he discharges an employee under such a contract simply because a vote among the employees was not taken under the State law before the contract was negotiated? See Algoma Plywood & Veneer Co. v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Board, U. S. Supreme Court, decided March 17, 1949.

The absurd result of the provisions of section 14 (b) yielding to more restrictive State laws in connection with union security has been demonstrated by our experience. In such a case as the Giant Food Stores case (22 L. R. R. M. 1070) the Labor Board was forced to disregard a single bargaining unit and to hold union authorization elections only in those States covered by the bargaining unit which did not outlaw union security.

Under the conditions created by modern industry, collective bargaining is not a matter permitting a diversity of treatment according to local conditions. Uniformity in bargaining terms produces a stability which is essential to effective collective bargaining. Section 107 wisely prevents a balkanization of the bargaining process. Congress has expressly stated in the Wagner Act that the promotion of collective bargaining and of self-organization is a Federal concern and the Supreme Court, in refusing to permit local terms to vary the meaning of the Wagner Act, has pointed out in construing another section of the act, in N. L. R. B. v. Hearst Publications (64 S. Ct. 851, 857):

"Both the terms and the purposes of the statute, as well as the legislative history, show that Congress had in mind no such patchwork plan for securing freedom of employees' organizations and of collective bargaining. The Wagner Act is Federal legislation, administered by a national agency, intended to solve a national problem on a national scale. (Cf., e. g., S. Rept. No. 573, 74th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 2–4.)"

Section 14 (b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, which is discussed in part II, had the effect of delegating to State legislatures the power to destroy federally created rights and thus to impair the public interest. It had the further effect of actually encouraging the States to impose restrictive local conditions upon the bargaining relationship. This provision should make it clear that with respect to the important matter of union security and check-off the integrity of the Federal standard is to be preserved.

There is a further problem in connection with restrictive State laws which needs clarification. I suggest that under the heading, Freedom from Restrictive (not restricted as it presently appears) State Laws, there be added a new section 108 in place of the notice provision which is now entitled section 108. This new section should make it clear that other basic rights in addition to union security are to be made immune from State interference.

Specifically, it is proposed that a new section 108 be written into the bill as follows:

SEC. 108. Section 13 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 is amended to read as follows: "Nothing in this act, except as specifically provided for herein, shall be construed so as to interfere with, impede, or diminish in any way the right to strike or the exercise of the other rights guaranteed by section 7 of this act. Nor shall any provision in any State law interefere with or impede or diminish in any way the right of employeers of employers engaged in commerce or whose activities affect commerce to strike or the exercise of the other rights guaranteed in section 7 of this act."

It will be noted that this amendment adds to section 13 of the Wagner Act the phrase "except as specifically provided for herein." The purpose of this amendment is to conform section 13 to the qualifications on the right to strike which are contained in the new bill.

In addition, this amendment makes it clear that it is not only the right to strike which the act protects but the other rights to engage in concerted activities which are guaranteed by section 7.

As the section is presently written it might suggest that the right to strike occupies a position superior to the other rights, such as the right to self-organization, which are guaranteed by section 7. This clarification, which is obviously consistent with the intention of Congress, has been made necessary because of the cloud cast upon the integrity of these other rights by the recent decision of the Supreme Court in UAW-AFL v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Board, decided February 28, 1949. The first sentence of the proposed amendment standing alone might serve to establish the fact that not only are all of these rights protected by the act but that they are immune from interference or diminution as a result of the operation of State laws. However, in order to remove all doubts that it is intended to accomplish both these results, the second sentence in the amendment relating to State laws has been added. Thus this provision should serve to prevent the application to employees of employers in interstate commerce of State laws requiring strike votes, for example, or notices as a condition to the right to strike. It should also serve to make it clear that State laws requiring notification of a State agency or an employer as a condiion of the right to strike are inapplicable to interstate situations. In addition, this amendment will prevent further qualification by the States of the right to strike or to engage in other concerted activities with reference to employees in interstate commerce, to an extent greater than these rights are qualified by the bill. It need hardly be added that the proposed amendment will not invalidate State laws in this field; it will merely confine their application to employees engaged in intrastate commerce.

It is important to make the paramountcy of the Federal law in this field absolutely clear. This has been done in connection with the closed shop by section 107 of the bill. The failure at this time to take parallel action with respect to the right to strike and related rights will only serve as an argument by employers that all of the myriad restrictions on the right to strike in the States were intended to be left standing. This construction will achieve added weight because of the decision of the Supreme Court in UAW-AFL v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Board, supra, shortly before the bill was reported out. Unless the clarifying amendment suggested above is adopted there is a very grave danger that the right to strike even in industries affecting commerce may be seriously qualified and even destroyed by State legislation.

(7) Restrictions on political contributions.—Nothing more clearly demonstrates the partisan political character of the Taft-Hartley Act than its provision outlawing political expenditures by labor organizations. Although unrelated to any labor relations issue, it was inserted in the act by its sponsors in an effort to escape the political consequences which such a restrictive measure might produce. It was logical for the sponsors of the Taft-Hartley Act to seek to deprive labor of the power to make effective political choice in order to elect those who opposed the act and to defeat those who favored it.

The outlawing of political expenditures by labor organizations was another expression of that falsely conceived mutuality which was used throughout the Taft-Hartley Act for the purpose of repressing labor. The prohibition completely disregards the civil and political rights of American workers. It is a blot on our statute books and should be eliminated.

The theory upon which labor organizations have been barred from political contributions and expenditures in connection with elections is that labor organizations must be treated like corporations.

However, it is obvious that there is a sharp difference between the corporations and labor organizations. Anyone familiar with the manner in which our Corrupt Practices Act has been enforced knows very well that it is perfectly simple for powerful stockholders and corporations to subsidize political campaigns and to obtain decisive political influence. Contrast the power of members of the Du Pont family, for example, with the power of individual trade-unionists and it becomes obvious that the ban upon the political activity of labor organizations has the effect of promoting a fundamental inequality. The records of the 1944 presidential campaign and the recent presidential campaign show enormous contributions by American upper-income families. The denial to members of labor organizations of the right collectively to direct their political strength against the overwhelming political strength of antilabor groups is not only to strip the workers of this country of the right of freedom of speech, press, and assembly, but to disfigure the democratic framework of our society and to place one group in permanent political bondage.

Labor organizations are part of a wholesome process through which the base of our political life is being broadened. The Taft-Hartley Act and the political ban contained in the Smith-Connally Act sought improperly to interfere with this process. They should be repealed in the interests of political democracy.

(8) Bar to certain proceedings.—Section 105 of the bill seeks to make it clear that all proceedings under the Taft-Hartley Act do not survive the new legislation unless such proceedings would be valid under the Wagner Act. The CIO believes that such a provision is sound and necessary.

However, I should call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Taft-Hartley proceedings are defined as proceedings "under the National Labor Relations Act, as amended by the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947." The correct name for the entire Taft-Hartley Act is, of course, the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947. As section 105 is presently worded, it would merely bar proceedings under that portion of the Taft-Hartley Act title I which amends the National Labor Relations Act. Thus it would not bar proceedings under title III arising out of damage suits against labor organizations or prosecutions for violation of the ban on political expenditures. I believe that the bar of section 105 should apply as well to this title of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Section 105 creates a bar to proceedings under the Taft-Hartley Act in any court of the United States. But the Taft-Hartley Act also sought to create a right of action in any court, including State courts, having jurisdiction of the parties.

To correct these errors, it is proposed that section 105 be redrafted to read as follows:

Notwithstanding the provisions of the act of February 25, 1871 (16 Stat. 432), neither the Board nor any court of the United States nor any other court having jurisdiction of the parties shall have jurisdiction to entertain, process, make, impose, or enforce any petition, complaint, order, liability, or punishment under the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, with respect to any act or omission occurring prior to the date of enactment of this act, unless such petition, complaint, order, liability, or punishment could be entertained, processed, made, imposed, or enforced under the National Labor Relations Act with respect to a like act or omission occurring after the date of enactment of said act. [The remainder of section as it presently appears.]

At this point, it should also be noted that the exemption of the Railway Labor Act in section 405 inadvertently fails to include title I of the Taft-Hartley Act.

I am convinced that this bill is sound and just legislation in the field of labor relations.

In a democratic system labor-relations legislation ideally serves the purpose of setting up with a minimum of Government interference the ground rules which serve as a basis for free collective bargaining. Those who seek to transform labor-relations legislation into something more than that, into a means of hampering, handicapping, or oppressing one or the other of the parties to the relationship, really do not believe in freedom or in the freeman's society.

I believe that this law takes labor relations out of the area of partisan politics and restores them to the parties.

This bill is consistent with the recognition which is at the base of democratic labor relations, namely, that in order to protect the rights of the individual we must protect the rights of the group. In every period of crisis in labor-relations crusaders for individual rights have used this slogan to destroy unions. Long ago we learned the lesson that unless we protect unions we leave the individual helpless economically and politically.

We must recognize that the right of free association is a basic right, a right protected by our Constitution as well as by moral law.

PART II.—THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT AND OUR EXPERIENCE UNDER IT

We present below a series of discussions of particular provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act and the ways in which these provisions have operated. We have singled out only certain of the provisions concerning which experience is available

It is important to bear in mind that none of the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act may be considered in isolation, divorced from the other provisions. To give one example, the provision relating to decertification elections is objectonable for the reasons given in this analysis. But this provision must be considered together with the provision limiting elections to 12 months' periods, since where a decertification succeeds in unseating a representative union as a result of employer pressure no second election may be held for a period of 12 months.

In the same way, all of the election provisions which, directly or indirectly, give the employer access to the Board's election machinery must be considered in conjunction with the so-called "employer free speech" provisions which have been consistently used to permit employers to terrorize employees and to override their preference. Similarly, the provisions denying striking employees the right to vote in elections must be viewed in conjunction with the provisions giving employees access to the Board's election machinery, the free-speech provision, the provision outlawing a strike against a certified bargaining agent, the provision for mandatory injunctions against such strikes, and the provision creating a right of action in Federal and State courts on behalf of anyone injured by such a strike. And the provisions relating to injunctions and union unfair labor practices are integrally related to the agency provisions under which unions, both the local and the international, may be held answerable even for the acts of members whose conduct has been repudiated.

A. UNION SECURITY

The Taft-Hartley Act all but destroys union security. It achieves this result (1) by barring the closed shop and other forms of preferential hiring outright, (2) by permitting only an extremely limited form of union security, and (3) by not permitting even this weakened type of union security to be effectively implemented. Union security is rendered meaningless by confining it only to discharges for failure to pay dues. The effect of this provision has been to deny unions the power to procure the discharge of spies, contract breakers, stool pigeons, and other individuals whose activities may be injurious to the interests of both the employer and the union.

But still other obstacles are imposed upon union security. First, the union and its officers are required to comply with the filing requirements of the act and, second, the union has to win an authorization election of a majority not of those voting as in the conventional election but a majority of those eligible to vote.

Finally, even after a union wins such an election the right to negotiate the so-called union security agreement is subject to a deauthorization election. It was obviously the hope of those who devised this complicated structure that even limited union security would be wiped out by the Taft-Hartley Act. What has been the result of this section?

The record shows that the authorization election provision has resulted in overwhelming approval of union security. Statistics supplied by the Labor Board show that authorization elections have been won by unions in 98.2 percent of the cases and that 84 percent of the eligible voters voted in favor of union security. During the year in which these elections have been conducted, 3,457,532 employees voted. The cost to the Government has been approximately 40 cents a vote. The union authorization election has obviously not served its hoped-for purpose of preventing union security. On the contrary many employers complain that it has promoted union security on the ground that it is difficult to resist a demand for it after the employees have voted for it.

Apart from the fact that it has cost the Government a great deal of money to discover that the employees want union security other serious objections are presented to this provision of the law. In the first place, it has imposed upon the Board an unbelievable backlog. The Board has estimated that during the fiscal year 1948–49 it will be called upon to hold no less than 30,000 union authorization elections. This means not merely a hopeless administrative log-jam but in addition the creation of a situation in which the Board is powerless to process with reasonable degree of speed other types of cases, such as ordinary representation election and unfair labor practice cases.

A second objection to the union authorization provision is the fact that it has broken down completely in areas where employment is intermittent, such as the building trades.

Even the joint committee has recommended the elimination of this provision.

But the problem presented by the Taft-Hartley provision on union security is not confined to the authorization elections. The elimination of closed shop and the restrictions upon the use of union-security clauses must be abolished if we are to have sound labor relations. It would be pointless to burden the committee with a detailed justification of the closed shop. As long as there has been collective bargaining in America there have ben closed or union-security contracts. Prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act approximately 10,000,000 American workers enjoyed the benefits of union-security contracts in the steel industry, the clothing industry, fur, rubber, printing, maritime, electrical manufacturing, textile, and many other industries. The closed or union shop has contributed to industrial peace.

A study by Father Jerome L. Toner, formerly of Catholic University, draws the following instructive conclusions with respect to the benefits of closed-shop contracts:

"(1) Labor relations are considerably smoother as a result of the closed shop.

"(2) Trade-unions have demonstrated genuine responsibility under closed-shop contracts, and have contributed substantially to the improvement of production.

"(3) The closed shop will probably be the rule rather than the exception within the next decade."

Our labor history shows that employers who genuinely desire to deal with unions in a harmonious fashion have favored the closed shop and other forms of union security and that opposition to the closed shop is a mask which usually conceals a basic objective of destroying unionism. This identity between antiunionism and opposition to the closed shop is fully borne out by the records of the La Follette-Thomas committee, as well as the records of the National Labor Relations Board. The same antilabor employers who now claim to oppose the closed shop in principle did not hesitate to sign closed-shop contracts with company unions in order to prevent bona fide unionism. As Father Toner's study, referred to earlier, points out: "Many of those employers who use the closed shop to frustrate genuine labor organization frown on it when they are asked to incorporate it into the standard union contract."

It is significant that a number of employer witnesses admitted on cross-examination before the Senate committee that they opposed the closed shop because it increased costs. In short, the opposition to the closed shop is based not on principle but on the fear that it may strengthen the bargaining power of unions.

It is also significant that certain employer witnesses, appearing before the Senate committee representing industries in which historically labor unions have served as employment agencies, conceded that the Taft-Hartley Act's ban on the closed shop had produced chaos by impeding a vitally needed supply of skilled labor and jeopardizing long-established apprenticeship programs. One witness representing employers in the construction industry was frank enough to admit that he preferred the administration bill to the Taft-Hartley Act if for no other reason than that it sanctioned the closed shop.

I have already referred to the fact that six so-called emergency strikes occurred since the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act. In at least three of those strikes a major cause was the desire for union security. In addition the principal cause of the strike in the printing industry resulted from the ban on union security contained in the Taft-Hartley Act.

The Congress of Industrial Organizations is convinced that all of the limitations on union security contained in the law are unwise and unsound and that these curbs upon union security threaten industrial peace and long established stable relationships. The existing statutory limitation upon the scope of union security agreements preventing discharge for any reason other than the nonpayment of dues have made a mockery of the union security agreement and have left unions helpless to resort to union-security agreements as a means of policing violations of a labor agreement.

One of the inexplicable contradictions of the Taft-Hartley Act is its insistence upon union "responsibility" for contract violation, whether authorized or not, and at the same time its refusal to permit unions to use union security agreements for purposes of enforcing conformity with contracts.

As the members of this committee well know, an irony of the operation of this provision of the law is that it has produced disputes between unions and employers in situations where both have agreed upon the merits of union security. In many cases where strikes have not occurred union security clauses have been bootlegged so as to evade the provisions of the law.

It is not sufficient, however, in restoring the effectiveness of union security as an aid to industrial peace merely to restore the Wagner Act. The effect of the Taft-Hartley Act has been not only to weaken, if not destroy, effective union security but actually to encourage the States to pass and apply even more restrictive laws. This was achieved through section 14 (b) of the law which permits the application of more restrictive State laws prohibiting union security altogether.

In reenacting the Wagner Act it is important therefore that we make it clear that the Federal protection of union security may not be defeated by State laws. Under the present operation of the Taft-Hartley Act, collective bargaining in the field of union security has become a roulette wheel where an individual's rights turn not upon his agreement or the statute but rather upon the laws of the particular State where he happens to be living. Is there any reason why an employee of the United States Steel Corp. in Tennessee should be denied union security protection while an employee under the same agreement in Pennsylvania should enjoy that protection?

We have learned through years of bitter experience that uniformity is essential in fashioning a sound system of labor relations. The Supreme Court has recognized, in Bethlehem Steel Co. v. New York State Labor Relations Board (330 U. S. 767), and La Crosse Telephone Corporation v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Board, et al., decided January 17, 1949, that the Federal labor law is and must be supreme in any case which is within the Federal power.

This committee must by specific enactment make it clear, both with respect to union security and with respect to the related problem of the check-off, that conflicting State laws are superseded as to all cases under the Wagner Act. This does not, of course, mean that State laws are not applicable to purely intrastate enterprises. It does mean that in this field where uniformity is so vital Congress will not tolerate attempts to undermine Federal laws. Recognition of the primacy of the Federal law in this field is vital to avoid the chaos and confusion which inevitably results from a multiplicity of standards. In the Taft-Hartley Act the Congress deliberately abandoned its functions and delegated them to reactionary State legislatures to further carve up union security. This unfortunate abdication of Federal authority must be corrected. The congressional power to protect union security rests in the last analysis upon its power to protect interstate commerce from disturbances. But the threat of such an interruption of commerce remains when a State law refuses to permit an employer to bargain with respect to union security or to incorporate it into an agreement. It simply makes no sense for Congress to assert its readiness to protect union security under the commerce power and then to permit that protection to be wiped out by prohibitory State laws.

B. COERCION BY UNIONS AND BY EMPLOYERS; FREE SPEECH

(1) Union coercion.—Section 8 (b) (1) (A) of the act makes it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents to restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them under the act. This section of the act became law in the face of repeated warnings by labor experts who had opposed similar "equalizing" amendments in the past on the ground that this provision would be used as a dragnet device to destroy or hamper the exercise of labor's legitimate rights.

Still valid today is the statement in the report of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor in 1935 of reasons for confining the bill to unfair labor practices of employers:

"One suggestion in regard to this bill has been advanced so frequently that the committee deems it advisable to set forth its reason for rejecting it. This proposal is that employees and labor organizations, as well as employers, should be prohibited from interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in their organizational activities or their choice of representatives.

"The argument most frequently made for this proposal is the abstract one that it is necessary in order to provide fair and equal treatment of employers and employees. The bill prohibits employers from interfering with the right of employees to organize. The corresponding right of employers is that they should be free to organize without interference on the part of employees; no showing has been made that this right of employers to organize needs Federal protection as against employees. Regulation of the activities of employees and labor organizations in regard to the organization of employees is no more germane to the purposes of this bill than would be regulation of activities of employers and employer associations in connection with the organization of employers in trade associations.

"This erroneously conceived mutuality argument is that since employers are to be prohibited from interfering with the organization of workers, employees and labor organizations should also be prohibited from engaging in such activities. To say that employees and labor organizations should be no more active than employers in the organization of employees is untenable; this would defeat the very objects of the bill.

"There is an even more important reason why there should be no insertion in the bill of any provision against coercion of employees by employees or labor organizations. Courts have held a great variety of activities to constitute 'coersion': a threat to strike, a refusal to work on material of nonunion manufacture, circularization of banners and publications, picketing, even peaceful persuasion. In some courts closed-shop agreements or strikes for such agreements are condemned as 'coersive.' Thus to prohibit employees from 'coercing' their own side would not merely outlaw the undesirable activities which the word connotes to the layman, but would raise in Federal law the ghosts of many much-criticized injunctions issued by courts of equity against activities of labor organizations, ghosts which it was supposed Congress had laid low in the Norris-LaGuardia Act.

"Nor can the committee sanction the suggestion that the bill should prohibit fraud or violence by employees or labor unions. The bill is not a mere police court measure. The remedies against such acts in the State and Federal courts and by the invocation of the local police authorities are now adequate, as arrests and labor injunctions in industrial disputes throughout the country will attest. The Norris-LaGuardia Act does not deny to employers relief in the Federal courts against fraud, violence, or threats of violence. (See 29 U. S. C., sec. 104 (e) and (i))." (S. Rept. No. 573, p. 16, 74th Cong., 1st sess.)

Before the act was passed the text of this section on union coercion and restraint was amended to limit its scope and a legislative history was made for the purpose of stressing the claimed narrow nature of the section. Thus, a provision in the section placing a prohibition on union "interference" was deleted. In addition, an express provision was written in the section stating that the section should not be construed to impair the right of a labor organization to prescribe its own rules with respect to the acquisition or retention of membership therein. In addition, it was pointed out that the so-called free-speech provision of the act, section 8 (c), immunizing expression of views under any provisions of the act providing such expression contained no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit, would serve further to protect legitimate concerted activities by unions.

Despite all this, the worst fears of the opponents of the section have been realized even during the short period in which the act has been in effect. In cases of so-called union coercion on the picket line, the act has been used in situations in which, if misconduct did in fact occur, obviously appropriate forums would be the local courts and law-enforcement agencies. This provision has had the effect which was freely predicted by labor of imposing upon unions not merely a double liability but a triple liability. The same course of conduct which would give rise to local police action is now being used to ground State court injunction and Federal cease-and-desist orders. Moreover, in proceeding against these so-called union unfair labor practices new standards of liability are being improvised by the Board's agents which are reminiscent of those resorted to during the most antilabor period in our history.

The processes of the act are being used to police charges of episodic and dubious union misconduct on the picket line. The flavor of the kind of conduct to which coercion charges address themselves may be obtained from this comment of the trial examiner in the Sunset Line & Twine case (No. 20–CB–1):

"Having created a situation wherein human emotions might reasonably be expected to escape ordinary decorum and restraint, the company may not then stand aside in innocence, aloof and without responsibility for conduct of individuals among the crowd. The general counsel points to the presence there of two or three union officials. There is no evidence, however, that they were there before the police had arrived. Furthermore, Gouvea, the company superintendent, admitted that he also was there, moving freely about among the milling crowd. Under the circumstances, the examiner is of the opinion that the respondent unions may not be held to be accountable for the behavior of persons in this situation, which clearly was not of their making. Furthermore, not only subordinate officers but the heads of the city and county law-enforcement bodies were also on the ground. They witnessed the events. Yet, so far as the evidence shows, no individual was formally charged, haled into court, or found guilty of any misconduct. In effect, the general counsel urges the examiner to recommend that the Board seek from a circuit court of appeals an order requiring a local and an international union to 'cease and desist' from engaging in acts which, although witnessed by them, the State, county, and city police apparently considered of so little significance as to warrant not even police-court action.

"In Milk Wagon Drivers v. Meadowmoor Dairies, Inc. (61 Sup. Ct. 552), Mr. Justice Frankfurter said: '* * * the right of free speech cannot be denied by drawing from a trivial rough incident or a moment of animal exuberance the conclusion that otherwise peaceful picketing has the taint of force.'

"The examiner concludes and finds that the preponderance of evidence fails to sustain the allegations of the complaint relating to October 15: (1) as to 'mass picketing' and (2) as to conduct constituting restraint and coercion.

"4. Conclusions in general

"In summary, the strike at the company's plant has not taken place in a setting of violence No person has been physically or bodily injured while comnig to or leaving the plant premises. The few threats uttered have been both episodic and isolated; none is shown to have been an integral part of a conduct pattern designed to coerce employees. The attendant circumstances have not been such 'that fear of physical harm rather than persuasion is the force loosed upon the persons sought to be influenced.'"

The Board in part reversed the trial examiner's recommendations in the above case. Certain incidents which the trial examiner properly termed "petty annoyances" were found by the Board to be union coercion and restraint and elevated by the Board to the level of a Federal offense. The trial examiner rules in this case that the strike was caused solely by the employer's misconduct and that immediately after the Taft-Hartley Act was passed the employer arbitrarily terminated a 7-year period of peaceful labor relations and precipitated the strike. The Board did not dispute the factual bases of his ruling but merely held them to be irrelevant.

In Matter of Perry Norvell Company (case No. 9–CB–3) the trial examiner in dismissing charges of restraint and coercion against the union stated:

"2. ACTUAL RESTRAINT OR COERCION NOT ESTABLISHED

"The altercations described above which attended the reopening of the plant are well within that class of events characterized by the Board and the courts in numerous cases in the past as 'minor clashes on the picket line,' and have generally been found insufficient to justify the discharge of striking employees participating in them. There are no grounds for applying a more rigorous test where, instead of seeking relief, a labor organization is affirmatively charged with restraint and coercion. The incidents revealed by the record were relatively isolated, with reference to the length of the strike and the number of strikers involved. There was no mass picketing. There was no single instance where [an] employee seeking to enter the plant was prevented from doing so. There was no assault more serious than a push with shoulder or elbow, and no threat of violence which was taken seriously. On the whole, it would be difficult to find an instance of a strike as peacefully conducted under circumstances as provocative of violence. The clashes in question took place only after the discharge of the members of the committee for no other reason than their peaceful, though allegedly 'illegal,' leadership of the strike, and their attempt, and the attempt of the committee of lasters, to discuss the grievance of one of their members with their employer—a right guaranteed them by the act.

"The undersigned concludes and finds that there was no actual restraint or coercion exercised by the respondents herein, or their agents."

The Board upheld the basic finding of the trial examiner in the above case but insisted that several of the acts which he characterized as "minor clashes on the picket line" were condemned by the Taft-Hartley Act (23 L. R. R. M. 1045).

We cannot overstress the fact that a proper appreciation of the evils involved in the enlargement by the office of the general counsel of the concept of coercion as written into the act must include an awareness that the very issuance of the complaint and the holding of a hearing during a strike constitutes a sharp interference by the Federal Government in a labor dispute. Employer sponsors of charges of coercion against unions are not interested in obtaining punishment of particular individuals for illegal misconduct. They are far more interested in bringing to bear the force and power of a Federal official—namely, the general counsel—for strikebreaking purposes. They know that in such a forum a far lower standard of proof is required than in an ordinary criminal or equity case, and that the general counsel will be satisfied with dragnet theories of agency as a basis for imputing liability to the union.

An illustration of the manner in which this new technique operates is the Perry Norvell Shoe case. In that case, the employer filed a charge on August 27, 1947, alleging a jurisdictional strike, a breach of contract, and other claimed violations of the Taft-Hartley Act. Thereafter, on October 6, 1947, upon consultation with the general counsel's office, the employer filed an amended charge claiming a violation of the union coercion and restraint provisions of the act. On October 8, 1947, this charge gave rise to a complaint issued by the general counsel's office. We ask the committee to note the unusual speed.

On October 21, 1947, a hearing was held. However, on October 20, 1947, the company fired all the union leaders in the plant and notified its striking employees that—

"A complaint has been issued by the Board charging the union with certain unfair labor relations practices. The Labor Relations Board issued this complaint yesterday and made a thorough investigation into the facts by its own investigators.

"We feel that you should know this and that the United States Government has intervened into the matter. We intend to reopen the factory at 7 a. m. in the morning of Thursday, October 23, 1947.

"Your failure to appear on the day and hour set for the reopening the plant will indicate that you no longer want your job and you will be replaced."

Thus, immediately before the hearing the employer had already cleared the decks because, after all, had not the United States Government "intervened in the matter"?

Completing the pattern, the employer obtained an injunction from a State court on November 19, 1947, curtailing the picketing of his plant.

On December 12, 1947, the trial examiner issued an intermediate report dismissing the entire complaint. The trial examiner found, contrary to the contentions of the company and the general counsel, that the strike did not violate the contract, that there was no union misconduct on the picket line as contended by the general counsel, and that "on the whole it will be difficult to find an instance of a strike as peacefully conducted under circumstances as provocative of violence." Finally, the trial examiner ruled that the general counsel's theory of union responsibility was unsound and improper.

Thus, an improperly issued complaint successfully broke a strike.

In his efforts to transform section 8 (b) (1) (A) of the act into a catch-all for the purpose of restraining all manner of conduct of which he disapproves and which is not specifically made illegal, the general counsel has encountered certain difficulties because of the existence of the free-speech provisions of the section and the proviso preserving the right of the union freely to conduct its own internal affairs. However, these limiting provisions of the act have not deterred the general counsel in his attempt to expand the antiunion provisions of the law. Thus, in Matter of Watson Specialties Stores (Case No. 10–CC–1), a so-called secondary boycott case, the employees involved also picketed the establishment of the primary employer in an effort to persuade his employees to join the union. The general counsel, however, insisted that such picketing is "economic coercion" to "force" the employer's employees to join the union and that the free-speech protections of the law do not apply to this situation. The trial examiner, however, rejected this contention, which had in part served as the basis for a complaint and a petition for an injunction, on the ground that it was protected both by the Constitution and by the act.

In the Perry Norvell Shoe case, a union engaged in a strike which was not prohibited by any provision in the law. The general counsel first argued that the act was violated because of the conduct of the striking employees. He then argued that the strike was in violation of a collective-bargaining agreement—a contention which was rejected by the trial examiner—and that therefore the nonstriking employees were coerced in the exercise of their right not to strike. In short, the general counsel urged a theory which implied that any strike is "coercive" of the rights of nonstrikers. In rejecting this contention, the trial examiner stated:

"* * * the ultimate logic of the theory advanced by the general counsel would seem to be that all strikes are outlawed by the act, whether there is a collective-bargaining agreement or not; for by the terms of section 7 of the act, employees have a right to refrain from, as well as to engage in, the concerted activities enumerated therein. A peaceful organizational strike, where there is no collective contract, may operate just as effectively to violate the right of nonstriking employees to refrain from these concerted activities, and to interfere with their relations with their employer, as an equally peaceful strike during the term of a collective-bargaining agreement. If the latter constitutes restraint or coercion, so does the former, with the result that all strikes become unlawful under the general counsel's construction of section 8 (b) (1) (A), despite Senator Taft's statement that no strikes are outlawed thereby."

In his brief to the Board, the general counsel insisted that the strike was an "illegal" strike despite the fact that it was not condemned by any specific provision in the statute and despite the fact that the legislative history indicates that it was not intended to proscribe the type of strike involved. The general counsel maintained, however, that limitations on the right to strike are not confined to those strikes specifically banned by the statute but "Congress intended that the Board place such restrictions upon the right to strike as it deemed necessary to effectuate the policies of the act."

The Perry Norvell case illustrates an attempted enlargement of the coercion provision of the act on the basis of a theory that a strike by a union "coerces" nonmembers of the striking union.

In his attempt to bring peaceful picketing under Federal ban the general counsel has also developed the theory that peaceful picketing by workers of a striking union coerces members of other unions who refuse to cross picket lines. In Matter of Sealright (Case No. 21–CC–13), certain warehousemen, members of the ILWU–CIO, refused to handle paper which originated in a struck plant and which had been transported to a dock picketed by striking AFL paper workers. The general counsel first sought to obtain a cease and desist order against the picketing upon the ground that it was not protected by the free-speech provisions of the act and that even though peaceful it was nevertheless coercive. He urged, moreover, that the warehousemen refused to handle the struck goods out of fear of the pickets although there was not the slightest indication in the record that the words, actions, or conduct of the pickets were calculated to create fear. As the trial examiner pointed out in dismissing the complaint, the general counsel assumed contrary to fact that the employees desired to work in the presence of the pickets. The general counsel insisted that the employees who refused to work upon the struck goods did so out of fear and not out of conscience, despite the fact that the employees testified that they would not cross a picket line and that their contract with their employers protected them in the right not to pass the pickets.

It is noteworthy that in the Sealright case, despite the ultimate rejection of the general counsel's theories by the trial examiner, the Office of the General Counsel nevertheless succeeded in obtaining an injunction from the Federal district court before the issuance of the complaint.

The same attempt to expand the coercion sections of the act may be found in Matter of Klassen & Hodgson, Inc. (case No. 17–CC–1). In that case, a trial examiner found that truck drivers refused to cross a peaceful picket line maintained around the establishment of a secondary employer. The truck driver's union was not involved in any way in the dispute. The trial examiner nevertheless held that because a power of discipline exists in the truck driver's union to punish crossing a picket line, the picketing, even by members of another union, constitutes a threat of reprisal which is outside of the protection of the free-speech provisions of the statute. The trial examiner disposed of the fact that the truck drivers' union was not a respondent in the case by pointing out that it was a member of a building trades council which was a respondent in the case. The trial examiner stated:

"These employees were members of a union—the truck drivers—affiliated with the trades council. As to these persons, then, the picket line contained an implicit threat of discipline from their own union, and constituted inducement and encouragement of employees contrary to the statute. The absence of any overtly stated threat does not make the conduct noncoercive. A power of discipline existed in the union to punish the offense. In the absence of assurances to the employees to the contrary, it must be inferred that the power would be exercised.

"So far as the issue of responsibility is concerned, the respondents and the truck drivers' union, acting along with others and through the building trades council, engaged in a joint enterprise to force Klassen to cease doing business with Wadsworth. It was a foreseeable consequence of this action, if it was not indeed its purpose, that employees affiliated with the acting unions would decline to cross the picket line because of a reasonable fear of reprisal from their own union. Such a consequence did occur. There was thus prohibited inducement and encouragement attributable to the respondents. That the respondents had no power of reprisal over persons not members of their union is immaterial here. They are responsible for the foreseeable acts of their partner—the truck drivers' union—in the furtherance of the joint enterprise. Had the two not acted in concert, and had the acts of the truck drivers' union been its own independent conduct, the result would, of course, be different."

The significant aspect of this case is not merely the tortured reasoning by means of which peaceful picketing was clothed with a coercive character, but the development of a theory of "coercion" by a union of its own members because of the possibility that it may invoke its internal rules and regulations.

This decision makes completely meaningless the proviso in section 8 (b) (1) (A) preserving the right of a labor organization to prescribe its own rules.

In Matter of Ryan Construction Co. (case No. 35–CC–7), the general counsel sponsored a complaint on the theory that a picket line is per se coercive and obtained an injunction because other union members refused to cross the picket line. Evans v. United Electrical Workers (S. D. Ind.) 22 L. R. R. M. 2459).

The full flowering of the theory of intraunion coercion is contained in the Intermediate Report of Trial Examiner Ringer in the Graphic Arts case (No. 5–CB–1). In that case the trial examiner found that the ITU "coerced" its own members by conveying to them through their local union the union's internal rules with respect to its collective-bargaining program. The implications of this theory that a labor organization coerces its own members when it insists upon a democratically adopted bargaining program go to the very essence of group action and to the very heart of the trade-union movement.

When the cases on intraunion coercion are considered together with the cases dealing with the responsibility of the union for the acts of its agents we see the creation of a weird dilemma. The broad principles of union responsibility which the act provides for plus the denial in the act of union-security protection make imperative the adoption of effective union controls if the union is to avoid the imputation of liability for the acts of its members. But when the union proceeds to take steps to preserve itself from destruction, then such steps are deemed to be coercive. Indeed, one court, in Styles v. Local 760 (E. D. Tenn.) 22 L. R. R. M. 2447), has found "coercion" under the Taft-Hartley Act in being a "member of a modern strongly disciplined union."

The theory of the trial examiner in the Graphic Arts case and the theory of the office of the General Counsel in other cases involving alleged union coercion of its own members, appears to be that a union is a hastily improvised aggregation of individuals held together by illegal pressures which await only the "liberating" touch of a Board agent. In its ultimate posture the theory that a union coerces its own members when it promulgates legitimate and time-honored union rules relating to such matters as crossing picket lines or working upon struck work is a profound insult to the group loyalty, good sense and unity of American working men and women. It rests upon the ridiculous assumption that unions are held together by fear and intimidation and that union members never act toward a common objective through democratically arrived at means but rather are forced to do so by a threat of reprisal.

In the enlargement of the coercion provisions one final development of Board doctrine curtailing the free speech protections of section 8 (c) is significant. This development made its appearance in Matter of Montgomery Fair Co. (case No. 15–CC–5). In that case a trial examiner held that peaceful picketing of their employer's premises by members of an AFL union who refused to work with nonunion members for an antilabor contractor was not protected by either the Constitution or the act. The trial examiner achieved this result by insisting that the picketing was in support of a strike which itself was illegal and that it was not separable from the strike. This ruling was made despite the fact that practically all the employees who had been engaged in the strike had obtained employment elsewhere and that the only remaining pressure upon the employer was a statement of fact on the picket signs. This decision nullifies the rights of unions and their members to exercise a basic right which the Supreme Court has said is essential to constitutional protection.

The full impact of the enlargement by the Board and the Office of the General Counsel of theories of coercion cannot be properly appreciated without the awareness that in many of the cases discussed above injunctions completely halting the complained of activity were promptly obtained by the Board. This injunctive relief was obtained in Sealright, in Klassen & Hodgson, in Ryan Construction, in Atlantic & Pacific, in Montgomery Fair, and in ITU.

The coercion provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act go far beyond creating the basis for cease-and-desist orders against unions. They provide a perfect framework, as I have repeatedly pointed out, for the creation of a strikebreaking technique.

Finally, so-called coercion through mass picket lines is held to justify the discharge of participants in such activity by way of a strained analogy to the Fanstel case dealing with the sit-down strike. Thus, in Matter of International Nickel Co. (22 L. R. R. M. 1006), in Matter of Dearborn Glass Co. (22 L. R. R. M. 1284), and Matter of Socony Vacuum Oil (22 L. R. R. M. 1321), the Board justified discharges of union members and leaders, on the basis of such theories.

In short, the union coercion section of the act also undermines the weak protections against discrimination which exist in the act. The full flowering of this technique may be seen in the oil workers' strike in California in which the employers, alerted to their "rights" under the Taft-Hartley Act, have insisted upon wholesale discharges for alleged picket line misconduct.

(2) Employer free speech.—It does not tell the whole story to say that unions are being enveloped in a dragnet theory of coercion and that their right freely to picket is being subjected to a phenomenal injunctive and administrative erosion. For, during the very period when this development has occurred the Board, in processing those cases against employers which have their roots in Wagner Act complaints, has displayed a contrastingly tender regard for the rights of employers to freedom of speech and action. The Board does not find it difficult, as did the trial examiner in the Montgomery Fair case, to separate illegal conduct by employers from supporting speeches. Whenever an employer commits an unfair labor practice the Board refuses to permit his misconduct to deprive him of the free-speech privilege with respect to subsequent speeches even though the unfair labor practices are grounded in the same antiunion campaign. Without any evidence of coercion whatsoever the trial examiners of the Board and the general counsel have urged that a possible fear of union discipline is enough to ground a charge of coercion against a respondent union with respect to its own members. This eagerness to attribute to a relationship an actual or potential coercive thrust is in marked contrast to the Board's complete disregard of the enormously coervice implications in the employer-employee relationship.

From decisions of the Board and the trial examiners in connection with coercion and free speech by employers and unions there is emerging a dream world—a world of fantasy—in which the employees are continually victimized not by their employers who possess the power of discharge but by their unions. This strange double standard is illustrated by such cases as Matter of Wrought Iron Range Co. (case No. 14–C–1197), in which the Board reversed the trial examiner and found a blatant course of antiunion letters and notices to be privileged under the statute. Included in the employer's conduct on the eve of a representation election was a representation that the company was their "bargaining agent"; a warning to the employees that election results will "bear directly on your welfare and the welfare of those dependent upon you"; that "the company means to win this election"; that a defeat of the union will be "a vote of confidence in the company." The Board even found that the distribution by foremen of letters urging employees to consider "their own future welfare" and enclosing sample ballots marked as "'No' votes against the union" was within the protective scope of section 8 (c) of the act. In short, the Board has permitted the free-speech provisions of the act to be expanded to the point where the most open interference in an election which, after all, is the primary concern of his employees is outside the scope of the act.

It is important to point out to the committee precisely what is involved in this issue of employer free speech over which so many false claims have been made. In the first place, no labor organization has ever denied that employers are entitled to freedom of speech. This is a right that is, of course, guaranteed to all under the first amendment, but freedom to speak does not include the right to intimidate, to coerce, to dominate employees through verbal acts. We should bear in mind that employers have consistently used the shield of free speech as a device for interfering in employee self-organization.

Most typically, free speech has been used by employers to interfere in elections. One would assume that the question of what bargaining agency the employees should select should remain primarily a matter for the employees to determine. If labor organizations insisted upon the right to participate in the selection of a management representative such claims would hardly be received with sympathy. Yet employers insist that the right to free speech furnishes a justification not merely for interfering in employee elections but even for using speech as a coercive device. Under the Wagner Act the Board did not deny to employers the right to present views even in connection with representation matters. At times, the Board's tolerance extended to a dangerous point for, in many of the cases in which the Board refused to set aside elections, employers had actively intervened in the elections in order to influence the outcome.

The Board's rules under the Wagner Act were relatively simple:

(1) While employers were permitted freedom of speech in connection with elections they were not permitted to use their economic power or physical facilities for the purpose of compelling employees to listen to their propaganda.

(2) In evaluating whether speech had reached the level of an unfair labor practice the Board necessarily considered relevant the totality of the employer's conduct, whether he had in a context relevant to the speech engaged in conduct which gave the speech a sharper thrust than was communicated by its literal words.

(3) The Board recognized in certain cases that speech could effectively and improperly destroy the opportunity of free elections even if it failed to constitute an unfair labor practice.

The Taft-Hartley Act has, in my opinion, in an overwhelming number of instances frustrated the effectiveness of Labor Board elections in providing the employee with an opportunity for a free choice of bargaining agent. This has been accomplished through rulings under the act which permit the employer to take complete liberty in the way of propaganda and coercion. The Board has wiped out the captive audience doctrine and immunized employer speech even when employees are compelled to listen to it. It disregards the totality of the employer's conduct and permits the employer in an election virtually the same unlimited scope, with the sole exception of one case, Matter of General Shoe Corporation (21 L. R. R. M. 1337), which it allows him in an unfair labor practice situation.

In the General Shoe case referred to above the employer immediately prior to an election sent a series of letters to the employees assuring them that they would not lose their jobs by failing to join the union, pointing out that three pay increases had previously been given the employees and that the existing organizations in the plant were for the employees' benefit.

Subsequently, the employer issued leaflets, placed full-page advertisements in the town newspapers, issued a mimeographed letter and, on the day before the election, the president of the company read a prepared speech 24 or more times to small groups of employees who were brought before him in the plant by the foremen during working hours. In addition the foremen conducted personal interviews with the employees in the plant and at the employees' homes. The literature which the company circulated ridiculed the union. It urged that the employees vote against it because "(1) unions mean strikes and employees and the company lose money; (2) unions make workers dissatisfied, and unhappy workers do not make good shoemakers; (3) unions penalize the better employees by not recognizing merit; (4) unions cost money contributed by workers to promote jobs and potential power for union leaders, and (5) unions set employees and management at war with each other and are thus bad for both. * * *"

The employees were subjected to a barrage of further management propaganda which accused the union of causing trouble and predicted that it would not provide jobs for the men. The company also issued a three-page pamphlet, with one page containing a sample ballot with a sentence in large type, "A vote of 'no' is a vote of confidence in the company." The prepared speech of the company president included the following reference to the union organizer:

"Incidentally, this man Burke of St. Louis is not really named Burke, but Berg, a Jewish man from Brooklyn, N. Y. The union formed here in Pulaski would be under his jurisdiction."

After this diatribe the union was defeated in the election. The Labor Board rejected a finding by the trial examiner that the conduct involved a violation of the act and found instead that it was protected by the free-speech provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. The Board could not help finding, however, that even though the conduct did not constitute an unfair labor practice the election should nevertheless be set aside. Two Board members dissented from this finding on the ground that the employer's conduct was protected by free speech. This case is now under heavy attack both by employers and by the joint committee.

If this employer did not effectively coerce his employees in this case then language has no meaning. Not so long ago, in I. A. M. v. N. L. R. B. (311 U. S. 72, 78) the Supreme Court taught us that even "slight suggestions as to the employer's choice between unions may have telling effect among men who know the consequences of incurring the employer's strong displeasure."

What was involved here was no slight suggestion but a systematic campaign to undermine the employees' will and to corrupt their independence. Yet the Taft-Hartley Act requires that employers be permitted in this fashion to take over an election with immunity from unfair labor practice charges.

A case which illustrates the operation in election situations of the employer free-speech doctrine is Matter of Babcock & Wilcox (22 L. R. R. M. 1057). In this case the employees were required to listen to speeches on four separate occasions just before the Board conducted a collective-bargaining election. On each of the four occasions employees on the first and second shifts were called to a particular section of the plant during working hours. On each of these occasions the superintendent of the plant delivered a prepared speech, obviously calculated to intimidate the employees. The Board nevertheless held that this speech, which the trial examiner described as antiunion, was protected by the free-speech provisions of the act. In short, the Board has held that the employer has a right to speak even under circumstances in which he compels his employees to listen and that the employees have been deprived by the Taft-Hartley Act of the right not to listen.

In Matter of Mallinckrodt Chemical Works (22 L. R. R. M. 1514), the plant manager and the personnel director called the employees in, one at a time, and delivered to each employee a carefully prepared statement attacking the union. There can be no question that this statement was intended to and did coerce the employees into rejecting the union in a Board election. The Board held, however, that the statement was protected by the free-speech provisions of the the Taft-Hartley Act, despite the fact that the interviews were conducted under the most coercive circumstances. This case destroyed the underlying doctrine of the General Shoe case and leaves employees utterly defenseless in election situations.

In Matter of Mylan Sparta Co. (22 L. R. R. M. 1317), the company in connection with an election pointed out that "we have the right for good business reasons to close * * * entirely or in part, at any time." Here was a threat clearly understood by the employees to be a threat to close the plant if the election favored the union.

Yet the Board likewise placed its blessing on this electioneering.

In Matter of Hinde and Dauch Paper Co. (22 L. R. R. M. 1229), the employer assembled his employees and made a speech containing the following statements:

"Your job and your relationship with us is involved."

"Our relations with this union are bad."

Supervisors in the plant made the following statements:

"Join the A. F. of L. or a company union."

"Be sure to vote on the right side of the paper."

In addition, the employer threatened to close down his plant. Yet the Board found that the act protected the employer in this conduct.

In Matter of Fontaine Converting Works (22 L. R. R. M. 1149), the employer supported a company union and discharged union members. The Board found that statements to union men that they "would be sorry" for bringing the union into the plant, and compelling employees to listen to a speech in the plant attacking the union were not coercive even in the light of the employer's unfair labor practices.

In Matter of Atlantic Stages (22 L. R. R. M. 1242), the employer discriminated against a large number of union members. The Board found that even in this context his questioning of employees as to whether or not they were union members was not coercive.

These are only a very few of the cases in which the Board has given its blessing to deliberate invasions by employers of the right to freedom of organization and of the right to a free choice of bargaining agents. As a result of the Board's decisions dealing with the so-called free-speech problem prior to elections there has now emerged a full-dress employer technique for exposing employees on the eve of an election to a variety of coercive harangues with complete impunity under the statute. The employer's right of free speech has all but devoured the employees' right of free choice.

In the questionnaires which have been submitted to CIO unions, which I have referred to already in my remarks, there is a remarkable uniformity of reaction in connection with this problem of employer free speech. The union responses make it clear that unless something is done immediately elections will be virtually valueless as an expression of free choice. The free-speech provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act and their interpretations by the Board have made a shambles of sound principles for the conduct of industrial relations.

The experience of unions as respondents under the act serves as more than a significant contrast to the Board's treatment of employers. What is involved here is more than the fact that unions are being treated—in complete disregard of industrial reality—as the oppressors of the employees, both union members, and nonmembers, to be curbed by administrative order and injunction. Fundamentally, the double standard which the cases on coercion spell out means that the right to join a union and to engage in concerted activities has fallen victim to the right not to join a union and not to engage in such activities, that the right to organize is rapidly being supplanted as an object of Federal solicitude and protection by a "yellow dog" principle under which employer attacks on the fundamental rights to form labor organizations and engage in concerted activities are endowed with Federal sanctions.

C. THE REVIVAL OF GOVERNMENT BY INJUNCTION

The Taft-Hartley Act contains provisions for three types of injunctions. Under section 10 (j) the Board has discretionary power upon the issuance of a complaint to apply for temporary relief or a restraining order. This relief may be sought both against employers and against labor organizations, although up until the present it has been used almost exclusively against labor organizations.

Under section 10 (l) of the act the Board is required, where reasonable cause exists to believe that a charge is true and that a complaint should issue, to petition a Federal court for injunctive relief. See Douds v. Teamsters Local (75 F. Supp. 414). This provision is directed exclusively against unions and implements the unfair labor practice provisions dealing with secondary boycott and related matters.

There is a third type of statutory injunction. This is the injunction provided for in section 206 of the act, the so-called "national emergency" injunction. This is the provision of the law which authorizes the Attorney General to obtain an injunction to forestall a strike endangering the public health or safety. This provision is discussed in another section of this testimony.

In connection with all of these sections, jurisdiction is conferred upon the Federal court either in the district in which the labor organization maintains its principal officers or in any district in which its duly authorized officers or agents are engaged in promoting the interests of employee members.

In its applications for injunctions, both under section 10 (j) and section 10 (l) of the act, the Board through its general counsel has refused to permit the labor organizations involved to defend themselves and insisted that the only factual question is whether, in the case of section 10 (l), the Board's agent has reasonable cause to believe that the charge is true and that a complaint should issue and, in the case of section 10 (j), it is probable that the charges and complaint are supportable. In other words, not only has the doctrine of government-by-injunction been revived but it has been revived in such a form as to be as oppressive as possible in its impact upon unions.

We say "impact upon unions" advisedly for the injunctive provisions of the law have been invoked almost exclusively against unions. The Board's figures show that from August 22, 1947, until the present, the Board petitioned for injunctions in 43 cases. In all of these cases but two the injunctions were sought against unions. The injunctions obtained under this section have been addressed primarily to halting concerted activities for the maintenance of working standards.

The Board has petitioned for injunctions under its discretionary powers in 6 of these 43 cases and 4 of them have been against unions.

The general counsel of the Board, in his many speeches before employer groups throughout the country, almost invariably points out that it is not his intention to permit the discretionary injunctive provisions to be used except in the most unusual circumstances. Thus in a speech before the Indiana Personnel Association the general counsel stated:

"At this stage, however, I want to warn you that these discretionary injunctions are regarded in the office of the general counsel with the highest conceivable degree of respect. They represent one of the most powerful weapons existing under our system of government. It is our feeling that when Congress passed that authority to this agency, it intended that the power be used most sparingly and only in those cases where the principle involved was so glaring, or when the segment of the people involved was so large, that the acts sought to be enjoined could properly be regarded as endangering the public welfare in a substantial way. In short, it is not our idea that Congress ever intended this authority to be utilized in matters involving local disputes ordinarily to be handled in the regular course of the Board's proceedings. The Taft-Hartley Act is not a weapon placed in the hands of employers to abuse labor organizations. It is a medium for curtailing and restaining abuses of employers and employees and the public by labor organizations, and also, a medium for restraining abuses of employees and labor organizations by employers as well."

On another occasion he referred to the "emergency character" of these injunctive provisions. Yet the office of the general counsel has used these injunctive provisions in a most indiscriminate fashion. Thus, he sought an injunction in a local dispute involving some 40 members of the Meat Cutters' Union on the west coast. In another case, he sought and obtained a 10 (j) injunction in a dispute involving a trucker, Conway's Express, in up-State New York. And, as a part of comprehensive proceedings against the ITU, he sought an injunction against that union in a Federal court at Indianapolis. More recently he has sought an injunction to impose upon the mine workers the employers' theories of what constitutes collective bargaining within the meaning of the statute.

We assert that it is farcical for the office of the general counsel to insist upon the special circumstances under which injunctive relief may be afforded under section 10 (j) and then to proceed, as he has, to enjoin the ITU whose strike hardly involves that jeopardy to the safety and welfare of the public which the general counsel insists is the proper standard to be used in a 10 (j) situation.

In order to properly evaluate the viciousness of the injunction provisions the following considerations must be borne in mind:

(1) The office of the general counsel has exclusive control over the injunctive process. His decisions to take injunctive action are wholly unreviewable.

(2) It is the theory of the statute that injunctions are permitted only as a form of interim relief pending administrative disposition of the controversy. However, no one should be deceived into thinking that these injunctions endure for only a short period of time. The fact is that under the Board's injunctive provisions the controversy is settled on the employer's terms for a prolonged and indefinite period, long before the case is determined by the Board. This means that in every situation in which an employer can induce the general counsel to obtain an injunction he has, for all practical purposes, secured a legal short cut for the attainment of his ends. It would be a hardy union indeed which could resume a controversy with his employer after the long drawn-out process which might give rise to a Labor Board order in its favor. And bear in mind that the injunction is issued solely on the basis of probable cause. There is no consideration of the merits. The judge merely decides whether there is a reasonable ground for an administrative prejudgment with respect to the controversy.

The length of time during which an injunction may bind a labor organization and its members is illustrated by the case of Klassen & Hodgson. In that case an 8 (b) (4) complaint was issued and a petition for a 10 (l) injunction was filed. The injunction was granted by the Kansas City District Court on January 8, 1948. Subsequent to the entry of the injunctive order the Board's trial examiner sustained some of the charges but recommended dismissal of others. The circuit court of appeals nevertheless, on November 2, 1948, affirmed the injunctive order in its entirety (23 L. R. R. M. 2040).

But the appeals court recognized the injustice of the delay in the following terms:

"It is manifest that in making its injunction effective until the Board entered its final adjudication, the court acted in the belief that the Board would make its final adjudication with reasonable dispatch. Not only 2 months but approximately 10 months have passed, and the Board has not acted. If the court had understood or anticipated that such a delay would intervene, it might have withheld injunctive relief, or it might have conditioned its injunction differently.

"The judgment is affirmed and the cause is remanded with authority in the trial court to determine in the exercise of its sound judicial discretion whether in view of all the 10 existing facts, conditions, and circumstances the writ should be modified or terminated in advance of the final adjudication of the Board."

Thereafter, on February 24, 1949, the Board decided the case on its merits over a year after the injunction had been issued.

Under these circumstances it is completely misleading to contend that the injunction is merely a form of interim relief.

(3) While an injunction under the act remains outstanding long enough to destroy the exercise of vital rights, there is no effective means of appealing it. This is so because the injunction, by the terms of the statute, can remain outstanding only until there is administrative action. The administrative action usually is sufficiently delayed to cripple a labor organization but at the same time to cut off the right of an appeal to the Supreme Court.

(4) When an injunction is appealed to the circuit court of appeals, the standard of review which is applied by the court of appeals is far more restricted than in the case of an unfair labor practice involving an employer. The reviewing court will only inquire whether the decision of the district court to issue an injunction was "clearly erroneous."

(5) The injustice of the injunctive procedure is dramatically illustrated when we consider the relationship of the courts to the administrative process. In a number of cases, including the Klassen & Hodgson case previously referred to (see also Evans v. United Electrical Workers (22 L. R. R. M. 2459); Le Baron v. Printing Specialties (75 F. Supp. 678); Crancfield v. Bricklayers Union (78 F. Supp. 611)), a complaint against the union was dismissed in whole or in part by the trial examiner after an injunction had been issued. This has not induced the general counsel to seek to have the injunction dismissed or modified although it is the trial examiner who is charged with the interpretation of the statute. The fact that the union prevailed before the trial examiner in no way affects the injunction. In fact, in a case involving the International Typographical Union, the general counsel went into court to obtain an injunction to restrain acts which the trial examiner had already held not to be violative of the law. Indeed, the general counsel sought to hold the union in contempt on the basis of conduct declared to be legal by the trial examiner.

The converse is also true. The fact that the union prevailed before the court does not free it of the administrative proceeding. If a union should, in spite of the extreme narrowness of the issue, prevail in a court (see Styles v. Local 74 (21 L. R. R. M. 2010); Douds v. Metropolitan Federation (75 F. Supp. 672); Sperry v. Denver Building Council (21 L. R. R. M. 2572); Sperry v. Denver Building Council (21 L. R. R. M. 2712)) the administrative proceeding nevertheless continues. In other words, a union must win both before the court and before the Board if it is free to exercise its rights.

The above case is significant for another reason. The injunction was issued in that case to restrain activities by agricultural laborers on a huge mechanized farm whose employees were held not to be covered by the Taft-Hartley Act.

(7) It is obvious that the effect of 10 (j) and 10 (l) has been to lodge in anti-labor courts the right, power and jurisdiction to determine labor controversies. This vital question concerning the interpretation of the statute is decided in the first instance, and conclusively for all practical purposes, not by the administrative agency charged with the interpretation of the statute but by courts.

(8) When we consider the validity of the injunctive sanction we must remember that where 10 (l) injunctions are appropriate the statute also creates a right on the part of "whoever shall be injured" to sue labor organizations in Federal and State courts for engaging in the same conduct.

(9) In connection with the revival of the injunctive evil in circumstances where the Federal Government has been the petitioner, it is important to bring to the attention of the committee that the act has been responsible for widespread issuance of injunctions on both the State and the Federal level at the instance of private employers. We are aware that the legislative history of the act makes it clear that it was not the intention to give to private employers new grounds for obtaining injunctions, but the plain fact is that both directly and indirectly the Taft-Hartley Act has produced an ever-increasing number of injunctions obtained at the instance of private employers. See Futford v. Smith Cabinet Mfg. Co. ((Ind. App. Ct.) 16 L. W. 2465); Simons v. Retail Clerks Union, Local 77 (16 L. W. 251); Alabama Cartage Co. v. International Brotherhood of Teamsters ((Alabama Sup. Ct.), March 24, 1948); Scranton Broadcasters, Inc. v. A. C. A (November 7, 1947); Terminal Railroad Association v. I. A. M., (Ill. App. Ct.) January 26, 1948; J. Fred Schmidt Packing Co. v. Local 346 ((Court of Common Pleas, Franklin County, Ohio), December 17, 1947); Dixie Motor Coach v. Amalgamated ((D. C. Ark.), 21 L. R. R. M. 2193).

The injunctive provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act have been justified on the ground that "after all" it is only the Government and not the private employer who is permitted to obtain the injunction. As I have already indicated above, in many State courts injunctions have been issued on Taft-Hartley grounds at the instance of the employer. But more important is the fact that the injunctive evil is not alleviated but is intensified when the injunction is obtained at the instance of the Government.

The entire history of the injunctive evil shows that the intervention of the Government made of the injunction an even more oppressive weapon. The three leading injunction cases which led to the Norris-LaGuardia Act were all cases in which the Government sought the injunction. See In re Debs (158 U. S. 564); U. S. v. Frank J. Hayes et al. (D. Ind. November term, 1919) Equity 312, unreported); U. S. v. Railway Employees Department (283 Fed. 479 (N. D. Ill.)).

The movement to eliminate injunctions as a weapon in industrial conflict was not merely a movement to deprive private employers of that weapon. So to view it would be to ignore the entire character of the struggle against injunctions and would be to disregard some of the most bitter pages of our labor history.

(10) Finally, we cannot measure the extent of the injunctive evil merely by referring to the fact that 43 injunctions have been petitioned for. The Board's records show that over 300 charges of so-called secondary boycotts have been filed with the general counsel. In large numbers of these cases employers were compelled to halt or refrain from the complained of activities upon the threat that an injunction would issue.

The Taft-Hartley Act thus revives injunctions in their most oppressive form.

D. RESPONSIBILITY OF UNIONS AND OF EMPLOYERS UNDER THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

In considering the antilabor impact and scope of the Taft-Hartley Act we cannot confine ourselves merely to a consideration of the manner in which the antiunion sections of that law have been interpreted. It is important in addition to take under consideration parallel interpretations of the Taft-Hartley Act dealing with problems of agency and the responsibility of unions for alleged illegal acts.

This problem has an importance which goes beyond the problem of whether unions should be charged with responsibility for unfair labor practices which they have not committed. The Board resorts to the same theory of agency in seeking injunctions against unions as it invokes in its unfair labor practice proceedings. Thus on the basis of acts for which the union may not be fairly held responsible, the general counsel is enabled to obtain an injunction against the union itself. In other words, these expanded theories of agency can and do serve a strike-breaking purpose by permitting injunctions to be directed against the union itself.

Finally, it is important to bear in mind that the Board's theories of agency may well lay the basis for damage suits against the union under section 301 of the act.

Before the passage of the act unions were protected against indiscriminate imputation of liability by section 6 of the Norris-LaGuardia Act which prevented the imposition of liability except upon clear proof of actual participation in or actual authorization of the acts involved or after ratification of such acts where there was actual knowledge.

The need for the Norris-LaGuardia Act arose out of the practice of Federal courts to impose as a theory of responsibility in labor cases the "illegal purpose" doctrine which applied the law of conspiracy to strikes and other union activities—that is, the union and each of its members were held responsible or liable for each and every act of their associates on strike. See statement by Senator Walsh, 75 Congressional Record 4693; Frankfurter & Greene, The Labor Injunction, pages 61, 177–178.

The Senate report dealing with this provision of the Norris-LaGuardia Act (S. Rept. No. 163, 72d Cong., 1st sess., pp. 19, 20, 21) points out that "it has often occurred that employers themselves have secured the services of detectives, who, under the guise of labor men, have gained admission into labor unions. When this happens these detectives are usually doing everything within their power to incite employees who are on strike to commit acts of violence, and such detectives, contrary to the definite instructions of labor-union leaders, sometimes commit unlawful acts for the considered and only purpose of laying the foundation for injunctive process, for bringing discredit upon the union, and making its officers and members liable for damages."

The House report likewise points out (H. Rept. No. 669, 72d Cong., 1st sess., p. 9):

"This section speaks for itself and it is desirable because both individuals and associations have been held liable for unlawful acts of overzealous members which acts were never authorized nor ratified by the officer or association and were entirely without the scope of any authority permitted by the officer or association of the offending member."

Apart from the protections of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, it is accepted legal doctrine in this field that in order to hold a union liable for a wrongful act of a member acting on its behalf it must be shown that either the union authorized or ratified the wrongful act or the physical movements of the member were subject to the control of the union.

It was presumably the purpose of the agency provision of the Taft-Hartley Act to impose common-law rules of agency upon both employers and unions and to deprive unions of the important protections of the Norris-LaGuardia Act. We believe that this amendment of the act is unsound, unfair to unions, and unrealistic. (See Cox, Some Aspects of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, 51 Harv. Law Rev. 1, at 12–14.)

Even the limited experience up to this point with the Taft-Hartley Act demonstrates quite clearly that al of the old abuses in connection with union responsibility have been reintroduced into the law in a more dangerous form than ever before. It is accurate to say that the Taft-Hartley Act, as it has been construed, makes a labor organization responsible for the acts of its members under almost all circumstances. Thus, in the Mine Workers injunction case, decided April 19, 1948, Judge Goldsborough announced what he termed a novel principle of liability that "a union that is functioning must be held responsible for the mass action of its members." In short, under Judge Goldsborough's ruling all forms of concerted activities are attributable to the union whether authorized or not; whether repudiated by the union or not, and whether ratified by the union or not. The union becomes an insurer and must assume responsibility for every act which, in the opinion of the Federal judge, constitutes the "mass action of its members."

This doctrine is, however, not significantly broader than that adopted by the Board's general counsel and some of its trial examiners. In the Colonial Hardwood case (No. 5–CB–4), a trial examiner ruled that all pickets, whether union members or not, are agents of the union for purposes of imposing liability under the act. The trial examiner stated, "sanctioning of a strike by a labor organization's agent, with apparent though not actual authority to do so, also makes the participants in strike activities (such as picketing) the subagents of the labor organization in such activities. For, the actual or apparent sponsorship of a strike by a labor organization manifests an invitation to all the employees, whether union members or not, to engage in such activities supporting the strike as the labor organization establishes or directs through its actual or apparent agents. Participation by the employees in these activities constitutes an acceptance of the invitation with the result that, upon the normal consensual principles common to the law of agency and contract, they thereby become the subagents of the labor organization in the particular activities."

It was also ruled by the trial examiner that an international representative of the union through his actual or apparent authority can in his activities away from the picket line create "subagents" whose wrongful acts may bind the union.

It is quite apparent that these rulings completely revive the doctrine that a strike is a conspiracy which may furnish the basis for imputing liability regardless of authorization and ratification. Not all trial examiners have accepted the general counsel's dragnet theories of agency, theories which would impose practically absolute liability upon labor organizations and which would turn the clock back to the most repressive era in our labor history.

In the Sunset Line & Twine case, a trial examiner in dismissing the complaint thus analyzed and disposed of the general counsel's views with respect to union responsibility under the act:

"As to the responsibility of the respondent unions, counsel's stated position in summary is as follows: The unions must be held accountable, as principals, for the acts of their agents, and the term 'agents' shall be construed to include (1) officers of the local and of the international, and (2) pickets. As to his definition of 'pickets,' counsel admits that 'we will have to indulge in presumptions,' but asks that it cover (1) all persons carrying out functions normally associated with peaceful picketing, such as patrolling entrances to the plant regularly, carrying placards persuading employees and others not to enter the plant, 'or even * * * yelling "scab" at strike breakers'; (2) all striking employees of the plant in question when near plant property; and (3) fellow members of the union conducting the strike, even if not then or ever employees of the company involved, when near plant property at times when employees are entering or leaving the plant—unless 'the union * * * denies that such persons are their pickets.' Finally, counsel maintains, in effect, that the respondent unions must also be held accountable for the conduct of any persons who are on the street while picketing is in progress, if a union official is also present who (1) incites them to engage in activities directed against strike breakers, or (2) not having incited such persons, nevertheless takes no action to disavow responsibility for such conduct.

"It appears to the examiner that the general counsel, in urging the foregoing 'legal theory' is indulging in some presumptions which, if found valid, would not only negate section 13 of the act but also would reduce to shambles the long-established law of agency. What group of employees would have the temerity to strike, for any reason, if officers of their local and national unions might be held in contempt of a court decree because a threat was uttered or violence committed by anyone on a public street where pickets were peaceably pacing? And to insist, as counsel apparently does in this case, that the burden is upon the union to prove that it does not condone the acts of unidentified persons (who may be authorized pickets or agents provocateurs) is to do violence to a well-recognized principle of agency. Tiffany on Agency states: '* * * it is for the person who relies upon a ratification to show that all material facts were made known to the principal or else that the circumstances were such as to manifest an intention on his part to ratify at all events.' And in the Labor Injunction, by Frankfurter and Green: '* * * the plaintiff has the burden of proving that all individual defendants are liable on ordinary agency principles.'

"Under the circumstances of the case at hand, ascribing to the union knowledge of an act by an unidentified person in a crowd of 300 not of its own convening, on a public street, merely because a union official happened to be present somewhere in the throng, and therefrom to infer union ratification of the conduct, in the absence of immediate disavowal, is to stretch with Procrustean torture a short inference to fit a long theory.

"It would appear that the general counsel is reasoning in reverse from the 'omnibus' injunction issued in the Debs case, in 1895, where 'all other persons whomsoever' were enjoined, and is endeavoring to attribute to certain local and national labor organizations the acts of 'all other persons whomsoever.'"

The general counsel's theory of responsibility which was rejected by the trial examiner was very hospitably received by a majority of the Board. A majority of the Board found that the international union involved in the case was responsible for claimed acts of coercion and restraint committed by various individuals during the strike. 22 L. R. R. M. 1001. Little more appears in the record as a basis for holding the international responsible except the fact of affiliation with the local involved in the dispute. However, the Board improvised a new theory of responsibility. It held that the international was responsible not on the basis of proof but on the basis of the pleadings and on the basis of the fact that the regional director of the international was present at a picketing demonstration where violence was said to have occurred and did nothing about it. There was no proof that the representative participated in the claimed violence or that he in any way guided the activities of the strikers. The Board held the international union responsible for all of the acts committed by officers, pickets, strikers, and others, "although the record does not show the precise character of the relationship between the respondents," because of the "critical fact that the international was a cosponsor of the strike in the course of which the lawless acts were committed."

This case represents a complete revival of the doctrine under which labor organizations were held responsible for the conduct of individuals who in no way were authorized to represent the unions.

In the Perry Norvell case, one trial examiner tersely put it, in commenting upon the general counsel's theories of union responsibility, "counsel's theory as stated here amounts to the concept of a strike as a conspiracy, a concept which has long been obsolete."

In its consideration of the Perry Norvell case the Board found a labor organization liable on the basis of the acts of its members without any evidence of authority or ratification. Even the common-law rules of agency were not met and the Board indicated there, as in the Sunset Line & Twine case, that having found (on the basis of no evidence at all) certain individuals to be agents of a labor organization it was prepared to hold the organization responsible for the acts of those "agents" even though the labor organization may have expressly forbidden them (22 L. R. R. M. 1061).

In the two decisions in which the Board has dealt with the problems of agency and responsibility it has made the following clear:

(a) That it is prepared to find agency on the basis of mere membership in a union.

(b) That is is prepared to impute to the union responsibility for all acts of the agent even for those which the union has forbidden, and

(c) That it is prepared to conclude from little more than the fact of affiliation not only that the local union is responsible for the acts of the "agent" but even that the international union is responsible.

It is obvious that under the standards of agency adopted under the act there is virtually no way in which a union in a shifting and complex strike situation can protect itself from the imputation of liability for completely unauthorized acts. The door is once more completely open for the company spy and provocateur to expose a union to liability for unauthorized acts.

It is also important to bring to the committee's attention the fact that not only has the act produced outrageous conceptions of union liability but that the problem of establishing liability has involved extensive and unnecessary litigation. We think that an agency of the Federal Government charged with an important task of preserving industrial peace should have more important things to do with its time and money than to conduct a trial to determine whether a union representative is responsible for some episode which can be far more profitably investigated by the local authorities.

In connection with the issue of responsibility, as in other sections of the act, we find a significant one-sidedness. Before the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act the Board had carefully evolved rules to determine employer responsibility. These rules rest not upon common-law rules of agency but upon industrial relations. The Board recognized that under modern conditions of industry the very status of a supervisor is such as to convey management wishes to the men. The Supreme Court upheld the Board's theories of employer responsibility for the acts of supervision in many cases.

The Taft-Hartley Act, just as it expanded union responsibility, has curtailed employer responsibility so as to make it easy for him to violate the rights of his employees. Under the act as it is now written the responsibility of the employer for the acts of the supervisor—as that term is defined in the act—depends upon technical questions of agency and not upon industrial realities. It was pointed out when the Taft-Hartley Act was passed that this section wipes out 12 years of administrative and judicial interpretation and creates a device for destroying unions through the evasion of employer responsibility.

The operation of the Taft-Hartley Act with reference to employer responsibility is seen in such a case as Matter of Larsen Co. (22 L. R. R. M. 1210), where the Board reversed a trial examiner's ruling that an employer was responsible for the conduct of a field agent and a foreman. The Board concluded "under the circumstances we do not find that the conduct of either of these employees was, merely by reason of his status, attributable to the respondent nor, upon the basis of the entire record, are we persuaded that the respondent authorized or ratified the above-described conduct of Klint and Williams. Accordingly we are unable to agree with the trial examiner that the record warrants a finding that the respondent engaged in surveillance of a union meeting and thereby violated the act."

Contrast this with the ease with which the Board and trial examiners find that even employees are agents of labor organizations.

A second means which the Board has opened to employers to escape responsibility but has apparently denied unions is the disavowal of the conduct involved. The Board has indicated on the issue of union responsibility that where an "agent" acts within the area of his authority disavowal does not exculpate the union. However, contrast this with such a case as the Kinsman Transit case (22 L. R. R. M. 1165), where the chief engineer on a vessel, 10 days before an election was held, addressed the employees and told his audience that one of the two contending labor organizations involved was the better organization, could get more wages and a more favorable contract, that the company had less trouble with it and that the men might lost their jobs if they voted for another organization. In addition, several employees were questioned by this official before the election as to how they intended to vote. The union against which this campaign was directed pointed out that such conduct on a vessel by a superior officer is far more coercive in effect than when engaged in by an ordinary foreman or supervisor. But, because the employer had sent a formal letter of disavowal, the Board refused to set aside the election. This decision is particularly striking in view of one further circumstance, namely, that 4 hours prior to the election an outstanding adherent of the union which was opposed by the employer was discharged. Another instance of the technique of the strategic disavowal is Matter of Cutter Laboratories (23 L. R. R. M. 1445). In this case, on the morning of a decertification election, there was distributed to the employees in the plant through the regular company mail system a letter urging a "No" vote. The record shows that a supervisor participated in the distribution of the letters. The employer posted a notice on the bulletin board 15 or 20 minutes before the balloting began disavowing the supervisor's conduct. Even though it was obvious that many of the employees might not have seen the notice the Board refused to set aside the election.

The expansion of concepts of union responsibility and the contraction of employer responsibility are aspects of the statute which were injected into the law with the conviction that it would make many of the provisions even more coercive than they appeared to be. It was to sections of this type that Congressman Hartley had reference when he said that "there is more in this law than meets the eyes."

E. SECONDARY BOYCOTT

The elaborate and sweeping prohibitions on secondary boycott and sympathy strikes contained within the act share with the sections on union security the characteristic that they turn the clock back to a much earlier era in American labor history and they seek to outlaw rights and protections which have been long established. Prior to the passage of the Clayton Act in 1914, the antitrust laws were used to impose injunctive and criminal penalties upon boycotts.

A national protest led to the enactment in 1914 of the Clayton Act which declared that "labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. It is the purpose of this declaration to prohibit the application of antitrust laws to secondary boycott."

The courts, however, persisted in issuing injunctions against secondary boycott. Liberal judges, such as Justices Brandeis and Holmes dissented in Supreme Court cases on the ground that these activities were legitimate and should be protected. What Justice Brandeis pointed out in 1921 is even truer today:

"When centralization in the control of business brought its corresponding centralization of workingmen, new facts had to be appraised. A single employer might * * * threaten the standing of the whole organization and the standards of its members; and when he did so, the union in order to protect itself, would naturally refuse to work on its products wherever found."

In the Bedford Cut Stone case Justices Brandeis and Holmes held: "Members of the Journeymen Stone Cutters' Association could not work anywhere on stone which had been cut at the quarries by 'men working in opposition' to it, without aiding and abetting the enemy. Observance by each member of the provision of their constitution which forbids such action was essential to his own self-protection. It was demanded of each by loyalty to the organization and his fellows. If, on the undisputed facts of this case, refusal to work can be enjoined, Congress created by the Sherman law and the Clayton Act an instrument for imposing restraints upon labor which reminds one of involuntary servitude."

In the Duplex Printing Press case they pointed out: "May not all with a common interest join in refusing to expend their labor upon articles whose very production constitutes an attack upon their standard of living and the institution which they are convinced supports it * * *. Courts, with better appreciation of the facts of industry, recognized the unity of interest throughout the union, and that, in refusing to work on materials which threatened it, the union was only refusing to aid in destroying itself * * *. It is lawful for all members of a union by whomever employed to refuse to handle materials whose production weakens the union."

In 1932 the Norris-LaGuardia Act was passed which outlawed the use of injunctions in labor disputes and which made it clear that such disputes were protected against injunctions "regardless of whether disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee." It was a specific purpose of the Norris-LaGuardia Act to protect secondary boycotts against interference by the courts and to give effect to the views of Brandeis and Holmes.

The Supreme Court has, in case after case, recognized that it is legitimate and necessary for labor organizations to cooperate in order to eliminate threats to their wage standards arising anywhere within an industry.

In the Apex case the Court declared: "An elimination of price competition based on differences in labor standards is the objective of any national labor organization." In the Thornhill case the Court stated: "The health of the present generation and of those as yet unborn may depend on these matters and the practices in a single factory may have economic repercussions upon a whole region." And in the Swing case, the entire Court agreed that "Interdependence of economic interests of all engaged in the same industry has become a commonplace."

As President Truman made clear in his message of 1947:

"Not all secondary boycotts are unjustified. We must judge them on the basis of their objectives. For example, boycotts intended to protect wage rates and working conditions should be distinguished from those in furtherance of jurisdictional disputes. The structure of industry sometimes requires unions, as a matter of self-preservation, to extend the conflict beyond a particular employer. There should be no blanket prohibition against boycotts. The appropriate goal is legislation which prohibits secondary boycotts in pursuance of unjustifiable objectives, but does not impair the union's right to preserve its own existence and the gains made in genuine collective bargaining."

The Taft-Hartley Act provision dealing with boycott and illegal strike outlaws every conceivable type of sympathetic strike or boycott. Even where it is obvious that employees have real common interests to protect the act outlaws common action and it outlaws such action even against employers who are cooperating in strikebreaking.

Under the provisions of the law employees are required to work against their will and to subsidize with their labor the attempts of other employers to break down the standards in their industry. Even in the situation in which the secondary employer is organized by the same union which is on strike against the primary employer the union members in the second plant are compelled to act as strikebreakers under this law against a strike conducted by their own union. One of the really incredible ways in which this law operates is to direct its sanctions against workers maintaining a picket line in a plant against which they are striking when such picket line is respected by the employees of another employer. If the Labor Board can establish that a purpose, however remote, of the picket line was to turn away employees of other employers the act applies. See, for example, Matter of Klassen and Hodgson, Case No. 17–CC–1.

In Matter of Ryan Construction Company, Case No. 35–CC–7, a union was charged with unfair labor practices under section 8 (b) (4) (A) of the act because the employees of a contractor (Ryan) refused to cross a picket line which had been set up by the respondent union in a strike against the Bucyrus-Erie Co. The office of the general counsel maintained that the respondents violated the boycott provisions of the act because they induced the contractor's employees to "concertedly refuse to perform services for Ryan, in order to compel Ryan to cease doing business with Bucyrus" and obtained an injunction on this theory of the law.

The pretext for the Taft-Hartley boycott provisions was the claimed need to protect employers against internunion quarrels and jurisdictional disputes. However, almost every one of the boycott cases which has been reported involves concerted activity against nonunion employers and for the protection of living standards.

The scope of the secondary boycott provisions of the act is unrivaled by even the most restrictive State laws. To outlaw, as this statute does, a union's refusal to process struck work or to let its members work with nonunion men or its publication that a particular job is unfair betrays a fundamental contempt for the rights of working men and women and a complete disregard of the realities of industrial life. These broad provisions of the law are implemented by a requirement of mandatory injunctions which are obtained at the instance of the general counsel and by a section (sec. 303), making the offending labor organization liable in damages at the instance of "whoever shall be injured in his business or property."

The provisions here discussed are strikebreaking provisions of unprecedented savagery. They require the Government to obtain an injunction immediately forcing the employees to abandon strikes or picketing and subjecting the union to action in Federal court by anyone who might even be slightly discommoded by the prohibited acts. The Taft-Hartley Act was a colossal mistake. But, in the provisions dealing with secondary boycotts and related matters even the sponsors of the Taft-Hartley Act overreached themselves.

The evils of this portion of the law are dramatically illuminated by the recent decision of the Board in the Klassen and Hodgson case, No. 17-CC-1.

This case involves a so-called secondary boycott. In this case a building contractor cooperated with a manufacturer of prefabricated houses who refused to recognize and deal with the carpenters' union. The carpenters picketed the contractor who had entered into relations with the unfair employer. It also placed the contractor's name on an "unfair" or "we do not patronize" list. In addition, as a result of its activities, a union carpenter left the employment of the contractor.

The Board reversed the major findings of the trial examiner and held, first, that the activity involved is an unfair labor practice within the meaning of the act, and, second, that peaceful picketing and the circulation of "we do not patronize" lists is not protected by the free-speech provisions of the act, and, finally, that even though a single employee left the employment of the contractor nevertheless the union would be held responsible for inducing "concerted" action.

This case illustrates in a shocking fashion the evils of the Taft-Hartley Act. In this case even before a complaint issued pursuant to the requirements of the Taft-Hartley Act, the general counsel's office obtained an injunction restraining the activities which the Board has held to be an unfair labor practice. This injunction, which is exclusively directed against unions and which is mandatory under the act, has been in effect for over a year.

This decision and the injunction which was issued in anticipation of it, accomplishes the following results:

(1) It announces that under the Taft-Hartley Act an employer who cooperates with another to degrade established conditions of employment and thus threatens the working conditions of an entire area is completely immune under the Taft-Hartley Act. Under this decision workers in the building trades are forced to serve an unfair employer even when it means the destruction of their own standards achieved only after years of bitter struggle.

(2) This decision means that even a product boycott is outlawed by the act. In this case what was involved was a refusal by workers to handle a product which had been fabricated under unfair conditions. Here the act shelters not a so-called neutral party to a dispute but one who processes the product of an unfair employer with the inevitable result of destroying a wage scale.

(3) The Board's decision substantially curtails the right of peaceful picketing. Although it has long been established that the right of peaceful picketing is protected by the right of free speech contained in the Constitution, the Board has announced in this decision that picketing, even when it is peaceful, is not protected as free speech. The Board's decision completely destroys a protection which is indispensable to workers to present their side in an industrial dispute. Contrast this denial to workers of the right of free speech with the act's and the Board's extraordinary tenderness for the free speech of employers. The employers have used the act as a means for making a shambles of free industrial elections. Despite the most outrageous forms of interventions by employers at elections, the Board almost invariably holds their conduct to be protected by free speech. Yet it now announces that unions and their members may not hope for the same treatment.

(4) Under this decision and under the Taft-Hartley Act, which it interprets, even a request in writing by a union urging others not to patronize an unfair employer is not protected as a form of free speech. It is not merely that picketing is outlawed as a form of speech but other means of communication as well, traditionally sheltered by the free-speech protections, are now barred.

This decision makes it clear that the infamous illegal-purpose doctrine is revived under the Taft-Hartley Act. Under this doctrine conduct, no matter how peaceful, may be enjoined and outlawed by the simple device of a statutory or judicial pronouncement that while the activity itself may be harmless it nevertheless must be condemned because of its claimed purpose.

(5) Even in the days when some forms of boycott were outlawed, it was nevertheless consistently held that if in addition to a boycotting purpose a union sought as well to organize the employer against whom the secondary boycott was directed, such activity could not be enjoined. In this case the employees also sought to organize the contractor handling the unfair product. However, the Board held that the act requires that the conduct be enjoined. In short, this decision makes clear that the act is far more antilabor than any previous formulation of the law.

(6) The decision holds that even an effort to induce a single employee to leave an establishment is illegal as a form of concerted activity. The Board reaches this conclusion because it insists that the total purpose of the union was to induce concerted action. The Board's strange willingness to stretch in this fashion the scope of the act even where it means the denial to unions of basic rights, again contrasts with its tenderness toward employers and its refusal under similar circumstances to consider employer conduct in the light of total purpose.

(7) Finally, this decision involves the application of Federal power to a local construction enterprise. Here, too, we see an instance of the short-sighted and one-sided application of the Taft-Hartley Act. This act was sponsored by those who professed to be great believers in States' rights. States' rights arguments, however, are used only to defeat social-welfare legislation, such as health insurance, but never to prevent the Federal invasion of basic rights of workers no matter how local or intrastate in character the industry involved. It is only when a union seeks an election that the Board suddenly discovers that because of the local character of the industry "it would not effectuate the policies of the act" to entertain the petition.

This decision gives new life to all of those cases which constitute rejected symbols of an antilabor era. I refer to cases such as Duplex v. Deering, the Bedford Cut Stone case, and Gompers v. Buck Stove & Range. It does more than that, however. It also invalidates basic decisions in connection with the right to picket which a more enlightened Supreme Court has in recent years enunciated. I refer to such cases as Wohl v. Bakery Drivers, and Thornhill v. Alabama. The Board's decision makes it clear that the threats of the Taft-Hartley Act to labor's rights are profound and basic.

F. THE FILING REQUIREMENTS

The CIO is convinced that the filing requirements and in particular the requirements of section 9 (h) dealing with affidavits relating to political beliefs of union leaders are unconstitutional.

Section 9 (h) directs the Board to withhold from a noncomplying union the remedies otherwise available to it under the act for the prevention and redress of unfair labor practices by employers. As to noncomplying unions, employers are once more free to use the repressive practices by which they broke unions and prevented unionization in the days before the Wagner Act was passed. And there can be no question that employers have resorted to these practices on a widespread scale.

Literally, section 9 (h) only prohibits the Board from acting upon charges filed by noncomplying unions, leaving it free to consider charges by individual members of such unions. However, even the Wagner Act gave the Board complete discretion, not subject to judicial review, as to whether to act on charges. By a Taft-Hartley amendment (sec. 3 (d)), that discretion was transferred from the Board to the general counsel, whose dismissal of charges is now not reviewable even by the Board.

It is the general counsel's normal practice to entertain charges filed by individuals alleging discrimination, and presumably coercion and restraint, but not those alleging company unionism or refusal to bargain. However, even as to charges of the former types, the general counsel, sometimes, if the complainant's union is not in compliance, arbitrarily refuses to issue a complaint. In such cases the ground assigned for dismissal is that the members were acting for the union, although it is the individual who is the primary victim of an unfair labor practice of this type. (See e. g., Matter of Times Square Store Corp. (79 N. L. R. B. No. 50)).

Moreover, only the union can complain of an employer's refusal to bargain with it. Noncomplying unions which have for years been the certified bargaining representatives in particular plants, are thus now deprived of all legal remedy against the employers' refusal to bargain with them. This effect of section 9 (h) is strikingly illustrated by the cases of United Steelworkers of America, CIO v. N. L. R. B. (No. 431), certiorari granted; and United Steelworkers of America v. N. L. R. B., now pending decision in the court of appeals for the first circuit. In each of those cases the union had for some years been the certified-bargaining representative in the particular plant involved; the employer refused to bargain about certain subjects; the union filed a charge with the Board; and, after a hearing, the trial examiner issued a report recommending that the employer be ordered to bargain with the union on the issues in question. Each case stood in this posture when the Taft-Hartley Act was passed, and in each case the Board then conditioned its order upon compliance by the union with the new section 9 (h).

Employers are not forbidden to recognize or bargain with noncomplying unions; but, if the employer refuses, the union has no legal remedy under the act. The result is that the employer, and not the Government, decides whether the sanction of nonrecognition is to be invoked against a noncomplying union. For the Government to discriminate against unions on account of the political and economic beliefs of their officers is bad enough. For it to delegate such power to employers is worse.

Whether a particular employer will decide to withdraw recognition from a noncomplying union will depend on several considerations. One is whether he can effectively alienate the support of the union members and others in the community from the union on the ground that the union leaders hold proscribed beliefs. Attacks by employers upon unions and unionism for patriotic reasons are, of course, not a novel phenomenon in the field of labor relations. The recent longshoremen's strike on the west coast took place because the employers were induced by 9 (h) to believe that they could successfully refuse to deal with the existing leadership of the union. See Fortune, January 1949, p. 153. A second factor which will enter into the employer's consideration is whether the economic strength of the union is so great as to make it impracticable for him to withdraw recognition. For while a union has no legal remedy, it still has the right to strike or invoke other economic sanctions not prohibited by the Taft-Hartley Act.

Yet a third factor which may induce an employer to withdraw recognition from a noncomplying union is the presence in the field of a competing union which is more acceptable to the employer. The Board conducts its representation elections in such a fashion as to virtually insure the victory of a complying union. Thus, an employer can legally use noncompliance with section 9 (h) indirectly to influence its employees to reject the noncomplying union and select its competitor. That, of course, is just what an employer is forbidden to do directly by section 8 (a) (2).

The consequences of noncompliance with 9 (h) go far beyond the loss of legal remedies under the act. Unions which are not in compliance with section 9 (h) are prohibited from entering into a union-shop contract with an employer. That is effected in this way: The act, by sections 7, 8 (a) (3), and 8 (b) (1), prohibits the closed shop and permits the union shop only after the union has won a special type of election provided for in section 9 (e) (1) of the act. And section 9 (h) provides that no such election shall be conducted at the behest of a noncomplying union.

Not only the union shop, but the closed shop, was legal long before the Wagner Act. Indeed, this provision puts noncomplying unions under a restraint to which unions were never before subjected by Federal legislation. A closed or union shop is the goal of every union. To prohibit the union shop to noncomplying unions, while permitting it to complying unions, is to strike noncomplying unions a deadly blow.

Section 9 (h) results in the exclusion of noncomplying unions from participation in Board elections, and the holding of these elections under rules which virtually insure the success of competing complying unions.

In a recent proceeding (Matter of Woodmark Industries, Inc. (80 N. L. R. B. No. 171)) the Board certified a complying union which received only 15 votes out of a total of 43 cast. Of the remaining votes, 11 were for no union and 17 were write-in votes for a noncomplying union which had theretofore been the bargaining representative. The Board voided the 17 write-in votes and certified the complying union, which was the only union on the official ballot, on the ground that it won a majority of the 26 valid ballots cast.

The write-in votes were not even given the status of votes against the complying union. If they were, the Board declared, the noncomplying union would reap "an indirect benefit * * * (from a Board election) as the result of having demonstrated its strength in such election and having secured the defeat of a complying labor organization properly participating therein."

This election strikingly resembles those held in the people's democracies of eastern Europe. Joyfully accepting the mandate of the Eightieth Congress to stamp out political unorthodoxy in unions, the Board reduces to a mockery the constitutional rights of workers to form and join labor organizations of their own choosing.

Section 9 (h) and the financial filing requirements have encouraged employers to engage in grossly unfair labor practices against nonfiling unions and their members. In addition, they have made a mockery of free elections.

Moreover, section 9 (h) clearly invades freedom of thought and speech as well as freedom of assembly. The section is an insult to the labor movement because it seeks to impose improper pressures on workers in their choice of leaders.

The filing requirements have served to endow the Board and the general counsel with extraordinary powers of censorship over the right of a noncomplying union to exist and over the basic structure even of complying unions.

This is evident from such cases as Matter of Lane Wells (22 L. R. R. M. 1114, 1362), and Matter of Prudential Insurance Company (case No. 2–RM–70). In these cases, although the international union had complied with the filing requirements, the Board has insisted that local unions be required to file even if they play no part at all in collective bargaining and are not the bargaining agency but are merely in the picture. Unquestionably the Board is using the filing requirements as a means of forcing changes in the internal relations of unions.

In the Prudential case the Board announced the amazing doctrine that the CIO union there involved would not be permitted to participate in the election unless each local which contained employees of the employer as well as the international complied with the filing requirements. In that case it was perfectly clear that the local unions had nothing to do with collective bargaining. The decision imposed almost insuperable administrative problems upon the union involved. The inconveniences resulting from a doctrine that every local union which has members who are employees of the employer must file financial returns as a condition precedent to an election are enormous.

Because the filing requirements are a condition to obtaining elections and bargaining rights, they have imposed enormous delays upon unions' efforts in these directions. Where a labor organization has thousands of locals whose activities are not guided by lawyers endless delays result before the technical requirements of the law are fully satisfied.

The requirements relating to the filing of financial returns, I believe, are superfluous. Labor organizations are now under a duty to file, and there has been no showing that labor unions are financially irresponsible or remiss in their financial obligations to their members. The present financial filing requirements are so complex and so technical that many unions report that a great deal of staff work is required to maintain current compliance with these requirements. A number of international unions report that it has become necessary to assign a staff representative to assist local unions in preparing financial statements for filing which constitutes a tremendous expense for the unions. Most of the local union secretaries are plant employees and find it difficult to prepare these statements.

Finally, in connection with the filing requirements it should be pointed out that not only do labor organizations now comply with the filing requirements for tax purposes, but all CIO unions issue to their members complete financial statements in accordance with their constitutions and bylaws.

Like every antilabor development on the Federal level these interpretations of the statute by the Board have found an exaggerated counterpart on the State level.

In Simmons v. Local 770, Retail Clerks (21 L. R. R. M. 2685), a California court ruled that a union which has not complied with the Taft-Hartley Act filing requirements is an outlaw and may be enjoined from picketing an employer. The court ruled that such a union which had not submitted to the filing requirements has no legal standing to represent or bargain for employees of any business over which the Board has jurisdiction. This ruling is, of course, contrary to the law since there is nothing in the Taft-Hartley Act which justifies an employer in refusing to deal with a nonfiling union representing a majority of his employees. It is significant, moreover, that the very court which issued this decision permitting an employer to obtain an injunction against a strike or picketing by a nonfiling union on the ground that it is an outlaw under the Taft-Hartley Act had previously held that it has no power whatsoever to enjoin the alleged commission of unfair labor practices under the Taft-Hartley Act. In other words, the Court saw fit to rely upon the Taft-Hartley Act in order to discriminate against the exercise of rights by a nonfiling union.

A second case in which the Taft-Hartley Act was used in a State court for strikebreaking purposes involved the Scranton Broadcasters and the American Communications Association (21 L. R. R. M. 2021), in a strike which was forced by an employer through the discharge of a union leader. A Pennsylvania judge issued an injunction against the striking union on the ground, among others, that a union which had not complied with the Taft-Hartley Act could be enjoined from striking for that reason alone. In this, as in the great majority of cases in which employers have obtained injunctions, the employer involved manifestly was determined to escape from a bargaining obligation.

Another case in which a State court permitted an employer to flout his public responsibilities and his bargaining obligation involved the Smith Cabinet Company and the United Furniture Workers, CIO (Ind.) (77 N. E. (2d) 755). In that case the employer refused to recognize a majority union which had failed to qualify for certification under section 9 (h), a Labor Board election having been held before the effective date of the Taft-Hartley Act. The employer's refusal to bargain precipitated a strike and a request by the employer for injunctive relief against picketing. The union urged that the employer be barred from obtaining injunctive relief on the basis of a State statute banning such relief to employers failing to recognize the obligations imposed by law. An Indiana appellate court held on March 10, 1948, that an employee is free to refuse to bargain with a nonfiling union, although it admitted that under the Wagner Act the same employer would have been required to recognize the union as the bargaining agent in the absence of certification.

These decisions are typical of a growing number of decisions in which employers are using section 9 (h) of the act to defeat the statutory purpose of promoting collective bargaining and to obtain a repudiation of established rules with respect to the status of collective-bargaining agencies.

G. RESTRICTIONS ON THE RIGHT TO STRIKE

The Taft-Hartley Act outlaws certain strikes because of their purpose. In addition, even where a strike is for a purpose which is not barred by the act, certain serious prohibitions and obstacles to the right to strike are created. These include a 60-day strike notice provision, the emergency-strike provision, and a provision denying strikers the right to vote in elections.

(1) The 60-day-notice provisions.—The act imposes a requirement that no strike can be held where a collective-bargaining agreement is in effect unless a written notice is served 60 days prior to the time it is proposed to terminate or modify the agreemeent and the terms and conditions of employment are continued in full force and effect for such 60-day period.

This provision is so worded that it is frequently impossible to know just when a notice is required and when it is not. No clear guide is furnished as to whether wage-reopening clauses and contract extensions are subject to it.

Moreover, where a union violates the notice requirement and strikes prior to the expiration of the 60-day period, it can be completely demolished through the mass discharge of its members.

This is so because the law specifically states that an employee engaging in a strike during the 60-day period loses his status as an employee for the purposes of the act. The provisions of this section in effect make the entire future of the union turn upon whether it complies with the extremely ambiguous language of the statute. See Graham v. Boeing (22 L. R. R. M. 2243 and compare 23 L. R. R. M. 1107). In contrast, if an employer violates the notice provisions, the sole sanction is a Board cease and desist some time in the distant future.

The period prior to the termination of an agreement is a period which should be the most productive for the purposes of collective bargaining. This provision of the law has converted it into a period during which each side carefully watches the other to catch failures to comply with any of the technical notice requirements imposed and to gain whatever advantage it can from such technical lapse.

Most present-day collective bargaining contracts of any major proportions contain a provision requiring a certain period of notice and negotiation prior to the termination date. Such a provision reflects the considered judgment of the parties as to how long a period of negotiation is reasonable and necessary.

The imposition by Congress of a special notice provision in addition to that provided for in the contract has had harmful effects upon free collective bargaining. The incentive to bona fide negotiation and settlement is substantially diminished since the employer knows that for at least 60 days he has a guaranty against any strike action.

In addition, since there is a legislatively prescribed contract extension and negotiation period of 60 days, the parties could be expected in future contracts to omit the provisions on the same subjects now contained in their agreements. Such provisions would no longer serve any function with respect to the commencement of negotiations.

(2) Emergency strikes.—Section 206 of the Taft-Hartley Act established the procedure for dealing with emergency strikes.

This procedure, which has been applied in seven cases, has not operated in the public interest.

Under the procedure provided for in the Taft-Hartley Act, whenever, in the opinion of the President, a threatened or actual strike or lock-out involving all or a substantial part of an industry, not subject to the Railway Labor Act, will imperil the national health or safety, the President is authorized to appoint a board of inquiry to investigate the issues and to make a written report. Such a report under the statute includes a statement of the facts but contains no recommendations. No time limit is fixed in the statute for the filing of the report or for the functioning of the board of inquiry.

When the President receives the report of the board of inquiry, but not before, he may instruct the Attorney General to seek an injunction. The court, upon finding that the dispute affects all or a substantial part of the industry and will imperil national health or safety, may enjoin the strike or lock-out and make other orders deemed appropriate. The Norris-LaGuardia Act was specifically made inapplicable.

After an injunction is issued the parties are required, with the assistance of the Mediation and Conciliation Service, but without any duty to accept the proposals of the Service, to make an effort to adjust their differences.

After the injunction is issued the President is required to reconvene the Board and if the dispute is not settled at the end of a 60-day period dating from the issuance of the injunction, the Board reports to the President the current position of the parties and the efforts which have been made toward settlement. Within the next 15 days the Board must take a secret vote of the employees as to whether they wish to accept the employer's last offer. Five days later the Board must certify the results of the vote to the Attorney General who then must ask the court to discharge the injunction. The motion must be granted.

Thus, for a period of 80 days, employers receive, as a gift of the statute, their own terms, the forced labor of their employees.

The recent report of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service emphasizes that the injunctive provisions of this law have served to stimulate disputes rather than to promote settlement of them. As the Conciliation Service report points out (at p. 56):

"Indeed, the final report of the board of inquiry in the maritime dispute involving the Pacific coast longshoremen's union observed that the employers and unions in that dispute regarded the injunction period as a 'warming up' rather than a 'cooling off' period (p. 27). National emergency disputes vary widely in their facts and circumstances, and it is unlikely that any machinery can be devised that will guarantee satisfactory handling in all situations.

"One of the conclusions which the Service is undoubtedly justified in drawing from its experience of the last year is that provision for an 80-day period of continued operations, under injunctive order of a court, tends to delay rather than facilitate settlement of a dispute. Parties unable to resolve the issues facing them before a dead-line date, when subject to an injunction order, tend to lose a sense of urgency and to relax their efforts to reach a settlement. They wait for the next dead-line date (the date of discharge of the injunction) to spur them to renewed efforts. In most instances efforts of the Service to encourage the parties to bargain during the injunction period, with a view to early settlement, fall on deaf ears."

In the recent report of the Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations, this eloquent—and, we think, unconscious tribute—to the bankruptcy of the injunctive device appears in its discussion of the atomic energy dispute:

"The procedures called for by sections 206 to 210, inclusive, ran their course. In a last offer ballot, conducted by the NLRB, the employees voted by a large majority not to accept the employer's last offer. This last offer took the form of a proposed contract, a copy of which was distributed to each employee prior to the balloting. It was considered to be the most feasible method available under the circumstances, since the dispute did not involve a simple proposition, but six major points of difference and nine of lesser importance.

"The injunction was dismissed at the end of 80 days. Immediately the parties sat down, with the assistance of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, and after 52 hours of constant negotiation agreed to a settlement."

In short, the parties did nothing while the injunction was outstanding but settled the dispute when the injunction was dismissed.

In its discussion of the maritime strike the joint committee's report points out that the emergency board device likewise served to divert the parties from collective bargaining. The report states (at p. 19):

"It should be noted that in order to avert a strike in this case, it was necessary to invoke the procedures of the emergency provisions 12 days before the dead line. During these last 12 days the parties were busy preparing for and attending the hearings being held by the two panels of the President's board of inquiry, instead of negotiating and trying to reach a settlement. Hence, negotiations had to cease at a time when they are traditionally most likely to produce a settlement."

The joint committee itself has to some extent recognized that the emergency provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act are unworkable. It insists, however, that the injunction provisions should be retained. We are firmly convinced that the injunctive provisions constitute the basic evil of the measure. Injunctions are not, in our view, either sound or effective ways of resolving labor disputes. They impose upon workers involuntary servitude, they encourage employers to refuse to bargain, encouraged by their knowledge that for a period of 80 days at least they will have the labor of their employees at reduced rates and with governmental sanction. While the emergency injunction provision may temporarily stop a strike, it will, as it did in the west coast strike, inevitably serve to increase the resentment and determination of the workers and thus to stimulate a strike. Emergency injunctive provisions of the type embodied in the Taft-Hartley Act immediately raise in the mind of every fair-minded man one question: If workers may be required to render service upon the Government's terms for 80 days, why does not the public interest require that the employer be compelled to maintain conditions of employment which would render a strike unnecessary?

The Taft-Hartley Act involves compulsion, and compulsion is a two-edged sword.

The Taft-Hartley injunctive provisions make workers in our basic industries second-class citizens. They are punished and denied their rights precisely because their services are important to the economy.

Because of its prophetic and deadly accuracy, I commend to your attention the following portion of the President's message vetoing the Taft-Hartley Act, dealing with the problem of emergency strikes:

"This procedure would be certain to do more harm than good, and to increase rather than diminish widespread industrial disturbances. I am convinced that the country would be in for a bitter disappointment if these provisions of the bill became law.

"At the outset of a board of inquiry would be required to investigate the situation thoroughly, but would be specifically forbidden to offer its informed judgment concerning a reasonable basis for settlement of the dispute. Such inquiry therefore would serve merely as a sounding board to dramatize the respective positions of the parties.

"A strike or lock-out might occur before the board of inquiry could make its report, and perhaps even before the board could be appointed. The existence of such a strike or lock-out would hamper the board in pursuing its inquiry. Experience has shown that fact-finding, if it is to be most effective as a device for settlement of labor disputes, should come before the men leave their work, not afterward. Furthermore, an injunction issued after a strike has started would arouse bitter resentment which would not contribute to agreement.

"If the dispute had not been settled after 60 days of the waiting period, the National Labor Relations Board would be required to hold a separate election of the employees of each employer to find out whether the workers wished to accept the employer's last offer, as stated by him. Our experience under the War Labor Disputes Act showed conclusively that such an election would almost inevitably result in a vote to reject the employer's offer, since such action amounts to a vote of confidence by the workers in their bargaining representatives. The union would then be reinforced by a dramatic demonstration, under Government auspices, of its strength for further negotiations.

"After this elaborate procedure the injunction would then have to be dissolved, the parties would be free to fight out their dispute, and it would be mandatory for the President to transfer the whole problem to the Congress, even if it were not in session. Thus, major economic disputes between employers and their workers over contract terms might ultimately be thrown into the political arena for disposition. One could scarcely devise a less effective method for discouraging critical strikes.

"This entire procedure is based upon the same erroneous assumptions as those which underlay the strike-vote provision of the War Labor Disputes Act, namely, that strikes are called in haste as the result of inflamed passions, and that union leaders do not represent the wishes of the workers. We have learned by experience, however, that strikes in the basic industries are not called in haste, but only after long periods of negotiation and serious deliberation; and that in the secret-ballot election the workers almost always vote to support their leaders.

"Furthermore, a fundamental inequity runs through these provisions. The bill provides for injunctions to prohibit workers from striking, even against terms dictated by employers after contracts have expired. There is no provision assuring the protection of the rights of the employees during the period they are deprived of the right to protect themselves by economic action.

"In summary, I find that the so-called 'emergency procedure' would be ineffective. It would provide for clumsy and cumbersome Government intervention. It would authorize inequitable injunctions; and it would probably culminate in a public confession of failure. I cannot conceive that this procedure would aid in the settlement of disputes."

The emergency provisions have provoked strikes, not prevented them. These provisions have been condemned by every expert in the field.

(3) Strikes for "illegal" purposes.—The Taft-Hartley Act outlaws a number of types of strikes, regardless of the manner in which they are conducted, solely because of their objective. These include sympathetic strikes and so-called featherbedding strikes. Most importantly, the act has been held to outlaw strikes for a closed shop. See Matter of Amalgamated Meat Cutters, case No. 21–CB–8, decided March 7, 1949. There are few labor activities more basic than the right of workers concertedly to refuse to work with nonunion members. As was recently pointed out by Justice Rutledge in Lincoln Federal Labor Union v. Northwestern Iron & Metal Co., decided by the United States Supreme Court, January 3, 1949, "Strikes have been called throughout union history in defense of the right of union members not to work with nonunion men."

It is difficult to see how this prohibition in the act can be squared with the protection of the thirteenth amendment against involuntary servitude.

(4) The rights of strikers.—Properly classifiable as a serious interference with the right to strike are the provisions of the law barring economic strikers from the ballot where an election is sought during a strike. Under the Wagner Act practice the Board recognized that economic strikers have an important equity in the employment situation which entitles them to vote along with their replacements when an election takes place during a strike.

The provision of the law barring strikers from the ballot, when used together with the section permitting employers to petition for elections and the injunction provisions, is a perfect strikebreaking device. It encourages the employer to provoke a strike, hire strikebreakers, seek recognition, and instigate a stacked election in which the views of the strikers will not be reflected. When the strikebreakers win the election (as they inevitably must since the strikers cannot vote) the strike is automatically made illegal under section 8 (b) (4) of the statute since it is a strike against a certified bargaining agent. The general counsel is then required to seek an injunction to break it. This provision of the law has promoted the use of strikebreakers on a widespread scale. In the questionnaires which I have submitted to CIO unions in a great number of instances it has been reported that the use of professional strikebreakers is on the increase.

An illustration of the strikebreaking technique which the statute makes possible is provided by the Pipe Machinery Co. case (22 L. R. R. M. 1510). The employer in that case enlisted strikebreakers to replace his striking employees, members of the International Association of Machinists. The strikebreakers promptly formed an "independent" union and petitioned for an election. At the election the Board ruled that the strikers could not vote and certified the petitioning union. Thereupon since the strike was a strike against a certified union within the meaning of section 8 (b) (4) (C) of the act, it became an illegal strike subject not only to a cease and desist order but to a mandatory injunction under section 10 (l) of the act as well as a damage suit. The Pipe Machinery case and experience in other cases in which similar techniques have been used, make it clear that it is virtually impossible to prove that the strikebreakers, even where they are professionals, are not permanent replacements. Moreover, it is perfectly possible for the employer, employing a group of strikebreakers, to eliminate certain jobs and break down labor standards and to effectively claim that those strikers who were not replaced may not be permitted to vote on the claim that their jobs have been "discontinued."

An example of the use of the same technique, varied only by the circumstance that a single employee filed a petition for decertification is Matter of Solar Electric Co. (23 L. R. R. M. 1030).

Finally, in cases where the Board, in administering the Wagner Act, had reinstated strikers, the Board under the Taft-Hartley Act, has shown an increasing unwillingness to do so, not only in the case of economic strikers who have not been replaced (see Matter of National Grinding Wheel Co. (75 N. L. R. B. 905) but also in the case of unfair labor practice strikers. See Matter of National Electric Products Corp. (case No. 6-C-1147).

H. SUABILITY OF UNIONS

Section 301 of the Taft-Hartley Act authorizes suits against unions for breach of contract, states that labor organizations which are sued are to be bound by the acts of their "agents" and confers Federal jurisdiction over such suits, not only in the district where the organization has its principal office but in any district which such "agent" or representative is acting for employee members.

As I have already pointed out the salutary protections of the Norris-LaGuardia Act are eliminated both for purposes of unfair labor practices and for purposes of damage suits. We have already seen that for unfair labor practice purposes the Board has held that even a member of an organization is an agent and that the acts of such "agents" may bind not only the local but even the international. It is obvious that this damage suit provision is a perfect vehicle for muleting a union in damages not only for activities of its own agents but the activities of districts, locals, joint boards, grievance committeemen or all those other individuals who under the democratic structure of a modern labor union may be possibly designated to be its agent.

Under this provision the international treasury to which members from all parts of the country contribute may be emptied because of the irresponsible acts of a single individual in a single plant.

One of the ironies of this law is that on the one hand it seeks to break down union discipline and control in the interests of the freedom of the individual and on the other it imposes indiscriminate liability for acts committed in violation of contract by workers thus emancipated.

The law has made a novel contribution to strikes. It has precipitated strikes over a new type of issue, namely, the issue of union liability. Beginning with the strikes in the automobiles industry when the law was just passed there have been periodic strikes in many industries by unions in order to protect themselves against the imposition of indiscriminate liability for acts over which they have no control.

Here also, as in connection with union security, some employers are perfectly willing to extend protection to unions seeking to make the grievance-arbitration machinery the exclusive remedy for contract breach only to be told by lawyers that such assurances could not be validly given under the law.

The provisions authorizing lawsuits against unions in Federal courts are based upon the wholly unfounded assumption that labor unions frequently breach their agreements, that existing State sanctions for such breaches were inadequate and that an additional Federal sanction was imperatively needed. The recent report of the Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations makes the point that these provisions have not been extensively used. This in itself is a confession that the section was added not to provide a needed remedy but merely to harass unions.

The Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations apparently is unaware that in a number of strikes employers used or threatened to use this provision as a means of forcing compliance by a union with the employer's position on a contract and in some instances strikes have been prolonged because unions have insisted that they would not terminate the strike unless the employer waived all claims under section 301.

The plain fact is that Taft-Hartley Federal court suits are not brought primarily to police violations of contract. Employers who desire to live in good faith with their employees are completely aware that a lawsuit is a substitute for sound industrial relations, not a means of achieving them. This obviously must be the case if we are to have satisfactory labor relations in this country. As one authority has put it:

"It would be unfortunate if ther should develop any strong tendency to look to the Federal courts to settle questions concerning the interpretation and application of collective-bargaining agreements. A collective agreement is most workable when it is treated as a constitutional instrument or basic statute charging an administrative authority with the day-to-day application of general aims. The determination of disputes arising during this process is more a matter of creating new law than of construing the provisions of a tightly drawn document. Few judges are equipped for this task by experience or insight; in addition, they would be hampered by the restrictions and delays of legal doctrine and court procedure. Wider voluntary use of arbitration offers a more promising method of settling such disputes. * * *" Cox, Some Aspects of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947 (61 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 274, 305).

The damage suit provisions should be deleted because they jeopardize the mature development of the grievance-arbitration mechanism. Moreovver, these provisions place in the hands of antilabor employers a means of blackmailing a union. Damage suits are typically instituted not to make an employer whole for a claimed breach of contract, but to bleed a union and to destroy its treasury. Because damage suits pose such a tremendous threat to the very existence of a labor organization, they embitter industrial relations.

Finally, it is important to point out in connection with this provision of the law that it represents another one of those opportunistic enlargements of Federal jurisdiction which have been typically written into the law for purely antilabor purposes. Consider the situation. Of all the conceivable varieties of breach of contract, breach of a labor agreement alone is made a Federal subject matter regardless of the fact that there may not be a Federal jurisdictional amount of diversity of citizenship.

It is difficult to escape the conclusion that a sound dividing line between appropriate areas of Federal and State jurisdiction in labor relations has been made impossible by the essentially antilabor character of the act and its administration. Thus, under the act, lip service is paid to local labor-relations regulations when they are more restrictive than even the Taft-Hartley Act, as in the case of section 14 (b) dealing with union security. On the other hand, where the assertion of Federal jurisdiction might contribute to a sound and stable labor policy the act withholds Federal jurisdiction, as in the case of section 203 (b) dealing with the Conciliation Service. This section provides that "the Director and the Service are directed to avoid attempting to mediate disputes which would have only a minor effect on interstate commerce, if State or other conciliation services are available to the parties." But the tenderness of the act for the rights of the States suddenly disappears where, for example, the State happens to extend organizational rights to supervisors. See section 14 (a).

I have always had strong doubts as to whether a breach of a labor agreement can constitutionally be made a Federal subject matter regardless of the amount involved or the diversity of the citizenship of the parties. To this serious constitutional question should definitely be added the objection that this novel expansion of Federal jurisdiction is merely based upon an attempt to harass unions.

I. ONE-SIDED ADMINISTRATION

This act seeks to straddle conflicting and mutually hostile concepts. On the one hand it pays lip service to the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively. On the other hand, it creates a new Federal "right," namely, the right not to engage in union activity. This act purports to create a broad shelter for the protection both of the union man and the antiunion man. As has been pointed out many times by experts in the field, those aspects of the law which purport to protect the right to self-organization and collective bargaining can readily be frustrated by the provisions in the law protecting antiunion activities. In short, the two features of the law cannot coexist side by side. Either we have a Federal policy which protects self-organization or we adopt a Federal "yellow dog" policy which protects its opposite. It seems quite clear from the experiences under the act on this point that the act is dominantly one implementing a "yellow dog" policy.

It is, therefore, not entirely accurate to condemn the general counsel and the Board for their one-sided administration of the statute. The statute itself makes one-sideness in administration inevitable. Some examples of one-sided administration follow.

In the group of cases involving the International Typographical Union approximately 11 days elapsed between the filing of the charge and the issuance of the complaint. In the course of the attack by the office of the general counsel on the strike, complaint after complaint was issued against the union in record time and precisely the same issues were placed in protracted litigation. This deluge of complaints was buttressed by an injunction. When CIO unions protested that their charges were not being processed, they were informed that delays were caused by the fact that a large part of the general counsel's personnel was diverted into ITU litigation which became a major project of the general counsel's office.

In the Graphic Arts case the filing employer enjoyed the phenomenal service of having a complaint issued on the very day his charge was filed against the ITU. As a matter of fact, the charging party in that case received another unusual boon to facilitate the disposition of his charge. The trial examiner involved was summoned before this committee and interrogated about the delay involved in the issuance of his intermediate report. We know of no case in which a union filed a charge in which this committee demonstrated a similar solicitude for the rapid disposition of the issues.

In a case in which the Amalgamated Meat Cutters was the respondent, case No. 21–CB–8, the complaint was issued on the same day that the second amended charge was filed.

In another union unfair labor practice case involving the Smith Cabinet Co. and the United Furniture Workers of America, case No. 35–CB–3, a charge which was filed on November 26, 1947, gave rise to a complaint on November 28, 1947, and in a case filed against the same international union by the Colonial Hardwood Flooring Co., case No. 5–CB–4, the amended charge filed on December 23, 1947, gave rise to a complaint dated December 24, 1947.

The committee should bear in mind that all of these cases are not cases which are governed by the statutory requirement for priority. In the class of cases arising under section 8 (b) (4) (A) (B), and (C), in which the statute authorizes priority treatment, the general counsel, of course, is not even permitted to wait until the complaint issues but is required to seek an injunction merely when he has reasonable cause to believe that a complaint would issue.

Another instance of the one-sidedness of the act and its application occurs in the field of employee representation. Under the act, as under its predecessor, when a rival union seeks to organize an already organized plant it must make a substantial showing that the employees desire to change their bargaining representative. The importance of this rule is obvious. It promotes stability in bargaining relations, it discourages raiding, and minimizes the holding of futile elections. However, this requirement does not obtain when an employer files a petition. The employer petition section of the act provides that when a labor organization presents a claim to be recognized the employer may file a petition for an election. The Board has construed this requirement to impose no obligation whatsoever upon the employer to establish some reasonable basis for requiring the Board to hold a new election. He is not required to show that there have been defections from the bargaining unit or to overcome any presumption of the continuing representative status of the bargaining agent. Under this provision, as the Board construes it, the employer has the automatic right to force the election upon his employees, however foregone the result and however clear the fact that the petition has been filed for purposes of creating a pretext not to bargain or for renewing an attack upon the collective-bargaining representative.

Very early in the development of rules for the administration of the act it became apparent that the act would be administered in a one-sided way. An indication of this was the promulgation by the general counsel, in a directive to his field staff, of a rule that charges are to be dismissed unless supporting evidence is produced within 72 hours.

In this directive the regional office is instructed to adopt the following procedure when a charge is received:

(1) The person filing it is "required to produce sufficient affirmative and probative evidence to indicate a prima facie case."

(2) The person filing the charge is to be required to designate the witnesses through whom it is expected the charges will be proved.

(3) The person filing the charge is required to produce such witnesses at the Board office at a designated time not more than 72 hours after filing the charge.

(4) In the event of a failure to produce such witnesses or if the particular witnesses designated by the charging party are unable to substantiate the charges "by competent evidence," the charge is to be dismissed.

In order to appreciate the effect of this new directive, it is important to recall the former practice under the Wagner Act.

Under the former practice, the field director of the Board, through its field examiners, assumed the responsibility of running down charges once they had been filed. The old Board recognized that the Government, as part of its duty in enforcing the Wagner Act, had the responsibility of investigating the substantiating charges which had been filed with it. The Board realized that a union might have a perfectly valid charge and still be unable to substantiate it because of its limited facilities for investigation and detection. The Board recognized that this was particularly true in connection with labor matters since employers concealed their violations of the act in such a clever manner that intensive and professional investigation was required to uncover evidence of their law breaking.

This ruling, which reverses the Wagner Act practice, inevitably produces two results:

(1) It makes the already meaningless labor protections of the Taft-Hartley Act still more meaningless. When employers commit unfair labor practices few unions have the facilities to establish a prima facie case within 72 hours or the resources to produce witnesses at the Board's office and to finance their expenses and lost time.

(2) In contrast, employers are under no such handicap when they bring charges against unions. Employers are far better equipped than unions to meet technical requirements in the law regarding the type of proof which must be offered.

The inevitable effect of the ruling is to give employers a justification for reviving labor espionage. An employer who wants to destroy a union can justify his use of labor spies on the ground that he is merely seeking "evidence" of union unfair labor practice which has to be produced within 72 hours of the filing of his charge.

Under the Wagner Act, the Board denied protection to unions where the union was engaged in the conduct which would force the employer to violate the act, had breached a contract or engaged in activities which were in contravention of some other public policy. However, in Taft-Hartley cases against unions decided by the Board or by trial examiners in which it is perfectly apparent that the employer has refused to deal with the union without any justification and that the labor dispute arises out of such a refusal, the examiners have not applied the "clean hands" doctrine to deny the employers relief from pressures occasioned by their own misconduct.

These are but a few of the instances of one-sided administration of the act which have come to light since its enactment. But the evils in the administration of the law are inherent in its terms. Here are some of the ways in which the law is loaded against unions:

An employer charge of unlawful sympathetic strike must be given priority treatment, regardless of the number of union unfair labor practice charges on the docket.	But a union charge, no matter how urgent, or important, must await its turn in the tedious processes of the Taft-Hartley Board.
If union members strike during the term of the contract or before the expiration of a 60-day notice, in order to change the conditions of the contract, they may be fired summarily without right to reinstatement.	But if the employer locks out the union members for the same purpose, or unilaterally breaches the contract, he may only be charged with an unfair labor practice—and much, much later be told not to do it again.
If the NLRB entertains a charge by an employer of unlawful sympathetic strike, the Board must seek an injunction.	But in no kind of unfair labor practice charge by a union is the NLRB required to seek an injunction.
If the union participates in sympathetic strikes or boycotts which are unfair labor practices, the employer also may sue the union for damages.	But there is no unfair labor practice on the part of the employer which also entitles the union to sue for damages.
If, during a strike for a new contract, the employer hires scabs and petitions for an NLRB certification election, strikers are not allowed to vote.	But all the scabs can vote.
In every grievance, the employer has the right to press his interpretation of the contract.	But in grievances that may be taken up by individuals, the union has no say as to what the contract means.
Unions must file full financial data in order to utilize the NLRB.	But employers need file no financial data in order to utilize the Board.

Union officers must reveal political beliefs and swear to political affidavits before their unions can utilize the Board.	But employers may keep their political affiliations and opinions secret and still retain full access to the NLRB.
Union cases are subject to periodic and continued delay while registration and affidavits are brought up to date annually when new financial reports are due.	Employers, however, are subject to no such delays.
The law prevents union members from combating sweatshop labor within their own industry by refusing to handle nonunion goods.	But the law does not prevent the employer from breaking down union standards in his union contracts by utilization of sweatshop goods; dealing with sweatshop employers.
The law prevents unions from requesting payment for services which are not to be performed.	But there is nothing in the law which prevents the employer from requiring services which are not paid for as in the case of the speed-up and stretch-out.

J. THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT'S ADMINISTRATIVE AND PROCEDURAL PROVISIONS

Bad as the Taft-Hartley Act's substantive provisions are, its administrative and procedural provisions are even worse. It must be recognized at the outset that the administrative and procedural changes embodied in the Taft-Hartley Act were not enacted in response to any genuine need for administrative and procedural reform of the Wagner Act.

The provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act providing for so-called separation of functions eliminating the review section and creating a labor czar in the general counsel's office are the result of a long campaign to emasculate labor legislation by administrative and procedural devices.

The changes in administration and structure effected by the Taft-Hartley Act are merely a way of insuring that the statute did not serve to promote self-organization or collective bargaining. We should bear in mind that these changes were made after the passage of the Administrative Procedure Act which applied to all Government agencies, including the Board as it was set up under the Wagner Act.

The Administrative Procedure Act was passed after years of intensive study and was sponsored by the American Bar Association. It was preceded by a long series of investigations of procedure, beginning with the President's Committee on Administrative Management in 1935 and included the report of the Attorney General's Committee on Administrative Procedure in 1941. Despite the fact that the administration of the Wagner Act conformed to the Administrative Procedure Act and to sound administration in the field of labor relations, it was discarded.

The administrative and procedural changes embodied in the Wagner Act are part of a stock technique for emasculating social legislation. Whether the field be price control, housing, communications, power, or farm benefits, we find that the attack upon the administrative process is the handmaiden of the attack upon the substantive features of a particular legislation involved.

This attack seeks in the name of curbing bureaucracy to weaken enforcement, to impose upon the statute an administration not in accordance with its terms, to insure delay, to provide for multiple lines of authority. From the point of view of those bent upon weakening social-welfare legislation, this technique is invaluable because it permits them to accomplish their objective with a minimum of difficulty. It enables the enemies of social-welfare legislation even to pay lip service to its virtues and at the same time to insure that its beneficial effect will be diluted, if not completely lost.

Unless the administrative and procedural changes which are embodied in the Taft-Hartley Act are viewed as an instance of the technique referred to, an analysis of those changes cannot deal with fundamentals. The two major administrative changes which the Taft-Hartley Act provides are (1) the creation of a dual structure for the administration of the statute, and (2) the attempted destruction of the institutional administration of the statute and the substitution therefor of a personalized system of adjudication and lawmaking.

The dual administrative structure which makes of the general counsel's office an autonomous and separate entity has actually made the Taft-Hartley Act even more oppressive than its literal provisions.

The result of the dual administrative structure created by the Taft-Hartley Act has been in effect to provide for separate systems of administration of two contradictory approaches in the field of labor relations. As it has worked out in practice the office of the general counsel has dedicated itself to a crusade against unions, to a protection of the new right to be free not to join a union, for the elements in the Taft-Hartley Act which may aptly be termed the "yellow-dog" elements, while the Board is more closely identified with the aspects of the Taft-Hartley Act which involve the protection of self-organization and collective bargaining. Unquestionably, the responsibility of the general counsel for enforcing the act against unions has conditioned the approach of the general counsel's office even to those aspects of the statute which are not antiunion with the result that these, too, receive a treatment which is hostile and antilabor. How could the Office of the General Counsel which devoted its energies to a unique crusade against International Typographical Union be expected to be solicitous of the rights of unions? As a matter of fact, the record shows that it was not as solicitous of those rights. A handy instance of this fact is that of the six injunctions issued under the statute pursuant to a discretionary power to restrain unfair-labor practices. Four were obtained against unions and two against employers.

All of the circumstances under which the Office of the General Counsel was created as a separate entity made it inevitable that it became identified as primarily an instrument for effectuating the many antiunion aspects of the Taft-Hartley Act. Indeed, the Hoover report on the structure of the National Labor Relations Board and its general counsel concedes this fact.

The creation of a dual structure with a separate general counsel's office has involved a further consequence, namely, that this office has become extremely vulnerable to congressional pressure in important areas of policy and administration.

The evils of the dual structure are particularly objectionable in connection with the Office of the General Counsel because the Taft-Hartley Act makes of him the most powerful peacetime Government official which this country has ever seen. In addition to the general counsel's important powers in connection with injunctions and unfair labor practices, the Board turned over to him—most unfortunately in my opinion—the power to seek compliance with the Board's orders, the authority to process petitions in representation cases, the authority to process 10 (k) proceedings, the power to seek 10 (j) and 10 (l) injunctions, and, finally, authority over all personnel with certain limited exclusions.

When this delegation is combined with the general counsel's statutory authority it can readily be seen that there is simply too much power over Federal labor policy concentrated in one individual. It is a ridiculous state of affairs, for example, that the Board under the Taft-Hartley Act exerts no supervision over field personnel and the performance of representation functions for which it, the Board, was primarily responsible. It is a ridiculous situation when appeals from the general counsel's refusal to issue a complaint are taken not to the Board but to the general counsel's office. The Hoover Commission in its study of the administration of the Taft-Hartley Act has pointedly commented on the absurdity of this situation. The arbitrary, and for all practical purposes unreviewable, power of the general counsel is even more dangerous because in many of the areas in which the general counsel has such power, such as the issuance of the complaints, in the seeking of 10 (l) injunctions or in the denial of petitions for certain types of elections, the principles involved were completely novel in the sense that there are very few decided cases to serve as a guide for administrative action.

One clear product of the Taft-Hartley Act's tampering with the Wagner Act's administrative mechanism has been to erect a labor czar with vast arbitrary powers directed primarily against unions. A second result of the dual structure imposed upon the administration of the act is that it has produced a dangerous inconsistency in administration. For example, the general counsel and the Board differ sharply as to what should be the Board's jurisdiction. This might be harmless enough in ordinary circumstances but it has had the effect of extending the application of the statute insofar as sanctions against unions are concerned—the general counsel is determined to "protect" the small-business man from union unfair labor practices no matter how much it strains Federal policy—since the general counsel administers the union unfair labor practice provisions of the law, but restricting the representation features of the statute, an area in which of course the Board possesses the ultimate authority.

Thus, the same union in the same situation may find itself unable to obtain an election because the Board does not wish to exercise jurisdiction but may nevertheless become the object of an unfair labor practice complaint and injunction because the general counsel decides that he must exercise jurisdiction. It is no answer to say that ultimately the Board may decide in the unfair labor practice case that jurisdiction should not have been exercised. This is so because the effect of an injunction obtained upon the general counsel's view of jurisdiction cannot be cured by the Board's ultimate disposal of the complaint. Thus, in the Sealright and other cases the trial examiners have dismissed the complaint after the general counsel has not only issued a complaint but has obtained an injunction under 10 (j) of the statute.

This administrative bifurcation has produced other strange results. Thus, in the Times Square case (22 L. R. R. M. 1373) an employer replaced strikers who filed unfair labor practice charges. No question can exist that the charges were well based. The general counsel refused to process those charges, not because they lacked merit but because he insisted that the charges were filed by individuals who were "fronting" for a noncomplying union. The striking union challenged the votes of the strikebreakers. The Board held that since the general counsel had refused to process the charges the strike must be held to be an economic strike and that the men must be regarded as economic strikers, subject to replacement and so unable to vote. In short, the Board was forced to decide that a nonrepresentative choice was a bargaining agent and that an employer was free in effect to choose his own bargaining agent because the general counsel had refused to process unfair labor practice charges.

In a second case, the Kinsman Transit case (22 L. R. R. M. 1165), an employer discharged an active union man 4 hours before an election. The union objected to the election on this ground. The Board held that since the general counsel had refused to proceed on the charges the election must be presumed to have been conducted free of coercive influences.

One of the greatest evils which has been produced by the dual structure is the fact that all important settlement functions are being endangered because a legal official and his personnel rather than the Board and its personnel are charged with this duty.

Another result of the dual administrative structure has been the fact that it has reduced the Board's prestige and general importance to that of the lowest of any Federal labor agency. While the general counsel has assumed a monopoly in the administration and interpretation of Federal policy, the Board's role has rapidly shrunk. This has been accomplished both by the statute and by the Board's own voluntary abdication of duties.

It should be pointed out, moreover, that the Board's diminished role is even less than would appear. For example, the fact that it is the office of the general counsel and his personnel which has authority in the first instance to receive and process all petitions in representation cases considerably reduces the meaning and effectiveness of the Board's right to act on appeals from a refusal to issue a notice of hearing, from a dismissal of a petition, from procedural matters arising after hearings. This is so because the denial of a petition in the first instance or the refusal to issue a notice of hearing can decisively influence a labor situation and frequently does.

Similarly, the Board's authority to determine unfair labor practice cases is an isolated island in a sea of power dominated by the general counsel. Thus, it is the general counsel, and not the Board, who has final authority to determine whether a complaint shall issue. It is the general counsel, and not the Board, who determines whether, as ancillary to the complaint, a 10 (j) or 10 (l) injunction should be obtained. And even after the Board has decided the unfair labor practice case it is the general counsel, and not the Board, who determines whether or not and under what circumstances to enter upon the decisive enforcement stage.

Moreover, it should be borne in mind that the Board's so-called ultimate authority in connection with representation proceedings is largely illusory. A certification in itself carries no binding effect. And an employer's failure to yield to it gives rise to an unfair labor practice proceeding, in which, of course, the general counsel's authority is dominant.

The decline of the Board under the new statutory structure is, of course, no accident. Since the Board was identified with the enforcement of the Wagner Act, it became necessary for Congress to devise some administrative apparatus for rendering it powerless and as an insurance that an antilabor statute would receive an antilabor administration.

In the name of an objective of separating Board functions, the act has destroyed the Board as a cohesive labor agency, has reduced its prestige, and has invested the Office of the General Counsel, fundamentally a prosecutive and investigative office, with a monopoly of effective power in the administration of the statute.

But the impairment of the prestige and effectiveness of the Board does not result only from the curtailment of its functions. The manner in which the subordinated Board is made to operate under the new statute further contributes to its weakness.

It was the purpose of the Taft-Hartley Act to make the Board operate like a court. This objective the statute seeks to achieve by abolishing the review section which existed under the old Board and substituting in its place a system of legal assistants, each attached to one of the members of an augmented Board of five members, by reducing or eliminating delegation entirely and by wiping out economic analysts as a structural arm of the agency. Serious study of the problem has convinced me that personalized administration in the labor field is dangerous and unwise.

In the first place, when we deal with unfair labor practices we deal with a type of misconduct which is predictable and recurrent to an amazing extent. Certain types of union activities give rise to certain types of employer reactions. Unfair labor practices fall into stock patterns which must be evaluated in an institutional way.

It is both inefficient and fruitless to impose personal administration in an area in which a body of administrative adjudication so readily evolves about standard types of conduct.

In the second place, personalized administration tends to strip the agency involved of its public character and instead make of its adjudications a product—and frequently a compromise product—of clashing private interests. Instead of a group of Board members dedicated to the public interest and objectively matching fact situations against expertly evolved bodies of doctrine we find a Board consisting of an employer member, a union member, a public member, etc., examining cases from the point of view of a particular interest and reaching a result which may or may not coincide with the public interest.

In the third place, this so-called insistence on personalized administration sacrifices the greatest single contribution of administrative approach, namely, the expertise which an administrative agency develops. The locus of this expertise must of necessity be the staff which is educated by and in turn educates the Board members.

In the fourth place, personalized administration means delay, long and unnecessary delay, delay which is fatal to the effective administration of a labor statute.

In the fifth place, personalized administration means that the statute as a rule of conduct, as the sum of a series of decided and well understood cases never becomes established as the law of industrial life. Every lawyer is sure that he can convince a majority of the Board members that his case is different. Every employer is encouraged in his transgressions in the hope that he can sway Board members. An employer bent on violating the law weighs his chances not against the law itself but against the possible reaction of some Board member.

Finally, personalized administration means opening the door to personalized pressure, particularly from Congress. It means stripping an agency of the means of insulating itself from outside pressures and injecting into the decision-making process considerations which are hostile to fair adjudication.

The result of the attempt to convert an administrative agency into a collection of five judges has been in effect to provide a statute with five built-in bottlenecks. The analogy to a judge is obviously strained when each Board member has 15 assistants and a chief legal assistant. What the act needs is administrative procedures; it needs effective staff work; it needs a review section; it needs the power to delegate functions to the Regional Director in representation cases and to the trial examiner in unfair-labor-practice cases; it needs to function as a team. In short, it needs the administrative structure and orientation which the Taft-Hartley Act has taken away from it.

A recent statement, Major Issues in National Labor Policy, summarizing a forthcoming book by Dr. Harry A. Millis, former Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, and Emily Clark Brown, professor of economics at Vassar College, admirably sums up the fatal defects in the Taft-Hartley administrative structure.

"Separation of Functions Under the Wagner Act

"Our detailed study of experience under the 1935 act convinced us that the NLRB had largely solved the problem of combining proper separation of functions with needed unified control of policy. Over the years it had increased its delegation of authority and its own separation, as the decision-making body, from the earlier functions of investigating and prosecuting cases. There were already under the Wagner Act three practically separate parts of the agency: (1) those members of the staff who investigated, handled the great bulk of cases informally, administered the determination of representation questions in the field, and prosecuted the complaint cases requiring formal action; (2) the trial examiners who heard cases; and (3) the Board itself who with the assistance of review attorneys decided the formal cases. Yet the Board was able to maintain the unity of policy which resulted in its very successful record for informal settlements, what the Attorney General's Committee called 'the lifeblood of the administrative process'.

"And over the years it had an unusual success among the Federal administrative agencies in obtaining approval from the courts of its procedures and its policies. The machinery itself seemed to provide adequate safeguards for the integrity of the quasi-judicial process. The Board had developed over the years effective methods of selection, training and supervision of staff, and had established standards of procedure, properly centralized control of policy and decentralization of administration. All of this went far toward providing efficient and fair administration in this complex and difficult field.

"Separation of Functions Under the Taft-Hartley Act

"The Taft-Hartley Act, on the other hand, with its rigid prescriptions as to administration and its division of authority between the Board and the general counsel, made it very much more difficult, if not impossible, to provide as efficient and fair an administration as had been the fact before. The increase in the number of Board members and authorization for use of panel system in making decisions were on the whole advantageous. Freeing the Board of some administrative detail also was helpful, though this could and probably should have been done before by the Board itself. But we can find no gain from the division of authority between the Board and the general counsel.

"A major difficulty in administration under the 1947 act arises from the final authority of the general counsel, subject to no appeal to the Board, to dismiss or to decide to prosecute charges of unfair labor practices. While the Board is ultimately responsible, subject to review by the courts, for the interpretation of the act, administrative decisions at an early stage are often crucial for the parties in particular cases. The result is that a case may be handled early on a theory which the Board itself will later reject. But the early action may have been conclusive as far as those parties are concerned. Reversal by the Board perhaps a year later cannot undo the effect of the earlier action. Delay in establishing policies and sometimes injustice to the parties is an almost inevitable result. On the other hand, if the Board is free to consider matters of policy involved in the decision to process or to dismiss a case at an early stage, without considering the details of fact in the particular case, it can avoid the waste and possible injustice of early decisions on basic policy which may later be reversed.

"Differences of opinion between the Board and the general counsel as to the extent to which the Board should assert jurisdiction over enterprises heretofore considered essentially local has been a source of confusion in the field. It has led too to waste effort, and to a measure of compulsion on the Board finally, when it hesitates to reverse the general counsel on a case which has been carried through all the stages of formal action up to the point of decision by the Board. Such a basic matter of policy should be decided by the Board, interpreting the congressional mandate on the point.

"A serious limitation upon the power of the Board to consider all aspects of a case which comes to it for decision arises, also, from the power of the general counsel to dismiss an unfair labor practice case, subject to no appeal. Such an administrative dismissal proved to be the deciding factor in one important case in determining whether a strike was an 'economic strike' or one caused by unfair labor practices, since the Board considered itself bound by the action of the general counsel in dismissing a charge of unfair labor practices. But this alone determined, under the terms of the law, that strikers who had been replaced had no right to vote in a representation election. And that earlier dismissal had been made administratively without hearing, by the general counsel, not by the Board. The requirements of full and fair hearing, sound administration, and unity of policy, all point to the necessity that the Board have the full authority to make all such vital decisions.

"The degree of concentration of responsibility and authority in the hands of one man, also, is unwise, especially when much of it is subject to no appeal. Inevitably many questions must be decided by subordinates, or else by off-the-cuff decisions, however able and fair the general counsel may be.

"A broader base for responsibility, with freedom to delegate authority as seems wise, gives more protection against mistakes and against pressure from special interests. A board, rather than one individual, should be the locus of authority and responsibility in such a controversial field as this.

"With goodwill and cooperation between the Board and the general counsel it has been possible to administer the act, although with considerable waste motion. But this has been in spite of the prescriptions as to administration, not because of them. And under other circumstances a complete break-down of administration would be possible.

"The Decision-Making Process Under the Wagner Act and Under Taft-Hartley

"The other most important change in administration made by the 1947 act dealt with the decision-making process. The Review Section was abolished, and its place was taken by a group of legal assistants for each individual Board member. There seems to have been little understanding by those responsible for these provisions of the actual process of making decisions and of the safeguards which had been developed in a careful procedure for handling a great volume of cases. Perhaps it was thought that the Board members themselves would review the records of hearings and normally draft their own decisions. But this is an obvious impossibility in view of the work load. Under the review system as it had developed in the later years under the Wagner Act, the review attorneys under carefully selected supervisors studied the trial examiners' intermediate reports and any briefs and exceptions of the parties and record of oral argument, before review of the record of the hearings to check as to the adequacy and correctness in law as well as in fact of the intermediate report. In reporting to the Board the review memoranda made clear any disagreement with the trial examiners. All of these reports went to the Board members, each of whom with the aid of his legal assistant was expected to give special attention to any conflicting parts of these documents. The results were then presumed to give a sound basis for each member's judgment as to the facts and the issues, and what the essentials of the decision should be. Memoranda were drafted by the members and circulated. Then after conference and discussion by the Board the decision was made, and directions given for drafting the opinion. Drafts were frequently revised and rewritten by the members. The decisions were thus made by the Board through a constructive process of conference and accommodation of views, though independence of judgment was reflected both in the frequent reversals of trial examiners in part or sometimes in whole, and by dissents and separate concurrences by individual members.

"Taft-Hartley, however, abolished this system developed and tested by experience, and substituted instead a group of legal assistants for each Board member—in effect five little review sections. It was assumed that the Board member would supervise these assistants, and apparently that in some way the decisions would be made by the Board with more direct personal responsibility than had been true before. But no change in structure could eliminate the essential steps of consideration of the intermediate report or hearing officer's report along with briefs and exceptions of the parties, checking all against the record to whatever extent this was necessary, some process of reaching agreement as to the decision, and drafting, checking and final signing of the decision. The lack of a centralized review section introduced inefficiency. Board members themselves are not all lawyers, nor should they be, and they may not be the best qualified to supervise the technical job of reviewing a record; and the supervisors under the Board members may not all be as efficient as the carefully chosen supervisors in a central review section. Differences in ability as well as in policy are difficult to avoid in five separate review sections; and the necessary effort to maintain proper coordination and unity of policy is made extremely difficult, though not insuperable.

"With a volume of cases awaiting decision far beyond that ever handled by a circuit court, and with long records and complex issues of fact and of law to be decided, the Board members need all the help possible in getting and analyzing the information on the basis of which they make the decisions. The problem is how to insure that the review of records is done in such a way as to make decisions as nearly 'foolproof' as possible. It is impossible to believe that there has been any increase in the amount of careful consideration given by each Board member to the decision of cases. The reverse seems almost inevitable. The limitations upon the Board's discretion by such rigid prescriptions as to the machinery for decision-making prevented its developing the most efficient possible devices for handling the great volume of its work. We are convinced that the Board should be left free at its discretion to organize its work at the decision-making point in whatever way seems most efficient and helpful, delegating responsibility as it finds wise, so long as the Board itself keeps its ultimate responsibility for the decisions.

"Conclusions as to Administration

"To summarize, a unified administration should be restored, giving the Board all final authority, with the right to delegate administrative responsibility and to determine its own organization on the basis of its experience under both the Wagner Act and the Taft-Hartley Act. The Administrative Procedure Act provides adequate safeguards for the integrity of the quasi-judicial process, in our judgment. Yet it might be thought desirable for the sake of public relations to specify in the Nation Labor Relations Act the administrative separation between those members of the staff who work on the investigation and prosecution, the trial examiners, and those who review records and assist the Board in its decision-making functions. There should, however, be no policy-determining administrator within the agency not subject to control by the Board. And of course the Board should continue to be an independent agency, in order to avoid any possibility of suspicion that it is subject to administrative pressure in behalf of any special interest."

The diffusion of administrative responsibility is one of the oldest methods for extending only paper protection to workers' rights. It is not without its significance that in the Senate report on S. 1938, the bill which ultimately became the Wagner Act, under the heading "Weaknesses in existing law," the committee referred to the "excessive diffusion of administrative responsibility" in preexisting agencies handling labor problems. Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, Senate Report No. 573, page 4.

The administrative features of the Taft-Hartley Act cannot be defended. They must be dropped.

K. WELFARE FUNDS AND CHECK-OFF

Section 302 of the Taft-Hartley Act imposes criminal penalties upon certain so-called improper payments to unions. In its application to welfare funds the section limits the purpose for which trust funds may be held, it requires that they be jointly administered, and that the detailed basis on which the payments are to be made be specified in a written agreement with the employer. Certain other additional requirements are imposed upon the trust fund and its administration.

In addition, a fund established prior to January 1, 1947, is exempt from certain limitations of the act where it contains provisions for pooled vacation benefits.

The criminal provisions of the law are made applicable only in situations where the payments are to be made to the labor organization. It does not apply where the fund is under the sole control of the employer and the employees' contributions are deducted by the employer.

This unique invasion by the Federal Government into the field of insurance originated solely as a legislative act of spite in connection with the labor dispute in the coal industry.

It completely disregarded the large number of welfare insurance systems which had been functioning successfully under systems of administration made criminal by the law.

It was estimated that prior to the Taft-Hartley Act some 4,000,000 workers were covered by some form of health-benefit plan negotiated by unions and employers. These plans cover workers in a great variety of industries, such as clothing, coal mining, textile, etc.

In a study made of plans covering 600,000 workers in 1945, the Department of Labor points out that:

"A little more than a third of the employees covered by health-benefit programs included in this report are under plans which are jointly administered by the union and the employer. Another third are covered by programs for which insurance companies assume the major administrative responsibility; and somewhat less than a third are under those administered by the union."

The Taft-Hartley Act, in decreeing that welfare funds should be administered in one way and one way only, seriously hampered the growth of collective bargaining in this important field. The provision is completely inconsistent with free collective bargaining and imposes a strait-jacket on the growth of health insurance plans. Not a word of evidence was ever adduced in Congress that union administration of welfare insurance trust funds or their form were unsound. It was arbitrarily decided that even though an employer may make a deliberate judgment that he may want nothing to do with the administration of a welfare fund which he supports financially, he must nevertheless share in its administration.

The technical and complicated features of this section gave rise to the March 1948 strike in the coal mines because of the language in section 302 (c) (5) restricting the use of welfare funds for the sole and exclusive benefit of the employees of such (the contributing) employer. In addition, there can be no question that the settlement of the dispute between the musicians union and the recording companies finally reached on December 13, 1948, was prolonged because of difficulty in conforming the royalty payments provided in the fund with the restrictions contained in section 302. Here, as in connection with the field of union security, employers, and unions desirous of continuing or initiating arrangements in accordance with their wishes have been compelled to circumvent the hampering restrictions of section 302. See Rice-Stix Drygoods Co. v. St. Louis Health Institute ((E. D. Mo.) 22 L. R. R. M. 98).

The act also makes criminal all check-off of union dues from the wages of employees unless the employer has received from each employee a written authorization which cannot be irrevocable for a period of more than 1 year or beyond the termination date of the applicable collective-bargaining agreement.

Prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, figures compiled by the Bureau of Labor Statistics showed that approximately 6,000,000 workers were covered by some form of check-off provision in 1946. Automatic deduction of dues made criminal by the Taft-Hartley Act was specified for almost 60 percent of the workers while the other 40 percent provided for check-off of union dues in individual written authorizations.

Here too not a single employer appeared before a congressional committee and complained that the automatic deduction of union dues created a condition requiring Federal action. Congress legislated not with reference to any specific evil but solely for the purpose of weakening unions. Agreements providing for the check-off of union dues have been long established in American industrial relations and play an important part. These clauses promote efficiency and order in the policing of the collective-bargaining agreement.

The denial of automatic check-off of the dues of union members in a plant where collective-bargaining rights have been established is the denial of a relatively simple efficient convenience embodied in the check-off and is an insistence on forcing the union into the difficulty, the wastefulness, and the unnecessary expenditure of energies of employees whose attention might otherwise be devoted to constructive administration of the collective-bargaining contract. Where an employer accepts in good faith the principles of collective bargaining and accepts the union as an organization with which he is prepared to live and cooperate during the term of the contract there is usually no excuse for refusal to make the administration of the contract and the operation of the employees' organization as efficient and as simple as possible.

To make the deduction of dues contingent upon individually signed authorizations is to ignore the fact that the check-off is a subject matter of collective bargaining as to which the union as the collective-bargaining representative has a right to speak for the employees in the bargaining unit. It encourages a disregard for the union as the agent of the employees and permits the employer to play the members against the union itself. Moreover, outlawry of the automatic check-off encourages individual employees to evade their fair share of financial responsibility for the cost of running the union.

A very serious objection to this section of the law has been its application to other fields. Many employers have refused to pay union grievance committeemen on the ground that it would be a crime to do so. Union officers have been denied seniority for time spent on union work on the ground that this would be an improper payment within the meaning of the law. Other types of traditional payments or rewards for union officers have been stopped by employers on the ground that they constitute illegal payments.

This section of the law is one of the most complex and ambiguous of all of its provisions. It has provoked serious controversy as to the form of check-off card which would be acceptable with the result that the Department of Justice and the general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board have taken opposing stands with respect to the appropriateness of certain types of voluntary check-off cards. It is important not only that these provisions be repealed and that free collective bargaining be restored but that it be made clear, as I have already indicated, that collective bargaining for check-off provisions validated by the Wagner Act are not subject to the restrictive requirements of local law.

This section of the law reflects an evil which is at the root of the entire Taft-Hartley Act, namely, the dictation by Government of the terms of the collective agreement. The Taft-Hartley Act dictates such collective-bargaining terms as welfare funds, pensions, check-off, closed shop, and feather bedding. And the provisions relating to suits against unions in the Federal courts have dictated the negotiation of exculpatory clauses in contracts. Those who have joyfully injected the Government into collective-bargaining relations apparently fail to realize that this process is a two-way street which will inevitably result in the elimination of traditional management rights in collective-bargaining matters through political pressures. This has been the experience of many European countries.

L. LAWLESSNESS AGAINST UNIONS AND UNION MEMBERS

I have repeatedly throughout this testimony emphasized that the effects of the Taft-Hartley Act have been extremely broad and that a proper view of the impact of this legislation upon labor relationships in this country cannot be obtained merely from an analysis of the law and its administration.

One of the most shocking consequences of the law is the manner in which it has stimulated a wide variety of lawless acts and attitudes on the part of State and municipal authorities. We refer here to only a few of the more outstanding examples of what has occurred.

On April 23, 1948, there took place in Kansas City, Kans., a shockingly inhuman assault upon the striking Packinghouse Workers of the Cudahy Packing Co. by the Kansas City, Kans., police.

According to a staff correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Selwyn Pepper, an investigation disclosed the following facts surrounding the beating of the striking employees by the Kansas City police:

(1) Police acted in response to open pressure from the Kansas City Chamber of Commerce, which issued an ultimatum to the mayor demanding the police "get tough" with the strikers.

(2) Without a court order, police took it upon themselves to reduce the number of pickets on the line from about 15 to 10, then, wielding night sticks, they ordered other strikers standing idly on the sidewalks nearby to get into their union hall. When some of the strikers were slow in moving, the police struck them with their clubs.

(3) Then police broke into the hall and continued beating men and women until all had fled from the building. Assistant Chief Eli Dahlin admitted he lost control of his men. The hall was wrecked.

(4) No arrests were made.

The day before the police attack upon the strikers, the chamber of commerce called upon the mayor demanding that he instruct the police to act against the strikers. The police chief received orders to change the tactics of the police and he reluctantly agreed to crack down upon the strikers.

According to a reporter of the Kansas City Star, Albert E. Robinson, Captain Dahlin, who was placed in command of the police detail at the Cudahy plant, told a group of policemen whom he had assembled for the purpose—about 70 in all—

"We are not going to get pushed around any more. We will meet force with force and we will not yield an inch of ground. If the strikers insist on violence, there are going to be some skulls cracked, because we are going to get tough.

"We are going to limit the pickets to 10 whether we have the legal authority at the moment or not."

The uniformed policemen and others armed with pistols and nightsticks then got into automobiles and rode to the Cudahy plant.

Here is the account of one of the strikers of what happened at that point:

"The cops assembled, Captain Dahlin talked to them, and then they began to clear the sidewalks. I started down the south side of Kansas Avenue and a cop told me, 'Get off the street.' I told him, 'This is a public street; I haven't done anything.'

"He let me have it with a billy club; hit me on the left arm. I cut through some parked cars and started to cross the street. Some more coppers in the street hit me about four licks on the back and hips before I could get inside our hall.

"I went to the front end of the hall and stood at the double door. I noticed the police safety car in front. Captain Dahlin began speaking over a loudspeaker. Then someone closed the double door. Frank Rose, one of our committeemen, opened the door and hollered to the captain that he wanted to talk to him.

"Next thing I knew the captain kicked the door in and glass flew everywhere. He came right on in and the police followed right after. They started hitting me. They were trying to get in and I was trying to get out.

"I fell over two women lying on the floor at the door leading into the hall. (There is a small waiting room between the front entrance and the door to the large meeting hall.) I got up, ran to the side door and was hit two or three times more before I got out.

"I went to the parking lot and Lieutenant Jones came up. He told us, 'Go home before you get it worse.' He asked me if I saw him swinging a club. I told him I didn't and that was true. Jones almost cried. He said, 'I hated to see this but it was orders from higher up.'"

As a result of the completely illegal actions of the police, 10 persons were hurt seriously enough to go to hospitals and about 40 others, including taxicab drivers and other passers-by, suffered injuries.

Another product of the Taft-Hartley Act was the strike of the United Steelworkers of America against the Nashville Corp. On August 20, 1947, the CIO union defeated the machinists in an election 903 to 464. But because the steelworkers had not submitted to the filing requirements of the law, the Labor Board refused to certify it, thus forcing a strike. In its strikebreaking tactics the company not only sought to enjoin peaceful picketing, but also filed unfair labor practice charges against the union for alleged violations of the Taft-Hartley Act. After these charges were dismissed by the general counsel the company nevertheless filed two suits in the Federal court against the same union based on the same claim of alleged violations of the Taft-Hartley Act.

The circumstances surrounding the Nashville Corp. strike illustrate the manner in which the Taft-Hartley Act has popularized lawsuits against unions and stimulated police brutality. Almost 100 separate legal actions were brought against the union and its members, either by the company or by the local law enforcement officials. The great majority of these actions were frivolous and completely without foundation and were dismissed in the courts.

Almost as soon as the strike commenced Lynn Bomar, the head of the Tennessee State Highway Patrol, was called in personally to take charge of the situation. He kept on the scene a large force of highway patrolmen, estimated by some to be as high as 50 automobiles loaded with from 2 to 4 patrolmen in a car. The patrolmen were equipped with tommyguns which they flourished freely and which they used to push the pickets around while they threatened and cursed them. The police simply arrested anyone whom it struck their fancy to arrest. Representatives of the union were arrested, imprisoned, and then released in a systematic way. One individual on the picket line was arrested for vagrancy. Bomar personally took the witness stand to testify that the defendant had made some comments about PAC that Bomar did not like and that the reason the arrest of this particular individual was made was because Bomar wanted to get him away from the picket line. The court dismissed the charge.

A staff representative was present in the vicinity of the picket line, driving his brother's car which bears a Maryland license. He was arrested on the charge of violating the Tennessee automobile license law although he had actually been in the State for a period less than the grace period allowed in the law before local licenses are to be applied for. After this representative was taken to the jail, he was severely beaten and to justify the beating, the charge of resisting arrest was added to the other charges against him.

A third union representative was arrested and charged with public lewdness. This charge was based on the fact that the sound truck which the union had been using to play phonograph records included records, frequently played by unions to bolster morale in labor disputes, which Bomar did not like. This charge was dismissed.

The union brought an action in the Federal court to enjoin Bomar and his State police from interfering with its picket lines. Two of the leading witnesses at this hearing, both of them presenting their testimony against Bomar, were thereafter stopped in a car in which they were riding and charged with reckless driving. They were beaten by the two officers who made the arrest. These officers then took them not to jail or to a court, but to the area of the plant where Bomar was stationed. They then picked up Bomar and drove around in the car with the two union members, beating them again with blackjacks before taking them to jail.

The CIO desires to emphasize to the committee that one of the greatest dangers to peaceful and decent labor relations in this country, a danger which has been intensified by the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, is the intervention by police officials in labor disputes for the purpose of imposing upon workers the viewpoints of their employers. One CIO union was recently forced to go to court to prevent members of the Indiana State police from attending union meetings, taking notes of what occurred. The court granted the injunction against the State police and pointed out (Local 303, United Furniture Workers v. Gates (21 L. R. R. M. 2233, 2234):

"The evidence definitely establishes the fact that the presence of the State police has kept the members of the union from openly discussing the matters which relate to purposes of the meetings, for example, the affairs of the union and the strike it is conducting. It is further shown that little actual business is accomplished when the State police are in attendance because the plaintiffs feel restrained from discussing their union problems and affairs at such times. A witness for the plaintiffs testified that reports covering the gathering of funds to support the strike and their disbursement to union members are not read or discussed when the State police officers are present. Another witness testified as follows: 'We can't speak our minds while the police are there.'

"The plaintiffs' undisputed evidence is that during the strike the State police have maintained friendly associations with the officials of the Smith Manufacturing Co., but that their attitude toward the strikers has been unsympathetic and unfriendly. The State police officers have been requested repeatedly by the union representatives and members to leave the meetings and to state their reasons for being there. The officers have refused to leave as requested and also have refused to give any reason for their presence."

Here are other instances of violence against unions and union members.

Tallapoosa, Ga., is a town with a population of approximately 2,000 people. The town depends upon a thread mill which employs approximately 500 persons who live in a mill village. This thread mill is part of a chain of 10 mills located in 7 States including some in New England with which the union has contractual relations. In November 1947, the union assigned an organizer to the mill. She was a widow who had raised six children, the oldest having served in the Army for 4 years. She had worked in cotton mills all her life. She was a resident of Athens, Ga. For approximately 2 months prior to November 17 she went to Tallapoosa each week and remained there 1 or 2 days. She contacted workers and was securing representation cards looking toward an NLRB election. The response from the workers was good and she decided to rent a room and remain in the community for about a week. She finally secured a room in a boarding house. The evening of the very day upon which she rented the room, the wives of the plant superintendent and an overseer visited the boarding house keeper and they and the organizer engaged in some sewing and general conversation. Shortly, thereafter, the superintendent's wife left after a private discussion with the boarding house keeper. Around midnight that night, while the organizer was in bed, four armed men with shotguns invaded her room through a window and five women joined them, declaring that they did not want "no God damn CIO here." They dragged her in her bed clothes from her bed, tied her with a rope, carried her to a waiting truck outside and drove her off a long distance from Tallapoosa where they dumped her outside the road. They left her there with the threat "Don't came back to Tallapoosa or you will be shot on sight."

Cuthbert and Buena Vista, Ga., are two adjacent small towns in the southwestern part of the State, which have a population of about 2,000 people. The towns are dominated by three lumber companies. The CIO organizing committee had organized the workers of these plants as members of the International Woodworkers Union. Despite the fact that such ordinances are clearly unconstitutional, the city council, composed in part of executives of the lumber companies, adopted an ordinance requiring organizers to secure a license. Under this ordinance, union organizers were arrested and are kept under surveillance by the local police. Shots were fired into union meetings. Threats were made to burn the church attended by union members. Nevertheless, the union secured an overwhelming majority of representation cards in the several companies. However, the companies refuse to recognize the union or to consent to an election. Petitions for elections filed in January 1948 went to hearing on April 7, 1948. Though no issues were involved, one of the companies insisted, in a 33-page brief filed on May 24, 1948, after two extensions were granted, that the Board should not process the case because the CIO had not filed documents required by section 9 (f) (g) and (h) of the act. This position is argued in the brief at great length despite the fact that the Board had held that the CIO was not required to file. The International Woodworkers of America has qualified under the act.

A strike occurred in one of these plants and immediate restraining orders prohibiting all picketing were secured. Workers on strike were arrested indiscriminately on charges of vagrancy. In Buena Vista strikers were evicted from their homes. Chattel mortgages on their pigs were foreclosed. Other acts of oppression occurred. A striker was seen talking to a friend. He was immediately arrested on a charge of breach of the peace. When his lawyer came to see him and while he was speaking to his client on his porch, a town marshall rushed up to him and, flourishing his gun, demanded to know by what right the lawyer was speaking to his client. He was immediately joined by an armed group of eight men. They said they came to protect the defendant "against the CIO." The lawyer complained to the sheriff about this show of armed force and was blandly informed by the sheriff that he did not know that this had occurred and therefore would do nothing about it. The case against the defendant was continued from week to week and finally the defendant was held for the grand jury on the charge of breach of the peace and the friend to whom he had spoken was held for the grand jury on the charge of perjury because he had testified that the defendant had made no threats against him. This strike was broken. The workers were blacklisted and were dispersed as laborers in the outlying farm district.

It is significant that the wages in these lumber mills were 40 cents per hour for women and 45 cents to 50 cents per hour for men.

In the small towns in the eastern part of North Carolina, local police terrorize workers by insisting upon attending union meetings and forcing their way into workers' homes to question them about union activities. In Roanoke Rapids, Va., agents of the Internal Revenue Department took workers out of a mill being organized and forced their way into the homes of workers on the pretex that they were investigating income-tax returns which had been filled out with the aid of the union organizer.

In Columbia, S. C., on March 7, 1948, a gang of thugs invaded a union square-dance party, seized the union organizer, dragged him into a side room and there beat him with brass knuckles and a blunt instrument, fracturing his skull in seven places.

In Rome, Ga., the management of a textile plant, intent upon smashing the union, engaged in a course of conduct during the past year refusing to bargain collectively with the union on any issue and refusing to settle any grievances. As the contract neared expiration, negotiations began for a new agreement. Management insisted that before it would discuss any other issues the union abandon top seniority, the voluntary check-off, and assume full liability for strikes and other violations of agreement terms. During the course of the negotiations, company officials began securing licenses for themselves and employees to carry guns. A strike began on March 28, 1948, and is still current. The company secured an immediate restraining order. Many workers have been arrested on a variety of charges. Eviction proceedings have been instituted to oust about 75 strikers from company houses. One unarmed striker was shot by a company overseer. One worker was shot by a scab while sitting in his home. A woman was stabbed. Here indeed is armed warfare. Charges have been filed with the NLRB alleging refusal to bargain beginning April 17, 1947, and continuing to March 1948. An amended complaint was issued by the general counsel on May 18, 1948. No hearing has as yet been held. In the meantime the company has succeeded in bringing in strikebreakers to man its first, second, and now its third shifts.

We do not believe that the instances we have supplied the committee of lawlessness against unions and their members are isolated or unrepresentative. Every day the evidence accumulates of lawlessness, violence, and disregard of the constitutional rights of working people. The actions of State executives in summoning the State police upon the demand of employer interests, the viciousness of many law-enforcement agencies, such as the Tennessee State Police, in mishandling strikers, the readiness of State court judges to issue injunctions banning pickets—all of these sinister developments are definitely related to the Taft-Hartley Act and its impact upon American labor relations.

M. REPRESENTATION PROVISIONS

(1) Plant guards and professional employees.—This provision of the Taft-Hartley Act provides that plant guards must belong to autonomus unions and that professional employees, as elaborately defined therein, are to enjoy special unit severance rights. I believe that both these sections improperly interfere with the discretion of the Board in an area where complete flexibility should be maintained. The problem of shaping bargaining units depends upon such matters as bargaining history, the functional cohesiveness of the groups involved, the effectiveness of a single or a split unit for the purpose of collective bargaining and other matters, a consideration of which should not be foreclosed by statute.

The Taft-Hartley Act provision which requires autonomous unions of guards is an improper interference with the right of self-organization. Before the Taft-Hartley Act was passed, the Labor Board under the Wagner Act established adequate safeguards to insure that the union affiliation of guards would not render them incapable of adequately enforcing their duties. As in the case of supervisors, the Board has expanded the meaning of this section. It has interpreted "guard" to include watchmen and workers who in fact cannot be distinguished from rank-and-file employees. See Matter of C. V. Hill & Co. (21 L. R. R. M. 1172; Matter of Young Patrol Service (21 L. R. R. M. 1046); Matter of Chrysler Corporation (22 L. R. R. M. 1394).

(2) Company unions.—The act forbids the Board to consider the fact of affiliation in determining whether an organization is company-dominated both for purposes of the representation provisions of the act and for the purposes of the unfair labor practice sections of the act. Many CIO unions have reported that under the stimulus of these provisions company-unionism has revived and is flourishing in areas where it had been successfully stamped out.

This too is an improper handicap of the Board's discretion. In determining whether an organization is dominated it should be for the Board to decide under all the circumstances whether in fact the organization is a bona fide organization or a dominated one.

The Taft-Hartley Act in foreclosing the exercise of the Board's discretion disregards the historic fact that an inside unaffiliated union which is company-dominated and supported stands uniquely before the employees as the employer's candidate and must be permanently disestablished because, if permitted to continue, it will inevitably be identified with the management which called it into existence and coerced the employees to join it. The appearance of such a union on an election ballot thwarts the purposes of the act.

However, in the case of an affiliated organization the very fact of its affiliation draws to it strength and independence outside of the employer's direction and control. Consequently employer assistance never extends to the point of domination. But to assume, as the act does, that no conclusions with respect to the legitimate character of an organization can be drawn under any circumstances from affiliation or lack of affiliation is simply to blind oneself to the facts of life. Here too, of course, we find another instance of that "falsely conceived mutuality" which robs workers of their rights by insisting upon equal treatment of the traditionally unequal.

(3) Decertification elections and elections upon employer petitions.—Both of these types of elections which the Taft-Hartley Act added to the Wagner Act have become routine weapons in the antilabor employer's arsenal. The files of our organization are full of instances reported to us of employers who have instigated decertification petitions and thus actually used the processes of the Board for the purpose of defeating self-organization. Employer petitions are as well simply a means whereby an election may be prematurely engineered through a petition filed after an inside favored group has requested recognition. It is an ideal means for replacing a striking union with a hastily formed strikebreakers organization.

(4) Other unsound representation provisions.—The Board's discretion in the field of elections has been strait-jacketed by two other provisions which are worthy of note because our experience so clearly demonstrates their destructive character.

The first of these provisions bars the Board from holding an election for any period shorter than 12 months after a valid election has been held. While under the Wagner Act it was the Board's normal practice to deny election petitions filed within 12 months after an earlier election had been held, nevertheless it exercised its discretion to order such elections within shorter periods where it would effectuate the purposes of the act to do so.

It is vital that the Board have his discretion if employees are to enjoy the full benefits of self-organization. In many instances elections are held under unrepresentative circumstances and an employer may have an expanding labor force which may make appropriate or desirable the holding of a second election long before 12 months have expired. An industry may be of such a changing or seasonal character as to make appropriate the holding of elections within short periods of time.

There is likewise no good reason why the act should impose upon the Board a prohibition against deeming the "extent of organization" a controlling factor in determining an appropriate bargaining unit. The factor of "extent of organization" was developed by the Board as a guide in fashioning units in certain areas where organization would be impossible without it, such as department stores and utilities. The Board determined in such cases that it would be unfair to the already organized employees to force them to wait until an ideal unit of large scope became organized. This provision is a gross interference with administrative discretion and was merely passed to make self-organization more difficult.

N. DEFINITION OF EMPLOYER AND EMPLOYEE

One of the subtler forms of attack upon employee rights embodied in the Taft-Hartley Act is the redefinition of the term "employer" so as to define that term to include "any person acting as an agent of an employer" rather than as the Wagner Act provided, "any person acting in the interests of an employer." This definition had two effects: (1) To limit the employer's liability to common law rules of agency, and (2) it prevented the Board from proceeding against an employer association as an independent respondent when such an association sought to engage in unfair labor practices against employees. Only where the employer association acts as an agent of an employer can the Labor Board now reach it. See N. L. R. B. v. Sun Tent-Luchbert Co. (151 F. (2d) 483; 154 F. (2d) 108).

The Taft-Hartley Act has opened the door to the antilabor employer association. Information which has come to me clearly shows that employer associations are assuming an extremely active and dangerous role in antiunion activities. The Wagner Act originally defined employer so as to make it possible to proceed against employer associations because it was recognized that antiunion weapons in the hands of employer associations are an even more serious and effective threat to freedom of self-organization than are the same weapons in the hands of a single employer. Employer associations wield special weapons against union members, such as the blacklist, which are not within an individual employer's grasp. The activities of such associations against organized labor constitute one of the most shameful pages in our labor history.

The definition of employee was also changed by the Taft-Hartley Act so as to exclude "any individual having the status of independent contractor." The effect of this has been to make the definition of employment in a Federal statute depend upon local common-law definitions of who is an employee, definitions which evolved in connection with duties unrelated to the purposes or the needs of a Federal labor law. Of course it was the purpose of this changed definition in the Taft-Hartley Act to bar certain individuals from the protection of Federal labor policy. The same kind of thinking was responsible for the restriction of social security coverage which produced, and properly so, such a vigorous reaction among our people.

In order to achieve the purpose of protecting self-organization and promoting uniformity in the enjoyment of Federal rights, the Wagner Act definitions of employer and employee should be restored.

O. DISCHARGE FOR UNION ACTIVITY

One of the hopes of the sponsors of the act was to weaken the protections of unions which it permitted to remain in the Taft-Hartley Act so as to make them ineffective. This technique was used in connection with the protections against discrimination by writing into the law a provision in section 10 (b) to the effect that "no order of the Board shall require the reinstatement of any individual as an employee who has been suspended or discharged, or the payment to him of any back pay, if such individual was suspended or discharged for cause."

It was this section of the law that President Truman had in mind when in his message vetoing the Taft-Hartley bill he pointed out, "The bill would make it easier for an employer to get rid of employees whom he wished to discharge because they exercised their right of self-organization guaranteed by the act. It would permit an employer to dismiss a man on the pretext of a slight infraction of shop rules, even though his real motive was to discriminate against this employee for union activity."

In an increasing number of cases the Board has absolved employers from charges of extremely discriminatory practices. See, for example, Matter of Young Patrol Service (75 N. L. R. B. 404); Matter of Cleveland Graphite Bronze Company (75 N. L. R. B. 481); Matter of Fulton Bag and Cotton Mills (75 N. L.

R. B. 883); Matter of Cedartown Yarn Mills, Inc. (76 N. L. R. B. 571); Matter of Goldblatt Bros. (77 N. L R. B. 204); Matter of Fontaine Converting Works (77 N. L. R. B. 1386).

The Board's denial of the protection against discrimination appears particularly sharply in connection with the rights of strikers. In Matter of Fontaine Converting Works (77 N. L. R. B. 1386), the employees went on strike to obtain a foreman's reinstatement. Although the strikers were plainly fired because of their concerted activity, the Board refused to extend them the protections of the act.

In Matter of National Electric Products Corp. (66 C. 1147), a union leader was fired and the Board conceded that this was an act of discrimination. It also conceded that any appeal through the established grievance machinery would have been useless. In order to redress this injustice the employees picketed the plant to win the reinstatement of the discharged worker. The employer thereupon fired the pickets as well. The Board nevertheless refused to order the reinstatement of the pickets even though the contract had not been violated by the picketing. The only remedy, said the Board, that the employees had was to file unfair labor practice charges. In short, even though the employees struck against their employer's unfair labor practices, they were not protected by the act.

Board Member Houston in his dissent clearly shows the nature of the Board's retreat in connection with this important protection:

"I am in full agreement with the majority that the discharge of Marfia was discriminatory. I must, however, dissent from the conclusion of my colleagues that the suspension of the picketers was not a violation of the Act because I consider that they were engaged in concerted activity protected not only by the Wagner Act but also under the recent amendatory legislation.

"Although this is a case of first impression, the Board has established a number of guide posts in past decisions which, in my judgment, clearly draw a line beyond which disciplinary action by an employer would not be permitted despite the fact that his employees had engaged in concerted activity in violation of contract. Most pertinent in this connection is the Scullin Steel case in which the Board found that an employer properly discharged employees who engaged in a strike in violation of a contractual provision binding them not to strike during the term of their agreement. We were careful to note, however, in that decision that that employer, quite unlike the employer here, had not engaged in any unfair labor practices. The direct implication of such language was that had such unfair labor practices been shown, a different result would have followed. I should have thought that here where the record is very clear that the discharge of Marfia—an unfair labor practice of the most fundamental character—was the direct cause for the picketing that we would be bound by the implication in the Scullin Steel case. But the majority has determined that no protection ought to be given because the employees should have relied upon the 'remedial processes of the Board.' What this amounts to is that employees may be deprived of a basic right because an administrative remedy for their complaint exists. My colleagues must be aware, however, that the amendments of 1947 which placed restrictions in a number of instances on the right to strike disclose in their legislative history a total rejection of the idea that the right to strike should be restricted further in the manner now utilized by the majority. Omitted from the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 was a provision passed by the House outlawing 'any strike * * * to remedy practices for which an administrative remedy is available under this Act.' Moreover, section 13 of the present act reenacts the guaranty of the Wagner Act of the right to strike except as specifically limited by the present act. I have been directed to nothing in the present legislation from which it can be even inferred that Congress intended a limitation of the nature imposed by the Board here.

"Of course, it is true, as my colleagues state, that no-strike clauses are substitutes for economic warfare, and, consequently, are very salutary supports to industrial peace. However, such commitments are found in agreements which must have some inhibitory effect not only on the employees but also on employers. It is something less than just to say that an employer who has secured from his employees a relinquishment of their basic right to strike may remain, nevertheless, quite unhampered in whatever arrangements he has made to impose heavy penalties on his employees solely because they protested, in a traditional way, his disposition to violate the law. And it is something less than equitable to hold that he may do so with impunity merely by insisting that he has a contract forbidding his employees to protest. Yet a decision of this character permits exactly such a result."

In the National Grinding Wheel case (75 N. L. R. B. 905), the employer justified his refusal to reinstate certain strikers on the ground that he had "heard that they had quit." Although the evidence showed that they had not quit, nevertheless the Board held that the employer's belief that they had quit was sufficient to justfy his refusal to rehire them.

The discrimination provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act have virtually ceased to be an effective protection against the still formidable weapon of employer discrimination. The act and the Board's administration of it has encouraged every antilabor employer in the land to gamble on the use of discrimination as a strikebreaking weapon in the hope that it can persuade the Board that the discharge was for "cause."

In dissenting in this case, Board Member Houston pointed out—

"Clench, Davignon, and Heubusch were participants with their fellow employees in a strike for higher wages. Shortly after the strike began, and for an understandable reason—the need to support their families—they applied to other employers for work. Having been advised that employment would involve a relinquishment of their employment with the respondent, and it appearing that this condition was inflexible, they pretended agreement. Upon termination of the strike, and after an invitation by the respondent, they returned and requested that they be given their jobs. They were rebuffed, despite the fact that their places had not been filled, despite the fact that they were not told that there was no work available, and although they at no time had informed the respondent that they had quit. The refusal to reinstate them was made with the assertion that the respondent had learned from 'undisclosed sources' that they had accepted permanent jobs elsewhere and, consequently, had quit the respondent's employ. Slight attention was paid to their repeated disclaimers and they have not been employed. In bare essentials, these are the facts upon which my colleagues have decided that these employees ought not to be reinstated. Although the issue appears quite simple, its disposition by the majority carries the most intensely significant implication that the equality between an employer and his striking employees, sought hitherto so religiously to be preserved in these circumstances, now has been set awry by overweighting the balance in favor of the former.

"We discovered early the necessity for setting out a code of rights and obligations so that an equitable balance might be fixed between the interests of employer and employee in our industrial society, when economic rivalry culminated in a strike. At that point it became important that each contestant should conduct himself with full knowledge not only of his liberties but of reasonable limitations imposed on his conduct by fairness. Our formulation of principles to govern the relationship of an employer and his striking employees took careful account of the need to protect the former in his right to operate his business. That this right should be meaningful, he was left free to replace the strikers. He was also left free to refuse to reinstate the strikers if he had replaced them, if he had no work for them due to a legitimate change in operations resulting in the elimination of the type of job, or if they had seized his property, engaged in violence, or struck in violation of a contractual obligation not to do so. These protections were granted so that he might compete upon a fair basis with the strikers. Correlatively, and in order to establish a milieu of freedom for the striker, his right to reinstatement was protected. Not without qualifications, however. He must have unconditionally abandoned his strike, and he must not have been replaced. These qualifications met, his right to return was guaranteed against discrimination by his employer. These correlative principles are well established. Their essential desirability lies in their definitive justness and in the fact that their applicability is made facile because it is quickly ascertainable from the proof in any case. I have set them out only because, as I have said, I find that the majority, although apparently aware of them, has created an imbalance between them by granting an added defense to an employer which so comprehensively sanctions any refusal to reinstate strikers as to make that right quite empty.

"The majority decision amounts to this: That an employer who has not replaced his striking employees and who has work for them may nevertheless refuse to reinstate them, because he has a reasonable belief that they have disqualified themselves. He may assert any number and variety of excuses, drawn from undisclosed sources and, according to my colleagues' decision, if this Board is impressed with the reasonableness of his attitude he is protected in his refusal. The validity of his defense will not be judged by actuality, i. e., whether the striker in fact was disqualified. This is deemed to be immaterial. Although this concept of reasonableness has a surface appeal and outwardly appears equitable, its ramifications in this context invite gross injustices. Consider with what criteria we should judge an employer's assertion that he barred a striker for whom he had a place because he had heard from an undisclosed source that the employee drank, beat his wife, failed to pay his bills, did not attend church, changed his job frequently, flirted, gambled, or was guilty of kindred immoralities. Consider also that the employee was in fact not guilty of any of these frailties. It would be extremely absorbing even if it were somewhat frustrating to deliberate upon the precise measure of doubt we should have to entertain of his innocence before we should be prepared to certify as reasonable his employer's belief that he was guilty."

An important reason for restoring the Wagner Act is the imperative need to provide effective protections against discrimination.

P. SUPERVISORY EMPLOYEES

The act wholly bars to supervisory employees all rights to self-organization and collective bargaining. Under the act an employer may with impunity discharge a supervisory employee for union activity.

This provision of the act invites industrial warfare and the use of economic power against individuals seeking to exercise a basic right to join a union. By inviting such discrimination the section threatens an evil far beyond its apparent intention. Since the provision permits discrimination against certain employees its inevitable effect will be to create an atmosphere in which all the employees not merely supervisory employees are intimidated. What employee will feel free to join any kind of union when he sees that supervisory employees suffer mass discharges merely because they join a union of their own choice? In short, this section will undermine the basic organization protection for nonsupervisory employees.

This section is based upon the specious argument that unless a line is drawn between the employees and supervisors, labor organizations will divide the loyalty of supervisors to management and impede its functioning. At the time the Wagner Act was passed the same employers who now make this argument also argued that a worker could not be a member of a union and a faithful employee at the same time and that his obligations to management were inconsistent to union membership. The cry of divided loyalty is one which is typically raised for the purpose of defeating organizational rights.

In defining the term "supervisor" the act uses the term so broadly as to include within it many employees who have traditionally been regarded as eligible for union membership and properly within an appropriate bargaining unit.

The effect of the Board's decisions in interpreting this section of the act is to permit employers to remove from the organizational force a large group of personnel simply by designating them as supervisors.

The existence of the present provision in the act denying benefits to supervisors does more than do injustice to a large group of American employees who need the benefits of collective bargaining. It opens the door to widespread evasions of the bargaining obligation and defeat of organizational attempts by unions through the wholesale creation of supervisors as that term is broadly defined in the Taft-Hartley Act.

The attempt of employers to utilize the provisions of the law for the purpose of weakening the union may be seen in the west coast controversy over the including within the bargaining unit of ships' clerks and walking bosses.

All the predictions made by labor with respect to the effect of the denial of organizational protection to supervisors have been verified by our experience with this provision of the law. In such industries as shipbuilding, employers have demanded the dilution of a bargaining unit by exclusion of such type of individuals as leaders and leading men, although prior to the Taft-Hartley Act individuals much closer to mangement were regarded as employees and not supervisors and hence eligible for union membership.

Employers in this and other industries have used the supervisor's immunity from protection to discharge such individuals who have refused to cross a picket line in the case of strikes and to discharge rank and file employees because they struck against management discrimination against foremen. See Matter of Fontaine Converting Works (77 N. L. R. B. 1386).

CONCLUSION

I have detailed some of the objections of the Congress of Industrial Organizations to the Taft-Hartley Act. I should emphasize that I have not attempted to discuss all of the ways in which our organization has suffered as a result of the act and its administration. I have not touched upon matters about which labor feels keenly, such as the delays occasioned by the statutes and the great variety of time-consuming elections which were authorized under the statute, the unreasonably short period of limitations for the filing of unfair labor practice charges, the attempted exclusion of unions from the grievance procedure and other matters. This law has not served the needs of industrial peace. It has been bad for business, for labor and for the public. It has turned the clock back on progress in the field of industrial relations.

STATEMENT OF CLARK C. SORENSON, DIRECTOR OF PERSONNEL, HARRIS-SEYBOLD CO., CLEVELAND, OHIO

My name is Clark C. Sorensen. I am the director of personnel of Harris-Seybold Co., Cleveland, Ohio. Our company is one of the largest producers of graphic arts machinery, manufacturing various types of printing presses, paper cutters, and a wide variety of graphic arts equipment. During the last fiscal year our sales were approximately $20,000,000.

In our plants at Cleveland and Dayton we have some 1,600 employees. At one plant, we bargain with the United Automobile Workers (CIO). At the other, we bargain with the United Electrical Workers (CIO). In addition, we bargain with the Pattern Makers League (AFL) and with the International Association of Machinists (Ind.).

My purpose in appearing before this committee is not to discuss the Taft-Hartley Act in its entirety, but to tell you what this act means to me and to my company in the practical conduct of labor relations, and in the operation of our business. We feel that are others better qualified than we are to inform you about the fairness and the importance to employees, to employers and to the public of many of its provisions.

There are six main provisions of the act which, in our own experience, are of great importance to a company such as ours which has bargained collectively with several unions for a number of years. Not necessarily in order of importance, these are the provisions relating to (1) union duty to bargain; (2) union contract responsibility; (3) freedom of speech; (4) secondary boycotts and jurisdictional strikes; (5) exclusion of supervisors; (6) union discrimination, coercion, and interference.

I should like to tell you briefly what each of these provisions means to us, and why we believe that they should be retained.

1. Union duty to bargain (secs. 8 (b), 8 (d)).—The ultimate objects of the act are, and should continue to be, the promotion of collective bargaining and the maintenance of stable employer-employee relations. But these are objects which can be achieved only through the maturity of mutual understanding, respect and confidence and the full exchange of facts and ideas across the conference table. Maturity is vital to successful collective bargaining, and maturity comes only through responsibility.

Collective bargaining cannot be a one-way street. Each of the parties must have the duty to try in good faith to reach agreement if the process is to have any long-range chance of success. Particularly as we move from a seller's to a buyer's market and a more normal economic level, it is of the utmost importance that both parties have the duty to bargain in good faith concerning mutual problems as they arise. The "take it or leave it" philosophy should have no part in the settlement of such problems.

Based upon our own experience, there is not the slightest doubt that requiring unions as well as employers to bargain in good faith has contributed immeasurably to accomplishment of the main objects of the act. And the provisions (sec. 8 (d)) maintaining the status quo for a limited period while proposed changes in a contract are negotiated, have done much to substitute sincere bargaining for economic force.

2. Union contract responsibility (sec. 301).—By law and even more as a practical matter, collective bargaining does not end with the signing of a labor contract. That is only the important first step. Throughout the life of the contract, provisions must be interpreted, grievances must be adjusted, problems must be faced and solved if the mutual objectives of employees, management, stockholders, and customers are to be achieved.

Like the process of bargaining to arrive at a union contract, the continuous bargaining process under it must be accompanied by responsibility on the part of both parties to observe it. As in the case of any other contract, responsibility is imposed and assured only if there is an effective way to enforce it.

The purpose of providing an effective remedy for breach of the labor contract by either party is not to provide a means of litigating rather than negotiating disputes. Quite the contrary, the purpose is to encourage the realization that true collective bargaining and stable labor relations involve, among other things, observance of the collective agreement by both parties.

Again, it is clear to me that the provisions of the act providing both parties to a labor contract with an effective remedy to enforce it has greatly strengthened the process of peaceful negotiation of differences.

3. Freedom of speech (sec. 8 (c)).—Sometimes, as is perfectly natural, there is disagreement between our employees and us concerning the settlement of a dispute or some action which is proposed by one or the other of us. But for practical reasons, the employees are represented in collective bargaining by a small committee. In consequence, unless we are free to present our views and the facts as we see them to all of our employees, we are forced to rely upon a union committee, which is not and should not be nonpartisan, to do it for us. Such a result is obviously not fair to our employees, to the union, or to us.

Moreover, in our experience, freedom of both parties to speak out against actual or supposed unreasonableness or ill-advised action inevitably strengthens the collective bargaining process. In the long run, it exposes and therefore discourages intemperate action and arbitrary demands by either party. In the short run, it provides maximum assurance that a fair and practical settlement will be reached.

Our right to express our views and give the facts as they appear to us cannot be honestly questioned so long as we do not interfere with the legitimate right of our employees to act according to their own lights. Otherwise, we are deprived of our only effective means of insuring full and fair consideration by our employees of our problems and proposals, and of the respective merits of divergent views of the union and of management.

It seems clear to us that particularly as mutual problems increase in this transition period, it is imperative that we be free to speak whenever the need arises.

4. Secondary boycotts and jurisdictional strikes (secs. 8 (b) (4), 10 (k), 10 (l), 303).—Many of the printing presses and paper cutters which we manufacture are very large and must be assembled and installed by skilled workers in the customer's plant where they are to be used. Thereafter, skilled servicing is required from time to time. To provide for these services, we maintain a number of sales and service offices throughout the United States and Canada.

These facts, as well as the nature of our products, bring us into close contact with the graphic arts and printing industry, and a number of printing and other craft unions. Aside from the familiar rivalry of CIO and AFL unions, we are constantly exposed to rivalry between craft unions and to disputes between another employer and a union of his employees. In none of these situations do we have a bargaining relationship with the other union or unions in question. Nor do we have any practical way to get to the bottom of the dispute and try to settle it.

The fact that our own labor policies and relations with our employees may be good does nothing to relieve us from the paralyzing consequences of a secondary boycott or strike in connection with a dispute in which we are only an innocent bystander. Yet prior to the Taft-Hartley Act we were helpless to confine the area of the dispute to the parties fundamentally concerned with it, even though the threat was as disastrous to our own employees as it was to us.

The protection afforded by the provisions of the act dealing with secondary boycotts and jurisdictional strikes is vital not only to us but to our employees.

5. Exclusion of supervisors (secs. 2 (3), 2 (11)).—Like most companies, our company could not function without effective and loyal supervisors. They are the base of our management pyramid. From the standpoint of labor relations, they are the day-to-day link between employer and employee, carrying our policies and problems to our employees and their proposals and problems to us. In our view, the supervisor's role as the primary representative of management is indispensable to the maintenance of good, and therefore stable, labor relations.

Confronted with the obligations of compulsory union membership under a labor contract, and with the simultaneous obligation to represent management in the supervision of fellow union members, a supervisor is placed in a hopeless dilemma regardless of his sense of duty and loyalty. His effectiveness either as a member of the union or as a member of management is materially impaired. Under the Wagner Act his employer was bound to prevent him from interfering in union activities or affairs, yet was forbidden from interfering with his actions on behalf of a union, although the line of separation was far from clear. His fellow union members were bound to admit him to their meetings and plans, knowing that he represented the management which they might feel impelled to impose or with which they disagreed.

The act's confirmation of a supervisor as part of management is urgently required out of fairness to the employees and their employer, and out of fairness to the supervisor himself. To insure the effective operation of business, the need for such confirmation is likewise clear.

6. Union discrimination, coercion, and interference (secs. 8 (b) (1), 8 (b) (2), 8 (b) (3).—The necessity of prohibitions against discrimination, interference, and coercion of employees by unions as well as by employers, cannot be seriously challenged. It is not really a matter of making what is sauce for the goose, sauce for the gander as well. Rather it is the basic problem of insuring that employees are wholly free from improper influences and pressures, and thus are free to consider every question on its merits.

Absence of complete freedom has many practical, and serious, consequences. For example, about a year ago the political beliefs and proposals of some leaders of one of the unions with which we were then bargaining were questioned by employees at one of our plants. These employees thereupon advocated another union. As a result, we were advised by the bargaining union that two of these employees had been expelled from membership in the union.

Prior to the Taft-Hartley Act, we would have faced a very practical dilemma. On the one hand, the maintenance-of-membership clause then in effect would have required us to discharge the two men, even though they had been good workers for 10 years. On the other hand, the National Labor Relations Board would have held the discharges to be discriminatory, and therefore unlawful. But the explicit provisions of the act enabled us to avoid a controversy which theretofore had defied practical solution.

This is only one instance of the necessity of forbidding discrimination, coercion, and interference by unions as well as by employers. It seems clear to us that the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act which accomplish this must be retained in fairness to employees, to employers, and ultimately to unions as well.

To summarize, then. Our own experience convinces me that the six provisions of the act which I have discussed are of the utmost importance to the maintenance of good labor relations and to the conduct of a business such as ours. Other employers are better qualified than we are to confirm our own belief that, in principle and in actual operation, the Taft-Hartley Act is fundamentally fair.

Statement by Farrell Dobbs, National Chairman of the Socialist Workers Party, on the Thomas-Lesinski Labor Bill

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, speaking for the Socialist Workers Party, I support conditionally the Thomas-Lesinski labor bill to the extent that it repeals the Taft-Hartley Act and restores unimpaired the original Wagner Act. I urge strengthening of the Thomas-Lesinski bill to provide full and adequate safeguards of the right to strike, which has been gravely undermined during and since the war.

Compulsory cooling-off periods; court injunctions; staggering fines against striking unions; seizure of industries solely to break strikes; bans on strikes of Government employees; threats to draft strikers into the armed forces—all these and other devices of compulsion have been used by Government to restrict, restrain, and deny the right to strike.

A new and most serious attack on the right to strike has arisen through President Truman's claim of "inherent power" to break strikes by injunction. If permitted to stand unchallenged, the President's sweeping assertion of strike-breaking powers would render null and void any act of Congress lifting present restrictions on the right to strike. It is therefore necessary for the Congress to enact legislation specifically forbidding the President to break strikes by injunction.

The right to strike is similarly subject to attack under certain provisions of the Thomas-Lesinski bill.

Title III empowers the President to proclaim a national emergency in major labor disputes, appoint an emergency board to investigate the dispute, and ask postponement of strike action for 30 days. That provision would impair the right to strike because the full weight of Government condemnation would automatically be brought to bear against workers who might decline to stay on the job for 30 days. And it constitutes an open invitation for the President to invoke his claim of "inherent power" to go to the courts for strike-breaking injunctions. Title III should be eliminated in its entirety.

Title I, section 108, would make it an "unfair labor practice" to terminate or modify collective-bargaining contracts without 30 days' prior notice to the United States Conciliation Service. Here again Government compulsion is introduced to restrict free exercise of collective bargaining and the right to strike. Title I, section 108, should be eliminated.

Another infringement of the right to strike is the declaration under title II, section 205, that it shall be the "public policy of the United States" to demand arbitration of disputes growing out of the interpretation or application of collective-bargaining agreements. That provision means the full weight of Government pressure would be used to impose compulsory arbitration in an important area of collective bargaining. Title II, section 205, should be stricken from the bill.

Compulsory arbitration of jurisdiction disputes between unions and a ban on secondary boycotts in such disputes is provided under title I, section 106. If the Government orders compulsory arbitration of jurisdiction disputes, and strongly advocates arbitration of disputes over contract interpretation, then dangerous precedents will have been established for a later attempt to order compulsory arbitration of wage rates, hours of work, and general working conditions. If today secondary boycotts are banned in jurisdiction disputes, tomorrow the ban may be extended to all boycotts. Title I, section 106, should be eliminated.

To secure full protection of the rights of the working people, I urge total repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and restoration of the original Wagner Act with the following supplementary safeguards:

(1) There shall be no restriction whatever on the rights of all workers, including Government employees, to organize, bargain collectively, strike, and picket.

(2) It shall be unlawful for any agency of Government to restrict, restrain, or deny the right to strike and picket, by injunction, by seizure of struck facilities solely to break strikes, or by any other means.

(3) If a corporation in any basic industry or public utility should cause public hardship by instituting a lock-out, or by precipitating a strike through refusal to bargain equitably with its employees, such corporation shall be nationalized by the Government and its facilities operated under the democratic control of its employees.

STATEMENT BY DONALD L. JORDAN, PRESIDENT, JOHNSON-CARPER FURNITURE CO., INC., ROANOKE, VA., ON H. R. 2032

The House Subcommittee on Education and Labor has requested that I submit my views on H. R. 2032 in writing in lieu of a personal appearance before the committee as I had requested.

By way of introduction, let me state that I am the president of Johnson-Carper Furniture Co., a furniture-manufacturing concern located in Roanoke, Va., and employing approximately 500 employees. The employees of this company have been represented by the United Furniture Workers of America, CIO, for approximately 3 years. The company and the union have worked together and have negotiated collective-bargaining contracts under both the Wagner Act and the Taft-Hartley Act. I can say, without qualification, that the relationship existing between management and the employees under the Taft-Hartley Act has been far more harmonious and mutually advantageous than under the Wagner Act.

The union membership today is about the same as it was prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act. There have been no strikes or work stoppages since the enactment of the new act and there is strong evidence that a sense of responsibility for the observance of the terms of the contract has developed in the minds of the union representatives and employees. Insofar as I know, employees of this company do not object to the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act or feel that it is detrimental to the best interests of the employees, but, on the contrary, I know that many of our employees feel that this act is desirable in order that it be fair to both labor and management and especially so that it will protect the rank-and-file employee and the general public.

It is my belief that the foregoing statement of conditions would be subscribed to by all manufacturers in the Roanoke area and this would include many industrial concerns. The labor-management situation in Roanoke has been more stable and harmonious during the past year and a half than it has ever been to my knowledge and it is my sincere belief that a great deal of credit for this situation is due to the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act.

In view of the statements heretofore expressed, I think you will understand that I do not favor the provisions of H. R. 2032 but believe, on the contrary, that the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 should continue to be the law of this country with such minor amendments as may be determined as desirable by the Congress.

STATEMENT BY JOHN C. JURAS, PRESIDENT, IROQUOIS FOUNDRY CO., RACINE, WIS., RELATIVE TO H. R. 2032

We are an employer of approximately 100 people. Since the inception of the Wagner Act our labor relations have been just as stormy as the average of industry. Our experience has been that labor (organized) is irresponsible and did not accept its responsibility to any agreement that it had signed with us up and through 1947. From 1938 through 1945 we had one strike of 10 days' duration, innumerable incidents of contract violations, and work stoppages. It was only at the end of 1945 that we decided to keep permanent records of disturbances within the plant in order that we would have something to present to interested parties in the event that it became necessary to prove our record. We therefore did, starting January 1, 1946, record labor disturbances that we considered unwarranted and in violation of a written agreement in effect. Our record is as follows:

From January 1, 1946, through December 31, 1946, we had nine incidents of contract violations and work stoppages. From January 1, 1947, through December 31, 1947, 10 incidents of contract violations and work stoppages. From January 1, 1948, through December 31, 1948, there were no violations of contract or work stoppages, nor have we had any violations of contract or work stoppages so far during 1949. In our opinion, the only reason we had no disturbances in the plant during 1948 and 1949 is due to the fact that the Taft-Hartley law was made a law of the land and it forced upon organized labor (the group we deal with) responsibilities to the fulfillment of their obligations. Without this law we believe they would have continued to operate as they did in prior years.

Therefore, our record proves that any new labor legislation that will be written should include language that will make both parties responsible under new agreements that they may write. Law without such a provision would, in our opinion, be a farce, and democratic processes will break down in the event this particular phase in legislation is bypassed.

STATEMENT BY TYRE TAYLOR, GENERAL COUNSEL, SOUTHERN STATES INDUSTRIAL COUNCIL, IN SUPPORT OF THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

On June 2, 1948, we stated to the Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations that—

"In the opinion of the council, the Taft-Hartley Act is steadily proving itself to be wise, moderate, and generally effective legislation. The fears of those who opposed it on the ground that it went too far—was indeed a 'slave labor' law—have been proved groundless, while those who went to the opposite extreme in their appraisal have likewise had to revise their initial unfavorable opinion."

The events of the last 10 months have served only to strengthen and confirm the general impression thus outlined to the joint committee. Today, I should like to discuss some of the specific provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act which are not included in the Lesinski bill (H. R. 2032) and which we think are absolutely essential if we are to have a national labor policy in this country which is reasonably fair to all parties concerned, namely, the employers, the employees, and the public. No attempt has been made to list these items in the order of their relative importance for the reason that, as I have just stated, we feel that they are all essential.

PROTECTING EMPLOYERS' RIGHTS

1. Free speech.—The depressing story of how this fundamental constitutional right was denied to American employers is too familiar to require repeating. By holding illegal all sorts of statements—in themselves clearly noncoercive—management was effectively deterred from expressing its views. In fact, employers became so confused and intimidated that they dared not open their mouths.

The Eightieth Congress acted to correct this intolerable situation. Both management and labor were given the right to express their views so long as such expressions contained no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit.

We feel that this principle of equality should be retained. It is not only the right but the duty of every employer to discuss freely with his employees the effect of union demands and policies on his business. Both have a common interest in the prosperous condition of the enterprise in which they are mutually engaged. To require that management abstain from discussing union actions which vitally affect the interests of both employers and employees is inimical to a democratic economy.

The unions take the position that the right of free speech doesn't have to be established by statute. They contend that the Supreme Court has ruled that an employer may speak freely if he does not threaten or coerce his employees. The trouble with this contention is that it ignores our past experience with an overzealous administration under the Wagner Act. The Board, acting as grand jury, prosecutor, judge, and jury paid only lip service to this principle in many instances. And even under the present law—in which the right of free speech is protected—the Board in the General Shoe case held that such protection does not prevent it from declaring a new election whenever it deems a noncoercive statement to have upset "the requisite laboratory conditions."

It is true that later decisions modified this doctrine, but until the law clearly forbids the Board from compromising the right of every person to free speech in both unfair-practice cases and election cases, there is no assurance that employers will not once again be silenced.

2. Mutual obligation to bargain.—For nearly 15 years it has been our national labor policy to encourage collective bargaining. During nearly all of this time, however, the one-sided Wagner Act operated to make collective bargaining a duty of employers only, and many instances arose when powerful unions took advantage of this inequality by presenting their demands on a take-it-or-leave-it basis. Congress when it passed the Wagner Act found that the refusal to bargain led to industrial strife and unrest. This finding is retained in the bill before this committee, yet it proposes to discard the Taft-Hartley provision making the obligation to bargain a mutual undertaking, and once again returns to the thoroughly discredited assumption that only employers refuse to bargain. It is difficult to conceive of any valid objections to equalizing the obligation to bargain. The wisdom and justice behind such a requirement are so undeniable that any proposal to destroy it can only dumbfound honest-thinking citizens.

Spokesmen for the unions have not had the gall to oppose it outright but prefer to say that it is not necessary since the central object of unions is to bargain collectively and they don't have to be required to do it. Of course, this is only another example of labor organizations asking for special privilege. Just as in the case of free speech, they want their rights spelled out clearly in the statute, but not the concomitant rights of employers or the public.

Times have changed since the Wagner Act was passed. The unions have steadily grown in numbers and strength. More and more, they enjoy a heavy preponderance of bargaining power. Where this is true—and from the union's standpoint—bargaining loses a great deal of its attractiveness. It's far more effective for them to dispense with attempts to reach an understanding and insist that there is nothing to talk about. In case there are those who doubt the danger of his happening, I cite the refusal last year of John Lewis to discuss any terms of settlement with southern coal producers.

As it is now both parties are required to give 60 days' advance notice of a desire to terminate or modify an existing contract before resorting to a strike or lock-out. During this time both labor and management have a legal duty to meet and negotiate with each other. Experience has shown that these steps have encouraged the settlement of differences without costly strikes. Nevertheless the proposal is to abandon these preventative measures, apparently for no other reason than a reluctance to admit that there is anything worth saving in the Taft-Hartley Act.

3. Separation of board functions.—We in this country have always taken pride in the fact that ours is a government founded on justice under law. It is fundamental to such a system that the function of judge and prosecutor be strictly separated. The evils which result from a failure to follow this principle have been clearly illustrated by the operations of the Board under the Wagner Act.

It is elementary that when an employer is charged with a violation, and the Board has the duty to determine whether a cease and desist order should be issued, it must be impartial in weighing the evidence if justice and fair play are to result. Yet under the Wagner Act and the Lesinski bill the Board is given authority of prosecutor, judge, and jury. Obviously this imposes the impossible burden of serving two masters, and in a labor law which goes as far in governing the relations of men as this one does, it destroys public confidence in the impartiality of our whole system of government.

To be sure, there will be judicial review of final orders by the Board. But this holds no assurance that an aggrieved party can avail himself of the Court's protection. And even where this is possible, he will frequently find no relief since courts have long held to the rule of noninterference with administrative discretion.

If the prosecution functions are returned to the Board, its successful operation will be impaired by an inability to convince employers they will receive a fair and impartial hearing. To employers as well as to a large segment of the public the Board will once more appear as an arm of the labor-union movement.

The Administrative Procedure Act will not prevent this. The separation of functions provided for under that law would not prevent the Board from exercising general supervision over attorneys and investigators charged with the prosecution and issuance of complaints.

4. Suability of unions.—I have just stressed the importance of making the obligation to bargain collectively a duty of labor as well as management. It is equally important under our national labor policy to make contracts freely entered into after collective bargaining mutually binding on both parties. Common sense tells us that peaceful labor relations cannot be achieved by bargaining if one of the parties is not held to an observance of his contract. The very essence of any contract is mutuality of obligation. If this is not present there is nothing but a bare agreement.

We feel that it is absolutely essential that Federal courts have the power to enforce collective-bargaining contracts. In many State courts this is not possible, either because unions cannot be sued as an entity or because collective-bargaining agreements are not recognized as legally enforceable contracts. Unless uniform enforcement procedure is permitted in Federal courts, the practical result is that only employers are financially responsible should they refuse to live up to their agreement.

When the Taft-Hartley Act made unions suable in Federal courts, some people predicted that labor organizations would be subjected to harassment by employers filing a multiplicity of suits against them. These dire predictions have never materialized, and experience has shown that a large part of actions filed were disposed of by agreement between the parties. Peaceful settlement of disputes has been encouraged by making unions as well as employers responsible for their actions. Particularly beneficial was the reduction in wildcat strikes which unions themselves have endeavored to prevent, but very often without success. Largely responsible for this was the fact that the Taft-Hartley law does not require a showing of authorization of subsequent ratification in order to determine whether a member was acting as an agent of his union. If collective-bargaining contracts are to serve as a means of preventing labor disturbances, it is essential that this provision be retained.

Secondary boycotts, jurisdictional strikes, and attempts to force an employer to bargain with a union when another union has been certified as bargaining agent are all condemned by the proposed bill as unfair labor practices. However, in view of the fact that the Board takes many months to process such cases, some additional deterrent should be provided. An effective method is to allow suits for damages sustained as a result of such illegal practices.

This remedy has been available for almost 2 years and there is no evidence that it has been abused. Only about a dozen suits have been instituted, and here again court records will show that many were settled out of court. The most recent information I have concerning the disposition of such actions is that in no instance has any union been required to pay damages. The major benefits of holding union suable is not so much that they afford injured parties a means to collect damages but rather that they prevent injury by making unions a responsible entity in our society. This is accomplished without making individual members liable for a money judgment and forecloses any possibility that the labor-union movement will be deprived of its financial support.

5. Supervisory employees.—There is no more vital issue in the whole field of labor relations than that of the status of supervisory employees and foremen. In almost every plant—and particularly the large ones—foremen are the most direct contract that management has with production workers. These employers frequently regard the foreman as the boss, and to fulfill this responsibility to his employer he must be prepared to take disciplinary action against men over whom he exercises supervisory authority. Because of this, a very serious problem arises whenever a foreman is a member of the same union as production workers. The difficulty is that a foreman in such a situation is subject to the discipline of the union and must obey all its rules and regulations. If the union has a compulsory membership contract, he can, of course, lose his job should the union expel him from the organization.

Placed in such a position the foreman has the impossible task of serving two masters. No matter what course of action he takes, there is no way for him to avoid trouble.

When the Wagner Act was passed the possibility that foremen exercising managerial authority would be classed as employees under the act was never considered. At first the Board decided they were not, then later it reversed itself an held they could join an independent union. Still later, in the Jones-Laughlin Steel Co. decision, the Board went the whole distance by holding that an employer could be compelled to bargain on wages and working conditions of foremen with the same union that represented the production workers whom the foremen were expected to supervise.

In the Taft-Hartley Act Congress undertook to rectify this mistake by excluding supervisors from the law. The result has been gratifying. Employers for the most part reacted by making foremen a more integral part of the management team and provided them with additional benefits and privileges. The labor unrest that was predicted never materialized. Indeed, the enactment of this provision contributed to the settlement of a strike of supervisory personnel which was in existence at the time the act was passed.

The demands of unions that the foremen be classed as employees under the law jeopardizes these gains made in the last 2 years and unless they are resisted foremen will once again find themselvs torn between conflicting responsibilities.

6. Jurisdictional strikes.—The necessity for preventing jurisdictional strikes is universally recognized in this country. The administration and labor spokesmen are agreed that such strikes are indefensible. H. R 2032 makes such strikes an unfair labor practice, and gives the Board authority to settle them.

However, the effectiveness of this bill as a solution to jurisdictional disputes is open to serious doubt. This is indicated by an article in the January 31, 1949, issue of the New York Times, which deals with the efforts of the AFL to settle such disputes in the building industry. The following is a quotation from this article:

"American Federation of Labor building trades unions and the organized contractors have agreed in meetings here to continue indefinitely their joint board for the settlement of jurisdictional disputes, but the administration-backed labor bill is putting a blight on prospects for the machinery's continued success.

"This threat arises from the measure's omission of an injunction provision to prevent interruptions of work while conflicting union claims are being mediated or arbitrated. It has not been necessary to use the Taft-Hartley injunction authority in jurisdictional disputes but the mere availability of the injunction has forced certain unions to respect their own peaceful machinery for settling disputes.

"Labor leaders are strongly opposed to the injunction weapon in principle, but at least some of them recognize privately that as a practical matter it is desirable to have some such enforcement weapon to protect them from each other * * *."

I feel no need to add to this statement for it clearly points out the weakness of relying on a cease and desist order of the Board to protect innocent bystanders who President Truman stated would be injured by a collision between rival unions.

7. Secondary boycotts.—Here, too, we find the administration and labor agreed on the desirability of prohibiting a practice but a reluctance to deal with it realistically.

The bill now under consideration fails in three respects to provide adequate measures to curb the evil of secondary boycotts.

First, the definition of a secondary boycott is phrased so as to leave a serious loophole permitting certain types of boycotts that are intended to be prohibited. The definition is framed so that the prohibition applies only to the refusal of employees "to produce, manufacture, transport, distribute, or otherwise work on articles, materials, goods, or commodities because they have been made or are to be manufactured, produced, or distributed by another employer."

The weakness of this definition can be explained best by concrete example. Let us suppose that two unions are engaged in a jurisdictional dispute over the assignment of work in a flour mill. The mill continues to operate and sells some of its flour to a bakery. One of the unions in the dispute calls out the bakery's drivers that deliver its products to consumers for the purpose of forcing the bakery to cease dealing with the flour mill. Under these circumstances, it is highly probable that the union would be successful in contending that it was not engaging in a secondary boycott under the definition contained in this bill. For the Board might well hold that the bakery's drivers were not refusing to handle any articles, materials, goods, or commodities that were manufactured, produced, or distributed by the flour mill. The reason being that flour, once it is made into bread, loses its identity as such, and the drivers would be refusing to handle bread, not flour, which the flour mill neither produced nor distributed as bread.

The second respect in which this bill fails to meet the threat of secondary boycotts is that it does not prevent a boycott which is designed to force an employer to cease doing business with another employer, so long as there is no jurisdictional dispute or question involving bargaining representation involved.

Thus, in the above example, if the flour mill and the union are in disagreement over wages, the union could legally force the bakery to stop dealing with the mill by calling a strike. As often happens in such cases, the bakery may have no other source of supply and is therefore forced to close its doors and lay off all its employees. By such means localized labor disputes are spread through the entire system.

The third defect of the bill is that no effective remedy is provided to prevent strikes to enforce illegal secondary boycotts. To be sure, a complaint may be filed with the Board, but it may be a year or more before a cease and desist order is issued and, even then, violations of the order can continue indefinitely until a court order is granted. The obvious need for a more prompt means to prevent or stop strikes of this nature is nowhere provided for in H. R. 2032. President Truman, in his state of the Union message, condemned strikes to compel an employer to violate the law. Nevertheless, if this bill is passed in its present form, there will be no real protection against the use of this device until it has accomplished its purpose.

PROTECTION OF THE RIGHTS OF EMPLOYEES

1. Compulsory unionism.—From the individual employee's point of view there is probably nothing more destructive to his freedom than the proposal to legalize the closed shop. We have heard a lot of loose talk about slave labor in this country. However, most of it comes from union bosses who have done their utmost to impede free access to the employment market by any but their own members.

A slave is a slave no matter who acts as his master, and labor leaders prefer to ignore the fact that compulsory unionism was abolished by the last Congress in order to emancipate labor from their monopoly control.

Two years ago this committee brought to light the many abuses which result from compulsory membership. The examples given demonstrated that this practice stifled democratic processes in the internal affairs of unions and led to a number of restrictive practices which inflicted serious injuries on the public at large. It was shown that a handful of labor leaders not only monopolized employment in an industry, but used their power to paralyze our entire economic system to further their own ends.

A few months ago Mr. Murray, at the CIO convention, criticized a number of officials in affiliated unions for not energetically seeking new members. You will recall that Mr. Murray made it plain that he thought the CIO was being harmed by lazy organizers. Without doubt other labor leaders are also troubled by this problem. There is only one solution for it. It is that unions, like any other private organization, must sell and not force their services on prospective members. Under the Wagner Act a union was not required to give consideration to the wishes of employees in a plant if the employer could be compelled or persuaded to sign a closed-shop agreement. Now that this is no longer possible, it is perhaps not surprising that some unions are finding it difficult to change gears.

It is beginning to be obvious that compulsory unionism is as harmful to unions themselves as it is to the workers and the public at large. The railroad unions have flourished without it and there is every reason to believe any labor organization worthy of representing its members doesn't need governmental sanction to force anyone to join.

Far-sighted union men know this. They also know that if the Federal Government is going to authorize and promote compulsory unionism, it cannot be long before the Government will be asserting complete control over the internal management of unions. One follows the other, for if the laboring man's prerogative to join or not to join a union is not protected, then it is absolutely essential that his every right as a union member be guarded by the Government. There is no way for the country or the unions themselves to avoid this dilemma—either we are to have a free-labor movement with voluntary membership or unions are to become mere adjuncts of the Government with every laboring man a member. I need hardly point out that this latter possibility must be prevented if our democracy is to survive.

The bill now before this committee ignores the danger of closed unionism. It goes even further in this direction than did the Wagner Act by nullifying right to work laws passed by over a dozen States. Seven Southern States now have statutes forbidding the exclusion of persons from work because they are or are not labor union members.[1] The Supreme Court only recently twice ruled that States have the power to enact such laws and thereby rejected the contention of the unions that the Federal Constitution affords protection for union members against discrimination but forbids the States from providing the same protection for nonunion members. Having been denied the constitutional right to drive from employment persons who will not join, the unions are now asking Congress to preempt the right of a State held constitutional by the Supreme Court.

Last June before the Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations we asked that States be given additional responsibility for maintaining industrial peace. At that time we said, "Good labor relations begin where the problem arises—in the factories and mills, in the towns and cities, and from there to the individual States where special and particular problems are more easily understood and more quickly solved." Then, as now, we pointed out that the tendency to look to the Federal Government to cure all the ills of labor-management relations has become a dangerous fetish, and has engendered an apathy on the part of citizens and local and State government officials in seeking out and applying solutions of their own labor problems.

We urge therefore that if Congress deems it inadvisable to prohibit all forms of compulsory unionism, that it at least retain the mild protection of the employee's right to join or not to join a union which is embodied in our present labor law, and that discriminations not forbidden be permitted only where membership arrangements are expressly authorized by State law and then only under the conditions specified in such laws.

2. Coercion and intimidation of employees.—Another important protection to employees not found in the proposed bill is that of making it an unfair labor practice for a union or its agents to restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of their rights given to them by law. To appreciate the potential consequences of this omission, we need go no further than to refer to the record of testimony taken by this committee in its 1947 investigation of coercive picketing. In a large number of instances unions were found to have resorted to physical violence against employees for continuing to work against the wishes of the union. In some cases plants were invaded and workers thrown out bodily by "flying squadrons." Employees risked their lives and property if they dared defy the picket lines.

Under the proposed bill employees would not even have the present mild remedy of a cease-and-desist order by the Board. They would be completely dependent on the union's approval before they could earn their living. The unbelievable examples disclosed by this committee's own records where unions have exerted despotic control over workers' rights make it essential that the present provisions of the Taft-Hartley law dealing with such abuses be retained. And it is further necessary that the Board be authorized to require a union guilty of such tactics to reimburse employees for the wages they have lost.

PROTECTING PUBLIC RIGHTS

7. National emergencies.—The dangerous and potentially disastrous situation caused by strikes that imperil national health and safety has evoked widespread concern. It is clear beyond dispute that such strikes cannot be a permissible economic weapon in any organized society. It is equally clear that no government worthy of the name can continue to tolerate them.

How does H. R. 2032 intend the Federal Government to discharge its duty to protect public interest from such strikes? It provides for a Presidential proclamation calling on both parties to continue or resume operations in the public interest while an emergency board conducts an investigation and reports on its findings and recommendations. But suppose one of the parties refuses to obey the proclamation and forces a complete shut-down of a basic industry? The answer to that situation is now a matter of dispute within administration circles. Secretary Tobin says the bill was drafted without an intent to provide the Government with the right to seek an injunction. Attorney General Clark states that in his opinion this right is inherrent and need not be specifically spelled out by law, and President Truman has said he has no objection to allowing the use of injunctions to meet the problem. Labor spokesmen on the other hand continue to maintain their unalterable opposition to a grant of injunction powers over their organizations.

This array of conflicting interpretations and desires on the part of supporters of this bill concerning its intent and purpose in a matter so vital to our national existence is itself convincing evidence of the need for explicit legislation. If these disputes exist before the bill is passed, how can its enactment serve to deter such strikes? Nothing is settled and new sources of antagonism are certain to arise. Surely Congress has a duty to the people of this Nation to take a firm stand against the right of any group to place its interest above national welfare. Six times since the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act the President found it in the interest of the public to enjoin strikes that threatened to paralyze our economic system. During one period, two basic industries—coal mining and rail transportation—were operating only because the Federal Government intervened to prevent a complete shut-down. In the face of this experience—and incidentally Mr. Lewis may be rendering a great public service in now reminding us of this experience—it would be nothing less than an invitation to national disaster to abolish the use of injunctions to protect national health and welfare. We think H. R. 2032 proposes to accomplish this result. Perhaps the Attorney General is correct in stating that the bill does not deny the use of injunctions by the Government. But must we wait until the Nation has suffered a paralyzing blow to find out? Can there be any justification for scrapping our present machinery which has been successfully used in preventing such strikes? We do not think the answer to this question can be in any serious doubt.

2. Industry-wide bargaining.—The use of temporary injunctions against strikes that imperil national health and safety, necessary as they are, nevertheless do nothing to prevent or control the basic conditions that give rise to such national emergencies.

Injunctions deal with the result—monopolistic strikes—but they do not remedy the cause—which is union monopolies.

Admittedly this problem is one of the most difficult in the whole field of labor relations. The extreme measure of permanently banning such strikes is in the judgment of most people not desirable. Mere prohibition does not settle the dispute which is a necessary prerequisite to a successful settlement.

Instead, we suggest that the committee consider eliminating certain conditions which make such strikes possible, and to accomplish this we respectfully submit the following proposals:

(1) Amend the bill to include the railroads and require that bargaining units in the coal, steel producing, and rail transportation industries be on a company-wide basis, with all other bargaining units restricted to a metropolitan district, county, or a company-wide basis; and

(2) Amend the Clayton Act and the Norris-La Guardia Act to make unlawful any combination, contract, conspiracy or concerted plan of action between any person or corporation represented in different bargaining units, whose operation is required to be autonomous under proposal No. 1 above, where the object of such activity is to formulate a policy with regard to the terms or conditions of collective bargaining agreements, or to agree on a time or plan for carrying out a strike, lock-out, slow-down, or other interference with trade or production.

With regard to the first recommendation, it seems clear that no effort to solve monopolistic strikes can succeed unless the bargaining units are dissolved into autonomous agencies for negotiating collective bargaining agreements. Proposals for doing this should recognize the need for more complete decentralization in industries where monopoly unions are the strongest and where cessation of operation, if even for a short time, will lead to a national emergency.

In the case of coal, it may be safely asserted that peace will never prevail in this industry as long as Mr. Lewis can dictate the same terms and conditions to all operators and at the same time call out all miners to enforce his demands.

In all of these industries we have not only a case where one union can close down the entire industry, but also a condition where a shut-down even for a brief interval will seriously impair the economic life of the Nation. In other industries where the problem is not so serious, it may suffice to split up bargaining units on a geographical basis (i. e., metropolitan areas or county), with an exception allowed for company-wide bargaining in all cases.

Our second suggestion is made for the purpose of insuring the autonomous operation of bargaining units required to be dissolved under point one. It would be worse than useless to require bargaining on a company or metropolitan area basis and allow an international labor organization to control the terms of a contract which a local union can sign. It is said that you cannot prevent local unions from making the same demands and that applying the antitrust laws would not be effective. Of course this is speculative until it is tried, but we believe that if the local unions had complete freedom of action they would exercise it. Many employees in a local plant resent the fact that they have no freedom to agree on the conditions of their employment. But so long as the international union can require that it be made party to every agreement and can exercise the right of veto over such agreements, they are helpless to do anything about it.

3. Welfare funds.—The tremendous growth of union-management welfare plans within recent years makes it necessary that more serious attention be given to their operation and effect, as well as that our national policy with regard to them be clarified.

When it enacted the Taft-Hartley Act Congress recognized that these funds often amount to huge sums and, unless some control is placed on their establishment and operation, abuses will occur which injure their intended beneficiaries and the public generally. Therefore the act required several conditions to be fulfilled in an effort to assure that they would be properly administered. The chief beneficiaries of this protection are the employees themselves and it is to be regretted that H. R. 2032, intended to be in the interests of labor, neglects to provide these minimum safeguards.

In our view it is encumbent on Congress at the very least to retain intact the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law controlling such funds. Anything less than this will open the door to widespread maladministration and eventually lead to sizable losses. Considering the size and number of these funds which have grown up over the country, there is a public interest involved in making sure that they are managed in a democratic and trustworthy manner.

In this connection, we feel that two problems in particular—neither of which is provided for under existing law—merit special consideration by this committee.

The first is the current ruling of the Board which makes welfare plans a subject of compulsory bargaining. Employers who oppose this do so because their experience has taught them that welfare programs are not suited to the process of collective bargaining. In the first place, these plans are enormously complicated by actuarial considerations, as well as the ability of each employer to meet certain commitments. The difficulties involved very often make it impossible for an employer to follow a plan which the bargaining union may have in effect with another employer, and neither can he establish several separate plans to satisfy the demands made on him when more than one union is representing his employees. In view of these facts, continued retention of the compulsory bargaining rule may serve to lessen rather than promote new welfare programs from coming into existence.

Secondly—and from a long-range point of view—it is even more important that the committee give consideration to the effect on our economy of welfare plans financed from royalty payments.

It is clear that such payments are a charge on the entire economy. The resources available for their payment are not limitless and continued expansion can only mean that members of certain unions will receive more than their share, while other less fortunate employees will receive less or nothing.

In this connection it is important to bear in mind that in the case of certain employee's trust funds the Internal Revenue Code not only frees the trust itself from tax but employees are not taxable on the amounts paid into the trust by their employer.

On the other hand, if you and I, or any of the millions of people who are not members of such welfare plans, try to provide for the needs of old age or sickness by purchasing insurance, we receive no tax deduction on what it costs us.

Right at this very moment, now that prices are no longer increasing and the argument of higher prices-higher wages has lost its force, some unions have swung over to demanding welfare plans for their members. If the impetus to these demands continues and more of these plans are established, the Government is going to be faced with a serious drain on its tax revenues. Then we shall wake up to the fact that these arrangements are having an adverse effect on the ability of the Government to satisfy the demands placed on it by all of its citizens. Both as consumers and taxpayers the public is paying the bill and sooner or later Congress will be forced to take more—not less—interest in their operation and the effects they have on the economy as a whole.

4. Non-Communist affidavits.—Now that Communists in this country and elsewhere have publicly declared their allegiance to Soviet Russia in time of war, it would seem mandatory from the standpoint of national security that its adherents be denied places of authority in the labor union movement. We are now engaged in resisting Communist domination in every part of the globe and are spending tens of billions of dollars every year to do it. To say that we can afford to lower our guard against this menace at home is foolish beyond comprehension. We therefore earnestly urge that Congress strengthen existing safeguards against these enemies of mankind by denying the facilities of the Board to any union that has Communist members on its executive committees or councils. And while the number of Communist or fellow-traveling employers is believed to be insignificant, there is no good reason we can think of why this same requirement should not apply to management.

STATEMENT OF L. B. BEWLEY, DIRECTOR OF INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS, STOCKHAM VALVES & FITTINGS, BIRMINGHAM, ALA., AND AS CHAIRMAN OF THE LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE, ASSOCIATED INDUSTRIES OF ALABAMA, ON AMENDMENTS TO THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

I think that the general acceptance of the clever title "slave labor bill" attached to the act by union leaders is one of the phenomena of the past 2 years in this country.

Apparently many otherwise well-informed persons have been taken in by this dishonest label.

Various times since I heard this piece of propaganda I have asked our shop committee to point out one provision which enslaves labor. To date I have had no response to that invitation—and I have an intelligent, outspoken committee.

We must reject that propaganda for what it is—a lie. Some union leaders created this false label because, for the first time, they have been placed under obligation to conduct bargaining and other union affairs in a manner fair to the public, employers, and workers. For the first time they, the alter egos of their organizations, have been required to assume the responsibility which rightly goes with their important roles in the national economy. But these reasons, they knew, would have no vote appeal.

Granted that when the Wagner Act was passed unions may have needed a biased set of rules to permit them to gain strength at the bargaining table, it cannot be denied that they now have attained and perhaps surpassed the bargaining power of employers. It is therefore proper and in the public interest that we have a set of rules which permits the two parties to meet on an equal basis. The Taft-Hartley Act furnishes those rules.

The record of strikes in this country before and after passage of the act speaks for itself. In our plant, employing 1,600 workers, we had a general illegal strike in each of the years 1944, 1945, and 1946, and during these years we had numerous instances of illegal work stoppages involving varying numbers of workers. Each occurred under a no-strike clause contract. Since the end of the 1946 strike, in September, we have not had a general strike and we have had only one work stoppage which involved 10 workers. Our experience is typical of the experiences of companies generally in the industrial Birmingham district which are unionized.

It may be argued that unions have not struck because they are afraid of suits for breach of no-strike-clause contracts under section 301 of the act. However, this is not the answer in Alabama for unions have been suable under the laws of this State since 1921. Other States, among them California, Colorado, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, have similar laws.

Most bargaining contracts provide for the ultimate settlement of differences by arbitration or mediation. The right to press charges of unfair labor practices against employers remains the same as in the Wagner Act. In view of these protections is it asking too much that unions be held responsible for breach of contract provisions in the same manner that any other person or entity would be held responsible for their breaches?

The old cry "management by injunction" has been revived since passage of the act. One without knowledge of the facts would think that this equitable remedy—as ancient as our law—had been overworked against unions during the past 18 months. There are three instances under the act in which an injunction may be obtained:

First, the Board may seek an injunction in aid of an unfair labor practice complaint issued by it;

Second, the Board must seek an injunction in a secondary-boycott case and in case of a jurisdictional battle between unions, if it has reasonable cause to believe that the charge is true;

Third, the President may instruct the Attorney General to seek an injunction where a strike or lock-out affects an entire industry or substantial part thereof and may endanger the national health or safety.

Since the passage of the act injunctions were sought in only six cases under the first category—only three were granted. Under the second, injunctions were sought in 29 cases—only 15 were granted. And, under the third, six petitions were filed and all were granted.

It is observed that petitions for injunctions against secondary boycotts and jurisdictional strikes were more numerous. If there ever was a case where, in equity and good conscience, an employer's business should be saved from harm it is the case where he is an innocent bystander in a struggle between a union and another employer or between two rival unions.

Furthermore, with proper safeguards such as this act affords, I fail to see why an employer should not have protection against irreparable damage to or destruction of his business by an action of labor unions. Equity protects him against such threat on the part of any other persons or group of persons. What virtue is possessed by members of labor unions which entitles them to be free from the restraint of a court of equity where they elect to follow a destructive procedure rather than to pursue the ample remedies afforded them by the act?

Recently Attorney General Clark said that the President has "inherent power" to enjoin strikes which threaten the national health or safety. One wonders why this "inherent power" was not used when a railway strike was threatened 2 years ago. Instead, the President asked Congress to empower him to draft railroad workers into the armed forces. If the President has this "inherent power," then it seems to me that the unions should welcome provisions of law which specifically define the time, place, and method of exercising such power.

Finally, it was said that the Taft-Hartley Act would destroy the unions. I have seen no evidence that this prediction has come true. On the contrary, according to the Department of Labor, unions added about 600,000 members during 1947 and 1948, and, according to the CIO's official publications, "Operation Dixie" was a huge success in 1948. I suggest that union officials, representing independents as well as those representing the large national organizations, be questioned on the comparative growth of their respective unions for the 16-month periods before and after the effective date of the act. In our own plant—an open shop—the ratio of union members to eligible workers has remained unchanged during such periods.

Associated Industries of Alabama, with a membership of 600 employers, joins me in urging the Members of Congress to deal with this important legislation on a nonpartisan basis, and to examine carefully the criticisms of the act, many of which are repetitions of catch phrases calculated to enlist the sympathy of the uninformed.

STATEMENT BY E. J. KESSLER, REPRESENTING THE PERSONNEL DIRECTORS CLUB OF THE MANUFACTURERS ASSOCIATION OF LANCASTER CITY AND COUNTY, PA.

My name is Edward J. Kessler. I am director of labor relations for Armstrong Cork Co. and reside in Lancaster, Pa. I have been in the employ of the Armstrong Cork Co. since 1920, in the capacity of laborer, foreman, superintendent, assistant plant manager, and for the past 8 years as the director of labor relations. I am not a lawyer.

I am appearing on behalf of the Personnel Directors Club of the Manufacturers Association of Lancaster City and County, Pa. This association comprises 270 manufacturing concerns which employ a total of approximately 40,000 workers. Labor organizations have bargaining rights in about one-fourth of these manufacturing establishments.

It is not my purpose to defend the Taft-Hartley Act but rather to outline certain basic ideas which in my opinion should underlie any labor legislation. My statement revolves around three major principles—all based, I believe, on certain fundamentals essential to a free democratic government. These principles are first, the importance of the individual, which I believe is embodied in that portion of the preamble of our Constitution that purposes "To insure the blessings of liberty," and which is reflected in the oft-repeated comment of equality before the law; second, a basic concept of democracy that there is a responsibility or obligation with every right, duty, or privilege; and third, the supremacy of the national welfare over any individual group of selfish aim.

Under the first of these principles—that of the importance of the individual and equality before the law—belongs the right of individual determination of joining or not joining any organization whether it be one concerned with labor, religion, or politics. Compulsory membership is offensive to our basic idea of liberty.

Each individual should be free from coercion, either physical or mental, in making his choice of membership or nonmembership in an organization, in deciding whether or not he wants to be represented for purposes of collective bargaining, and in selecting which of any number of individuals or organizations shall be his representative. The right to continue at work even when the majority of our associates decide not to work deserves as much protection as the rights of those who elect to refrain from working.

Equality under the law demands that both the employee and the employer as well as their respective organizations have the same right to express and publicize their opinions and beliefs. Any restraints on freedom of speech that are imposed on one must in all fairness be imposed on the other. Even in the operation of our own Government the minority in bodies such as this committee is always given the opportunity to express its views, going even so far perhaps at times to imply threats or retaliation.

It seems to me that under the principle of equality the employer should have as ready access to the National Labor Relations Board to file petitions for elections or to present charges of unfair practices as any employee or employee organization.

Under the second fundamental idea of democratic government—that each right or duty has a corresponding responsibility or obligation, it seems to me that if the law gives a labor organization the right to seek and demand the privilege to bargain with an employer, then it must likewise impose on such labor organization the corresponding duty to bargain. Bargaining is not a one-sided affair. We have had a number of strikes in our community where the union came to the bargaining table with the insistence that its demands be met if operations were to continue without interruption.

The whole idea of responsibility, as we understand it in this country, includes the belief that a principal must assume responsibility for his agents. From the labor-relations standpoint, this has two angles. First, supervisors are definitely agents of management in that they carry out orders, direct the working force, maintain discipline, and in large measure reward good work. They do unquestionably represent management in the handling of grievances in their early stages, and management must accept the responsibility for their actions. It is inconceivable to include this group of management agents, even though they be employees, with those other employees who have a legal right to bargain with management but who have no responsibility for the direction of the business.

The second angle of this agency idea is the one that applies to labor organizations. Just as management is made up of individuals with varying degrees of authority, so is a labor organization and the organizer or field representative of a labor organization invariably acting under instructions from the top officials of the organization. These subordinate individuals can't be severed from a responsibility standpoint from the directing heads of the organization any more than the supervisors can be separated from management.

The theory of responsibility must reach to the sanctity of contract. Parties to a labor contract, particularly where the Government says that there must be a contract if one party desires it, should be responsibte parties and should be answerable for performance thereunder. Violations of labor contracts should be reparable at law just as any commercial contract. Responsible parties should, in all fairness, have no objections to being held accountable for any damage or loss that they might cause.

The third principle that must be recognized in labor legislation is the supremacy of the national welfare. Certainly no one would disagree with the statement that no individual right takes precedence over the welfare of the country as a whole. Consequently, some means must be provided in any labor law to prevent any individual group or combination of groups of people from cutting off the life-blood of the Nation. One of the prime duties of the Federal Government is to defend the country not only from enemies from the outside but also from disruptive forces from within.

Since the standard of living of all of us in the United States has been so far above that available to people elsewhere in the world, largely because of our productive capacity, it seems unnecessary to dwell on the fact that if this high standard is to be preserved, imposed inefficiencies such as result from make-work and featherbedding rules and boycotts and jurisdictional disputes should be disclaimed as a matter of policy of the Government and restrained insofar as practicable.

It so happens that the Taft-Hartley Act embodies many of the features which I believe should be included in any labor legislation. It is unfortunate that a rather large amount of the unfavorable reaction to this law should be based on bad labels pinned on it such as "The Slave Labor Law," "Promanagement Law," "It Will Be Used To Break the Unions." This is particularly disappointing when it seems evident that the general public favors by a large majority many of the ideas included in the law. For example, a recent well recognized public opinion poll indicates that more than 70 percent of union members and an even higher percentage of the general public are in favor of:

(a) Requiring unions to issue financial reports.
(b) Prohibiting Communists from union leadership.
(c) Establishing the union shop only with a majority vote.
(d) Allowing companies to sue labor organizations.

Practically 60 percent of union members and more than 70 percent of the general public are shown by this same poll to favor:

(a) Requiring a 60-day cooling off period.
(b) Permitting employer to ask for union election.
(c) Prohibiting jurisdictional strikes.
(d) Outlawing closed shop.

In considering the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and in your deliberations on any substitute legislation, I urge that every provision be measured against the yardsticks of these principles—equality before the law, the importance of the individual, the necessity of having responsibilities accompany rights and privileges, and the supremacy of the national welfare.

Statement by Harold W. Story, Vice President, Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co.

My name is Harold W. Story, and I reside in Milwaukee, Wis., where I have been associated with the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co. since 1919.

I have been vice president and general attorney of this firm since 1934; and, in this capacity, in charge of the technical problems of the company's struggle with the Communist leadership of local 248, UAW-CIO, over a period of 13 years.

I participated in the first social-security conference held in Washington in November 1934.

I have been a member of the statutory legislative advisory committee established under the Wisconsin Employment Relations Act since its formation in 1940.

I am a member of the advisory council of the industrial relations center of the University of Wisconsin.

In these capacities, I have become familiar with many of the problems which confront your committee in the working out of a national labor relations policy. I have prepared this statement to give my views based on my experiences, both academic and practical, in the field of labor relations.

SPECIFICATIONS FOR A SOUND NATIONAL LABOR POLICY

The problem—a national labor policy.—Stripped of its current emotionalism, the problem before Congress today is to define by legislation a national labor policy.

President Truman's specifications.—It is a truism that continuation of American democracy depends upon the protection of fundamental rights of individuals and of the public.

President Truman recognized this in two well-considered statements.

On June 12, 1946, the President said:

"We accomplish nothing by striking at labor here, at management there. There should be no emphasis placed upon considerations of whether a bill is 'antilabor' or 'prolabor.' Where excesses have developed on the part of labor leaders or management, such excesses should be corrected—not in order to injure either party—but to bring about as great an equality as possible between the bargaining positions of labor and management. Neither should be permitted to become too powerful as against the public interest as a whole. Equality for both and vigilance for the public welfare—these should be the watchwords of future legislation." [Italics added.]

In his recent inaugural address, the President again stated: "Democracy * * * is charged with the responsibility of protecting the rights of the individual and his freedom in the exercise of his abilities." [Italics added.]

Thus, President Truman has himself laid down for Congress the specifications for the formulation of a national labor policy, namely, legislation designed (1) to promote the public welfare and (2) to protect individual rights.

In building the national labor policy, it is logical to use as a foundation the basic right of individuals to self-organize for the purpose of collective bargaining and to exercise that right—affirmatively and negatively—with freedom.

Upon this foundation there should be erected a complete national labor policy prescribing the manner of exercise of this basic right and setting forth any limitation thereof which might be required in the public interest or for the protection of individual rights.

Specific questions of legislative policy.—In order to point out the legislation needed to round out a national labor policy, certain specific questions will be presented and discussed.

Proper approach to problem.—In line with the specifications declared by President Truman, it is hoped that your committee will consider these questions, not from the standpoint of whether they are "antilabor" or "prolabor"—but whether they are needed for the protection of the public welfare or for the protection of the rights of the individuals involved.

These questions should also be considered in the light of the power, both economic and financial, which unions have acquired since the enactment of the Wagner Act.

The automobile, steel, coal, maritime, and railroad unions have recently demonstrated that they now have the power to paralyze great segments of our economy. Thus, one of the original purposes of the Wagner Act, namely, to provide equality of bargaining power to employees, has not only been accomplished but actually surpassed in these areas.

QUESTION 1—SHOULD A NONCOMMUNIST AFFIDAVIT BE REQUIRED OF UNION OFFICERS AND OTHER EXECUTIVES?

Some members of your committee will recall the situation with which Allis-Chalmers and its employees were confronted when I testified before this committee in February 1947.

For the benefit of those who were not here, our plant had been struck for 10 months by the Communist leaders of local 248, UAW-CIO. The full and documented record of these union leaders, as well as the decade of violence and destruction they caused, is set forth in the brief filed with your committee at this time.

In June of 1947, the anti-Communist provision became effective. A few months thereafter the leaders of local 248 announced their resignations.

That these resignations were forced by the anti-Communist provision is proved by a statement in the November 26, 1947, issue of the union daily.

The statement said: "Yes, it is too bad this step had to be taken. Allis-Chalmers workers are now seeing the Taft-Hartley law in action;" and further, "The Taft-Hartley law has forced us to change our weapons and revise our method of attack." [Italics added.]

How true are those words.

The Allis-Chalmers employees did see the non-Communist affidavit requirement in operation. They did see the Communist leaders resign and the international union move in with an administrator who made it possible for the election of a democratic trade-union leadership.

Our experiences of the past year clearly reflect the great change in labor-management relations which resulted from the removal of a leadership which apparently could not sign the affidavits.

Immediately upon the establishment of a trade-union leadership, an interim agreement was reached between the new leadership and Allis-Chalmers. This provided for a check-off and grievance procedure.

Collective bargaining then continued and in December 1948, the first full contract in 5 years was signed by Allis-Chalmers and the new leadership of local 248.

On December 20, 1948, after the contract had been ratified at a meeting of the union membership, the Milwaukee Journal said in an editorial entitled "Miracle on South Seventieth Street:"

"This is the Christmas season so perhaps it is not too unusual for miracles to occur. Anyway, one has just happened in West Allis. We will call it the miracle on South Seventieth Street. That's where the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co. general office is.

"Outside the gates of this enormous plant there has occurred in recent years the most violent labor strife in the bitterest strikes ever held in Wisconsin. Men and women have been injured, property destroyed, riot conditions have prevailed at times.

"Thousands of workers were off the job for periods of more than a year in several strikes. Hate ran high. The whole of West Allis suffered. How else could it be with the greatest industry half paralyzed for long periods?

"Inside of the largest union, local 248, UAW-CIO, there was bitterness, too. A handful of purposeful leaders, apparently more devoted to Soviet interests and to world communism than to the American worker, managed to control the union. Some of them stopped at almost nothing—not even at ballot fraud. There was no democracy in the union.

"Things are different today and that is what has brought about the miracle on South Seventieth Street; Local 248, UAW-CIO, is still there but it isn't the same union. It is a new union with an old name. The voices of the Communists and their followers are stilled; their power is broken. The ringleader is facing a 2- to 6-year prison sentence.

"Today the membership runs local 248 democratically.

"For a long time negotiations have been in process between the union and the company management. They have been very different from negotiations, or what were called negotiations, in the past. Both sides have sat at the bargaining table in good faith. We weren't present so we don't know exactly what happened. But we have heard from both sides that there has been honest bargaining—tough bargaining perhaps, but honest bargaining just the same. It was give and take, but it wasn't hot-headed shouting; it was not a mere exchange of charge and countercharge, nor a competition in invective, either in the sessions or outside them.

"Finally terms of a contract were agreed to. The union members didn't all like them. Some wanted different terms. A minority report was submitted to union members. Then everything was threshed out in a democratic union meeting. In due time, the membership voted, after hearing all arguments. The contract was approved, unanimously.

"And that brings us directly to the miracle on South Seventieth Street. A contract, mutually and peacefully agreed to by union and management, was signed there Monday.

"May we, and we are sure thousands of Greater Milwaukeeans will want to join us, wish you all at Allis-Chalmers—union members and management alike—a very, very Merry Christmas, indeed." [Italics added.]

Similarly, at other plants throughout the Nation, the Communist union leaders in many instances have been forced to resign their union offices.

Thus, the effectiveness of the anti-Communist affidavit requirement of section 9 (h) has been well demonstrated by the value already derived from it by industry and unions. Furthermore, even the Government has taken cognizance of this fact.

Not long ago Mr. David Lilienthal, Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, ordered General Electric not to recognize the officers of United Electrical Workers local in their atomic plants because the officers had failed to file the non-Communist affidavit.

In the Atomic Energy Commission's motion in the United States court in the District of Columbia to support Mr. Lilienthal's order, the following language was used:

"The dangers arising from Communist control of a union representing labor employed in the production of fissionable materials hardly requires lengthy elaboration. In the field of atomic energy, at least, continuity of production and the safeguarding of restricted data are both vital to the national defense. Past experience, notably in the strike of the Milwaukee plant of the Allis-Chalmers Co. in the interlude between the Russo-German Pact of 1939 and the German attack on Russia in June of 1941, teaches that labor unions under Communist leadership, however innocent the rank and file membership, may be used to halt production in the interests of a foreign power." [Italics added.]

The value of these non-Communist affidavits takes on added significance when it is considered that many labor leaders and friends of labor favor them. A few are Mr. David Dubinsky, of the Germent Workers; Mr. Green, of the A. F. of L.; and Mr. Tobin, the Secretary of Labor. Other labor leaders, such as Walter Reuther, of the United States Automobile Workers, who originally opposed the affidavits, have apparently found that Communists' inability to comply has been helpful in cleaning the Communists out of unions.

In view of the troubled international situation and the past efforts of Communist leaders to sabotage defense preparations by strikes and other defensive tactics, it is more important than ever to use every means to prevent Communists from controlling unions through subterfuge or otherwise.

For that reason, it is obvious that section 9 (h) should be retained. The only question is whether the scope of the provision should not be broadened.

Experience has shown the evasion possibilities where the Communist union officers have resigned and taken other posts of great influence in union affairs but with no official status under the union's constitution and bylaws. Such a post is that of education director, which is ideal for the dissemination of the Communist doctrine. Other similar subterfuges have been employed to evade signing the affidavits.

Accordingly, in view of President Truman's recent characterization of American Communists as "traitors," it would seem a necessary safeguard to extend the scope of the section to prevent such subterfuges.

Thus, my recommendation for the legislative answer to this question is (1) to retain the provision of section 9 (h) and (2) to enlarge its coverage so that it will apply to all executive holding policy-forming positions or other positions where Communist influence may be effective.

QUESTION 2—SHOULD THE RIGHT OF AN EMPLOYEE TO SEEK OR RETAIN EMPLOYMENT BE DEPENDENT UPON MEMBERSHIP IN A LABOR ORANIZATION?

Phrased more directly, the question would be:

"Should compulsory unionism be sanctioned from the standpoint of the public welfare and the free exercise of fundamental individual rights by employees?"

Definition of compulsory unionism.—The term "compulsory unionism" means any contract requirement which makes an employee's job dependent upon his membership in good standing in the union. The contract requirement may take the form of a closed shop, an all-union shop, or maintenance of membership.

How compulsory unionism functions.—In operation, compulsory unionism means that an employer must discharge an employee when so requested by the employee's bargaining agent.

The absoluteness of the right of a union leadership, under the War Labor Board directed type of maintenance of membership clause, to demand discharge of an employee is well demonstrated by the decision of an impartial referee in an Allis-Chalmers case (Referee Decision No. 131, local 248, UAW-CIO, and West Allis Works). In this decision the referee said:

"Although a union member who had executed a maintenance of membership card faced expulsion from the union because of acts which either he, or the company, asserted he was bound to perform in the fulfillment of his obligation to the company, the tribunal which shall determine the correctness of formal charges filed against him or the sufficiency of his defense is the membership of the union acting under union law and through its duly constituted committees or agencies, and neither the company nor the referee has any power to review, question, or reverse union action." [Italics added.]

Union control of the right to work, a public-policy question.—The right to work means, of course, the right to a means of livelihood without resort to public assistance.

Compulsory unionism enables a union leadership through the "good standing" device to control at its will the right to work. Thus, compulsory unionism enables a union leadership to utilize for its own ends the most coercive human pressure, namely, the control of the individual's means of livelihood.

Certainly no one would urge that the fundamental right of individuals to self-organize, that is, to belong or not to belong to a labor organization, should be destroyed or even abridged except in the public interest, i. e., for the common good.

This principle is recognized by the Reverend William J. Smith, S. J., a well-known authority on labor unions, in his book entitled "Spotlight on Labor Unions."

On page 56 he states:

"It cannot be denied that the right to work is a sovereign right. But it should likewise be made crystal clear that the right to work is not an absolute right any more than the ownership of property is an absolute right. They are both conditioned by the principle of the common good. Labor has a social aspect as well as property.

"Whether or not a minority of workers must cede their right to work as individuals and join up with their fellow workers in a closed-shop agreement depends upon a simple question: 'Is the closed shop a necessary means for the existence and the proper and efficient functioning of the union?' If it is, the common good of all the workers must be given priority and preference over the individual whim or dissident desires of the individual workers." [Italics added.]

The two views on the question.—There are two opposing schools of thought in the country as to the function of unions in our free society.

One school believes that a union is merely a voluntary association which occupies a place in our society, which is either useful or destructive, depending upon the purposes and actions of the particular union leadership. This school feels that if the usefulness of a union is not sufficient stimulus to gain support of an overwhelming majority of those in the collective-bargaining unit, the union is not entitled to gain support through the coercion of compulsory unionism.

The union, according to this school, is merely an administrative agency mechanically necessary to carry on the work of collective bargaining for all employees in the bargaining unit.

The members of this school decry the legalizing of compulsory unionism as a violation of human rights—the constitutional right of freedom of contract. They desire a legislative declaration that compulsory unionism is contrary to the public interest.

The opposing school of thought believes that unionism, both from a social and a practical standpoint, is vitally necessary to the welfare of our society. It seems to consider the union as a sort of spiritual or social collective bargaining entity without which there can be no fair treatment of employees by an employer.

This school includes many religious and intellectual groups whose sincerity and soundness of purpose are beyond question.

The members of this school have the conviction that unions cannot survive without the assistance of compulsory unionism. Stated in another way, they believe that the union needs some type of "union security" to fulfil its function.

Analysis of the view that compulsory unionism is necessary.—By critical analysis, let us consider whether there is any sound basis for this conviction; and in so doing, keep in mind the tremendous financial and economic power possessed by unions today.

"Union security" is an appealing term which implies the necessity for providing protection to the union against some force which threatens its status as a bargaining agent.

But what are the forces which might threaten the security of a union? They must be either (1) the employer, (2) another union, or (3) the employees eligible to membership exercising their right to self-organization.

Are certified unions protected against interference by employers?

The National Labor Relations Act, of course, protects the right of self-organization (i. e., unionism) against interference by the employer. The Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 contains all of the protective "unfair labor practice" provisions of the NLRA.

So also do most State labor laws.

No question has been currently raised as to the adequacy of the provisions of the LMRA from the standpoint of affording protection to employees and their unions against interference by the employer.

Hence, it may be assumed that there are at present State and Federal labor laws affording adequate protection to unions against the employer. However, if the protection is not adequate, these laws may be strengthened in order to insure adequate protection upon a proper showing of the fact.

Are certified unions protected against "raiding" activities of other unions?

The answer is "No" largely because that kind of protection would be contrary to the fundamental principle of the National Labor Relations Act, namely, the right of self-organization.

To be a "right" at all, the right to self-organize must be a continuing "right" which would permit employees to select a different bargaining agency as they see fit but with such restrictions as might be administratively desirable from the standpoint of short-term stability.

Moreover, it is the responsibility of unions themselves to work out the solution of this particular problem by establishing an antiraiding gentlemen's agreement.

In addition, it would be a simple matter for a trustworthy union leadership to bargain for an "antiraiding" clause (similar to that in most Allis-Chalmers contracts) which would prohibit union activity on company premises on behalf of any competing union.

However, in view of the ever-present threat of Communist union leaderships, it is extremely doubtful whether antiraiding protection to unions would be in the public interest. This is indicated by the raiding activity now being conducted against certain unions which appear to be under the domination of Communist leadership.

Since unions, as a class, have the power to prevent raiding, it is illogical for them to urge the necessity of compulsory unionism for that purpose.

Is the certified union protected against the acts of employees in the bargaining unit?

The foundation of any national labor policy is the guaranty of the right of employees to self organize for the purposes of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

Legally, there are two distinct types of activity in this connection. One is the participation in the election (or rejection) of an exclusive bargaining agency. The other is the exercising of the prerogatives of membership in the union.

Thus, the question under discussion must be applied to two groups of employees, namely, (1) nonmembers of the union, and (2) members of the union.

Accordingly, the first part of this question is whether the certified union is protected against acts of nonmembers.

The National Labor Relations Board, even under the Wagner Act, did, with considerable inconsistency, protect the right of self-organization of nonmember groups in working against a certified union.

Nevertheless, it has tacitly sanctioned the Allis-Chalmers policy of protecting the certified union against acts of nonmembers on company premises.

This Allis-Chalmers policy was expressed in a published statement to employees explaining the meaning of a certain provision of the 1938 contract with local 248, UAW-CIO, as follows:

"* * * The union cannot force an employee to join the union. But, on the other hand, no employee who stays out of the union will be permitted to talk against the union on company premises. This is just fair play."

This policy was effectuated by a contract provision prohibiting any competitive organizing activity on company premises by nonmembers of the certified union. The contract clause read as follows:

"No employee will be permitted to engage in any activity in any way related to or connected with the work of a labor organization or of collective bargaining on company premises, except as provided in the agreements with labor organizations certified as the exclusive bargaining agencies in the various bargaining units in the plant."

Incidentally, a violation of this contract provision is an unfair labor practice, enjoinable upon complaint of the certified union under section 111.06 (2) (c) of the Wisconsin Employment Relations Act.

Thus, it appears that protection against this nonmember group can normally be obtained by collective bargaining. But in any event it can be obtained through legislation establishing a code of fair conduct for the nonmembership group and a method for its enforcement through the unfair labor practice procedure of the LMRA.

The second part of the question is whether the certified union is protected against the acts of its own members.

The protection which leaders of a certified union have in mind is a bloc against the right of the members to work for a change in the leadership of the certified union or a change in the bargaining representative itself.

This kind of protection, of course, is the nullification of the employees' basic right of self-organization. It can be accomplished only through a deal between the employer and the certified union for a compulsory unionism clause. The sanctioning of this contractual arrangement was contained in section 8 (3) of the Wagner Act and is now incorporated in the administration bill.

Thus, the whole question of compulsory unionism is whether the substantial nullification of the right of self-organization is in the public interest.

On what grounds do unions justify compulsory unionism?

The unions' position is stated by the Reverend Jerome L. Toner on page 190 of his dissertation, "The Closed Shop in the American Labor Movement," as follows:

"Unions have always defended their legal right to ask for a closed shop * * *. They have also stressed the moral right to seek a closed shop, claiming that this rests on the social necessity of unions and the dictates of simple justice. Since unions are usually necessary to enable workers to obtain what is their due and since unions generally cannot long exist and properly perform their function without closed-shop conditions, unionists insist that it is the duty of every worker to join a union. * * * Mere financial payment by nonunionists is not enough, according to the unionists: actual membership is required."

Summarized, the union claims are that (1) unions are a social necessity, (2) unions cannot exist without compulsory unionism, and (3) it is the duty of every employee to join the union.

The statement that a union cannot exist without compulsory unionism is not true. The record of unionism throughout the United States during the past 10 years is replete with examples of unions which have grown strong without the aid of compulsory unionism. Railway unions are shining examples.

The experience of Allis-Chalmers is proof enough. Strong unions of all types represent its employees at nine plants without the aid of compulsory unionism.

Next, let us consider the other two union claims together, namely, (1) the social necessity for unions and (2) the duty of the employee to join the union.

These claims are also unfounded. All unions do not have good leadership. Hence, every union is not a social asset. Obviously, no employee has the duty to belong to a socially undesirable union. On the other hand, he has the positive duty of organizing to oust the bad leadership or to select a different bargaining agency. But compulsory unionism is the very device which can be used to prevent him from doing this, particularly if the union has a communistic leadership.

What are the real reasons why union leaders want compulsory unionism?

Off the record, union leaders will quite frankly admit that they desire compulsory unionism for two reasons, namely, (1) the power to discipline employees and (2) the assurance of financial support for the union.

The power to discipline is the power to force employees to support the policies of the union leaders. In large unions these policies are usually formulated by union leaders without benefit of democratic expressions from rank and file.

The danger of this autocratic power, the possibility of its abuse, and the necessity for protection of the individual employees against its misuse is now being generally admitted by authorities on the subject.

The danger of this power is pointed out by the Reverend Toner, in these words:

"An important aspect of the power of the closed shop to control job opportunity and tenure is the dangerous power which it vests in union leaders who do not represent the interests of the rank-and-file membership. The almost irresistible impulse to perpetuate their positions sometimes leads them to utilize constitutional devices to centralize authority in executive hands. Any attempt to organize an opposition may be penalized by charges resulting in suspension or expulsion from the union, which automatically means dismissal from a closed-shop job. Such strategy is carried on by perversion of parliamentary procedure just as effective as gangster domination. Unless the worker is protected from this kind of abuse under the closed shop, it may prove more harmful than employer exploitation and discrimination. Not until the employee who is suspended or expelled from a union is able to go to a Labor Board, Federal or State, and has his case heard will this danger, almost inherent, although infrequent, in the closed shop, be removed." [1] [Italics added.]

The need for protection of employees against abuses of compulsory unionism is shown by the following quotations:

"Labor unions are, of course, human institutions and are thus subject to the vices as well as the virtues of their leaders. In that respect, the closed shop presents the same dangers that are inherent in the concentration of power in the hands of officers of any institution—political, economic, or social. But it is obvious that the danger is much more minatory when the power is held by union officials who, through the usurpation of power of voluntary associations, may almost at will refuse membership to some workers or rescind it from others. In either case, under such abuses of the closed-shop principle, the result is to deprive a man of the opportunity to earn his living. Therefore, in order to safeguard that opportunity, while at the same time permitting the proper functioning of the closed shop, two important provisions are needed: (1) Every union must be open generally to qualified workers on reasonable and nondiscriminatory terms; and (2) workers who have been refused membership and those who have been suspended or expelled from a union should be permitted to appeal their cases to an impartial chairman or a labor board." [2] [Italics added.]

"We think that the Board should have power to order a union to cease discriminating, or inducing an employer to discriminate, under such circumstances.

"But should there be a broader protection against unreasonable expulsion or refusal of membership under a union-security agreement? Taft-Hartley, we think, went too far in preventing any power of discipline by a union by expulsion and requiring discharge as a result. Yet occasional abuses have been prevented by this provision. Is not this a point on which agreement should be sought from the unions as to standards of behaviors, with some provision for appeal to the Board when necessary against unreasonable exclusion?" [3] [Italics added.]

"I have no desire to weaken the bargaining power of unions. But I am greatly concerned that the rights of the individual workers, which the Wagner Act established as against the employers, shall be preserved within the organizations that the law fosters to protect the workers' rights against employers. Only if the unions are democratic both in the sense of protecting individual rights and in the sense of affording full participation in all decisions, can they rise to their full possibilities as instruments of industrial democracy in a free society." [4] [Italics added.]

"How might Congress have dealt with this issue (compulsory unionism) more fairly?

"By requiring that all discharges under union-shop conditions be reviewed by an impartial umpire or by the Board itself. This would have protected the rights of the individual worker without weakening the effectiveness of the union shop." [5]

The attitude expressed in the foregoing quotations is that the arbitrary power of discipline made available to a union leadership through compulsory unionism may be desirable in certain situations; but that employees must be protected against the misuse of this power by union leaderships.

Let us carefully analyze the practical application of this general endorsement of compulsory unionism.

It means the endorsement of the use of this powerful weapon by union leaderships which may be communistic, or of questionable ethics, or possibly merely incapable of the exercise of sound judgment in the area of economics.

It is a specific endorsement in such situations because, from a practical standpoint, it is impossible to prove to their objectionable characteristics in advance of the actual realization of the destructive effect of the activities of such leaderships. In other words, proof of the objectionable character of union leadership is always after the fact of the destructive utilization of the power of compulsory unionism.

The experience of Allis-Chalmers with local 248, UAW-CIO, from 1937 until 1947 clearly illustrates the point.

During this long period of destructive control of local 248 by a communistic union leadership, the company was convinced of the communistic affiliation of the notorious Harold Christoffel and his satellites. But it was not until the Milwaukee press exposed the true character of this leadership—as late as 1946—that public opinion took charge of the situation and made possible the ousting of this clique.

However, during this entire period the company had the heavy burden of fighting the continual demands of the Communist leadership for the power of compulsory unionism under the appealing guise of union security.

In the final analysis, the tacit sanctioning of compulsory unionism by the "hands off" attitude of section 8 (3) of the Wagner Act, which is incorporated into the administration bill, would have certain destructive effects:

First, it would destroy the protection now afforded to employees by the L. M. R. A. from misuse of the device of "good standing as a condition of employment"—a protection generally recommended in the quotations of Reverend Toner et al. (supra);

Second, it would provide a fruitful source of labor disputes and potential strikes, now made illegal by the L. M. R. A.;

Third, it would again place upon employers the responsibility of resisting the pressure of strikes clearly against the public interest called by communistic union leaderships in support of demands for compulsory unionism; and

Fourth, it would again permit compulsory unionism to be utilized for the selfish interests or motives of union leaderships or employers.

The time is long past for the laissez-faire attitude of section 8 (3) of the Wagner Act. In view of the tremendous financial and economic power now possessed by international unions, the use of the coercive power of compulsory unionism has become a matter of vital public policy, and therefore, governmental responsibility.

What is the responsibility of government in this connection?

Prof. Sumner Slichter, Father Kelly, Father Toner (supra), and other authorities on the subject, apparently would be satisfied with some procedure whereby a member could appeal to an impartial referee or a State or Federal Labor Board.

Probably these suggestions were not intended to contain the complete thought of the authors on the subject. But in any event they inadequately perform the desired purpose of protecting union members against the abuses of compulsory unionism for two reasons:

The first reason is the fact that the coercive abuses of compulsory unionism can occur without actual discharge. In other words, the mere threat of possible discharge is usually enough to coerce the average union member into acquiescence to any particular policy urged by union leaders.

The second reason is that the mere opportunity for appeal of a discharge on the ground of no "cause" or "unjust cause" would leave the decision entirely to the judgment of the appeal board as to the employee's duty to the union. This judgment would vary widely depending upon the particular philosophy of the board upon the question of preservation of individual rights as against the theory that employees' rights must be abrogated in favor of the social desirability of a union.

The question of the duty of an employee to his union brings into bold relief the conflict between the guaranty of the employee's right to organize and the union's right to represent all employees in the bargaining unit.

This thought seems to be indicated by David A. McCabe in a statement (supra) as follows:

"I have no desire to weaken the bargaining power of unions. But I am greatly concerned that the rights of the individual workers, which the Wagner Act established as against the employer's, shall be preserved within the organizations that the law fosters to protect the workers' rights against employers'." [Italics added.]

This "concern" can be met only if the Government meets its responsibility through appropriate legislation establishing an objective standard of behavior of employees toward their union (as suggested by Prof. D. A. McCabe (supra)). Then "cause" for so-called "disciplining" of members of a union would be limited to violation of such standard behavior.

Because of the foregoing reasons, the Government has the responsibility of making a different approach to the problem. But what is the proper approach?

Upon the basis of two arguable assumptions, i. e., (1) unions are a social necessity and (2) unions cannot exist without compulsory unionism, the proper approach to the problem would be to work out a program of legislation which would provide any protective security needed by unions without the coercive powers (and possible abuses) of compulsory unionism.

What different kinds of security are obtained by unions through compulsory unionism? They are:

(1) Financial protection;

(2) Protection against raiding by rival unions;

(3) Protection against acts of the employees in the bargaining unit; and

(4) The hiring hall.

Can these protections be provided by legislation?—As to financial protection.—When the employees in a collective-bargaining unit, by a majority vote, have elected a union to represent them in collective bargaining, it might fairly be required as a condition of the election that each employee in the bargaining unit should be required to bear his proportionate share of the expense of the union in carrying out its administrative duties as bargaining agent.

Legislation could readily be devised to provide that such expense be checked off by the employer and paid to the union. Only items should be included in the budget of administrative expenses of the union which are incurred in carrying on its day-to-day operations in connection with the bargaining unit. Any extraordinary expense, such as those for political action committees, insurance funds, strike benefits, and the like should not be included in the administrative budget, but should be met by voluntary dues payment.

There is no obstacle to passing legislation for compulsory payment to meet the administrative budget of the bargaining agent. The only real problem would be to define the items which would be included in unions' administrative expense.

As to protection against raiding unions.—By administrative rule, the Board under the Wagner Act gave substantially 1 year of anti-raiding protection. The LMRA by substantive provisions does likewise.

Whether more protection should be provided as a matter of public policy is a grave question. But if proof is furnished showing such need, then any additional protection could be guaranteed through the device of an unfair labor practice.

As to protection against employes of the bargaining unit.—It would be a simple matter to create a code of fair behavior for employes in relation to their bargaining agent. It would mean merely designating as unfair labor practices the employe's acts found to be improper.

In this way, employes would be assured of a fair trial of any alleged violation of such code charged by the certified union.

No difficulty would be presented in stopping unfair labor practices of this kind. The problem would be in defining what acts of the employes should constitute unfair labor practices.

As to the benefits of the hiring hall.—The hiring hall is the contractual device that changes an all-union shop into a closed shop (closed union). It requires the employer to hire only persons supplied by the contracting union.

The hiring hall is potentially discriminatory and monopolistic and violative of the intent of the antitrust laws.

For that reason, the closed shop is obviously more dangerous from the standpoint of public welfare and the rights of individuals than any other type of compulsory unionism.

As a legislative matter, the hirng hall can be legalized by a very simple provison. The difficult problem would be to write into the law all the needed safeguards, if it should be decided by Congress that the hiring hall was not contrary to public policy.

The foregoing analysis indicates that the suggested direct approach to the problem of union security is feasible. In other words, all the protection afforded to a certified union through compulsory unionism can be obtained through affirmative legislation by Congress and without the undesirable consequences of compulsory unionism.

However, this question is complicated because of (a) the wide difference of philosophical approach to the problem by the two schools of thought, and (b) the need for exhaustive factual research.

For that reason, it appears that the question cannot fairly be decided upon the basis of the type of testimony presently available to the committee, but should be reated from the objective standpoint recommended in the conclusion of this statement.

Many months of study would be required to do the necessary research.

A review of the existing protection of the certified union discloses no reason why, in the interim, the provisions of the existing law, with reference to compulsory unionism, should not remain in force.

Inferentially, there is adequate protection of the union against interference by the employer under existing law because the provisions in this respect are practically identical with those of the Wagner Act.

There is adequate antiraiding protection of the certified union under the present law.

The financial security afforded by compulsory unionism is available under existing law.

Because of the hiring hall's potential for antitrust law violation and discrimination against individual rights, it should not be legalized prior to a considered decision reached after an exhaustive study to determine (1) whether the hiring-hall clause should continue to be prohibited or (2) whether it should be legalized under certain circumstances and with defined safeguards.

Upon the basis of the foregoing analysis, it is recommended that the Hoover Commission, or other similarly constituted body, conduct an exhaustive research upon the whole subject of compulsory unionism and particularly the following pertinent questions:

(1) Does existing law adequately protect the certified union against interference by the employer?

(a) If not, what additional provisions of law are necessary?

(2) Does existing law adequately protect the certified union against "raiding" or other interferences by competing unions?

(a) If not, what additional protection should be provided in the form of unfair labor practices?

(3) Under what circumstances, if any, is compulsory unionsism required in order to afford financial security to a certified union?

(a) Should each employee in the bargaining unit be required by law to bear his proportionate share of the administrative expense of the certified union?

(b) What items of expense should be included in an administrative budget?

(4) With adequate protection against interference by the employer and raiding unions, and with adequate financial security, can the certified union exist as a constructive collective-bargaining force without compulsory unionism?

(a) What behavior on the part of an employee would constitute an improper interference with the functioning of the certified union?

(b) What acts of an employee constitute an improper interference with the certified union so that they should be included in a code of unfair behavior and classed as unfair labor practices?

(5) Under what circumstances, if any, should the "hiring hall" be sanctioned?

(a) If the hiring hall, under some circumstances, is sanctioned, then what safeguards against discrimination, monopolistic practices, and violations of the spirit and purpose of antitrust laws should be provided as a condition of the sanction?

In making the study, the joint committee should be guided by President Truman's specifications for a sound national labor policy explained in the preface of this presentation.

Accordingly, they should keep in mind that a national labor policy established to protect the right of self-organization and collective bargaining should conform to the following principles:

(1) Protection of the public welfare;

(2) Protection of the rights of individual employees; and

(3) Maintaining "as great an equality as possible between the bargaining positions of labor and management."

QUESTION 3—SHOULD INTERFERENCE WITH THE RIGHT TO WORK BY ILLEGAL PICKETING BE AN UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE?

This question has two parts: First, what is illegal picketing, and second, should it be classed as an unfair labor practice under a national labor policy?

What is illegal picketing?—Illegal picketing is any kind of picketing which is not "peaceful" as judicially defined.

"Peaceful picketing" is picketing which advises the public by printed and spoken word of the existence of a strike and the reasons for the strike. The purpose of this picketing is to enlist public support of the strike.

The courts have given peaceful picketing the benefit of a constitutional guarantee as a form of "free speech." But the constitutional guarantee of free speech does not protect slander, threats of violence, and other tortious utterances.

Unfortunately, picketing is not customarily peaceful. On the contrary, the usual type of picketing seen today in industrial strikes is the complete blockade of plant gates by a mass of pickets in lock step slowly circling in front of the plant gates.

This is in accord with unions' general position—tacitly understood, although not frankly declared—that the purpose of picketing is to stop completely the operations of the employer.

In this connection, it may be interesting to recount certain happenings during the 1946 Communist-dominated strike at the West Allis works of Allis-Chalmers in Wisconsin.

According to the Milwaukee press, the recording secretary of the Communist-led local 248 addressed a mass meeting of employees in this manner:

"The union expects 100 percent allegiance to the walk-out," he said, warning, "Some of the boys think they are big enough to stand by themselves. But we'll deal with company stooges. Nothing alive will walk into that plant." [Italics added.]

Again in an editorial in the CIO News, the local 248 leadership stated:

"* * * A few pickets at a gate cannot stop a bunch of scabs determined on going in to work; but a mob of pickets can keep any plant shut."

Mr. R. J. Thomas, then international vice president of the UAW-CIO and now on the national staff of the CIO, publicly urged bigger and better picket-line violence.

On November 25, 1946, during the height of the violence of that strike, the company sent the following telegram to Mr. Philip Murray, president of the CIO:

"Press reports indicate that you are urging mass picketing of our West Allis works by persons who are not our employees. We are assuming that the press reports have not correctly interpreted your statement because mass picketing which interferes with the pursuit of work is a violation of State statutes and of State labor laws which protect equally the right to work and the right to strike.

"The Wisconsin State Labor Board, after lengthy hearing, found that the leadership of local 248, UAW-CIO, was conducting picketing in violation of law and ordered discontinuance thereof The courts have issued an injunction based upon the State's action.

"You occupy an enviable position in the field of labor as head of the CIO. Your leadership will mean much to the future of organized labor and unionism.

"With the conviction that it is not your desire even to condone, much less urge, violation of State laws by illegal picketing in this community, we are calling this situation to your attention so that you may, if you deem it necessary, take steps to insure that your statements have not been thus misinterpreted."

Mr. Murray did no respond to this telegram nor did he make a public statement condemning the violence, even though it was common knowledge that the violence was being incited by communistic local union leaders.

The true significance of the unions' position is more obvious when viewed in the light of the fact that local police protection is usually inadequate to cope with tremendous mass picketing in large industrial strikes.

For example, the picketing in Allis-Chalmers' Communist-led strike in 1946 occurred in the city of West Allis, Wis. On some days the pickets numbered more than 2,000. The entire effective police force of the city numbered about 40 officers. The police force was quite naturally inadequate to control picket-line violence involving thousands of pickets

Accordingly, the conclusions can be drawn:

(1) By common practice, picketing is customarily illegal; and

(2) Normally, illegal picketing interferes effectively with the right to work, and hence results in a loss of production for interstate commerce.

Under these circumstances, should illegal picketing be treated as an unfair labor practice?

The Wagner Act was held to be constitutional on the ground that under the commerce clause of the Constitution the Federal Government has the responsibility for protecting interstate commerce.

Where illegal picketing is causing an interference with the right to work, and hence production for shipment in interstate commerce, the Federal Government not only has the right but also the responsibility to remove the illegal interference with interstate commerce.

Because of this responsibility and the inadequacy of local police power, the Eightieth Congress enacted section 8 (b) (1) (A) of the L. M. R. A.

This provision makes illegal picketing an unfair labor practice, and hence subject to a cease-and-desist order of the National Labor Relations Board.

The effective application of this provision was demonstrated in the Board's decision in the Sunset Line & Twine Co. case.

In this case the Board found that automobiles of nonstrikers and supervisors attempting to gain access to the plant were blocked by massed pickets. Other automobiles were violently shaken, with the threat of overturning. Observing the mass picketing, drivers of other cars turned back without attempting to enter the plant.

In its decision the Board ordered the union to cease and desist from such illegal picketing.

The unions' intention to utilize illegal picketing as a union device to close down plants is clearly shown by the statements of Mr. Philip Murray, president of the CIO, and Mr. Arthur J. Goldberg, CIO general counsel.

Mr Murray said:

"Just last week the Taft-Hartley law was held to outlaw picketing, however peaceful and orderly, if engaged in by a solid number of strikers. I say to Taft and Hartley and their candidates for President that labor will not permit this invasion of our clear constitutional rights"

And Mr. Goldberg said:

"The decision of the National Labor Relations Board issued today in the Sunset Line & Twine case completely exposes the claims of Republican supporters of the Taft-Hartley Act that it is a mild law. The decision also makes it clear that the Labor Board is determined to enforce this antilabor law in as harsh a manner as possible."

Thus, these statements disclose one of the obvious reasons why the unions are urging the passage of H. R. 2032, which would eliminate section 8 (b) (1) (A) of the L. M. R. A.

The effect of this elimination would be to relieve the National Labor Relations Board of its responsibility to prevent interference with interstate commerce by illegal picketing.

Thus, the situation would be restored to that under the Wagner Act. In other words, there would again be interference with interstate commerce by illegal picketing.

Stated in another way, the repeal of section 8 (b) (1) (A) of the LMRA would mean that Congress was giving tacit sanction to illegal picketing interference with interstate commerce.

A few brief remarks seem appropriate with reference to certain statements made in this connection by Mr. G. P. Van Arkel, formerly general counsel of the NLRB, in an interview with the staff of United States News and World Report and published in the February 11, 1949, issue.

One question was:

"You don't think the right to work should be protected by statute?"

Mr. Van Arkel's reply was:

"If the right to work is interferred with by anything which we would define as improper—I mean by that by violent methods or anything of that sort—you have your local police officials there ready to take care of it. Beyond that, I don't think you have to go."

Inasmuch as it is common knowledge that the police forces of small communities are not adequate to prevent violence, it is difficult to understand why Mr. Van Arkel would make a statement of this kind.

It would be interesting to have Mr. Van Arkel's comment on the situation confronting the 40-man police force of the city of West Allis when, during Allis-Chalmers' 11-month Communist-led strike in 1946, over 2,000 pickets committed acts of violence.

With what sincerity could Mr. Van Arkel say that police officials of West Allis were "ready to take care of" the situation?

In answer to another question:

"What about mass picketing—do you think there should be anything about it in the new Wagner Act?"

Mr. Van Arkel replied:

"Again it seems to me that the regulation of that kind of thing by the Federal Government means setting up a Federal police court."

Certain acts of employers are treated as unfair labor practices and subject to cease-and-desist orders of the National Labor Relations Board. If this sets up a police court for transgressing employers, then there is no reason why the same should not be done for transgressing employees and union leaders.

Actually, however, a cease-and-desist procedure is not a police court procedure but, if it were, a police court procedure for employees would be no different than one for employers.

The attitude of Mr. Van Arkel in this regard is significant because it is indicative of the purpose of the Wagner Act as administered by the old National Labor Relations Board and its policy-making staff.

It shows once again what might be expected if section 8 (b) (1) (A) of the LMRA were repealed.

For that reason, it is recommended that illegal picketing, which interferes with the right of employees to work and, therefore, constitutes an interference with production for interstate commerce, should be declared an unfair labor practice and, hence, be subject to the cease-and-desist order of the National Labor Relations Board.

QUESTION 4—SHOULD JUDICIAL AND PROSECUTING FUNCTIONS OF A LABOR BOARD BE SEPARATED?

There are two major functions of a National Labor Relations Board, namely, (1) judicial, and (2) prosecuting.

The judicial function covers decisions on all questions of unfair labor practice. The prosecuting function covers the prosecution of unfair labor practices before the Board.

Thus, the prosecuting function is like that of a district attorney.

No one would urge that the function of the district attorney be combined with that of the trial court. And yet that is exactly what the combination of these two functions of a labor board would mean.

The judicial function has always been typified by a blindfolded goddess who dispenses even-handed justice to the parties.

The picture of a typical district attorney is rather different. One sees a keen-eyed, aggressive lawyer whose primary functional responsibility is to win convictions.

The prosecutor must be partisan. The judge must be impartial. The fusing of these two functions would result in a degenerating change in the exercise of the judicial function.

In this connection, it seems fitting to make the prophecy that the time is not far off when the governmental attitude will change from that of fostering unions to that of controlling their tremendous power and regulating their activities in the public interest.

When that occurs there will be built up a code of unfair labor practices applying to the employer, the employees, and the unions.

When that time comes the unions will be joining with the employers in demanding a separation of the prosecuting and judicial functions so that they may be assured of an impartial hearing upon unfair labor practice charges made against them.

At that time consideration may be given to a complete change of approach to the problem of unfair labor practices. It is not inconceivable that the judicial structure of the Wisconsin Employment Relations Act will be adopted.

The Wisconsin act sets up a code of unfair labor practices for the employer, the employee, and third parties.

A complaint charging the commission of an unfair labor practice is initiated by the aggrieved party. It is filed with the Board acting as a court as in any other lawsuit. The defending party answers the complaint. After the issue is joined the case is tried like any other lawsuit by the submission of evidence in proof of the complaint and by refuting testimony of the defending party.

There is no function of the prosecuting attorney in the Wisconsin procedure. Thus, from the standpoint of even-handed justice, the judicial procedure of the Wisconsin Employment Relations Act is better than the procedure of either the Wagner Act or the I. M. R. A.

It is recommended that Congress adopt the judicial procedure of the Wisconsin Employment Relations Act, but failing in that, then to create separate and independent divisions to handle the judicial and prosecuting functions of the agency charged with the administration of the national labor relations policy.

QUESTION 5—SHOULD STATES' RIGHTS BE PROTECTED IN A NATIONAL LABOR POLICY?

In the area of a national labor policy there is the possibility of conflict between States'-rights reservation clause (art. X) and the commerce clause (sec. 7, art. I) of the United States Constitution.

The extent to which States' rights may be invaded by legislation under the commerce clause can only be decided by the United States Supreme Court.

It would seem to be sound congressional policy to protect States' rights as far as possible in order to establish a block against Federal control in matters of local public interest.

Your committee has now under consideration a proposal (sec. 107, H. R. 2032) which would nullify the statutes of 13 States placing restrictions upon the use or operation of compulsory unionism in such States.

Whether the United States Supreme Court would hold this nullifying provision to be a violation of the States'-rights clause is a matter of conjecture. However, it seems a certainty that no national labor policy is sound which attempts to nullify the statutes of 13 States enacted as matters of local public policy.

Hence it is recommended that this nullifying provision form no part of our national labor policy.

QUESTION 6—SHOULD THE EMPLOYER BE REQUIRED TO BARGAIN COLLECTIVELY WITH THE MEMBERS OF HIS MANAGEMENT GROUP?

When we speak of "management representatives" we refer not only to foremen and other supervisory employees but to all administrative and professional employees in the management group (such as inspectors, time-study employees, plant-protection personnel, and confidential employees in the industrial-relations and pay-roll fields).

Upon the understanding that the reference to foremen applies generally to the entire management group, let us consider from a practical standpoint the status of the foreman in the complex operational structure of a manufacturing company which is as finely balanced as that of the human body.

To carry out the metaphor of the human body, the brain is represented by top management with its policy-making and leadership functions. The muscular system is represented by the rank-and-file employees who perform the work of production. The motor system is represented by the foremen who implement the policy-making and leadership activities of management.

No matter how fine the brain or perfect the muscular part of the body, any substantial interference with the efficient operation of the motor system causes a paralysis of the muscular functions of the body.

So it is with the industrial body. The failure of any appreciable number of foremen to perform their duties efficiently has the inevitable result of paralyzing production.

The economic progress of our country has, in a large sense, been due to the efficiency of the "body" of industry.

Thus, the basic question is: What will be the effect upon the productive capacity of our country if the employer is required by law to bargain collectively with his foremen?

In order to determine whether the functions of the foreman actually constitute the motor system of the industrial body, let us examine in detail the scope of the foreman's duties.

It is the foreman who says, "I need more men." In other words, he initiates hiring. It is the foreman who is in charge of the important on-the-job training of employees in his department. It is the foreman who knows the ability or lack of ability of his employees, and thus has the responsibility of initiating promotions, demotions, and transfers. The foreman is the man who irons out minor frictions that normally develop between employees, thus maintaining order. When breaches of order occur, it is the foreman who initiates corrective discipline.

The foreman also is charged with the duties of recommending merit increases, assigning overtime, and, in general, applying the collective-bargaining agreement.

The foreman, too, is primarily responsible for the administration of production procedures and the efficient distribution of the working force. It is the foreman who says to the employee, "Joe, I want this job done this way," and says, "Pete, I want you on this job today, and Mike, I want you over here."

And all the while he is expected to keep one eye on the costs within his department so that his company can meet the sharp competition that is inherent in our economy.

When an employee has a complaint against the company, who receives it? His foreman, who may adjust the complaint immediately. Normally, the foreman is the first recipient of any formal grievance presented by a union.

In this position, the foreman is the first management representative to spot the weaknesses in the application of company policies. His keen observation of these weaknesses is a primary factor in establishing sound company-employee relations policies.

There are many other duties of the foreman which do not fall into any regular classification; yet they are strictly management functions. For instance, the foreman is responsible for the paper work which is the key to such important confidential management functions as cost accounting and pay-roll procedure.

Thus, the foreman is responsible for implementing management policies. In short, he is an essential part of management.

The foregoing demonstrates clearly the importance of the foreman as an essential part of management.

Thus the real question is: How does unionization of the foreman destroy his effectiveness as a part of management?

The answer is twofold in that (1) the foreman's loyalty is divided between top management and his union and (2) the union acts as a wedge, creating an ever-widening breach between top management and foremen.

True, these two points are interwoven, but to fully understand their implications they must be considered separately.

On the first point, when an employee becomes a member of a union organized for the purpose of collective bargaining, he assumes the duty of fulfilling certain obligations to that union.

When an employee becomes a member of management, he assumes the obligation of performing his duties as a part of management.

No matter how ideal a management's relations with a union may be, areas of conflict are certain to arise.

If a foreman is a member of a union, he is confronted with the hopeless dilemma of reconciling his management duties with his obligations to his union.

Complete fulfillment of both obligations is frequently impossible. Whatever course the foreman takes is open to the charge of "bad faith" either by his employer or his union.

It is, indeed, the old story, all over again, that "no man can serve two masters."

As to the second point, it is the normal attitude of a union leadership to have the union act as a wedge between the company and union members. In order to "sell" the union to its members, the union leadership normally seeks to emphasize its importance to members by acting as an intervening agent in all phases of employer-employee relationship.

This has been our experience during the past 10 years in negotiations with unions representing production employees.

There has been a studied attempt on the part of union leaderships to prevent a close relationship between management and employees. For example, union leaders have attempted time and time again, in negotiations, to prevent the employee from presenting his work problems directly to his foreman. Instead, they have sought to force the intervention of the union steward.

What has occurred in the relationship between management and the production employees would inevitably be repeated if an employer were required to recognize a foreman's union for the purpose of collective bargaining.

The interposition of this union wedge into the management system would result in a failure of the foreman to effectuate management policies. This would be the "interference with the motor system" which would cause creeping paralysis of the productive efficiency of the company.

For the foregoing reasons, it seems clear that the proper legislative answer to the question is that the employer should not be required to bargain collectively with any of the members of his management group.

CONCLUSION

The formulation of a sound labor relations policy is one of the most important and difficult tasks confronting Congress today.

The importance of the task arises from the fact that a national labor policy inevitably has an impact on every phase of our society: Social, economic, and political.

The difficulty in performing the task is twofold:

(1) The tremendous quantity and quality of objective research necessary to obtain the required factual data; and

(2) The necessity for a philosophical and realistic objectivity in research and in the correct evaluation and implementation of the data in terms of legislation for a sound labor policy.

By creating the Hoover Commission, Congress has already adopted the idea of the necessity of comprehensive research by an outside organization in connection with the complex problem of reorganization of the executive branch of the government. The problem of formulating a labor policy is at least as difficult and, hence, should require the same type of research.

Of course, Congress must always exercise the function of making the ultimate legislative decision required for the establishment of the national labor policy; but the procedure of the congressional committee is not conducive to making the factual research which should form the basis for legislative policy making.

This is due in part to the fact that the witnesses who appear before congressional committees naturally make their presentations as partisan supporters of their own beliefs. My own presentation is no exception, even though I have attempted to be objective in voicing my opinions.

For the foregoing reasons, it is recommended that not only the subject of compulsory unionism, but also as much of the entire field of labor relations as may be necessary for the formulation of a sound national labor relations policy, be referred to the Hoover Commission, or similarly constituted organization, for research and policy recommendation.

Statement by A. F. Whitney, President, Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, on the Proposed National Labor Relations Act of 1949

The effort of many columnists and radio commentators to delay and, if possible, defeat the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, reminds me of the penetrating truth expressed by Henry George, "A great wrong dies hard."

We cannot fully comprehend the grave issues involved in this legislation without reflecting on the industrial history of America. Early efforts of working people to improve their wages, living standards, and working conditions were thwarted by judge-made law holding that trade-unions were conspiracies in restraint of trade. The commodity theory of labor prevailed for many years in this country. Then, in 1914, the Congress enacted the Clayton Act, in which it declared: "The labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce."

The decade following World War I experienced the most shameful era of laissez-faire economics that ever existed in this Nation, prior to enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act. The success of the "open shop" drive of the 1920's resulted in the decline of trade-union membership from over 5 million in 1920 to 3.5 million in 1929. During this period of industrial prosperity, the workers did not participate in it, as hourly and weekly earnings remained almost stationary. Increased productivity, made possible by technological changes, was accompanied by output restrictions, and as a result employment was barely maintained. Unemployment ranged from a low of 10 percent in 1920 to a high of 27 percent in 1921, and averaged about 15 percent during the decade of the 1920's. Full employment of our physical and manpower resources was not a characteristic of the "prosperity" of this period.

Between 1929 and 1932, industrial employment declined 40 percent, while unemployment increased fourfold. Earnings for those who had work declined about 60 percent. The Wagner Act aided materially in reversing these harmful trends and it is not surprising therefore that the masses of the American workers have been seriously concerned over demands to modify, and, what is falsely called to "equalize," the Wagner Act, which propaganda program by the monopolists brought about enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act.

During the 1920's, profits soared and the percent of national incomes shifted more and more from consumers to profit-takers. Monopolies and cartels expanded, while trade-union membership declined. And then came the black autumn of 1929, with the financial crash which engulfed all segments of our economy.

Even before the election of Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1932, it was becoming apparent to the more reasonable employing and financial interests that our full economy could not survive unless something was done to restore purchasing power. Reasonable men realized that a stronger labor movement was indispensable to this end. In the closing period of the Herbert Hoover administration, the Norris-LaGuardia Anti-Injunction Act was enacted by Congress, and a grateful Nation applauded the end of the evil of "government by injunction" in the human relationships of industry.

Senator Robert F. Wagner, of New York, introduced the National Labor Relations Act of 1935. Hearings were held. There was a growing belief that a strong labor movement and the democratic processes of collective bargaining were essential to a restoration of living standards and mass purchasing power necessary to the survival of our free-enterprise economy. In a world of growing dictatorships, that was America's democratic answer to the problems growing out of economic distress. Mr. H. M. Robertson, general counsel, Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., testified as follows in support of the Wagner Act:

"We felt that if the present economic system was to continue, it was inevitable that in the future there should be the organization of labor, and that real collective bargaining would eventually be made effective."

The Wagner Act became law in 1935, and for the first time in American history workers were guaranteed by statutory law the right, long exercised by employers, to form and join organizations o ftheir own free choice. The National Labor Relations Act did not affect the employer who honestly recognized the democratic right of his employees to organize.

We then witnessed the genuine truth that "A great wrong dies hard." An army of keen lawyers, employed by the National Association of Manufacturers, solemnly declared that the Wagner Act was unconstitutional. However, in 1937 the United States Supreme Court declared the Wagner Act constitutional. But the battle for freedom for American workers had just begun. In 1937 and 1938, the United States Senate established a Committee on Oppressive Labor Practices.

As we listen to the NAM interests orate about violence in labor disputes and the alleged necessity for curbing labor and protecting the public interest, let us ponder the findings, based upon sworn testimony, of that Senate committee. It found that some large corporations maintained arsenals of industrial munitions. Thugs, guns, and explosives were used by these employers to crush labor's democratic rights. The Chicago Memorial Day massacre and the Little Steel murders of workingmen proved that great wrongs die hard. And, let me remind you, that the NAM has only but begrudgingly recognized the principle of collective bargaining in its official pronouncements in recent years.

The Wagner Act freed the American workers, improved living standards and assisted American business. Between 1935 and 1947, over 7,000,000 employees voted in representation elections, conducted by the National Labor Relations Board, with 80 percent voting in favor of union representation. But a small percentage of eligible industrial employees were protected by collective-bargaining agreements in 1935, while almost half were covered by 1947. Those who orate about curbing the so-called labor monopoly should take note of the fact that only about one-fourth of the workers are organized in trade-unions at this time.

The Wagner Act stimulated that righteous principle of collective bargaining and improved labor-management relations. Evidence of increased acceptance of collective bargaining under that act is furnished by strike statistics. In 1937, at the beginning of the effectiveness of the Wagner Act, 60 percent of the workers were involved in strikes which included the issue of union recognition. In 1946, only 12 percent were involved in such strikes. Employers could have avoided about half of the strikes under that act by recognizing the democratic right of their workers to organize.

There is such a thing as repeating an untruth so often that honest men come to believe it. One of the false claims was that the Wagner Act restricted the employers' freedom of expression. The falsity of this claim is proven by full-page newspaper ads, tiresome magazine articles, Nation-wide radio programs, and millions of tricky pamphlets, all smearing organized labor, and condemning its leaders as selfish, dictatorial trouble-makers, bent upon getting something for nothing and wrecking the country, calculated to poison the minds of the public against labor unions, all of which constituted a conspiracy against the working people of the Nation.

Historically, it is unlawful for any man to threaten and intimidate a person in the exercise of his lawful rights, except that prior to the enactment of the Wagner Act, it apparently was not unlawful for an employer to threaten and intimidate his employee's democratic right to form and join labor organizations of his choice. The Wagner Act outlawed such employer intimidation.

I assert that there was no mandate from the people for the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act, since but 39 percent of the people voted in the 1946 election that created the unforgettable Eightieth Congress.

Before we leave consideration of operations under the Wagner Act, let us inquire into the economic effects of this act. There was an increase in the organization of workers; wages increased, and employment improved, while national income going into corporate profits increased from 5.3 percent in 1935, the year the Wagner Act was enacted, to 12.2 percent in 1947. During the same period, there was a decrease from 65.3 percent to 63 percent in the share of the national income going to employees. From 1935 to 1947, the over-all increase in corporate profits after taxes was 687 percent, as compared with an increase in wages of 244 percent. Between 1945 and 1947, the increase in corporate profits after taxes was 108 percent. Certainly these economic facts do not demonstrate any need for shifting power from labor to the corporations and monopolists, which was the solemnly avowed purpose for the Taft-Hartley Act.

Had the Wagner Act served its purpose or outlived its usefulness at the time it was corrupted into the Taft-Hartley Act? As recently as May 1946, Gerard Reilley, former member of the National Labor Relations Board, and certainly one who cannot be considered as prejudiced in favor of labor, said:

"You know as well as I do, that the process of converting the theory of collective bargaining into practice is far from complete, that the law of the land has yet to become the law of thousands of our industrial plants. As I see it, in the very near future, the acceptance and practice of collective bargaining in certain areas may well be put to as severe a test as any one of our other institutions have had to face. Let us not forget what happened after World War I, when the 'open shop' plan swept certain areas and left a wake of disrupted unionism."

We were well on our way to achieving the laudable goals of the Wagner Act by 1947, when the conspiracy against collective bargaining manifested itself in the form of the Taft-Hartley Act. Under the Wagner Act, a favorable climate for collective bargaining had been achieved. There were areas in our industrial economy that still needed to be organized. For instance, there is no reason why a clerk in a 10-cent store should have to depend upon her parents to supplement her small earnings in order to exist. In the interests of all the people, and in the interests of our free enterprise economy, millions of unorganized workers should now be organized. If you will review the hearings on the Taft-Hartley Act, you will observe that it was from those employers with an antiunion record that the principal amount of testimony in favor of the Taft-Hartley Act was given. So impressive is this, that it must have been planned that way.

We come now to a consideration of the period following World War II. There were many strikes in that period. The presence of the Wagner Act or the absence of the Taft-Hartley Act was not responsible for these strikes. Only one living in a fool's paradise could reach that conclusion. After World War II, in addition to the usual confusion and economic disruption that arises out of going from a wartime to a peacetime economy, the take-home pay of millions of workers was harshly reduced as a result of loss of overtime pay and down-grading. This fact, alone, would naturally lead to industrial unrest. But there were other and unusual factors in this postwar economy. Corporations made millions of dollars out of the war. Monopolies grew in power and size. They were allowed to purchase Government war plants and equipment for a few cents on the dollar. They were riding a crest of wealth and arrogance unequaled in our history. But, to cap the climax, Congress enacted a law providing for "kick-backs" in corporate taxes, and they were allowed extravagant amortization write-offs of wartime purchases, which had the result of making it possible for corporations to enjoy substantially as much profits for idling as for producing. Thus, there was little incentive for employers to make fair and peaceful settlements with their employees.

Added to these economic stresses on workers, as against the cloistered and sheltered position of the employers, the economic soothsayers of the NAM and their voices in the Congress solemnly assured us that if we got rid of price control and allocations of scarce articles, prices would decline and there would be no scarcities. I need not detail the results of this false counseling. Workers were caught between run-away prices and take-home wages. Congress failed to raise minimum wages. It did nothing about the serious housing shortage. It failed to secure workers in their health or their jobs. It enacted the old Charlie Chaplin stunt of standing on the board, while trying to pick it up. Many Members of the Congress decried strikes and joined the monopolists in the demand that labor be curbed. The infamous Taft-Hartley Act was the result.

The Taft-Hartley Act has not contributed to industrial peace or improved the basic soundness of our economy as the Wagner Act did during the most devastating economic catastrophe of our national history. Anyone acquainted with the economic injustices following World War II, would anticipate many strikes and much strife. However, the decline in strikes during the life of the Taft-Hartley Act has been less favorable than the period following World War I, when the economic injustices which I have described were not present. Between 1920 and 1921, there was a 32-percent decline in strikes, as compared with the Taft-Hartley era of 1947 and 1948, when there was only a 15-percent decline.

We have been amused by the orations of some people to the effect that the Taft-Hartley Act has not enslaved anyone yet. With corporate profits soaring beyond anything the most avaricious profiteer could have dreamed of, even during the peak of the wartime profits, with corporations giving labor $1 in wage increases and taking $2 or $3 in price increases, who can honestly assert that the Taft-Hartley Act, rather than staggering profits and prices, is the cause of declines in strikes during the life of that act?

The Taft-Hartley era is comparable to the "open shop" era of the 1920's, and the economic trends of both eras have much in common. Now, as then, a larger and larger share of the national income is going to the profit-takers. Corporate earnings are going up three times as much as consumer incomes. Shadows of the 1929 crash are lengthening. The fundamental principles of the Wagner National Labor Relations Act are as vital today as they were in the 1930's and following.

Monopolies are stronger and more threatening to our free enterprise economy today than ever before in history. Strong, healthy labor unions are one effective economic counterinfluence to the evils of financial and industrial monopoly. Monopolists know this. That is why they have tried the "stop-thief" technique of calling organized labor a monopoly."

Gentlemen, understand this: Those who describe as monopoly the efforts of working people to organize to improve their wages and working conditions, do not believe in the democratic principle of collective bargaining. They wish to destroy trade unions as an effective means of perpetuating their monopolies. Anyone who does not understand that the Taft-Hartley Act is a conspiracy of the monopolists to crush free labor in America, understands neither the Taft-Hartley Act nor the serious monopoly problem with which this Nation is threatened. Those who most loudly proclaim the free enterprise economic system are the ones who are doing most to wreck it, for we will never have free enterprise without free labor.

It was during the Hoover administration that the Norris-LaGuardia anti-injunction law was enacted by Congress, and "government by injunction" in the human relationships of industry was brought to a richly deserved ending. This cry to return to government by injunction in free America is disheartening. Again, it is only the monopolists and their voices in and out of Congress who want to go backward beyond Herbert Hoover and beyond the Clayton Act of 1914 and legislate on labor as though it were a commodity, and subject human beings to a sinful, un-American "government by injunction."

In the field of labor legislation, we should never lose sight of two fundamental facts of economic life. The incentive against nonproduction is far greater against labor, deprived of its income during a strike, than against management, which seldom misses a pay check or skips a meal. Secondly, to deprive labor of the right to strike, places it at the mercy of the industrialist and encourages the industrialist to become arrogant and ruthless. These facts exist, whether or not a worker may be employed in a so-called essential industry. With the scales of justice already heavily weighted against it, we must not further unbalance them by returning to government by injunction.

In the field of so-called essential industry you are reminded that the workers suffer the same inconveniences and hardships during a strike situation that employees in a nonessential industry who are on strike suffer, and both groups meet the same hardships and inconveniences during a strike situation that other citizens in the community do, plus the loss of wages during the life of the strike.

Why not turn our attention to the industrialists in the dispute? Surely no reasonable person will assume that labor is responsible for every strike, since many strikes are provoked by management, and labor after exhausting its efforts to correct the injustices must surrender or strike. Injunctions never solve labor disputes or promote justice. They usually protect the unjust in their injustices. The injunction in labor disputes is the weapon of the coward, and represents a form of hideous dictatorship. The purpose of the injunction in 90 percent of labor-management disputes is to blackjack labor, deny it its economic rights, and at the same time strengthen the position of ruthless management.

We should likewise remember that when we legislate against labor, we are legislating against all of the American people. Economic justice is often stifled by the rendition of unfair decisions against labor, because powerful industrialists and monopolists largely control the means of communication.

We should glorify the fact that for many years our people progressed and prospered in an atmosphere which prohibited "government by injunction." For 17 months monopoly has been riding high under the Taft-Hartley Act, and the net profits of industry in 1948 reach 21 billion dollars. Its reign of injustice is growing stronger and more threatening as the years pass by and its arrogant demand that the Congress reserve for it the injustices in the Taft-Hartley Act should be sternly denied, with a wholesome respect for the voice of the people who spoke on November 2, 1948.

Gentlemen of the committee, the country is not nor has it been threatened by the activity of organized labor, since it has contributed more in supporting the arm of democracy than any other group. It is not organized labor that threatens our way of life nor hampers production, so essential to our people. It is the mischief and the conspiracies of that totalitarian group who are selfishly, arrogantly withholding reasonable wages and appropriate working conditions from the millions of workers under the Taft-Hartley monstrosity, that have endangered our economy and caused a reign of unrest and confusion.

We have given careful consideration to S. 249, the proposed National Labor Relations Act of 1949. Its objectives in ridding the country of the Taft-Hartley Act are laudable. Its understanding of the human relationships in industry is reflected by its emphasis on voluntary procedures around the collective bargaining table, instead of compulsion by courts or mandatory arbitration boards. In proposing these ideals, it is of the essence of American democracy and freedom. Surely there never was a time in world history, when it was so vital to human welfare to demonstrate to a war-torn, confused and troubled world that what it most needs is more, not less, democracy, more free enterprise, less monopoly and cartel power over the destiny of the people.

It is our understanding that sections 204 and 205 dealing with settlement of disputes arising under existing agreements, while stating obviously desirable objectives, do not carry with them the sanction of governmental compulsion: if they did, we should feel that our country was committing itself to compulsory arbitration. The provisions dealing with secondary boycotts are, in our judgment, so limited that they do not interfere with the legitimate objective of every trade union to eliminate sweat-shop and substandard competition; it is clear that, unlike the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, they do not compel union members to act as strikebreakers by force of law. The provisions dealing with jurisdictional disputes are carefully considered to reach the underlying problems, unlike the Taft-Hartley Act they provide ascertainable standards for decision of these problems and do not, as did Taft-Hartley, under the pretense of dealing with jurisdictional disputes, strike down legitimate efforts of trade unions to preserve themselves against the competition of nonunion men.

We enthusiastically support the reaffirmation of the Norris-LaGuardia Act contained in this bill, and its elimination of the injunction as an employer weapon in labor disputes. The removal of the dangerous right to sue for breach of a collective agreement with its unlimited damages, the restoration of political freedom to the trade-union movement, the elimination of the insulting anti-Communist affidavit requirements, the removal of the NLRB general counsel as a labor czar, the ringing reaffirmation of the right of free collective bargaining on such matters as union security, the check-off, health and welfare funds and all other matters, the dropping of the stupidly devised union security elections, all these are matters which, in the light of our experience under the Taft-Hartley Act, are desirable and long overdue.

We must not be content to find a bill which will be better than the Taft-Hartley Act, for human ingenuity could not devise a worse law and a child could find a better one. We must find the right national labor policy. It is our judgment that the bill now presented places the maximum permissible limitations upon the freedom of the trade-union movement called for by the legitimate interest of employers, and that no bill should be adopted which goes further than this. With an amendment which I will explain, it is our hope that this bill will be speedily adopted to replace the noxious Taft-Hartley Act which was so thoroughly repudiated on November 2.

Before closing my testimony, I should like to call to your attention what I believe to be a rather serious mistake in S. 249. Please refer to section 405, page 21, "Exemption of Railway Labor Act." Only titles II and III of S. 249 are made inapplicable with respect to any matter which is subject to the provisions of the Railway Labor Act, as amended. I can think of no good reason why title I of the proposed law should not also be included in this exemption. Obviously that part of title I relating to repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and establishing the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, and the creation of the Board thereunder, would have no appropriate application to the subject matter covered by the Railway Labor Act. Other parts of title I would seem to have no reasonable applicability to the subject matter covered by the Railway Labor Act. Secondary boycotts and jurisdictional disputes are not a problem in the railway industry and some of the language in title I of S. 249 might interfere with the established procedures under the Railway Labor Act.

Even if it were deemed desirable to make any changes in the provisions of the Railway Labor Act, such changes should be brought about by amending that act, rather than by confusing its terms with the legislation now under consideration by your committee. In other words, I propose that the same complete exemption of the subject matter covered by the Railway Labor Act that was provided for in the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 be included in S. 249.

KRAFT FOODS CO.,
Chicago 90, Ill., March 18, 1949.

MR. JOHN LESINSKI,
Chairman, Committee on Education and Labor,
House Office Building, Washington 25, D. C.

DEAR MR. LESINSKI: This letter is being written at the request of Mr. John Lesinski, chairman of the House Committee on Education and Labor for the purpose of presenting to the committee the views of the Kraft Foods Co. with respect to various issues which have been presented in connection with pending Federal labor legislation.

We are opposed to any labor legislation which discriminates against and does not recognize the rights of union labor, unorganized labor, employers, or the public. We believe the Federal labor legislation should recognize and protect the rights of all such groups and, to this end, should be so framed as to place an equal burden of responsibility on both employers and unions.

This company for a number of years has negotiated annually approximately 140 separate union agreements covering employees in its various branches and plants throughout the country. Based upon this experience in the field of labor relations we wish to present the following recommendations with respect to a number of the issues which are currently being considered by your committee:

1. Union and closed shop.—We believe that organized labor and employers should be free to collectively bargain union-shop agreements. We would have no objection to the elimination or repeal of the union-shop referendum provision from the present law. However, we strongly urge that Federal legislation should not be so drafted as to prohibit States from adopting such laws as they deem appropriate with respect to union security agreements, including both closed- and union-shop provisions. We believe that compulsory hiring halls and "closed unions" should be outlawed. Closed unions are un-American. They frequently result in minority groups being denied employment; encourage labor monopolies; and create artificial labor scarcity particularly in trades or crafts.

2. Check-off of union dues.—Management and organized labor should be free to bargain collectively on the matter of the check-off of union initiation fees and dues. However, such deductions should be prohibited except where the employee has voluntarily consented thereto in writing. The check-off of union assessments of fines should be outlawed. With respect to the check-off of union dues and initiation fees, we believe that it is not the right of management and organized labor to arbitrarily withhold any part of an employee's earnings without the sanction of the person who has worked for and earned such money. Special assessments and fines are so often arbitrarily fixed without the consent or approval of the persons against whom they are levied that we feel they should be excluded from permissible check-off items.

3. Freedom of speech.—The law should specifically guarantee freedom of speech to both union and employer represenatives. The employer in exercising such right should not be permitted to intimidate or coerce his employees or make any promise of benefit to influence them. In the case of unions, the right of free speech should not include the right to threaten employees with force or reprisals. The opinion has been expressed that a free-speech provision is not necessary in the Federal labor law since the right of free speech is guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. However, in order to assure that there will not return to the restrictive and unfair construction of the constitutional guaranty of free speech as applied to employers which obtained under the Wagner Act, we believe it essential that the free-speech provisions contained in section 8 (c) of the present law be retained.

4. Featherbedding practice.—Employers and unions should be prohibited from entering into agreements which countenance featherbedding rules and practices. Featherbedding can result only in economic waste and exploitation of the public and, hence, as a matter of public interest, should be declared unlawful.

5. Contractual responsibilities.—Both unions and employers should be made legally responsible for the performance of their respective obligations under labor-management contracts entered into through the process of collective bargaining. Unions should not be deprived of the right to strike to enforce lawful contract demands made upon the employer. However, once a contract has been entered into by the parties, both should be required to abide by the terms of the agreement; and, if either party fails to do so, it should be required to answer therefore in a court of law. The union as a contracting party should have the right to sue and be sued as a legal entity separate and apart from its individual members.

6. Sympathetic strikes, jurisdictional strikes, and secondary boycotts.—The law should protect employers against sympathetic strikes, jurisdictional disputes, and strikes and secondary boycotts. In the case of sympathetic strikes, the employer is in no manner involved in a labor dispute and, hence, should not be made the victim of a quarrel between a union and another employer in which dispute he has no interest and over which he has no control. In the case of jurisdictional disputes, the employer likewise has no voice or control in the matter and, hence, the employer should not be made the victim of such interunion disagreement. Secondary boycotts cannot be justified. No employer should be subjected to strikes, picketing, etc., where the object thereof is to cause an interruption of business relations between such employer and another concern and thus indirectly bring pressure to bear upon the other concern with whom the union may have a dispute.

7. Collective bargaining.—Both management and unions should be required to bargain in good faith. We believe it is ridiculously inadequate to require one party to bargain in good faith and at the same time not exact the same requirement from the other. The law should require both parties to meet and in good faith make every honest endeavor to settle their differences.

8. Bargaining representatives.—Both management and unions should have unfettered freedom in the selection of their bargaining representatives.

9. Strikes affecting national interest.—The law should contain specific procedures for the handling of strikes which may have a detrimental effect upon the public health, welfare, and economy.

10. Political contributions.—The law should forbid the use of union funds for political campaign purposes. However, union representatives should not be deprived of the right of free speech in such campaigns. Corporations are prevented by law from utilizing corporate funds in political campaigns, and that is as it should be. The same logic and the same philosophy which justify the prohibition of the use of corporate funds for such purposes applies equally to the use of union funds.

11. Non-Communist statements.—The provision in the present law requiring the filing of non-Communist affidavits by union leaders has, in our opinion, accomplished considerable in smoking out and eliminating the Communist element from organized labor. We believe such a requirement should be retained. We feel it is only equitable that employer representatives likewise be required to file similar affidavits.

12. Petitions for elections.—We urge that the provisions of the present law permitting unions, employees, or employers to petition for representation elections be retained. Prior to the enactment of the present provision, employers were often subjected to strikes and picketing by unions as a part of an organizing campaign, when in fact the union represented only a minor fraction of the employees for whom representation rights were claimed. The employer had no redress in such cases until the enactment of the present law which gave him the right to request an election. This we believe to be a fair and desirable provision.

Likewise, we urge the retention of the provision of the present law which permits employees under certain circumstances to petition for decertification elections whereby the employees may terminate the authority of a union as their representative.

Each of these separate points mentioned above could be elaborated upon at length. However, in the interest of brevity, we believe it more desirable to present this brief short outline rather than a voluminous statement.

Yours very truly,

KRAFT FOODS CO.,
BRYANT H. PRENTICE, JR.,
General Personnel Manager.

TWO RIVERS, WIS., March 18, 1949.

Hon. JOHN LESINSKI,
Chairman, Committee on Education and Labor,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LESINSKI: My name is Joe Wood. I work at the Paragon Electric Co., Two Rivers, Wis., at $1.20 per hour. I am a veteran of the First World War and a lifetime member of the American Legion and past commander of my post. I started in 1916 as a foundry worker, became a machinist, and have been continuously employed in factory work ever since. I feel that I have been through the mill and know the working man's problems.

When I heard that hearings were being held to change the present labor law, it disturbed me very much, and I talked to my friends about it. We made a pool to send me to Washington to testify. I wired for permission to appear before your committee, but, since that is impossible, I am writing you instead, as you suggested.

I am for anything that will improve my interests as a working man. I am against anything which claims to improve my interests, but which actually will hurt me in the long run.

Outside labor organizers caused me loss in pay and many problems. This was not the result of unionism as such, but was due to the irresponsible, radical leaders whose jobs depended on stirring things up all the time. In my opinion, this was Communist-inspired. I know that these outsiders do not represent the thinking of the workers.

I worked in factories before the Wagner Act, under the Wagner Act, and under Taft-Hartley. In the old days the bosses took advantage of the working man. Under the Wagner Act, the labor leaders went too far the other way.

Before the Taft-Hartley law, we workers were always caught in the middle. Under the Taft-Hartley law, we got more breaks. There are less strikes, and unions have grown. Because the Communists are being squeezed out, there is a better feeling between management and workers. The worker has more to say about union affairs. Work has been steadier, and without these interruptions we are taking more money home.

I believe that labor leaders have covered up the parts of the Taft-Hartley law that helped the workers.

I like these things about the present law:

(1) The working man now runs his union.

(2) He knows what happens to his dues.

(3) A man doesn't have to join a union to get a job unless he wants to.

(4) A worker knows whether he is led by an American or a Communist.

Some labor leaders have not recognized that the American way is sharing responsibility. Workers have a responsibility; management has a responsibility. Whatever law is written will be most effective if it recognizes that fact.

Sincerely yours,

JOE WOOD.

ST. PAUL & TACOMA LUMBER CO.,
Tacoma, Wash., March 18, 1949.

JOHN LESINSKI,
Chairman, Committee on Education and Labor,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LESINSKI: I have received your letter of March 14, 1949, suggesting that a written statement be filed with your committee in line with my letter of February 4, 1949, addressed to the House Committee on Education and Labor.

My name is Harry W. Naubert, personnel manager for the St. Paul & Tacoma Lumber Co., of Tacoma, Wash. I have been employed by the company for 33 years.

The company operates logging camps, a sawmill, and a plywood plant in Pierce and Thurston Counties, Wash., and employs about 1,400 people. The great majority of the employees are members of a union, the International Woodworkers of America, affiliated with the CIO, with headquarters in Portland, Oreg.

My chief reason for writing you is to recommend continuance of section 8 (3) (B) of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, which reads:

"Provided further, That no employer shall justify any discrimination against an employee for nonmembership in a labor organization if he has reasonable grounds for believing that membership was denied or terminated for reasons other than the failure of the employee to tender the periodic dues and the initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership."

Prior to passage of the act, it had become a fairly common practice for the union representing our employees to impose fines, or threaten to impose fines, on individual employees of the company, in matters regarding performance of assigned duties on a given job, or for almost any reason. Usually, this interference was in direct conflict with the company's orders and immediately created an intolerable situation, placing the individual employees, faced with taking conflicting orders from two opposed authorities, in an impossible position.

The above section has been a real protection in such situations, as the employer operating under a union-shop clause is not required to discharge employees except for failure to pay standard dues an initiation fees; in fact, he would commit an unfair labor practice were he to do so. I strongly urge continuance of this provision.

Section 2 (11) defining supervisors is another valuable provision of the act in that it prevents unions from forcing supervisors into the union, thereby weakening their slupervisory functions and dividing their responsibility. I beleve it should be retained.

For the sake of brevity and saving the committee's time, I have stressed the above two points only. There are many other important and fair features of the law which will undoubtedly be emphasized by testimony from other interested persons.

Thanking you for your courtesy and consideration, I am,

Very truly your,

HARRY W. NAUBERT, Personnel Manager

Q. Whip a man?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And what was his answer about whether or not he wanted to make a little money by whipping a man?—A. He didn't give me no answer right then. He said, "We'll see about it."

By Mr. ADAIR:

Q. Did you go all the way to town with David?—A. No.

Q. Tell us what you did.—A. When we got to this end of the bridge, coming toward town, I left David, told him I'd see him in a few minutes. I turned and went off by Joe Collins' house.

Q. All right, what took place when you got to Joe Collins' house?—[P. 1058] A. Well, just before I got to Joe's house, his wife was out there washing. I asked her where Joe was. She said he was in the house. I went on there and talked to him.

Q. Did you go on in and talk to Joe?—A. Yeah.

Q. What did you talk to Joe about?—A. About making that $50.

Q. Did you tell Joe about your conversation with the Police Chief?—A. No, sir; not right then.

Q. Now, what did you and Joe do? You were at his house talking to him; now, what did you do after that?—A. Well, we walked on down the road and I can't be positive, I couldn't tell you everything we said to each other.

Q. What did he say then?—A. He just asked me what sort of size man he was, how big was he.

Q. Did Joe ask you anything about what had happened if you—all got hurt or got arrested or anything like that?—A. Yes. I told him if we got a tooth knocked out or an eye put out, they'd pay for it.

[P. 1060] Q. Now, what made you say that to him?—A. Just 'cause.

Q. Because what?—A. They told me that.

Q. Who told you that?—A. Mr. Harper.

Q. Chief of Police Harper?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. He told you if you got a tooth knocked out or an eye put out or injured in any way that he'd pay the hospital bill or somebody would?—A. He didn't say who'd pay for it; he just said it would be paid.

Q. Did you ask the Chief of Police in presence of Mr. Dorsey about what would happen if you got in jail?—A. He said we wouldn't get in jail.

[P. 1061] Q. Did he say whether or not there'd be a fine?—A. No, he didn't say; he just said we wouldn't get in no trouble.

[P. 1065] Q. What did you do after you got back from taking that drink?—A. Well, we just sort of hung around and waited for Mr. Harden to come down.

Q. You knew he was up in the union hall?—[P. 1066] A. Yes, sir; saw him go up there.

Q. Well, now, you testified that—something about $50 was going to be left for you. Did you check up on that?—A. Yes, sir; I went back out there after we took that first drink of rum.

By Mr. ADAIR:

Q. Now, you testified that Mr. Harper had a discussion with you about $50. What did you do about the $50, if anything, that morning?—A. I went up there and got it.

Q. What did he say to you?—A. Well, we was crossing Whitewater Bridge; he asked me did I want to make $50 quick, and so I asked him how. He says, "Whip a man," so I asked him who it was. He told me and I says, "We might get in trouble," so we went on and that was all that was said about it.

Q. Did he reply to you when you asked him——[P. 1220]—A. He says, "No, you won't get in no trouble."

Q. What else did he say, if anything?—A. Later on, after I saw him and Joe, I asked him how did he know that I wouldn't get in trouble and he said, "Well, the law have done tole me that we wouldn't."

Q. Did you wait out there till Mr. Hardin came down?—A. That's right.

Q. Do you remember when it was that he came down?—A. Well, it was a little after 12 o'clock.

Q. Did you attack him then?—A. No, sir.

Q. What happened then?—A. He went over to the Gulf filling station. We walked on over there and [p. 1221] he went in the restroom, so we were standing back of some cars, like, parked in the driveway, up to it. When he came out, I called him.

Q. You called him?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did you say to him?—A. I called him by his name.

Q. Did he come over?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did he say?—A. Joe spoke up then; he mentioned he was causing a lot of trouble around, causing little kids and women to miss Christmas money.

Q. Did he say anything else to him?—A. Well, he told Joe—no, Joe didn't.

Q. Yeah?—A. He told Joe he was representing the union and he wouldn't leave.

Q. Did Joe ask him to leave?—A. Told him he'd better get out of town.

Q. What took place then?—A. Joe hit him.

Q. And after Joe hit him, what happened?—A. Well, they hit two or three licks; then, when Joe missed him, that's [p. 1222] when I got him.

Q. Did you hit him then?—A. That's right.

Q. Did you hit him more than one lick?—A. Sure.

Q. Did you knock him down?—A. Well, I couldn't say whether I did or not, on a case like that.

Q. Was he knocked down?—A. Sure.

Q. Was he knocked down more than once?—A. Twice, I believe it was.

Q. What was his condition?—A. Well, at last he was sitting up down on the street, and then Bill he got ahold of us, said, "Don't hit him any more."

Q. What did you do then?—A. We turned him aloose.

Q. How much money did he give you?—A. $20.

[P. 1226] Q. And you never appeared in court?—A. No.

Q. You didn't pay any fine?—A. No fine.

Q. Did you have a conversation with Police Chief Harper any time after that or before that and after the fight?—[P. 1227] A. The second day after, after the fight?

Q. The second day after the fight. What——A. I met him at the Gulf place and he said to me, says "You see that car sitting right yonder?" I says, "Yeah." He said, "It would be very easy to walk by and throw a cigarette in it and it'll never cost you nothing." So I just looked at him and walked on, didn't say anything.

[P. 1230] Q. And prior to the fight you had no conversation with Fred Harper?—A. No, sir; I didn't have no conversation, no more than about the car burning.

Q. The car that you said was Ben Logan's that you don't know the model or don't know the wheels of the car, the color of the wheels?—A. That's right.

Q. Or the license number?—A. That's right.

Q. Now, how much did you get—was that prior to the fight or after the fight that you had the conversation about burning this car?—A. After the fight.

Q. Did you know Mr. Harden before?—A. Sure, know him when I saw him.

Q. Did you ever have any conversation with him?—A. Never have.

Q. Had nothing against him, no grudge against him?—A. Nothing against him.

Q. And for $20 you beat him up?—A. For $20 I beat him up; yes sir. That's right.

Case Histories, Etc., Relative to Various Matters Before National Labor Relations Board, Affecting UAW Locals and Their Employers

Local 773, Dorsey Trailers, Inc., Elba, Ala.

The union was certified as the exclusive bargaining agent in this company on May 16, 1945, and signed a contract September 17, 1945. In the early fall of 1946 the contract was renewed with provision for union shop and check-off.

Shortly after renewal of the contract the company transferred certain employees to new job classifications, but refused to pay the wage rates provided for such classifications under the contract. The grievance procedure was employed without satisfactory adjustment. The company refused to arbitrate the grievances.

A strike ensued on November 19, 1946, but 1 week later the company rejected the offer of the union for the unconditional return of the strikers and shut down the plant until January 6, 1947. During this lock-out the employees affected drew their unemployment compensation.

On December 17, 1946, a membership meeting was convened by the president of the local, who called the meeting for the purpose of having a vote to determine whether the men in the plant still desired to be represented by the union. Shortly before the meeting convened, at 2 p. m., three men accosted on the street and beat up severely with the jaws of a heavy pocket knife the international representative of the union, Jim Harden. These three men, W. L. Dewberry, Joe Collins, and David Burk, had been procured by Fred Harper, police chief of Elba, and Kimmie Dorsey, assistant superintendent of the company, for the sum of $50 to beat up Harden and to tell him to get out of town.

Later in the same afternoon, the financial secretary of the union, Ben Logan, was told by the same three men that he would be shot unless he left town before sundown. The financial secretary, the union attorney, and the assistant regional director of the international union reported this threat to the sheriff in Elba, who made no move to make any arrest, but, on the contrary, stated to the financial secretary: "It has been reported to me that you are carrying a gun around here."

The three who had been procured by the Elba police and the company for this assault later testified in the Labor Board hearings concerning their employment for this purpose, and one of them testified also that he had been asked, but refused, to place a gun in Jim Harden's car, and that they had been offered money by the chief of police to run over Jim Harden with their automobile "even though they had to run up on the sidewalk to get him" and to burn the car of Ben Logan, financial secretary of the union.

Appeals by the union to the attorney general, the State bureau of investigation, the governor's office, and the FBI produced no action. One of the three thugs appeared in local court, pleaded guilty for himself and one other, and was told that a fine of $104.50 against each of them "had been paid."

Excerpts from the testimony of the three men named above are attached hereto as an exhibit.

Upon the reopening of the plant on January 6, 1947, Jim Nevels, Ben Logan, and Leavy Boutwell, all officers of the local union, were not recalled to work. They have not been rehired, although they have applied for reinstatement.

Complaint was issued by the NLRB April 25, 1947, against Dorsey Trailers, Inc., alleging unfair labor practices. Hearing was held in June 1947 at Elba, Ala. The trial examiner's report finds the company guilty of unfair labor practice in the assault upon Jim Harden and in discriminating against Jim Nevels, Ben Logan, and Leavy Boutwell. The case was sent to the National Board in Washington in September 1947, but was not assigned for Board consideration until sometime subsequent to April 30, 1948, and prior to May 14, 1948.

In a letter dated May 14, 1948, Paul M. Herzog, Chairman, advised the union, "I can advise you that we have commenced analyzing the transcript of the hearing and the exceptions to the intermediate report in this matter."

Chairman Herzog also stated: "We are hopeful that formal action may be taken in the near future." This was on May 14, 1948. Six months later, on November 22, 1948, 2 years to the day from the employer's first refusal to bargain with the union, the Board issued its decision and order.

The Board found that this respondent locked out its employees illegally for 4 days in May 1946; that it illegally refused to reinstate three union officers on January 6, 1947, because of their leadership in the strike; that the employer illegally refused to bargain with the union on December 31, 1946, and at all times thereafter; and that it illegally participated in the assault on Jim Harden.

The Board ordered the respondent company to cease and desist from discouraging membership in the union, from refusing to bargain with the union, and to reinstate the three union officers with back pay to January 6, 1947, and to reimburse the employees locked out in May 1946.

As of February 10, 1949, the company still refused to comply with the act or the Board's orders. On that date the case was sent into Washington for enforcement by the office of the general counsel.

As of March 11, drafting of the brief by the general counsel was reported to be still 2 or 3 weeks from completion, and that court action against the company would not begin sooner than 3 weeks from date. It was held unlikely that the case would be heard before the fall term of court.

It therefore appears probable that the case of Dorsey Trailers, Inc., will be in court or awaiting its turn on the third anniversary of the refusal to bargain and of the slugging of Jim Harden by the company's hired thugs.

During all this time, and up to the present, the company refuses to bargain with the union, refuses even to accept mail from the union, continues to lay off employees without regard to seniority and in violation of the contract, and refuses to process grievances. While seniority employees remain laid off, new employees are hired.

LOCAL 669, ALLEN B. DUMONT, LABORATORIES, INC., PASSAIC, N. J.

This plant has not been organized. Just prior to the decision of the NLRB issued April 15, 1948, ordering an election with IAM and UAW-CIO on the ballot, the company, on April 12, 1948, issued to all hourly paid employees a memorandum stating that wages would be increased approximately 10 percent to all hourly paid workers, effective May 3, 1948.

Thereafter the company engaged vigorously in a campaign against both unions, attacking especially the UAW-CIO and the officers of local 669, and urging a vote for "no union."

In one of its pieces of campaign literature it threatened the individual's chances of promotion in event of a union victory in the election, as follows:

"A merit-rating policy that allows new employees to advance quickly within their job classifications. They are not retarded by union-imposed seniority clauses. Promotions are made from the ranks to better jobs. A majority of your supervisors were once production employees. This is a new industry, and your chances of promotion are good—if you have what it takes and if your freedom and the company's freedom to cooperate day by day are not restricted by the artificial rules and red tape that would be imposed by unionization."

In another hand-out the company made the general threat that hard times will ensue if the plant is organized:

"It is our honest belief that the restrictions that would be imposed by a union contract would not only directly affect you in connection with the matters which we have discussed but would also directly affect the company, and indirectly you as a part of DuMont, by hampering efficient production and our ability to maintain and continue to improve the standards of employment that have made DuMont a good place in which to work."

The result of the election on May 7 was: UAW-CIO, 285; IAM, 248; no union, 345.

A run-off election being ordered for May 21, 1948, the company continued its attack upon UAW-CIO and acclaimed the virtues of its personnel policies.

In this "free speech" literature of the company, employees were given to understand that victories for the union would adversely affect the economic position of the company and its opportunity to provide employment. The following paragraph is quoted from its letter of May 18, 1948, to production and maintenance employees:

"Both employees and management are mutually dependent upon each other, and whatever affects one of us adversely, usually affects the other. It is my belief that no advantage would be gained by either of us if the UAW-CIO gained a foothold in DuMont plants, and it is my hope that you will vote against them."

In its four-page tabloid "DuMont Telefacts," volume 1, No. 1, issued May 20, 1948, on the eve of the election, it devoted most of one page to defamation of local 669 and its officers and sought to impress employees with the peril of unionism through stories under the following headlines:

"Cooperation—Not union strife."

"What a worker loses when a strike is called."

"Lost wages in recent UAW strikes."

"Wright workers vote to strike."

"UAW employees to be assessed for Chrysler strike."

"We've come a long way together."

The following article taken from page 4 of this publication carries the threat that the company's prosperity depends upon its employees "cooperating" with it by not voting for the union:

"We are merely at the threshold of an industry which can become one of the largest in the country. And you company has every intention of going forward with the industry, of getting its share of the receiver and transmitting business, of keeping in the van as a manufacturers of quality equipment.

"Definite steps have been taken for immediate expansion, and word has just been received that our bid for the huge Wright Aeronautical Co. plant in East Paterson has been accepted by the War Assets Administration. If agreement on terms can be reached with the United States Government, we can proceed quickly to greatly expand our production and make it more efficient.

"This vital step will be taken regardless of the outcome of tomorrow's election, but we would enter into this program with greater confidence if we were sure that we had complete cooperation and trust from the majority of our coworkers. We hope sincerely that tomorrow you will demonstrate your confidence in us. We are an independent company and in the television industry we are bucking financial giants of the radio industry. It will take continued foresight, ingenuity, and cooperation for us to maintain our position of leadership against such competition. We need your help, and believe that you will give it."

The result of the run-off election on May 21 was: UAW-CIO, 418; no union, 432; challenged ballots, 48.

The NLRB denied the UAW-CIO's appeal, contesting the run-off election.

Today, thanks to the Taft-Hartley guaranty of "free speech" to employers for the intimidation of employees, the DuMont workers are without union representation, protection, and contract.

LOCAL 61, AUTOPULSE CORP., LUDINGTON, MICH.

After being under contract with local 174 in Detroit since 1940, the company moved all of its operations to Ludington where it got into full production in June 1947. Labor relations at Detroit had been fairly good.

District 50, United Mine Workers, made the first attempt to organize the Ludington plant. The organization meeting on November 26, 1947, was attended by a company supervisor, William Nyman, who signed his name and address to the paper circulated. Following a hunting trip on November 29 with A. J. Eldred, president of Autopulse, Nyman stated in a bar that any employees who took an interest in the union would be fired.

At the request of employees, UAW-CIO held an organization meeting December 4, 1947. On December 6, 28 workers were discharged by the company, 27 of whom had attended the November 26 meeting called by district 50.

UAW-CIO immediately filed a complaint case with NLRB, which is still pending. The NLRB field examiner who investigated the case, Joseph Kulkis, stated to UAW representatives that it was his understanding that complaint cases had priority under the Taft-Hartley Act and that it would take anywhere from 1 to 3 years before this complaint would be settled.

The company attempted to stop payment of unemployment compensation to the workers discharged on December 6, but in every case the unemployment compensation department of the union was able to prove to a referee that these workers were not discharged for misconduct. They received their benefits.

As the union continued its organizational drive, the company began sending out letters to the workers.

On December 22, 1947, the union petitioned for a representation election. A hearing was held January 20, 1948, at which the only issue raised by the company was an exclusion of draftsmen. The union offered to waive inclusion of the draftsmen in the bargaining unit, and the hearing officer asked the parties to agree to a consent election. K. B. Matthews, attorney for the company, told the hearing officer that he was going to take every step within the law to prevent an election. An election was finally ordered March 2, 1948.

After the election had been ordered, the company unleashed a vicious campaign to discredit the union, including a series of letters mailed directly to each worker's home and speeches by the plant superintendent on company time and property. For 10 days prior to the election these meetings were held and almost every day, lasting from 10 to 30 minutes, and workers were compelled to shut off all machinery, stop all operations, and listen.

The points most frequently made in these speeches were:

(1) If you vote "no," paid vacations will not be hard to get.

(2) If you vote "no," you will have steady work, because when we don't have orders we will build banks of parts.

(3) If you vote "yes," we will lay off a large number of workers almost immediately.

(4) If you vote "yes," you will have to do what union "big shots" tell you to do. If you vote "no," you can come into the office at any time and talk over your problems with me.

(5) If you vote "yes," your ability to do the job and to get along with your foreman will count for nothing, because the company will be forced to let you off in accordance with seniority.

The company sent letters about twice a week over a period of 2 months prior to the election addressed personally to each employee at his home and signed by A. J. Eldred, manager of the corporation.

These letters sought to persuade the employees that they would be mulcted by the union and that the union officers would not worry about the workers' problems but would seek only to promote their own interests.

In addition to attacks upon the union, the letters contained the specific threat that if the employees voted for the union, the chances of continued employment will be reduced. The same scarcely veiled threat was contained in the following paragraph near the end of the 2-page letter sent to employees by Eldred on March 19, 1948:

"So, the way things stand, you have a good job. The pay is better than in other Ludington shops, the work is steady. If you are planning on a home, or have other reasons for wishing a steady income, why vote a mistake you may later regret."

The bitter antiunion attitude of this corporation, which had had fairly good labor relations with the union from 1940 to April 1947 clearly shows the effect of the Taft-Hartley Act in breaking down labor relations.

The discharge of workers for participation in organization meetings and the threats of economic loss made by the operating head of the company and the plant superintendent to the workers prior to the representation election mark a return in the direction of the industrial warfare which preceded the passage of the Wagner Act.

Despite this campaign of attempted intimidation, UAW-CIO Local 61 won the election and, after a costly strike, negotiated a contract now in effect.

But to date, 14 months after the 28 employees were fired following attendance at a union meeting by 27 of them, the NLRB has not even set a hearing on the unfair labor practice charge.

Contrast this inaction with the short-order service rendered to employers by the Taft-Hartley NLRB general counsel and the Board itself.

By its failure to act in this and other instances of mass firings for union activity, the Taft-Hartley NLRB and the general counsel condone this method of smashing organizing efforts, particularly in the smaller plants.

FORD MOTOR CO.

Under date of August 21, 1947, the International Union, UAW-CIO, and the Ford Motor Co. entered into a contract which continues until July 15, 1949, except that it could be reopened with respect to economic demands on July 15, 1948.

Article II of this agreement provided for union shop in all Ford plants except where prohibited by State law. This article runs to July 15, 1948, and "if and to the extent permitted by law" continued thereafter until July 15, 1949.

In short, a contract entered into in 1947 between the company and the union provided for a union shop until July 15, 1949, provided the union complied with the union-shop authorization provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Despite this agreement, the company took advantage of the Taft-Hartley Act (1) to discourage union membership and (2) to defeat the efforts of the union to comply with the election provisions of the act.

It notified employees in States with anti-union-shop laws of their opportunity under the laws of the State and the Taft-Hartley Act to withdraw from the union and to discontinue check-off of union dues from their pay. A copy of the letter sent by the plant manager of the company's Norfolk, Va., assembly plant to all of its UAW-CIO employees on October 6, 1947, is attached.

A letter was sent by John S. Bugas, director of industrial relations for the Ford Motor Co. to all hourly paid employees on or about February 15, 1948. Interpreting the 1947 contract between the company and the union, it plainly conveyed the impression that the union-shop provision expired July 15, 1948. Although the contract provides that "if and to the extent permitted by law" the union-shop agreement shall be continued after July 15, 1948, "until the expiration of the remainder of this agreement," the letter to employees stated that the union shop ended July 15, 1948, "unless certain legal requirements are met."

In negotiations with the union during May and June 1948 on the holding of the union-shop elections, the company made clear its intent to use this requirement of the Taft-Hartley Act as a lever to obtain concessions from the union on other contract features. It told the union, in effect, that it would consider allowing the union-shop election to be held on company property if the union would make a good agreement with the company on article V, section 6, of the contract which relates to union liability for unauthorized strikes. In a telegram to the director of the national Ford department of the union, John S. Bugas of the Ford Motor Co. referred to the necessity of extending time for the union-shop elections beyond July 15 and expressed willingness to grant such extension of time "conditioned on the continuing cooperative attitude of both parties" and the offer is stated to be "revocable at any time up to the date of vote."

The company applied conditions to the holding of the union-shop elections on company property which made it impossible to hold such elections on company property. In conference with Frank H. Bowen, director of region 7, NLRB, on May 25, 1948, John S. Bugas of the Ford Motor Co. stated that elections would be permitted on company property (1) only in the event that the union's petition for election was made on a local unit basis, instead of on an international union basis as provided in the contract, and (2) only on the additional condition that Ford Motor Co. would designate the places on the company property where the polling booths would be set up.

As was well known to Bugas, neither of these restrictions upon conduct of its elections would be accepted by the NLRB, and they were rejected by the NLRB director.

In a telegram to Kenneth Bannon, director of the union's national Ford department, May 26, 1948, Mr. Bugas stated that the elections would be held on company property only under the conditions previously outlined in conversation between Bugas and Bannon. These conditions set the same restrictions upon the elections as the company had sought to impose upon NLRB.

The telegram of May 26 and the union's reply are attached as exhibits.

It was well known at the Ford Motor Co. that the holding of union-shop elections off the company property would necessarily result in excluding a large number of eligible employees from the opportunity of voting, and that those who did not vote would in effect be voting against the union shop. The Taft-Hartley Act set the trap—the Ford Motor Co. tried to use it—but in vain.

The results of the Ford workers' elections on the question of continuing a union shop turned out to be dramatic and significant proof that American workers value the unions they have built.

Under all the handicaps, hardships, and expenses that the Taft-Hartley Act and the Ford Motor Co. could throw up as road blocks, the Ford workers smashed through to roll up the most impresive vote of confidence in the principle of unionism and in the UAW-CIO that has been given during the 18 months of life under Taft-Hartley. The statement issued July 10, 1948, by Ken Bannon, director of the UAW-CIO, national Ford department commenting on the results of the NLRB elections to determine whether or not the Ford workers wished to continue the union shop in the plants of the Ford Co. throughout the United States, gives both the arithmetic of the vote and the spirit that led many Ford workers to travel as much as 200 miles in order to cast their ballots:

"The magnificent victory of the Ford workers in the union-shop election completed Friday is a victory for the whole labor movement and a lethal blow to the hopes of all reactionaries who think that American unionism can be destroyed through repressive, undemocratic legislation.

"Here is a Nation-wide poll—the largest ever conducted outside plant premises—88,943 workers of all races, creeds, and colors and from 25 States in various geographical areas have declared in unmistakable terms that they stand solidly behind their union and will maintain their union-shop agreement. (Ford workers in seven States were not permitted to vote because of State laws forbidding the union shop.)

"Their votes are a slap in the face of the authors, sponsors, and supporters of the vicious Taft-Hartley Act.

"They have served notice on the Ford Motor Co. that they give complete support to the demands now in negotiations between the union and the company and are ready to back up those demands with action if the company forces them to do so.

"They have taught the Ford Motor Co. the lesson that its refusal to cooperate with the Government by permitting the elections to be held on plant property will not prevent the Ford workers from turning out in overwhelming numbers to protect their union-shop agreement and their bargaining power.

"And finally, and perhaps most important, they exposed the lie of the anti-democratic spokesmen that American workers would reject unionism and union-shop agreements if given the opportunity to do so in a free election.

"Out of 91,681 workers who voted, 88,943 workers voted to maintain the union shop, the company challenged 924 and 1,214 voted against. The union won a 98-percent majority. Even under the unfair, undemocratic, Taft-Hartley provision which stipulates that votes not cast are votes against the union shop, the Ford workers came through with a ringing 90-percent majority. The total number eligible to vote was 98,989. (If this Taft-Hartley provision was applied to congressional elections, most of the seats in Congress now occupied by Taft-Hartley Congressmen would be vacant, because very few, if any, were elected by a majority of the eligible voters in their district.)

"The Ford workers are to be congratulated on their democratic spirit and upon their determination to have a truly representative election despite the obstacles put in their way both by the act itself and by the company. They have performed an invaluable service to the cause of American unionism and democracy."

FORD MOTOR CO.,
NORFOLK, VA., ASSEMBLY PLANT,
October 6, 1947.

To All Employees Coming Under the UAW-CIO Contract:

By virtue of the laws of this State, the Taft-Hartley Act, and the new agreement between the company and the UAW-CIO, the union-shop provisions of that agreement do not apply to you.

You are free to continue, or not continue, your membership in the union, as you may see fit. The company may not discharge you because you do not belong to the union.

In either event, however, the other terms of the agreement cover your employment by the company, and the UAW-CIO will continue to be your exclusive bargaining agent.

The company will check off and turn over to the union the membership dues of employees who authorize it to do so in writing. In the event that you sign such an authorization but subsequently resign from the union, and if you notify the company of your resignation, the check-off from your pay will be discontinued, since no further dues will be payable to the union by you.

The only purpose of this notice is to inform you of the facts. The decision is yours. The company makes no recommendation as to what course of action you should choose.

G. L. LEMOINE, Plant Manager.

[Telegram]

MAY 26, 1948.

KEN BANNON,
Director, National Ford Department, UAW-CIO:

We have repeatedly outlined in conversation principal conditions under which the company would extend privilege of conducting union-shop elections on company property. Because of details involved in preparation the vote would not be conducted until after July 15 or after end of our negotiations should they extend beyond July 15. In this connection we would extend time under which vote could be held under our contract within limitation allowed by law. Because our granting this privilege is conditioned on the continuing cooperative attitude of both parties, it is revocable at any time up to the date of vote. Through acceptance or rejection of these conditions the decision is entirely in your hands.

JOHN S. BUGAS.

MAY 27, 1948.

MR. JOHN S. BUGAS,
Vice President, and Director of Industrial Relations,
Ford Motor Co., Dearborn, Mich.

DEAR MR. BUGAS: This is in answer to your telegram of May 26 on the matter of the union-shop election on company property.

You state in your telegram that if the union accepts the conditions laid down by the company, the union-shop elections may then be held on company property.

The conditions that you insist on are:

1. Certification of union-shop elections on an individual-plant basis rather than on a 1-unit basis.

2. The company's right to designate where the polling places would be located.
3. The NLRB to furnish all polling booths and any other equipment needed.
4. Election to be held on employees' own time.

On point No. 1, it is our answer now as it has been from the moment you mentioned these conditions; we shall not amend the petition; the petition is filed in conformity with the agreement between the company and union.

On points Nos. 2 and 3 we have told you that these are matters for the NLRB to determine. Our position remains the same.

On point No. 4 we agree, if nothing more satisfactory can be arranged.

I want it definitely understood at this time that the union would appreciate the company's cooperation on this issue. We have repeatedly heard you use the word cooperation, but in very few instances have we seen it put into practice by the company. You can surely surmise the feeling of the union on this matter and the actual effects it will have on our relationship by your denying our request.

I have repeatedly gone into this matter with you and explained the union's position. The decision is not up to the union. We do not run the Ford Motor Co., nor do we own it. The decision is entirely in the hands of the company.

Our deduction, from the contents of your telegram, is a no decision.

Very truly yours,

KEN BANNON,
Director, National Ford Department, International Union, UAW-CIO.

LOCAL 539, CAMPBELL, WYANT & CANNON FOUNDRY CO., MUSKEGON, MICH.

This company has been under contract with local 539 since 1941. Maintenance of membership was provided in the first contract, dated August 3, 1941. The check-off provision was incorporated in the contract dated March 18, 1946.

In negotiations for contract renewal begun on April 27, 1948, the company repeatedly stated that there is no object in talking about union security and check-off, that in its opinion the parties are "far apart on this," and that anyway, no union-shop election had yet been held.

The union's membership covers all eligible employees except approximately 125 out of 3,200. It petitioned for a union-security election, but negotiations with the company continued to be stalled because the company would give no indication that the results of the election would influence in any way its thinking in regard to union-shop clauses.

The change in the company attitude, which the union is convinced was caused by the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, forced a strike which lasted for 79 days.

At the end of the strike, the company granted the union security which had been in effect in the previous agreement, but which the Taft-Hartley Act had encouraged the company to deny.

The Taft-Hartley Act in this case was largely responsible for a long and bitter strike which directly affected 3,000 workers at the company's Muskegon plant and which idled thousands of other workers in plants that were dependent on the products of the Campbell-Wyatt-Cannon Foundry.

Another instance in which the Taft-Hartley Act made industrial relations worse instead of better and caused a strike that was costly in lost wages, lost production, and lost profits.

LOCAL 637, SEALED POWER CORP., MUSKEGON, MICH.

Prior to Taft-Hartley, the company and the union had been operating under a contract containing union-shop and check-off provisions. In negotiations for renewal of the contract, the company refused to consider these provisions until a union-shop authorization had been held.

The election was held with the result that 883, or 87 percent, of the eligible employees favored union shop. (This was 93 percent of the valid votes cast.) However, the company continued to object to union-shop and check-off provisions, a positon which the union attributed to the Taft-Hartley Act.

After much delay, the union was finally able to win the renewal of the union-shop and check-off provisions.

LOCAL 190, PACKARD MOTOR CAR CO.

Since 1937 the contract with this company has given the UAW-CIO exclusive bargaining rights with the company for all the units covered. The contract also provided that grievances will be referred to the supervisor by the chief steward.

Last spring the union entered negotiations to renew the contract covering technical unit employees and a contract covering office workers. In substitution for the clauses which recognize the union as the exclusive bargaining representative and which provide for reference of grievances to the supervisor by the chief steward, the company proposed:

(1). A recognition clause in which the word "exclusive" is eliminated; and

(2). A grievance clause which provides (a) that the employee shall first take up a grievance with his supervisor and (b) that the employee may take up his grievance with the chief steward only after "obtaining permission from his supervisor."

This attempt by the company, for the first time, to cut down the bargaining rights of the union and to eliminate shop stewards from the handling of grievances was recognized by the union as an attempt to undermine collective bargaining under encouragement of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Encouraged by the Taft-Hartley Act, the company prolonged negotiations of these contracts for many months, although the technical unit and office employees covered represent less than 5 percent of the corporation's total employees. The company finally agreed to renew the contracts, without winning the changes it proposed, until June 1949, when its contract with the hourly rated employees would expire. At that time, the company intimated, it would make a determined fight to win these changes.

In the meantime, management is doing its best to hamper and delay the settlement of grievances.

The union cites an example of what the company's proposals with respect to bargaining rights and grievance procedure would mean. In October 1947 an employee, Fuller Woods, was approached directly by the company at the time of reinstatement after a sick leave and he entered into an agreement which canceled out 1 year of his 20 years seniority. Through negotiation under the existing representation and grievance clauses, the union restored the full seniority rights of this employee. This it could not have done if the changes in the contract now proposed by the company had then been in effect.

LOCAL 242, FRANK FOUNDRIES CORP., MUNCIE, IND.

Local 242, UAW–CIO, had been the certified bargaining agent for the employees of the Frank Foundries Corp.'s Muncie, Ind., plant since 1943, the year the plant began operations.

A collective-bargaining agreement, signed June 10, 1947, was in effect until June 10, 1948.

On or about April 9, 1948, the union gave the employer a 60-day notice of desire to modify certain provisions of the agreement and requested a meeting to begin negotiations on the proposed modifications. During the first 30 days of the 60-day notice period, the employer refused to meet with the union.

On May 7, 1948, the employer gave notice to the union terminating the agreement as of June 10, 1948, stating:

"Since our contract was entered into June 10, 1947, some of its provisions have been materially affected by new laws and other conditions over which the parties to said contract have no control, and it is the considered opinion of the undersigned that the contract should be terminated as of June 10, 1948, and it is our desire to terminate the contract as of that date."

The employer also stated his "intention and desire" to negotiate a new contract to become effective as of June 10, 1948, and requested a meeting with the union's negotiating committee at 3:30 p. m. June 1, 1948.

On May 27 employees in the core room, department K–6, were told by their foreman that they were to knock off work and go home at 9 a. m. that day, according to sworn affidavits presented by Seymour Goldstein, NLRB field examiner, in subsequent NLRB proceedings.

About 8:30 a. m., two union stewards, Herbert Hibbard and John Hendrick, were discharged. They requested John Higgins, chairman of the union's negotiating committee, and the full committee to take up the matter of their discharges with management.

Meantime, according to evidence contained in affidavits made by employees, the order to core room employees to cease work at 9 a. m. was canceled.

At 10 a. m., the negotiating committee met with J. Milton Johnson, general manager, and his assistant, George Gates. The meeting lasted 10 or 15 minutes. During that time, according to affidavits, the plant employees were still at work.

Johnson refused to act on the grievance until 3:30 p. m. that day. The committee returned to work. At 10:40 a. m., the committee returned to Johnson's office to reopen discussion of the grievance. Five minutes later, Guy Plymale, an employee, entered the office and told the committee that another employee, Robert Kirkland, had been hurt and was lying outside the office door waiting for an ambulance. This broke up the meeting. Kirkland, according to his own affidavit, was in intense pain from a hernia caused or aggravated by work. Approximately 25 employees from Kirkland's department were standing around their injured fellow worker. The rest of the plant employees were still at work, according to Higgins' affidavit.

After Kirkland had been put in an ambulance, the committee returned to Johnson's office. Johnson said, according to Higgins' affidavit, "You fellows either get back to work within 5 minutes or I'll have the bottom dropped." Johnson continued to talk until about 11:03 a. m., when he told the firemen, according to Higgins' affidavit, "Go out and drop the bottom."

The committee returned to work. Before noon, a printed notice was posted on the bulletin boards telling employees that the plant was down. This, the union contends, amounted to a lock-out.

Higgins has sworn that at "about 8 a. m. on May 27, 1948, Mr. Johnson told me in the cleaning room, department K–4, 'I am going to send the core room bunch home at 9 a. m. for lack of materials.'"

This proved, the union contended, that the plant management intended to shut down the plant on May 27.

After shutting the foundry down, the employer charged the union with a strike.

On June 1 the union's negotiating committee met with the company, at which time the company refused to negotiate a new contract until the plant was again in operation.

In July 1948 the union filed an unfair labor practice charge against the employer, charging him with refusal to bargain. The charge was supported by affidavits, a set of which is available to the committee. The charge was dismissed October 29, 1948, by Jack G. Evans, NLRB director for the ninth region, Cincinnati, Ohio, for lack of "sufficient evidence of violations to warrant further proceedings at this time."

Subsequently, the union is informed, the NLRB general counsel refused to issue a complaint because of a conclusion that the employees went on strike during the 60-day notice period and lost their employment status under section 8 (b) of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Meantime, however, on July 1–2, 1948, a State unemployment insurance hearing was held in Muncie to decide whether or not the employees of the Frank Foundries Corp. were entitled to unemployment-insurance benefits.

The referee held that there was no strike and that the employees were entitled to benefits.

The employer appealed the referee's ruling to the Review Board of the Indiana State Unemployment Insurance Division, and a hearing on the appeal was held October 14, 1948.

On February 9, 1949, the appeal board made a decision affirming the referee's decision and declaring the claimants eligible for unemployment-insurance benefits.

Here is a case in which a State agency has found that no strike was called or existed, while the NLRB and the NLRB General Counsel, operating under the Taft-Hartley Act, have for 10 months refused to recognize a lockout following discriminatory discharge of union stewards and a subsequent flat refusal by an employer to bargain with the union.

The text of the majority decision of the review board, signed by two of the three members, follows.

State of Indiana, Employment Security Division. Decision of review board. In the matter of: Claimant, Irvin Anderson et al.; employer, Frank Foundries Corporation, Muncie, Indiana. Case No. 48–LDR–2 (48–LD–36). Employer's Acct. No. 18634; date of appeal, August 10, 1948; date of hearing, October 14, 1948; decision mailed February 11, 1948

STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED

Section 1504 of the Indiana Employment Security Act, reads as follows:

"SEC. 1504. An individual shall be ineligible for waiting period or benefit rights: For any week with respect to which the Board finds that his total or partial or part total unemployment is due to a stoppage of work which exists because of a labor dispute at the factory, establishment, or other premises at which he was last employed: Provided, That this section shall not apply if it is shown to the satisfaction of the Board that he is not participating in or financing or directly interested in the labor dispute which caused the stoppage of work; and he does not belong to a grade or class of workers of which, immediately before the commencement of the stoppage, there were members employed at the premises at which the stoppage occurs, any of whom are participating in or financing or directly interested in the dispute; and he has not voluntarily stopped working, other than at the direction of his employer, in sympathy with employees in some other establishment or factory in which a labor dispute is in progress: Provided, That if in any case separate branches of work which are commonly conducted as separate businesses in separate premises, are conducted in separate departments of the same premises, each such department shall, for the purpose of this section, be deemed to be a separate factory, establishment, or other premises."

CASE HISTORY—SOURCE OF APPEAL

This is an appeal to the Review Board from the decision of the Referee in Case 48–LD–36 in which the Referee held claimants, if otherwise eligible, were entitled to their waiting period and benefit rights after May 27, 1948. The case came regularly on to the Review Board and was heard October 14, 1948. The employer was represented by counsel and witnesses. The claimants were represented by counsel and witnesses.

STATEMENT OF FACT

The record of the hearing before the Referee reveals that the employer operates an iron foundry employing approximately 150 people. A collective bargaining agreement had been entered into between the employer and Local Union 242-U. A. W.-C. I. O., as agent for the employees. Our local office serving that area was notified on June 3, 1948, that a stoppage of work had occurred and that notice had been served upon the employer that the men would not return to work until two recently discharged employees were reinstated by the employer; that the stoppage had begun at 11 a. m. on May 27, 1948. The employer furnished lists of those whose unemployment was alleged to be due to the stoppage. The claimants contended that a fictitious labor dispute was created by the employer and that the stoppage was actually due to the fact that there was a shortage of materials. In this connection it was established that for some months preceding the stoppage the employer's plant had only curtailed employment, frequent lay-offs and had been operating only three and four days per week. The plant had operated only eleven days in April, 1948, and ten days in the following month of May. A written grievance had been filed on May 18, 1948, according to requirements of the bargaining agreement, by two grinders in protest to revised pay standards for their work. On the morning of May 27, 1948, the employer discharged these two men and a second grievance was filed by them because of their discharge. One of the discharged men was a Trustee of the Union Local 242, the bargaining agent, and the other was Chief Steward. It was established that at about eight o'clock on the same morning the employees in the core room had been told by their foreman to clean up and go home. Later the order was rescinded and all but two of the core room employees remained and worked until the employer ceased operations.

During the forenoon of May 27, two different meetings were held in the plant offices between the General Manager, the foreman and representatives of the bargaining agent. At these meetings a discussion was held concerning the two discharged employees. The first meeting was requested by the Chairman of the bargaining committee to discuss the grievance filed some days previously by the two workers who were discharged that day. The second meeting was held about eleven a. m. and in that meeting the General Manager told the workers he would order the bottom of the cupola dropped in five minutes unless they returned to work within that time. It was shown that such action meant a shut-down of operations. Evidence was offered by the claimants that the cupola had been in full operation to that time and that it could be stopped for as long as two or two and one-half hours without the bottom being dropped and without damage by reason thereof. The employer's representative testified that during the last meeting in the office the men had all stopped work and were gathered near the door from the plant to the office. The claimants testified that an employee had been badly hurt and was lying near the door and workers had gathered to learn about his injury.

There was considerable evidence as to the shortage of materials and the employer's representatives admitted there was a supply of pig iron on hand sufficient for only one day's operations. Shortages of sand and coke had also occurred. The employer offered evidence that it had other plants which were located at Davenport, Iowa, and Moline, Illinois; that a number of cars of iron had, since May 27, 1948, been diverted from the Muncie plant and were being stock piled at the Moline plant. The metallurgist for the employer testified that there was adequate space at the Muncie plant for storage of from 500 to 700 tons of iron; that the Muncie plant used only about 25 tons per day.

The employer's plant has been closed since May 27. There is a high fence entirely enclosing the employer's plant with three gates which have been kept locked since that date. The foremen are still working and it was testified that the gates are opened and re-locked after each foreman who enters or leaves. Evidence of the Union's International Representative was that the bargaining agreement was shortly to expire and a 60-day notice had been given the employer by the bargaining agent requesting negotiations toward a new contract but the employer had not taken any steps toward negotiating a new contract.

There was evidence that the union, following the closing of the plant on May 27, had requested in writing that the employer open the plant and that of different employees that they had gone early in the morning to meet their respective foreman and ask when they could return to work.

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

Upon a consideration of the evidence heard by the referee and further evidence heard by the Review Board, the Board finds that a labor dispute existed at the employer's plant concerning the execution of a new bargaining agreement, pay standards for certain employees, and the reemployment of two discharged employees. This controversy existed on May 27, 1948. For some months prior thereto the employer had operated only part time, not exceeding 4 days per week. In the month of April they had operated only 11 days, and in May only 10 days. There had been talk of another protracted lay-off. All these lay-offs and shut-downs had been caused by material shortages, and the employer representatives admitted the supply of pig iron on hand was sufficient for but 1 day's operation.

It has been frequently held in this and other States that even though a labor dispute exists, employees are not disqualified from receiving benefits unless their unemployment is due to a stoppage of work existing because of such labor dispute. If there was no employment available from the employer, then the unemployment of the employees was not due to a stoppage of work existing because of such labor dispute. In the instant case this Board believes that the unemployment of the claimants, on and after May 27, 1948, as well as the unemployment they had sustained prior to that date, was due to the fact that no employment was actually available. This position is supported by the fact that on the morning of May 27 an order had issued, later rescinded, that the core room should close down and it was an integral part in continued operation of the employer's plant.

DECISION

The decision of the Referee is affirmed. Claimants, if otherwise eligible, are entitled to their waiting period and benefit rights.

AFFIDAVIT OF JOHN HIGGINS

STATE OF INDIANA,
County of Delaware, ss.:

I, John Higgins, being duly sworn, depose and say:

I reside at 515 Kirby Avenue, Muncie, Ind. I have been an employee of Frank Foundries Corp. since January 1943.

The following are the events occurring at the plant of the company at Muncie, Ind., on the day of May 27, 1948:

At approximately 7 a. m. on that day, I reported to work along with approximately 125 other employees.

It is my understanding, although not from my own personal knowledge, that employees in the core room, department K–6, were told by their foreman that they were to knock off and go home at 9 a. m.

At approximately 8:45 a. m. Albert Hibbard and Joe Hendrick, both stewards of the union, came to me and told me they had been fired. They told me that their attempts to go according to the grievance machinery had failed and they told me they wanted me, as chairman of the negotiating committee, along with the full committee, to take the discharges up with management.

Meanwhile, it is my understanding, although not from my own personal knowledge, that the order to go home, given to core room employes, was canceled.

I got the negotiating committee together, consisting of Emery Jones, Elam Fields, Ross Rhodes, Ben Hammond, Porter Person, Curley Dinwideil and myself. At approximately 10 a. m. to 10:15 a. m., the committee held a meeting with J. Milton Johnson, general manager, in his office. His assistant plant manager, George Gates, was present. That meeting lasted approximately 10 or 15 minutes. To my knowledge, the employees of the plant were all still at work. The committee presented the grievance covering the two discharges to Johnson. Johnson refused to act on the grievance until 3:30 p. m. the same day. Then the committee went back to work.

Because the two discharged men were not satisfied, I got the committee together again and we went back to Johnson's office about 10:40 a. m. Gates and most of the firemen were present. At about 10:50 a. m., Guy Plymale walked in the office and told all of us that Robert Kirkland had been hurt and was laying outside the office door. We all walked out including Johnson, breaking up the meeting. It took us about 5 minutes to get Kirkland in an ambulance, Johnson helping all the while. There were approximately 25 employees from Kirkland's department standing around us. The rest of the plant employees were still at work.

After we got Kirkland in the ambulance, the committee went back to Johnson's office. Johnson, Gates and the foreman returned right after us, about 10:55 a. m. Before we said anything at all, he said, "You fellows either go back to work within 5 minutes, or I'll have the bottom dropped." We just sat there not saying anything while he continued talking. About 11:03 a. m., Johnson told the firemen, "Go out and drop the bottom."

The committee then went back to their work. From about 11:15 a. m. on to about noon, a printed notice appeared on the bulletin boards, telling employees that the plant was down.

In additon to the above statements, I wish to add the following:

About 8 a. m. on May 27, 1948, Mr. Johnson told me in the cleaning room, department K–4, "I'm going to send the core room bunch home at 9 a. m. for the lack of materials."

The reason that the committee sat silent from 10:55 a. m. for 5 minutes was that Johnson did not give us a chance to talk as he was doing all the talking.

"This affidavit consists of 4 pages and has been read by me. The statements herein are true to the best of my knowledge and information.

MODINE MANUFACTURING CO.,
Racine, Wis., March 18, 1949.

Hon. JOHN LESINSKI,
Chairman, Committee on Education and Labor,
House Office Building, Washington 25, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The Labor-Management Act of 1947 in many ways has benefited labor-management relationships as is demonstrated by our own experience with three unions in three separate plants, in three different States.

During the period 1937 until passage of the act, we were constantly beset by serious labor disputes with our unions, many of which were premised on fancied wrongs. Few, if any, were realistic and practical situations. At our local plant, these disputes culminated in a serious strike which lasted almost 5 months during the year 1946.

Many employers in this area have had similar experience. Our community was strike-ridden year after year until the subject act became law. The cost to employees and employers alike was appalling.

Following upon passage of the revised Labor-Management Act, the general labor situation improved greatly. There have been almost no serious disputes and no strikes in the area since the act became effective. As for our own labor-management situation, our relationships have been, generally speaking, mutually satisfactory. The membership of the unions has not been reduced and their effective bargaining strength is even greater than prior to the revised act.

We fear, and with good reason, as you should know, that any change in the act will set off a new series of belligerent and overt actions on the part of the unions. These will be prompted by certain small segments of organized labor groups. Therefore, we urge you to continue the protection which the Labor-Management Act of 1947 has given to the rank-and-file worker, the individual union member, the employer, and the public. If you mutilate the present law, you will have to stand on the record as an accessory both before and after the fact.

Yours very truly,

MODINE MANUFACTURING CO.,
R. GRANT,
Vice President of Manufacturing.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD,
WASHINGTON 25, D. C., March 18, 1949.

Hon. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY,
Chairman, Subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN KELLEY: In accordance with your request, we transmit herewith the statement of the National Labor Relations Board with respect to H. R. 2032. The Board understands that you desire to include the statement, together with this letter, in the formal record of the proceedings before the House committee, in lieu of oral testimony. We appreciate this opportunity to submit our comments.

Because the bills are identical, this statement parallels almost exactly the one submitted to the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Walfare, when I testified in behalf of this Board on S. 249. It constitutes the formal statement of the full Board of five members on the pending legislation.

For a further expresison of my personal views, which I understand you also desire, I refer you to the record of the Senate committee hearings on February 2, 1949 (pp. 117–202). That record contains some of my indivdual comments upon and criticisms of the present Labor-Management Relations Act, as given in response to questions by members of that committee.

Very sincerely yours,

PAUL M. HERZOG, Chairman.

STATEMENT OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD ON H. R. 2032

When testifying before this committee on March 11, 1947, concerning certain bills which evolved later into the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, Chairman Paul M. Herzog opened by saying:

"The National Labor Relations Board, an agency of the United States, is concerned with the public interest and with that interest alone. We testify today as trustees of Congress for the administration of the National Labor Relations Act.

"The deed of trust is the act as passed in 1935. As it was our province, as trustees, to fix the terms of the deed of trust that gave us being, it is not our responsibility to decide whether those terms should be altered at the present time. That is a matter for the Congress to determine." [1]

Although the deed of trust has indeed been sharply altered since that time, the members of the Board are still trustees. We are still administrators performing quasi-judicial functions, and not formulators of policy. At the request of the subcommittee, we submit this statement in lieu of oral testimony, in order to express our views upon those sections of the 1949 bill which are appropriate subjects for comment by this Board. Reference, of course, is to sections 103 through 108 of H. R. 2032 (the Lesinski bill).

On the basis of experience, the Board endorses those provisions of the present bill which would continue it as a five-member tribunal with authority to panelize. Chairman Herzog, Mr. Houston, and Mr. Reynolds, who have served on the Board both when it had only three members and while it has had the present five, are convinced that decisions can be rendered more rapidly and more efficiently by the enlarged Board.

Today, approximately 85 percent of the Board's decisions are issued by panels of three members. Although the full Board has to pass on the remaining 15 percent of the cases because broad questions of policy are involved, this arrangement still relieves each individual Board member of the burden of passing upon about one case out of every three. When there were only three Board members, every member had to participate in every decision. The important thing, of course, is not the relief to us as individuals, but the fact that it makes it possible for us to issue decisions at a much faster rate.

During the second half of calendar year 1948, the five-member Board issued 950 decisions in contested cases. Of these, 100 involved unfair labor practices.

The most productive 6-month period under the predecessor three-man Board was in 1944, when 775 decisions issued in contested cases. The increase in production is over 23 percent. Because time is of the essence in labor-relations matters, anything that so clearly tends to expedite decisions is highly advantageous.

The Board questions the propriety of its commenting upon the content of any particular savings clause contained in proposed legislation, because enactment of such a clause as section 105 of H. R. 2032, would have a direct effect upon many individual cases now before us for decision in our quasi-judicial capacity. We do, however, urge the Congress to enact some language which will provide an explicit mandate to the Board to take, or not to take, specific action on pending cases which arose under the 1947 act but which might have to be treated differently under whatever legislation is passed in 1949.

When the Labor-Management Relations Act was substituted for the National Labor Relations Act in 1947, the Board found itself with almost uncontrolled discretion to dismiss, to modify, or to continue to process without change the many cases that had arisen under the original act and were still pending, at various stages on the Board's assembly line, on August 22, 1947. As the new statute provided no explicit guidance on the subject, we were forced to turn to the general savings statute,[2] and to court precedent which had little direct pertinence. In some situations we dismissed pending proceedings; in some we continued to apply the provisions of the Wagner Act; in others we applied the terms of the new statute; in still others we reopened Board proceedings or recalled cases from the courts. Although we believe that substantial justice was done, solution of the problem on a case-to-case basis was unsatisfactory, time-consuming, and productive of much litigation. We trust that Congress will take steps in 1949 to avoid recurrence of these difficulties. If these steps result in a curtailment of the Board's members' discretion to feel their way as they did before, you will hear no complaint from us.

We turn next to the provisions of the bill concerning jurisdictional disputes and secondary boycotts (section 106). We assume that these provisions, including the added policy findings of section 105 (a), are intended to implement the President's views, as expressed in his State of the Union messages, and to go no further. We believe that they accomplish this purpose.

[2] 16 Stat. 432 (1871).

SECONDARY BOYCOTTS

The basic approach employed in the boycott provisions is the one set forth in the President's 1947 and 1949 Messages on the State of the Union: that secondary boycotts should be judged, not on the basis of the form in which they appear, but rather on the basis of the objectives they seek to achieve. The President's approach evidently is that in the complexity of modern industrial life unions frequently find it necessary to extend the scope of industrial conflict beyond the area of the single disputing employer in order to preserve their existence or to achieve legitimate economic gains.[3] It postulates that legislation should therefore not condemn all secondary action by unions, but rather that it should outlaw such conduct only when the objective sought to be achieved is "unjustifiable."

The proposed bill first defines a secondary boycott. Then, in a later section, it declares such activity to be an unfair labor practice if engaged in for certain limited and specified objectives. The present act contains no explicit definition of secondary boycotts, but describes the conduct deemed unlawful in section 8 (b) (4). The present section 8 (b) (4) (A), because it outlaws all secondary boycotts without regard to objectives, clearly reaches some objectives which have sometimes been considered to be of sound economic character. These are not characterized by the President as unjustifiable.

Definition of secondary boycott.—The proposed bill defines a secondary boycott as: "A concerted refusal in the course of employment by employees of one employer to produce, manufacture, transport, distribute, or otherwise work on articles, materials, goods, or commodities because they have been or are to be manufactured, produced, or distributed by another employer."

This definition would cover virtually all the means by which a secondary boycott has customaraily been implemented. Although the word "strike" does not appear in the definition, it would cover the common form of secondary boycott in which employees strike to compel their employer to cease dealing with another employer. In such cases, the employees have gone a step beyond the refusal to handle a particular product, and have refused to work at all. But so long as it appears from the evidence that the strike grew out of a refusal by employees in the course of their employment to handle particular articles because those articles have been or are to be manufactured by another employer, the strike would still constitute a secondary boycott within the terms of this definition. The struck employer, normally an innocent and neutral victim, receives protection in such a situation if the objective is unjustifiable.

The unfair labor practice.—Section 8 (b) of the proposed bill is drafted to reach both secondary boycotts and primary strikes, when resorted to in furtherance of two basic objectives which the President believes that experience has demonstrated to be unjustifiable: (1) where the object is to compel an employer to violate his statutory duty to bargain with a majority representative of his employees; and (2) where the object is to further a jurisdictional dispute. The latter disputes are treated in detail below.

Common to the bill's handling of both unjustifiable objectives is the fact that the proposed provision is directed not only against secondary boycotts but also against primary strikes. If this were not done, an illogical result would follow. This is so because a secondary boycott is in essence the use of pressure by one employers' employees to support a strike by another employer's employees against the latter. The secondary boycott therefore has the same ultimate objective as the strike which it supports. To outlaw the one and permit the other would make illegality turn only on the fact that a secondary employer was involved, rather than upon the fact that the ultimate objective of the action was unjustifiable. Presumably, because this would run directly counter to the basic approach of this bill on secondary boycotts, which makes the objective the touchstone, the bill handles the situation on a broader base.

The proposed provision reaches strikes and secondary boycotts to compel an employer to violate his statutory duty to bargain, in three alternative situations: (1) Where the incumbent union sought to be unseated by the strike or boycott has been certified by the NLRB as the majority representative;[4] (2) where the employer has been ordered by the Board to bargain with that union; and (3) where that union, although uncertified, has a valid and subsisting contract with the employer and the time for a new election is not approaching. All three are based upon the public interest in the stability of established bargaining relations, which may require protection against being upset by a raider's use of economic force. A majority representative, whether its status is achieved by certification, an order to bargain directed against the employer, or voluntary recognition followed by a contract, should be free from rival union attack through strikes or boycotts. The employer, too, is entitled to a period of undisturbed collective bargaining with a labor organization with which he is dealing in accordance with law.

[4] It will be recalled that the Board affirmatively suggested inclusion of such a provision by amending the original Wagner Act, when we testified before this committee in March 1947. (See pp. 3090 and 3162 of the House hearings of that year, as well as the earlier declaration of analagous Board policy in the Thompson Products decision (70 N. L. R. B. 13; 72 N. L. R. B. 886). It is similar to sec. 8 (b) (4) (C) of the L. M. R. A.

While stability of bargaining relations is the principal argument for setting forth all three situations to which section 8 (b) (4) of the proposed bill would apply, a separate reason exists in the first two situations which is not applicable to the third (where there is only a contract). Effective administration of the act and respect for a governmental agency's processes require that protection be afforded to certifications and orders of the Board determining the status of a bargaining representative.

It will be noted, also, that neither the proposed definition of "secondary boycott" nor the language as to the proposed unfair labor practices makes any specific reference to picketing. The subject nevertheless appears to be covered by the proposed language of section 8 (b), because it extends to the situation in which a union causes or attempts to cause a strike or secondary boycott. The Board would in any particular cases have to determine from the evidence before it whether the picketing was designed to, or did in fact, bring on a strike or secondary boycott.

JURISDICTIONAL DISPUTES

On jurisdictional disputes, the President, in his 1947 state of the Union message, urged that machinery be provided for their final and peaceful settlement. He declared that strikes and boycotts in furtherance of such disputes should be outlawed. This bill is intended to achieve both objectives.

General scheme.—Various provisions of the bill interlock to form the following scheme for handling jurisdictional disputes:

Whenever there is a strike or threatened strike or secondary boycott affecting commerce, and it is caused by a jurisdictional dispute over work tasks (as defined in the proposed section 2 (12)), any party affected—union or employer—may apply to the Board, under the proposed section 9 (d), to have the dispute resolved.[5] The Board thereupon proceeds, if appropriate, to determine the dispute or to have it determined by an arbitrator appointed by the Board for the purpose. The Board (or its arbitrator), after hearing, issues an award specifying which of the unions in the controversy is entitled to the work. Once the award is issued, and the parties comply with it upon issuance, the dispute is ended, and the strike or secondary boycott is averted or terminated. It seems likely that in most instances the employer will want to comply with the award at this stage, assuming that he is a neutral anxious to have the dispute settled by someone in authority so that he may proceed with operations.

The award, like a certification of representatives, is not itself a final order. If the unsuccessful union or the employer refuses to honor the award, the Board may proceed against either in an unfair labor practice case (against the employer, under the proposed section 8 (a) (6); and against the union, under the proposed section 8 (b) (2)).

In such a proceeding, the prior section 9 (d) award would be treated as determinative of the work task assignment issue in the complaint cases, precisely as a certification of representatives is determinative of the representation and unit issues in a conventional later refusal to bargain case. The second proceeding would therefore be a rapid one. If rendered by an arbitrator, the award would have the same effect, unless the Board found it to be clearly unreasonable.

Once the Board issues its order in a complaint case enforcing the award, and the offending employer or labor organization complies with the Board order, the dispute is ended at this stage. Otherwise, either the Board or the party against whom the order is directed may seek enforcement or review in the circuit court under section 10 (e) or (f). Under 10 (e), a temporary injunction can be secured pending enforcement.

[5] These references to numbered sections of the proposed bill are inserted for the committee's convenience.

Some characteristics of the specific provisions which unite to form the general plan outlawing jurisdictional strikes and boycotts should be noted:

The arbitration proceeding—Proposed section 9 (d).—The most important, if not novel, single feature of the integrated scheme is probably the procedure for settling jurisdictional disputes. That procedure offers the following advantages to employers, unions, the public and the Government:

(1) The proceeding can be instituted at a stage when the strike or boycott is merely threatened, but has not yet materialized. (See the proposed section 9 (d).) Strife may thus be prevented at an early and critical period. (2) Any party interested in the dispute may resort to the Board for settlement. This opens up an avenue of peaceful solution not only for the aggrieved labor organization but for the employer, who may well be the innocent victim of an intermunion feud. (3) The parties are afforded a reasonable time to resolve the dispute themselves, even after the proceeding has been instituted. At this point, voluntary settlement, rather than Government-imposed determination, would probably be the choice of many disputants. The Board would, of course, welcome such solution, just as it welcomes consent agreements in its other proceedings. (4) The mere availability of the procedure may often be sufficient to achieve industrial peace in this field without the intervention of Government.

Three other aspects of the settlement procedure are of particular interest to the Board, in that each would tend to lighten the Board's burden in this new and difficult field of governmental operation:

First, the Board would have discretion to determine whether or not the dispute should be arbitrated. This would seem to be particularly valuable if it should develop, at any stage of the proceeding, that the dispute is truly a representation controversy. Upon such discovery, the Board would discontinue the arbitration proceeding and treat the case as if it had been instituted by a petition for certification under section 9 (c)—that is, determine a bargaining unit and proceed to an election if appropriate. Second, unlike the LMRA, this section provides standards to guide the Board or the arbitrator in making a determination. While the same criteria that serve as the starting point in arbitration proceedings by parent federations are made available as standards, other specific guides may also be followed if necessary. Third, the Board may designate arbitrators skilled in the field of jurisdictional disputes, rather than handle these matters directly itself.

The definition of a jurisdictional dispute—Proposed section 2 (12).—Another distinguishing feature of the bill is the definition of the term "jurisdictional dispute."[6]

By limiting the subject-matter of the dispute to "the assignment or prospective assignment of a particular work task," the definition describes the kind of intermunion disputes that are thought susceptible of arbitration. Representation controversies are considered to be more appropriately solved by an election and are, therefore, excluded from the definition. Industrial-union disputes and craft-severance conflicts would, for example, fall outside the scope of this definiton, as being representation controversies.

The definition also limits the nature of the dispute, by defining it as a dispute between two or more labor organizations. Conflicts between a union and an unorganized group of employees, or between an employer and a union over the employer's assignment of work to unorganized employees are not covered. In this respect, the definition is narrower than that embodied in section 8 (b) (4) (D) of the LMRA. On the other hand, it is broader than the LMRA definition in the following respect: The disputant groups need not be employees of the same or of any employer. A union may be found to have engaged in a jurisdictional dispute, as here defined, on behalf of its unemployed members—which is not infrequently the case in jurisdictional disputes.

The sanctions—Proposed section 8 (a) (6) and 8 (b) (2).—Unlike the LMRA, or the 1947 Morse bill (S. 858), the proposed section 8 (a) (6) makes jurisdictional awards enforceable against employers. Its presence is designed to serve as a deterrent against the occasional nonneutral employer, who might otherwise take sides in the jurisdictional dispute and assign the work to one of the warring unions despite the fact that its rival had received the award.

The union that engages in a strike or boycott to overturn an award is also guilty of an unfair labor practice, under the proposed 8 (b) (2). This section parallels the proposed section 8 (b) (1), which makes it an unfair labor practice for a union to strike or engage in a secondary boycott for recognition, in the face of a certification, refusal to bargain order, or contract that requires the employer to recognize another union.

[6] There is no specific definition of a "jurisdictional dispute" as such in the LMRA of 1947. The conduct constituting an unlawful dispute of that character is set forth in the existing sec. 8 (b) (4) (D).

The section (sec. 107) that refers to restrictive State laws is evidently designed to reestablish and augment Federal authority in the field of union-security agreements. While it is not the Board's function to comment upon the merits of this proposal, we assume that the committee desires us to indicate its significance.

Under section 14 (b) of the Labor-Management Relations Act, as construed by a majority of the Board in the Giant Food case,[7] State laws prohibiting the execution or enforcement of such contracts must govern the action of the NLRB in such States. During the earlier period, when the closed-shop proviso to section 8 (3) of the original Wagner Act was in effect, the Courts never had a final opportunity to determine whether a State statute restricting union-security agreements could be applied by the State to an employer engaged in interstate commerce. The 1935 legislative history had left the issue in some doubt.

A few weeks ago the United States Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of such State laws as a proper exercise of the State's own police power. The decision rejected contentions made under the first and fourteenth amendments to the Constitution, without reference to the commerce clause or any existing Federal legislation.[8] The impact upon such State statutes of Federal legislation based on the commerce clause of the Constitution will revive important legal issues, in the event that the substantive provisions of Federal law are again changed. The proposed section of the bill, by including the words "or in any State law," seeks to eliminate the uncertainty that prevailed between 1935 and 1947. Any State law on this subject—whatever its terms—inconsistent with the Federal statute would of course no longer determine the action of the NLRB, as it does under section 14 (b) of the present act. It would, we believe, also cease to be enforceable by the State itself, except where purely local enterprises are involved. Federal law is also expressly made paramount over any State law prohibiting the check-off.

Section 108 makes it an unfair labor practice for either an employer or a labor organization to terminate or modify an existing bargaining agreement except upon 30 days advance notice to the Conciliation Service. This would be enforceable through the remedial powers of the Board like any other unfair labor practice, with similar and nondiscriminatory sanctions available against both unions and employers. This provision should afford the Conciliation Service adequate time to assist the parties to maintain continuous bargaining relationships, before, rather than after, a prior agreement has run its course.

HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY,
Chairman, Subcommittee on H. R. 2032,
House Committee on Education and Labor, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN KELLEY: I am writing you this letter on behalf of the Washington, (D. C.) chapter of the Associated Master Barbers & Beauticians of America. We wish to draw the attention of your committee to certain problems which the proposed bill H. R. 2032, would create in our industry, and we request that this letter be included in the official reports of the hearings now being held before your subcommittee.

I am the owner of a barber shop at 320 Kennedy Street, N. W., Washington, D. C., and I am also president of chapter 336 of the Associated Master Barbers. Our chapter is composed of 62 proprietors of barber shops and all of us with very few exceptions work in our own barber shop where we employ other barbers who belong to a barbers' union affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, known officially as the Journeymen Barbers, Hairdressers & Cosmetologists International Union of America.

In the Northland Greyhound case, however, the Board did conduct an election in Wisconsin, a State which merely regulates union-security contracts. 80 N. L. R. B. No. 60.

[8] Lincoln Federal Labor Union v. Northwestern Iron & Metal Company et al. (23 LRPM 2199 (1949)).

There has been a good deal of testimony before your committee to show that repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act would not be beneficial to small businessmen. In our case, this is emphatically so. Without the protection which the act gives proprietors of small shops against the use of excessive power of unions which are organized on a national scale, we would be forced to submit to the most arbitrary kind of union practices.

This is particularly true of the barbering industry, which is essentially made up of small-businessmen. In the District of Columbia, for example, the average member of our organization employs about three barbers, who traditionally are members of the union. Some employers have as few as two employees. The largest employs nine.

We are actually faced with a policy adopted by an international union in clear violation of the literal language of section 8 (b) (4) (A) which would compel all employing barbers and all self-employed barbers to join the Barbers Union, become liable for dues and special assessments, and yet be denied any of the voting privileges of that union. This is a situation which confronts not merely those of us who operate barber shops in the District of Columbia but all members of the Associated Master Barbers throughout the United States.

For many years the barbers' union has had a practice of issuing union-shop cards to employers who employ members of the union and who agree to abide by such union rules respecting working conditions as may be prescribed either presently or in the future by the barbers' union.

For a number of years the barbers' union has had a rule under which it has permitted union locals to require proprietors who worked in their own shops and who also employed members of the barbers' union to obtain membership in the barbers' union and to pay dues but to receive only a restricted membership entitling them to no participation in union affairs or the fixing of union policies. However, until recently a great many of the locals have either ignored instructions from the union or have made no effort to push the application of this policy.

At the 1948 convention of the union which was held in Indianapolis in the fall of 1948, an amendment to the constitution of the International Barbers' Union was adopted which provided as follows:

"Article VIII, section 3.—An employer shall be construed to be any person or persons who either owns or operates a barber or beauty shop and employs steadily one or more full-time barbers or beauty operators, provided, however, employers who are working with the tools of the trade must become employing members of the local union and International Union of Barbers or Beauticians.

"Article XVII, section 3.—Any member becoming an employer must continue as a proprietor member of the local union so long as he works at the trade as a barber or beautician. Said member shall be entitled to all the privileges of the benefit fund of the international union as prescribed for active beneficiary members upon the payment of not less than $2 per month dues, and tax to the international to be the same as an active beneficiary member. A member who quits the barber or beauty trade to engage in some other kind of work, that is, does not work any time at all at the barber or beauty trade, may be issued a retiring card upon request. A proprietor, shop owner, or employer working at the trade and who has never been a member of this organization and who desires to operate a union shop must make application for membership. A proprietor member working with the tools of the trade shall be entitled to a voice and a vote in meetings of any local union, but shall be ineligible to vote on matters pertaining to wages, hours of labor, etc. And shall also be ineligible to any office in the local or international union or to act as delegate or alternate to conventions."

By these provisions the international union has removed any discretion from the hands of locals and has made clear its purpose to require every shop owner who works with the tools of his trade and who employs any members of the barbers' union to become a member, to pay dues of not less than $2 a month, plus any additional taxes which the international may determine to impose upon him.

The purpose which the union seeks to accomplish by these amendments is made crystal clear by the short explanatory statement made by the president of the International Barbers' Union at the convention on September 15. Mr. Birthright said:

"Now, that is fair that we take these men [meaning shop owners and employers] in and give them a voice, a vote on matters, but when it comes down to setting the price, the wage, the local union should agree on that themselves and then take it to these fellows and say, 'Here it is'."

In judging the effect of this provision, the committee should bear in mind that in the vast majority of barber shops the proprietor must also work at the barbering trade in order to make a living.

These amendments to the International Barbers' Union constitution are not mere idle paper threats. They are being put into effect throughout the country. The representatives of the barbers' union have tried to put them into effect in the District of Columbia.

For example, last October 14 a special meeting of the barbers' union was held at which all proprietors of barber shops employing union men were invited to attend. At this meeting officials of both the local and international barbers' union reported on the amendments adopted at the Indianapolis convention of the International Barbers' Union and announced to the employer barbers in attendance that "you boss barbers will have to join the union and bear your share of the expenses." Employers were further advised that if they did not join the union, their union-shop cards would be taken away, in which event the barbers' union would call barbers' union employees out on strike and would picket the shop of any employer who did not join the union. Examples of the union's power to put recalcitrant employers out of business were cited.

Faced with the situation, our chapter filed charges with the regional office of the National Labor Relations Board in Baltimore asking for a complaint to issue and for any further relief which seemed appropriate to cause the barbers' union to desist from encouraging our employees to strike if the proprietors refused to join the union. As a result of these charges, both the international and the local backed down. An uneasy truce exists at the moment which will be shattered if the Lesinski bill, H. R. 2032, is adopted in lieu of the Taft-Hartley Act, for the international union has still retained this amendment to its constitution and the local has served notice it will renew its efforts to enforce this provision if the Taft-Hartley Act is repealed or amended in any respect material to our case.

We believe it will be plain to every member of this committee that the national policy of encouraging collective bargaining between employers and employees would be completely defeated if an organization purporting to be a union may force employers to join the union and to accept any wages, hours, and other working conditions which by its own fiat it may promulgate.

It is obvious that whenever any employing barber capitulates to these union requirements, his collective bargaining days are over and the national policy of encouraging the settlement of employer and employee relationships by collective bargaining will be utterly ineffective.

Nothing in H. R. 2032 or in the old Wagner Act which it revives will afford any protection to employers against these dictatorial practices or any protection to the public in support of the national policy favoring collective bargaining.

Although the barbers' union officials have assured members of the AMB that nothing in the present Taft-Hartley Act provides any protection against the imposition of these requirements, it is evident that they misunderstand the present law. Under this law, which certainly applied to all commercial establishments in the District of Columbia, it is plain that these requirements of the barbers' union violate section 8 (b) (4) (A) which makes it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization to engage in, or encourage the employees of any employer to engage in, a strike or concerted refusal to work, where an objective is to force or require an employer or self-employed person to join any labor or employer organization.

Furthermore, this conduct is also prohibited by section 8 (b) (3) of the present act, which makes it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization to refuse to bargain collectively with an employer. Clearly, the union requirement that employers become members of the union, having no voice in the determination of wages, hours, and working conditions, and bound by the determinations of the union on these questions, deprives them of every semblance of an opportunity to bargain collectively with their employees about these matters.

We think that employers and the public are entitled to some protection against these utterly indefensible practices by a union and that any legislation enacted by the Congress should retain those features of the present Taft-Hartley law which provide such protection.

We think the committee should also bear in mind that this situation is not merely a simple conflict between groups of employers and employees in their ordinary roles. The fact is that to the extent that the barbers' union is a true labor organization representing the interests of employees, as such, against employers, it is in fact being used for other purposes quite unrelated to the advancement of the interests of the employees. For many years the union's rules have permitted one-chair and partnership shop owners who employ no employees to be full members of the union, exercising full voting privileges. The result is in various locals the one-chair and partnership shop owners dominate and control the policies pursued by the barbers' union. In the interest of eliminating competition many of these one-chair shop owners have promoted and voted exorbitant wage scales and percentages, hourly schedules, and vacation allowances in an effort to drive out of business their competitors who employ any union employees in their shops. Clearly, our national laws should afford some protection against the misuse and perversion of a labor organization to such ends.

Sincerely yours,

PHILIP GELFO,
President, Associated Master Barbers and Beauticians of America, Chapter 396, Washington, D. C.

A UNION-BUSTING PLAN—OIL-TRUST STYLE

A 1949 MODEL FORMULA FOR DESTRUCTION OR EMASCULATION OF LABOR UNIONS, AS APPLIED BY THE OIL TRUST AGAINST OIL WORKERS INTERNATIONAL UNION (CIO) IN CALIFORNIA

A Challenge to All Labor Unions

(This booklet has been prepared by OWIU-CIO for distribution to labor people everywhere that they may be prepared for future union-breaking efforts on the same pattern.)

THE CALIFORNIA PLAN

When the California oil workers struck September 4 for an increase to bring their wages up to the level paid union oil workers in the Deep South, they ran smack up against a brick wall.

Eight weeks later they know a lot more about the bricks in the wall they ran up against. The bricks spell "California plan"—which is just a modernized version with Taft-Hartley trimmings of the Mohawk Valley formula of the early 1930's.

The California plan was drawn up by the Big Six of the oil trust—spearheaded by Standard Oil of California, brain-trusted by Reese Taylor of Union Oil and supported by Shell, Texas, Richfield, and Tide Water Associated.

For the information of union men of CIO, the 14 big points of the California plan are outlined below. You'd better read them now—while you're not on strike, so you'll know what workingmen are up against in the Taft-Hartley era when they go out after a decent break in wages.

1. SOFTEN 'EM UP

Long before the strike, the Big Six were spending thousands of dollars on training programs for supervisory people. The "righteousness" of each company was sold, skillfully and delicately, to all employees. No rough stuff, please. The "friendly" approach. Iron hand in velvet glove. The "new look" in industrial relations. When the strike crisis came, some employees had been softened to the point that they believed too many of the companies' words.

2. THE SOLID FRONT

In preparation for the strike, the Big Six of the west coast oil trust formed a united front. There would be no "break-through" by one company, with the others following a pattern set by an initial settlement.

While refusing to negotiate wage issues jointly, the Big Six took the identical line in all wage negotiations. It was "United we stand, divided we negotiate." At each wage conference, whether in San Francisco Bay or Los Angeles or Bakersfield, the union committees ran into exactly the same answers, the same maneuvers from each of the Big Six.

3. COURTS SMASH PICKET LINES

On September 7, 4 days after the strike began, Shell Oil went into Judge Harold Jacoby's court in Martinez, on San Francisco Bay, and asked for an immediate injunction to break the oil workers' picket line at the Shell refinery. The union was not even notified or heard. Shell didn't bother to submit evidence or affidavits in its pleas for relief by the court. Fact was, it had none to submit.

Injunction granted. Pickets limited to four at a gate. Other members must remain at least 200 yards from the entrance. The four lonely pickets at a refinery employing 1,500 must be at least 20 feet apart from each other.

This was the pattern for all subsequent injunctions granted by a dozen different superior court judges in all parts of the State. These injunctions varied only in the number of pickets permitted; some judges deemed four too many, and allowed two or three.

On September 10, 1 week after the strike, Union Oil got a similar injunction from Judge Clarence M. Hanson in Los Angeles. There was no hearing. Neither OWIU nor its locals were notified of the company's action in seeking an injunction. The union read about these injunctions in the newspapers or found out about them when served on the picket lines.

Judge Hanson threw his heart into this injunction. He announced that for the slightest infraction of his injunction, he would deal out the maximum penalty—a $500 fine and 5 days in jail. No monkey business about jury trials, either. In California there are no juries in contempt cases and no appeals to a higher court.

After the Richfield injunction, granted by Judge Hanson a few days later, the international union, Long Beach Local 128, all of its officers and all international representatives were cited in contempt cases totaling 1,380 counts. Under Judge Hanson's threat, these cases would cost the union and its members $640,000 and 6,900 days in jail.

In all, 21 injunctions have been obtained by the Big Six, tying up picketing in every refinery, oil field, and pipe line in the State.

After 2 months of striking 310 union oil workers have been arrested for picketing activities and are under criminal charges that can result in jail sentences and onerous fines.

After 2 months there had been about 1,500 contempt citations. There are 60 such citations pending against International President O. A. Knight, International Vice President A. R. Kinstley, and International Secretary-Treasurer T. M. McCormick, each. McCormick has not even been in California in recent months.

While the injunctions follow the pattern, Richfield (a corporation controlled by Sinclair and Cities Service) has something different in the way of an injunction. This one, presented to Judge Hanson in Los Angeles Superior Court, asks that:

(1) No union members be permitted within 2 miles of a Richfield plant.

(2) No union member be permitted within 2 miles of any scab's residence.

(3) No union members be permitted within 2 miles of any company with which Richfield does business.

4. BUST THE UNION FINANCIALLY

The Oil Workers International Union is being sued for over $28,000,000 for daring to call a strike on the Big Six. This figure was as of October 30. This sum increases at the rate of $360,000 a day. But this is only the half of it. Many of the companies have sued for "indefinite" amounts, alleging that their losses are so gigantic that they are unable to estimate them. At the same time publicity is fed to the pliant papers that oil-industry operations are "about normal."

These damage claims are filed against OWIU, its locals, and its members—everybody in the union.

5. JOHN DOE RAZZLE-DAZZLE

These fantastic injunctions and damage suits take on a typical California razzle-dazzle. In addition to naming all union officers, they name thousands of "Does."

One suit named "Does 1 to 2,000, inclusive." The "Does" being unidentified union members. Such citations were printed en masse and passed out like handbills on picket lines by process servers. Cameramen stood by to take pictures of the pickets as the citations were thrust into their hands, thus establishing identity and proof of service.

Particularly bizarre in Hollywoodism was the naming of "Doe Associations 1 to 20," to include any unions which might be assisting the oil workers. Some of these injunctions named "Doe Associations A to X," but undoubtedly the high point in the fantastic was reached in the injunction which named "Doe Associations Green, Blue, Yellow, Red, etc."

6. BACK TO WORK

Typical of the highly publicized back-to-work movements is this at the Wilmington plant of the Texas Co.

All newspapers received publicity hand-outs saying that the Wilmington plant would reopen "next Monday." These hand-outs were duly reproduced with appropriate headlines on the front pages of the papers. Come Monday, the newspapers announced solemnly that the Wilmington plant had "opened." A few days later the same papers followed up with a company hand-out to the effect that production in the Wilmington plant is "75 percent of normal."

"Seventy-five percent" seemed to be a favorite figure, covering a multitude of cold stills and cat crackers staring at a handful of supervisory employees and trainees.

Some of the production the companies were able to secure came from the use of trainees who had not previously operated the plants. But they had had some training through joint union-company training programs. This is something for unions to think about in setting up future training programs.

Other production was secured by the work of supervisory employees. It is notable that for years the companies had been using every means to increase the number of supervisors and narrow the field of employees called nonsupervisory and covered by the union bargaining unit.

In advance of the strike the Big Six had built up huge reserves of low-grade gasoline. This they have been unloading on the public to the disgust of clattering motors and cursing motorists. Two months after the strike, despite "75 percent of normal" productions, there is no Ethyl gas available in California. All the while the Big Six is losing money on highly profitable byproducts of petroleum, because they are not being produced. Crude oil is run through stills for low-grade gasoline and then run back into the tanks against the day when the oil workers are back on the job.

7. "WE RESIGN"

Unable to produce high-test gasoline, the Big Six had no trouble in mass-producing "union resignation" forms for distribution among striking employees. These were circulated personally by foremen in door-to-door visits. These visits were invariably "friendly"—the foremen didn't have a thing against the union, the boys needed more money of course, but how about that pension? The company likes you, Jim, and doesn't want to see you out of the end of a limb.

Company stooges filtered into union halls and engaged in backyard talks with strikers, skillfully introducing defeatist rumors. Scabbing with the tongue was so widespread that the word "scabwag" was invented to cover the type of character.

With the papers blaring forth back-to-work propaganda, company personnel spread the old stand-by rumors that strikers would lose seniority, pensions, and other benefits. These terror stories had some effect among men with many years' service records.

And here's another company "contribution" to the conduct of union affairs. In an effort to pack group meetings with procompany stooges, the companies carried on advertising campaigns for union meetings.

For example, a group strongly suspected of stooge sentiments approached the chairman of the Shell group in Long Beach to suggest a group meeting. The chairman said that certainly he and the other officers were happy to meet with any and all members at any time. He set an early date for the meeting.

Soon every Shell employee in the group received a mimeographed post card advertising the meeting. These cards went to members and nonmembers alike. They were addressed from addressograph stencils. They were not addressed from the union's file of stencils. Who else would have such a set of stencils—except the company?

Incidentally, the plan didn't work. Although this crowd-packing trick was tried in the big Shell groups at Long Beach and Martinez, in both meetings the people present voted overwhelmingly to stick solidly behind the strike.

8. PUBLIC OPINION BOUGHT AND PAID FOR

Unions have men, corporations have dollars. The Big Six has assets running into the billions of dollars. So in one phase of the battle of Big Six against the Oil Workers International Union, the Oil Trust wins hands down. That is, in buying newspaper space. Full-page ads run in all the leading California papers and in the oil papers.

There are no bones made about the unity of the oil monopoly. All ads are signed jointly by all companies. The Big Six won't talk jointly with the union, insisting on separate negotiations, but they're mighty ready to talk to the public jointly.

The ads give company claims of oil production; carry threats against striking employees; attempt to inflame public opinion against "violence" of strikers (men fighting for their jobs).

In this business the Oil Workers International Union has no chance. A single Big Six blast in the papers grosses $50,000 to the newspaper owners, who are the buddies of the Big Six anyway. The union case is smothered before it can be heard, by the weight of billions of dollars pressing against simple human rights.

9. TEASE 'EM INTO A FIGHT

Hogging the newspaper headlines during much of the strike have been stories about alleged violence. What brought about the few incidents of violence which did occur?

Provocation and aggravation. Men slapped and mistreated slowed red-blooded rebellion. When companies wanted back-to-work movements, did they try to quietly slip their scabs through the court-thinned picket lines, with a minimum of irritation to all parties concerned? No. They advertised the back-to-work movement well in advance. They flaunted their finky plans in the face of the strikers fighting for bread on their tables.

Back-to-work movements were staged en masse. Mobs of scabs were lined up to "crash" the two-, three-, and four-man picket lines. Literally hundreds of gun toting, billy wielding cops were dispatched to the gates to "protect" these scabs.

There was shoving from the cops. Pickets were run down by scab-driven cars. In one instance a woman picket was struck by a fink car and carried far into the Richfield plant, clinging to the bumper to avoid mutilation under the wheels. So there were some incidents. What do you expect?

At Richmond, scabs inside the Standard Oil refinery on at least one occasion rushed in a horde to the fence and heaved nuts, bolts, scraps of pipe and brickbats at the four pickets outside.

10. PRESS LORDS LOVE VIOLENCE

War, murder, sex, and violence are the real loves of America's press lords. Such stories may not build up the morale of a people, but they build circulation.

So naturally most of the California newspapers, reinforced by Oil Trust advertising, have been abjectly at the service of the corporations. And "violence" is their dish.

The picture of the $15,000,000,000 California Oil Trust being assaulted and bruised and manhandled by their employees is a hard one to draw. But not for the Los Angeles Times, which for 40 years has carried on a high-powered campaign to blast all unions—CIO, AFL, and what have you.

Perhaps it couldn't happen in most parts of the country. But in California, most newspapers have taken hand-outs from publicity agents of the Big Six accusing their employes of violence. Most newspapers elsewhere insist on getting such news from police blotters. But not in California.

And when the lone publicity representative of Oil Workers International Union protested this unabashed practice, the newspapers hemmed and hawed but did not retract. On the other hand, when OWIU's publicity department turned over authenticated instances of violence against the union's members, the newspapers either ignored the facts or played them down on page 31.

Most newspaper readers are bystanders on the industrial battle lines. While they read the flaring headlines on reported "violence," they don't have much chance to reflect that after all the men concerned have not been tried in court and found guilty, that the presumption of innocence, guaranteed under our Constitution, is with the strikers, and that, given a jury trial by their peers, most of the strikers will be found innocent of charges preferred during the heat of conflict.

11. BREAK THE UNION TREASURY

Money makes the mare go round. And the Oil Trust has the resources to whip the mare. The Big Six works it on advertising and they work it on lawyers.

The Big Six has scores of lawyers on its pay rolls for the sole purpose of harassing the union oil workers. The union has exactly one lawyer on its staff—all that it can afford.

Obviously the union's counsel can't be in half a dozen places at one time defending cases brought by Big Six. Obviously it's pretty unfair to the union to have to bring witnesses and union officials 300 miles to answer charges when they have no validity whatsoever. But it happens. Big Six files charges, for instance, in Santa Rosa, hundreds of miles from the Los Angeles oil basin, and the union is under the heavy burden of sending its officers and witnesses there for a protracted hearing.

Only the help of CIO in employing attorneys has enabled the Oil Workers International Union to meet this many-headed legal attack on a dozen fronts. Eight lawyers are working full time defending the union and its members.

Hundreds of strikers have been arrested. The bail bonds run over $100,000 on which there is not only a 4-percent commission to be paid immediately, but a minimum bail bond fee of $10, no matter how slight the charge.

If the oil workers union had to rely on its own resources, obviously hundreds of members would face court without protection of any kind. Only the help of CIO nationally has prevented this.

12. YOU CAN'T WIN UNDER TAFT-HARTLEY'S LABOR BOARD

It's heads you lose, tails I win, when a union goes to the National Labor Relations Board today.

Big Six asked a Federal injunction under Taft-Hartley to restrain union members from doing what they can't do anyway under State court injunctions. The Federal judge sitting in San Francisco inquired if OWIU had taken a firm stand against "violence." In evidence were submitted telegrams from President O. A. Knight to local unions urging strict compliance with injunctions. Ah ha, said the judge, that established the responsibility of OWIU for the acts of all its members.

Five of the Big Six have filed for Federal Taft-Hartley injunctions. Their virtue to the Big Six over State court injunctions is that the sky is the limit on fines. There is no maximum Federal fine, as John L. Lewis found out in the United Mine Workers case.

The San Francisco regional director of NLRB had the nerve to ask OWIU counsel to agree to a consent decree in all the injunction actions.

George E. Arthur was secretary of OWIU's West Side local in the sunburned oil fields of the San Joaquin Valley—the kind of devoted union man to whom the union is the breath of life. He was also an employee of Tide Water Associated—one of the Big Six.

When he and four fellow-workers living in company houses refused to scab, Tide Water Associated threw armed guards around their homes. They refused to let friends enter their houses. They turned back the men's ministers, and even the neighbor's children who just wanted to play with the strikers' kids.

The company cut off the water supply. OWIU filed unfair labor practice charges with the Labor Board. After three weeks of investigation, the Labor Board upheld the union's charges but refused to seek a Taft-Hartley injunction against Tide Water Associated.

By then it was too late for George Arthur. Brooding over what was happening in this Oil Trust corner of free America, Arthur went mad in the isolation of the concentration camp, murdered his wife, and nearly killed his two smaller children, and then blew out his brains.

The Big Six, with the assistance of NLRB had scored another victory over the union.

13. FIRE THE MOST MILITANT MEMBERS

Sticking point in repeated negotiations between the Big Six and the union has been the reinstatement of union members against whom charges have been filed under injunctions. The oil corporations insist that strikers charged with contempt are guilty and will not be rehired. They have named hundreds of union members—by pure coincidence they happen to be the officers, leaders, the cream of the crop—whom they will never, never reemploy.

In negotiations, each company has simply stated that "there are certain employees who we will not allow to resume employment."

"Which employees?" asked the union negotiators.

"Those guilty of violence," said the management spokesman.

"Who are they?" persisted the unionists.

"We don't care to say," replied management.

"How shall we determine guilt of violence?"

"We shall not rehire those who, in the company's opinion are guilty," was the adamant industry stand.

The "violence" bludgeon is of course one-way. Company supervisors and stooges whom the union holds guilty of violence are on the job nevertheless. In this, as in so many cases, it matters whose ox is gored.

Then there is the interesting angle that many employees who were loudest in their threats of what they would "do to the company" and who maneuvered picket line situations into violence, soon after quietly went back to work. "Violence" was no bar to their reemployment.

Also interesting is the fact that many former employees discharged for theft and similar infractions of company rules, and thrown out as "nonemployable," are now back on the job.

Simple truth is that the Big Six are determined to be the accusers, prosecutors, judges, and juries in blacklisting union men for alleged violence. The companies are determined to punish the unionists for having the gall to strike. They want to guillotine the union leaders, the backbone of the strike. "Violence" is merely a peg.

14. DIVIDE AND CONQUER

Oil is produced in isolated fields strung out over hundreds of square miles. It is piped in lines from distant points to the refinery areas in the Los Angeles and San Francisco Bay areas.

Under the concentrated pressure and terror of Big Six, some of the isolated union groups have gone back to work.

So now Big Six is refusing to negotiate for production and pipe-line groups represented in present agreements. They are demanding that the strong refinery groups sacrifice their brothers in the fields and on the pipe lines, as a condition of bargaining.

In some fields the Big Six have wheeled in Taft-Hartley decertification election proceedings.

The stage was well set for this maneuver. Taft-Hartley's NLRB had ruled that scabs had the right to vote. Scabs had been secured in large numbers in these instances. Particularly notable were the promises by companies of "super-seniority" for scabs. "Come to work," said the foreman, "and you'll have seniority over all the men on strike." There was even seniority among scabs. A man with a year's service with the company going back to work on Monday had seniority over the 30-year man who went back on Tuesday.

With many people misled by such company propaganda—and the Labor Board giving scabs a better chance to vote than strikers—decertification proceedings had a running start over union organizers.

ON GUARD

Well, brothers, that's the picture of labor relations with the "new look" under Taft-Hartley and Dewey, as drawn on the west coast against a union with as fine and clean a record of achievement as any American union can point to. This is the picture of the hatchet job done on a union which has complied with all the hateful provisions of Taft-Hartley. This is what is happening to a union that gave all-out cooperation to our Government during the war against the Nazis and the Japanese, the union which was responsible for the proud war record that whatever else our boys lacked, they never lacked the oil and gas to force the war to the heart of the enemy.

It happened to the Oil Workers International Union. Unless the record is studied carefully and labor-hating employers' California plan of union-busting is met successfully, it will be the record of what can happen to your union.

STATEMENT OF WOMEN'S GUILD OF THE EVANGELICAL AND REFORMED CHURCH, OF CLEVELAND, OHIO

ECONOMIC JUSTICE—KEYSTONE OF DEMOCRACY

Dr. Mark Dawber of the Home Missions Council says: "We are beginning to realize the major trouble in the world is an unchristian economy." Dr. Elmer Arndt of Eden Seminary says: "It is either bread or freedom to many people, if you say it must be either communism or capitalism." The World Council of Churches' report says, "There is no Christian economic system, and the criticisms of communism and capitalism cannot be explained away." Have you noticed how education, housing, and health are tied up with "what is good for business?"

The lines between labor and big business are tightly drawn over the Taft-Hartley bill. The following information will assist us in evaluating coming legislation in economics. The Wagner Act of 1935 was a bill demanded by the people against abuses of big business. It resulted in—1. An increase in the membership of labor unions from three to fifteen millions. 2. Increased wages and better conditions of employment with vacations, sick leave, and dismissal pay allowed. 3. A willingness of labor to cooperate with Government in wartime. 4. Protective measures. These include (a) The closed shop which protected the standards of union labor as well as preventing men from being employed who would not join the union and share in the expenses of maintaining union standards. (The prejudice against the closed shop is against its abuses. It has its good points). (b) The right to have union rules respected by Government and big business, (c) Arbitration to settle differences, (d) Collective bargaining by their own representatives.

The Taft-Hartley bill was supposed to correct the abuses of big labor unions. It is resented by labor because it was passed hastily with hearings based on opinions and not on the facts. The bill does not distinguish between abuses and fundamental rights, and its vague wording has been taken advantage of by irresponsible employers. The result has been increased political activity by the unions, a fact which certainly influenced the November elections. It contributed to the failure to be elected again of many of the 120 Congressmen who voted for the Taft-Hartley law. The Minimum Wage Law needs to be revised. There are 22,400,000 workers in agriculture, forestry, fisheries, Government jobs, retail trade, and other services who are not even covered by this 40 cents an hour law. 21,300,000 receive the minimum. Comparing the 1938 national income when the 40 cents an hour law was passed and the 1948 income, we see why the minimum wage must be raised. In 1938 it was $68,000,000,000, but in 1948 it was $215,000,000,000. The farmer's income has increased five fold and the industrial workers' wage has doubled. To do justly, it is necessary, that the Federal Government pass a law to increase the wage of as many as possible to at least 75 cents an hour. Can we afford this as a nation? Note this: Wages in 1939 took 61 percent of the Nation's income—but in 1948 took only 59 percent or a decrease of 2 percent. Profits were 10 percent in 1939 and in 1948, 15.5 percent, or an increase of 5½ percent. Inflation has affected industry but no worse than it has wage earners. The President's Economic Council report of 1948 says, "Prices should be lowered or wages increased, profits should be shared with employees, and taxes should be lowered on the low incomes and made higher on upper incomes. It states in 1939, individuals paid 25 percent of the Federal income tax and corporations 23 percent but in 1948, individuals paid 50 percent and corporations only 21 percent."

Justice needs to become the center of our democracy. As long as 55 percent of wage earners are employed by 1¼ percent of corporations there must be laws to protect these workers. When prices are high some adjustment must be made to take care of the 47 percent of the people in the lower-income groups. Laws are needed to protect children. There is a fine pamphlet, The Force in Enforcement available from the Children's Division of the Department of Labor in Washington, D. C. This indicates how only public opinion and constant watchfulness on the part of people can prevent child exploitation. Most people will be surprised to find what happens in their own communities.

There is a final group of people who need the help of Christian people if they are to be treated justly in employment. That is the minority group, who because of race, religion, or birth are prevented from good employment. A fair employment practices commission is needed to guarantee that everyone in the United States who is trained shall have an equal chance, (1) to get a job for which he is qualified, (2) to keep the job, if he is competent, and, (3) to grow and advance on the job as he really merits.

The measuring stick for judging economic problems asks: What are the facts? Who is right? Why are there conflicts? What is Christian? Sir Josiah Strong, English economist, has checked the Scriptures and found 40 percent of Jesus' teachings relate to money and material possessions. Let us be thoughtful Christian citizens in our criticism of economic facts.

Democracy in Trade-Unions

A SURVEY, WITH A PROGRAM OF ACTION

[Condensed from a larger pamphlet of the same title]

(Issued by American Civil Liberties Union, 170 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y., November 1944)

For many years the American Civil Liberties Union, in the course of protecting civil rights, has been confronted with appeals from trade-union members to test in the courts suspensions or expulsions from unions for criticism of union officials or the denial of democratic rights. To these complainants the exercise of their rights as members of unions was even more important than their rights as citizens, for it involved their very livelihood.

The Union believes that the increasing responsibilities placed on trade-unions by governmental protection of their democratic rights demand that they in turn accept the responsibility for the democratic conduct of their own affairs.

This development of the public responsibilities of trade unions, together with continuing complaints of autocratic practices which members sought to bring to the courts with the aid of the union, prompted in 1941 the creation of a committee on trade-union democracy. The purpose of the committee was to study trade-union practices to to suggest remedies for undemocratic procedures which denied civil rights to trade-union members.

Such action as this study suggests is based first on the assumption that trade unions in their own interest will study their own processes, analyze their public relations, and institute changes to square with democratic practice.

American trade-unions are growing more democratic, but this growth is not uniform. There are unfortunate and glaring exceptions. In many unions democratic growth is by no means compatible with their strength and power. Democratic standards, while general, are not sufficiently strong to furnish the friends of trade-unions with assurances regarding the future. If trade-unions are to offset the attacks of their enemies, it becomes imperative that they should remove these abuses. The entire program of the enemies of labor would be weakened, and we believe defeated, if racketeering, autocratic leadership, excessive initiation fees, racial and other discriminations could be quickly eliminated. The vast majority of our citizens are prepared, we believe, to accept and support strong, responsible, honest unions, democratically organized and operated.

We present these recommendations in the belief that though many of them may arouse criticism and opposition, on the whole they constitute a contribution to exploration and action at one of the most urgent points in developing democracy in the United States.

ADMISSION TO UNIONS

More than 13,000,000 jobs in the United States—over a third of those subject to unionization—are covered by collective-bargaining agreements. For more than half of these union membership is a condition of employment; few jobs are open to the nonunionist or the worker unwilling or unable to join a union. The number of industries in which unionism is firmly established has increased so greatly in the past decade that union membership is already a vital prerequisite for obtaining or holding a job.

Generally speaking, union membership is readily available. Applicants for membership must normally be approved by an examining committee of the local union, and are then voted upon by the members at a regular membership meeting. In some unions, the decision of the business agent is final and, though in a few unions respected candidates may appeal to the national executive board, this privilege is rarely exercised.

Restrictions on membership.—There are two significant restrictions on union membership. There are unions which discriminate against applicants because of their race, religion, political affiliation, national origin, sex, or other personal characteristics; and there are unions called closed unions which restrict the number of their members either by outright exclusion of all or most applicants, or by admitting them on a limited membership basis.

Negroes.—Prior to the New Deal few Negro workers were members of trade-unions, but the past decade has witnessed a marked improvement in the Negro's position in the labor movement, and to some extent discrimination on account of race has been reduced in some sectors where it has long flourished. The CIO has made the fight against discrimination a major plank in its program but the policies and practices of some of its locals reflect still the prejudices of some of the rank-and-file members. The A. F. of L. is on record against discrimination, but many of its constituent autonomous unions—particularly the old-line craft organizations—practice it.

METHODS OF DISCRIMINATION

Methods of discrimination vary. Some unions exclude Negroes by constitutional provision or by ritual. Some unions have no rule barring Negroes from membership, but locals exclude them by tacit consent; others confine Negroes to Jim Crow "auxiliaries" where they pay dues but are denied a voice in union affairs and an opportunity for advancement in the trade. Under wartime pressure a few unions have admitted Negroes but the membership ban still remains in the unions' ritual and may be resurrected after the war.

Aliens.—The American labor movement, since the middle of the nineteenth century, has opposed the immigration of foreign-born workers and many of the A. F. of L. unions have barred aliens from membership. In a large measure this opposition has stemmed from the fear of an oversupply of workers on the labor market but also because of the possibility of the use of the immigrant as a strikebreaker. Some national unions require full citizenship or eligibility to full citizenship for membership; others accept first papers; and still others charge aliens higher initiation fees, often prohibitive.

Women.—A number of trade-unions have long excluded women from membership, but during the war many of these unions have removed this constitutional barrier. While in 1924 only about 250,000 women were union members, the number rose to around 3,500,000 in 1942. While this was largely due to the need for women in the war industries, actually the break-down of union opposition to women members antedated the war, when in the early period of the New Deal, the organization of the mass production industries revealed that women could be organized successfully on a large scale. However, more than 25 unions still exclude women, these chiefly in the railroad industry and in the skilled crafts where women are rarely employed.

Political beliefs.—In addition to Negroes, women, and aliens, tarde-unions occasionally exclude applicants on other grounds. Religious discrimination exists in some unions, but is usually the result of individual prejudice and only rarely is trade-union policy. A few unions keep workers out for their political affiliation or for belonging to allegedly nonunion organizations, but these restrictions are seldom put into effect. Few unions tolerate dual unionism or accept members who belong to rival labor organizations.

The civil liberties problem.—Admittance to union membership is a civil liberties problem where earning a living depends on union membership, and where union organization is, to a large extent, under Government protection and encouragement. Under these circumstances, union policies and practices restricting membership are a deprivation of civil liberties except as they are designed to preserve the basic structure and existence of the union. Rejection of applicants on grounds of race, creed, color, sex, citizenship, religion, or political beliefs raises clear issues of civil liberties.

Fight against discrimination.—Trade-union discrimination against Negroes has been aggressively fought both within the labor movement and from the outside; many progressive labor leaders, notably A. Philip Randolph, president of the Sleeping Car Porters Union, have raised the issue both within their own unions and within the labor movement in general. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the National Urban League and other interracial organizations have protested with increasing vigor, with the result that in recent years at least four national unions have removed discriminatory clauses from their constitutions. The war and the need for manpower has also further reduced discrimination. Another more important factor against discrimination has been the Committee on Fair Employment Practice originally formed as an independent agency by order of the President in June 1941. Subsequently it was placed under the War Manpower Commission, but after undergoing severe criticism for failing to act in the railroad industry, it was reorganized as an independent agency with a new personnel. The Committee's chief service has been in publicizing discriminatory practices. It has held hearings in many cities, revealing evidence on discrimination by employers and unions. The National War Labor Board has also exercised a powerful influence against discrimination, having established in several notable decisions, the doctrine of equal pay for equal work regardless of sex or race.

Five States have passed laws designed to eliminate union discrimination because of race, creed, or color. The Pennsylvania and Wisconsin Labor Relations Acts invalidate closed-shop contracts where unions practice discrimination, but both statutes are difficult to enforce. Appeal to the courts on the whole has proven useless because the courts have held that union membership is a privilege not a right.

The closed union.—In addition to unions which discriminate against applicants on grounds of race, creed, color, sex, national origin, or political beliefs, there are unions which limit the number of full-fledged members or make it difficult for outsiders to join or gain full membership by means of high initiation fees, by the job permit system, or by outright, refusal to accept new members. These closed unions constitute a small sector of the labor movement, and their growth has been limited not only by the opposition of the national unions which prefer to gain strength through enlarged membership and more dues, but by the need of controlling the job market. Closed unions cannot survive unless they fully control a job market; without such control, union employers can be destroyed by the competition of unorganized plants. To control the job market in a single plant or in a locality a union requires the closed shop, to insure that all employees are union members, and in addition requires control of hiring.

Closed unions exist for many reasons. Sometimes membership rolls are closed when there are more men than jobs due to economic depression, technological change, or a declining demand for an industry's product. The closed union also exists in industries where the demand for labor fluctuates violently from day to day, as among longshoremen, and in seasonal industries, such as the garment trades. There are also unions which restrict their size in order to increase membership benefits to each card holder, and frequently we find the closed union where racketeers or local labor bosses desire to exploit a monopoly labor situation to their own financial and social benefit.

How unions are closed.—The simplest and most common method of restricting membership is to close the union rolls and refuse cards to new applicants. In skilled crafts admittance to the union is regulated by strict aptitude tests and into the trade by entrance regulations. Often membership is restricted, by the constitution or by tacit agreement, to sons or relatives of the members. Applicants are also kept out by excessive initiation fees (though this is not necessarily proof that a union is closed), and by the issuance of permit or privilege cards to nonmembers at a weekly fee of a small amount, thus enabling the union to assure as much steady work as possible to its regular members.

The civil liberties issues.—Where the reason for the closed union is to enrich the union treasury, to maintain minority control, to benefit a few at the expense of the many, to promote racketeering or to deprive already employed workers of their jobs, a clear civil liberties issue is involved. Where the closed union is operating on a closed shop basis (few can function otherwise) a civil liberties problem is posed in the denial of the worker of the right to work. However, it must be recognized that, under peace-time conditions, unions may actually jeopardize their existence and the livelihood of their members by admitting all jobless applicants regardless of the conditions of the job market.

Court decisions.—So far the courts have played a negligible role in the closed-union question. As in other cases of discrimination, the courts have ruled that until a worker is admitted to union membership, no right exists which the court can protect and enforce, and further that membership in a union is not a right but a privilege.

UNION MEMBERSHIP

Problems involving civil rights become very acute at those points where the trade-union seeks to discipline individual members, officers, minority groups, or local affiliates. Disciplinary actions vary all the way from a mere threat to impose a fine to permanent expulsion; they may apply to a single worker or to a large local group. Some people hold that unions are private and not public bodies and should be free to impose whatever penalties seem fit on members violating its rules and regulations. Others take the position that unions are not private or social organizations and the civil rights to which American citizens are entitled by law such as free speech, and the right to fair trial lose all meaning unless extended to the workers rights within his union.

How far can unions go in protecting the civil rights of members in disciplinary cases without impairing the essential strength of the organization? Clearly a union must retain sufficient disciplinary powers to prevent minority groups within a union from undermining the union's effectiveness. A distinction must be drawn between the civil rights of individual members and their personal interests. Members should not be penalized or expelled for activities involving their basic democratic rights, i. e. the right to criticize union officials; the right to inform fellow members of their opposition; the right to organize groups within the union to oppose the administration; and the right to voice public protests outside the union wherever channels for protesting within the union are closed.

But members should be disciplined and, if necesary, expelled for action detrimental to the union, such as, refusal to pay dues; receiving pay as an agent of an employer or of some rival labor group; violating working or wage rules of the union contract with the employer; violating duly authorized orders normally given in connection with strikes or other union activities.

The courts on union discipline.—In expulsion cases the courts have applied three general tests to determine the legality or illegality of trade-union proceedings; whether the trial conformed to union rules; whether it was conducted fairly, impartially, and in good faith; whether the rules and regulations of the union meet the requirements of natural justice, which includes notice in writing of the charges in advance of the trial; fair hearing and the right to appeal to a higher tribunal within the union; separation between the trial and the prosecuting body of the union; and absence of hostility against the accused on the part of trial board members.

The courts have ruled in favor of union members expelled for defamatory statements in a letter criticizing local union officials; criticism of officials in the press; violation of a union law "forbidding members to carry on union business outside of meeting or executive board rooms"; participation in an unauthorized strike; failure to pay insurance policy premium and continuing work during a strike. They have ruled against union members expelled for accepting less than the union wage; failure to pay a per capita tax; failure to pay back dues; participating in or giving aid to a rival union; acting in the interests of the employer or contrary to the interests of the union.

Disciplinary measures.—Union constitutions generally provide that charges against members shall be heard first by the local executive board or a special trial committee. Their findings are then passed upon by the local membership. If appealed, the case goes to the executive board of the district organization, from there to the general executive board and finally to the national convention. In a few instances, the referendum is an alternative court of last appeal. In several unions there is no appeal from the executive board; its decision is final.

Analogous to actions against individual members are actions involving the suspension, reorganization, or expulsion of local unions. In some unions, authority to take such action is vested in the national president; in other the power is in the hands of the general executive board. In some instances both may act.

Considerable evidence exists to demonstrate that some union officials abuse their disciplinary powers, and experience indicates that the offended member has very slight chance of redress by resorting to the courts. As is well-known, the courts hesitate to take action unless property interests are involved and unless all remedies within the union have been exhausted. Besides, legal action is far too expensive in time and money for the average union worker.

UNION ZONES OF AUTHORITY

The internal government of unions is organized on three levels: national, district, and local. Control over broad questions of policy such as constitutional changes, organizing campaigns and strikes is usually vested in the national organization. The local administration usually controls dues collection, initial dealings over grievances and participation in city politics. Least in importance are district organizations. Their role in framing contracts and handling strikes is overshadowed by the national or local bodies. Locals influence national and district policies chiefly through the delegates they elect to conventions. On the other hand, the national administartion usually has important controls over the activities of locals.

Within national, district, and local bodies authority is divided between the executive and the electorate. The former includes all elected officials and their appointees; the latter, the union members and their delegates.

Civil liberties issues.—Problems of democratic control arise in all three spheres of administration. In each the basic question is whether the members or their representatives have a genuine opportunity to participate in framing policy, and whether they actually utilize available instruments of control.

For example, granted the right to full, detailed reports on finance and important actions of the executive officers and board, there is always the possibility that members may not carefully read these reports. Granted the freedom to express rival views at meetings, on convention floors and in union publications, there is always the possibility that the members may not take advantage of the right of criticism. Granted an opportunity to approve or disapprove policy-making decisions and elect officers by secret ballot with the right of recall or impeachment and the freedom to alter the union constitution by initiative or referendum, there is always the possibility that the members will not weigh the merits of a proposed policy, or exercise the right to vote. There is also the possibility that leaders will play off one group against another, or use mass propaganda techniques to further personal interests.

Limits to individual freedom.—The civil rights of union members are conditioned by certain necessary limitations upon individual acton. While the right to criticize and the right to appeal are basic, no minority group can be allowed to block officials in their regular administrative duties or in carrying out duly authorized policies. Even in formulating general policies, considerable latitude must be granted to national executive officers if the union is to function properly. In most union activities, such as strikes, boycotts, and wage negotiations, there are obvious advaages to centralized control. All that can be reasonably required is that the members have the genuine opportunity to pass on general policies before these are adopted, that they be kept fully informed of their officers' activities and that they be free to approve or disapprove of their conduct.

National authority.—The supreme authority in most unions is the national convention. The national convention has the sole power to pass laws and determine policy regulating the union's general conduct. The national officers and executive board are required to present reports on their work to the convention and their decisions are subject to the convention's approval. Between conventions, all executive and judicial powers are vested in the national executive board. In the interim, between meetings of the national executive board, the union's affairs are usually directed by the national president.

Basic union law is essentially democratic but there are many opportunities for dictatorial control, due chiefly to the wide powers vested in national presidents and executive boards, and the manner in which national conventions are organized and conducted. In most unions, the president appoints all committees at national conventions. The credentials committee is of crucial importance for no delegate can be seated without its approval. In this way it may exercise tremendous control over the make-up of the convention and the outcome of the battle for control.

The national convention.—An important means of checking arbitrary action by national officers is afforded at conventions. Here national officers must win from the members' representatives endorsement for past policies and approval of proposed actions. Here, too, opposition groups have the opportunity to criticize the official family and to press for important changes in policy.

The most serious limitation to the effectiveness of conventions is their size. In fact most conventions are so large that active participation by the average delegate in floor discussions is almost impossible, and serious criticism of the administration is rare at the conventions of most long-established unions.

How often conventions meet.—The civil rights of union members are violated when conventions are not called for long periods of time. But only a handful of unions have been guilty on this score. Most unions, in fact, have taken positive action to make sure conventions will be called at regular intervals.

If some urgent question arises between conventions, special meetings may be called in most unions. This is done either by the executive board, or by referendum vote initiated by local unions, and in a few cases solely by vote of the membership.

HOW UNION POLICIES ARE MADE

Basic to the problem of trade-union democracy is the method by which decisions on policy are reached—whether members have a genuine opportunity to take part in the formulation of major decisions; whether opposition groups have a real opportunity to present their case; whether officers are strictly accountable for their work in carrying out policy decisions and are required to submit full reports to the membership; and whether the chief executive officers are tested by open and honest elections at regular intervals.

Generally, qualifications for holding union office are union membership from 6 months to 5 years, an employment record in the trade, and American citizenship or declaration of intention.

Few unions have qualifications for office which are definitely discriminatory. Out of 38 constitutions examined, only one contained a discriminatory clause. In the auto workers' union no candidate for office may belong to any organization declared illegal in the United States through constitutional procedure.

Where elections are held at conventions, delegates are usually free to nominate from the floor. Where elections are held by referendum vote, nominations are usually mailed into the national office, and a certain number of supporting members are required for each nominee.

The right to nominate rival candidates thus exists in unions, but delegates and members do not always avail themselves of this right. In most national unions, administration candidates are usually unopposed.

Reports to members.—Another test of trade-union democracy is the report of officers to the membership. Unions fulfill one of their most important obligations to their members when they require full and complete accounting of funds, detailed reports of the activities of organizers, business agents, regional, district, and national officers. This basic obligation is violated where reporting is incomplete, misleading or sporadic. In most unions the president, secretary-treasurer, and other principal officers submit regular reports to the national convention and between conventions to the executive board. Action on reports by national officers is usually perfunctory. Furthermore, many unions take no steps to insure that officers' reports shall be accurate, detailed, and comprehensible.

RECOMMENDATIONS

The general principles affecting the civil rights of parties to the industrial conflict form the background on which the rights of trade-union members are cast. The democratic principles which apply to these rights are part of the entire structure of the relationship between the employer and workers, and between both of these and the public—principles which are now fairly clearly established by law and court decisions.

The American Civil Liberties Union has formulated these democratic principles in industrial conflict as covering the right of workers to strike, unqualified and unrestricted in any way; to organize and select representatives for collective bargaining free from coercion by employers and protected by State and Federal law; the right to picket peacefully at any time and at any place for any purpose, subject only to control of traffic, order and fraudulent signs; the right of qualified workers to union membership without discrimination and without limitation through excessive fees and dues and by means of work permits; freedom of unions from prosecution under antitrust laws for ordinary union activities, from compulsory incorporation and compulsory arbitration, from restrictions to contribute to campaign funds authorized by the membership.

Also democratic principles in industrial conflict should cover the right of nonunion workers, as distinguished from strikebreakers, to access to plants on strike; the right of employers to freedom of speech concerning unions where the utterances do not constitute coercion against their employees.

The democratic principles briefly outlined above represent on the whole the dominant tendencies in public policy laid down by the courts, the Federal Government and the principal industrial States. They are continually under attack, and legislation to qualify them is constantly before Congress or the State legislatures. However, the protections which have been afforded to labor unions are sufficiently established to justify a demand upon unions to conform in their internal affairs to these democratic principles.

A Bill of Rights for union members.—As a guide to that process, the American Civil Liberties Union presents the following as a basic bill of rights for trade-union members, couched in terms of the rights of industrial workers. We believe that every possible pressure should be exerted from within and without the labor movement to induce trade-unions to measure up to such standards.

(1) Membership in a trade-union appropriate to his trade or calling and to his place of residence should not be denied (a) by discrimination based upon race, creed, color, sex, national origin, or political affiliation, nor (b) by the imposition of restrictve or excessive initation fees, nor (c) by any limitations on membership other than incompetence in his trade or calling, bad moral character or a record of antiunion activity.

(2) Democratic participation of a member in the conduct of the union to which he belongs. This requires democratic organization of the union, inclusive of local, district, State, national and internatonal units. Among the principles to be safeguarded in democratic organization of trade-unions are (a) provisions for regular meetings or conventions held at reasonable intervals, (b) fair elections, (c) free discussion within the union of all union problems, and (d) control of dues, assessments, and financial matters by the membership, together with clear and authentic periodic reports to members on union finances.

(3) Protection within his union against arbitrary proceedings of a disciplinary character, to be guaranteed by constitutional provisions for fair hearings before persons other than those bringing charges, and with appeal to a separate and independent body.

(4) Fair and equal treatment with respect to job placement in all cases where the union exercises control over employment.

Legislation.—Legislative control affecting the inner affairs of unions is objectionable because it weakens the autonomy and independence of unions, and if accomplished by State enactments, puts an intolerable burden on national unions by requiring conformity of 48 separate and different standards. In our view, the only legal measures at present justified by the denial of democratic rights are:

(a) Punishing the exclusion from membership of any qualified persons on account of race, religion, sex, national origin, or political affiliation.

(b) Provision for hearing by an administrative agency on suspensions or expulsions, with review by an appellate court.

(c) Similar review of the application of democratic rights under union constitutions.

These proposals do not impose State regulation of any sort on a union's internal affairs. They afford relief from unfair discrimination for those desiring to gain admission; they protect the rights of union members under their own constitutions, affording a more orderly and expert review than is now provided by the uncertain resort to the courts.

Laws already adopted by five States (New York, Pennsylvania, Nebraska, Wisconsin, and Kansas) provide in principle that unions may not exclude applicants from membership on the ground of race or religion. In Pennsylvania the law was extended in 1943 to cover political affiliation. The New York law—a criminal statute, unlike the others—is an excellent statement of the principle, though it does not cover discrimination based on sex, national origin or political affiliation.

We recommend the enactment of legislation by the States (and in the Federal jurisdiction, by Congress) to provide: That when members have exhausted the machinery set up within the union for contesting suspensions and expulsions, and for adjusting such complaints, they should have the right to a hearing by a commission set up as a permanent division of the State labor department, or selected for specific hearings from a panel, with adequate representation of labor on such a commission. Appeal from the decision of the commission should be to an appellate court.

The advantage of a quasi-judicial commission acting as an intermediary agency between the union member and his union officials before resort is taken to the courts has been made clear in past experience in labor relations. This experience demonstrates that such commissions soon become expert in relation to the problems involved and make speedier and fairer dispositions of such controversies than do the regular courts.

The means of achievement.—It is clear that no reforms in union constitutions, rules and regulations will in themselves achieve trade union democracy and insure against undemocratic practices. No rules or regulations will stop packing meetings with the followers of a group determined to achieve power; they will not stop strong-arm methods of gangsterism; they will not prevent a minority from achieving control by outsitting the majority at interminable meetings, nor prevent a determined minority from getting together in a caucus and voting en bloc after dividing its opponents. In unions, as in other associations, constant vigilance by a sufficient number of members is required to insure democratic practice, with a constant struggle against every encroachment upon it.

Court action.—Appeal to the courts is justified on the part of union members who complain that their rights under the union constitution have been violated. While courts are on the whole reluctant to intervene in the affairs of voluntary associations, they have been the chief governmental agency in correcting such glaring abuses as failure to hold elections, to conduct fair elections, to account for the use of union funds, to accord members fair trials on charges resulting in suspension or expulsion, and to overcome the arbitrary suspension of locals by international officials. Resort to the courts in such matters requires no further legislation.

Relief in the courts for members unfairly tried on charges is both difficult and uncertain. A more definite system is desirable so that union members will not have to risk the considerable expense, the uncertainty of the court's taking jurisdiction, the unfavorable criticism that often attaches to court action by union members, and the more doubtful recovery of wages for time lost, if reinstated. Recognition of the public interest in protecting union members against unfair expulsion should be achieved by providing an appeal to a special agency of the State or of the Federal Government for members of unions engaged in interstate activity.

CONCLUSION

It may seem that the counsels for action contained in these recommendations appear contradictory. We urge certain action by the rank and file for increased power over their leadership. We urge the leadership to encourage rank and file democracy. We urge review of the denial of democratic rights by court action and by legislation.

But we see no essential contradiction in encouraging all these democratic advances at every point. It requires a highly complicated structure to insure democratic practices. We are clear that public intervention to that end should be held to the minimum guaranties of no reasonable discrimination in admission and relief for trade union members denied rights under their own constitutions or accepted democratic practice.

It will be maintained by many trade unionists that their internal affairs are of no concern to "outsiders." That argument has been destroyed long since by the union's acceptance of public protection in organizing and bargaining collectively and in the public regulation of industrial conflict.

We present these recommendations in the belief that on the whole they constitute a contribution to exploration and action at one of the most urgent points in developing industrial democracy in the United States.

STATEMENT BY GEORGE BALDANZI, EXECUTIVE VICE PRESIDENT, TEXTILE WORKERS UNION OF AMERICA, CIO

My name is George Baldanzi; I am the executive vice president of the Textile Workers Union, CIO, in whose behalf I am appearing here today. The Textile Workers Union of America is the major labor organization in the textile industry. The industry, which employs about 1,100,000 workers, 450,000 of whom are covered by TWUA agreements, is divided into various branches, and the plants vary in size anywhere from 25 to 10,000 workers each. The industry is concentrated in New England, in the mid-Atlantic States, and throughout the South in small towns or mill villages where the mill dominates the lives of all who work in it and live within its shadow. If it is a mill village, the textile mill employer owns the house the worker and his family live in; the school his children go to; the store at which his wife shops. In addition to this direct ownership, the mill owner usually dominates the local church, press, and radio.

It is in such a setting that the full impact of the Taft-Hartley Act must be considered, for it is here that its effect has been most pernicious.

Even before enactment of Taft-Hartley, a noticeable change occurred in the climate of labor-management relations. In the wake of the fury that had been whipped up against unions, antilabor employers and other antilabor elements were emboldened to encourage open attacks against unions, and even to engage in such activities themselves.

While the Taft-Hartley Act was still in the discussion stage, we said that its real objective, regardless of what its sponsors said, was the weakening, even the destruction, of the American labor movement. We said that if the Taft-Hartley bill became law, new organization would be seriously affected, and established labor-management relations would be thrown into confusion.

Since June 1947 opportunities for the organization of unorganized textile plants have decreased noticeably. In the 18 months that preceded the act, the Textile Workers Union of America participated in 337 elections for 127,419 workers. Of these, we won 172 elections for 63,034 workers and lost 165 elections in plants employing 64,385 workers. But since June 1947 we have participated in only 205 elections covering 65,444 workers. Of these, we have won 122 elections covering 24,046 workers, and we have lost elections in 83 textile plants employing 41,398 workers.

An atmosphere of open and active hostility, accompanied by intimidation, coercion, and violence, strongly reminiscent of the pre-Wagner Act era, has reestablished itself. The following situation is typical of our experience generally throughout the South.

At the Frank Ix plant in Charlottesville, Va., the union organizer was constantly followed by the personnel manager, the plant superintendent, and groups of foremen, when he visited workers' homes. The company even tried to rent a room overlooking his residence, in order to keep watch on him 24 hours a day. Workers found talking to the union organizer were harassed in the plant; one worker was beaten for wearing a union button; another worker was followed to the rest room to prevent him from talking about the union. The company sent stool pigeons to union meetings and boasted openly of its gestapo's efficiency. Foremen casually informed prounion workers that one of the watchmen was a "dead shot with the revolver." The company's bulletin board brazenly carried antiracial and antireligious propaganda. Workers who had won company awards for efficiency were accused of doing bad work when suspected of union sympathy; lay-offs and outright discharges often followed. Veterans were told they weren't loyal if they joined the CIO.

An elderly worker who had been called to task told a foreman: "I had three sons who went over to Germany to fight for my right to think as I please. One of my boys died over there." The foreman replied: "It would have been better if they had all died there than to have come back and joined the CIO."

For the first time in the 10-year history of our organization, we have lost elections in mills where a majority of the workers involved had previously signed up with the union.

A majority of the workers at the Cleveland Mill & Power Co., in Lawndale, N. C., had signed TWUA cards, but the union suffered a stunning defeat in a labor board election. Union representatives were unable to obtain a meeting hall and had to hold all meetings in a nearby baseball park. Despite this difficulty, these meetings, which were held weekly, were well attended, interest in the union was high, and good committees functioned in the plant.

Up until 3 days before the election, the situation looked good for the union. Then each worker received a letter from the company aimed at stirring up racial prejudice against the union's representatives, and urged every worker to vote against the union. The company told merchants in the town that if the union came in the mill would probably shut down. Thus armed, these merchants exerted effective pressure on the workers. This they could legally do under the change introduced by the Taft-Hartley Act, because, although they were clearly acting in the interest of the employer, they were not his agents, and were therefore immune. The union's representative was advised to leave town by an antiunion delegation. In this atmosphere of coercion and intimidation, the union lost the election.

Similarly, at the Dacotah Cotton Mills, in Lexington, N. C., the union had signed up a majority of the workers— in this case, 65 percent. From November 16, 1948, the day the union petitioned for an election, until January 20, 1949, when the election was held, the company, through its supervisory employees, carried on a systematic campaign of intimidation of union members. Two days before the election the owner of the plant sent each worker a letter similar in content and tone to the letter sent to the workers at the Cleveland Mill & Power Co. The day before the election the owner shut down the mill and harangued the workers for an hour on company time. In this atmosphere of pressure and intimidation, the union lost the election 210 to 62.

The Taft-Hartley Act has stimulated open, violent resistance to peaceful, legal union activities. In many mills, both North and South, where elections had been won, many employers greeted passage of the act by redoubling their fight against the union.

Let me present a few illustrative examples, the first of them involving a union other than our own.

On April 18, 1947, the International Woodworkers of American won an election at the Greene Bros. Lumber Co. in Elizabethtown, N. C., by a vote of 171 to 87. Between that date and July 16 a total of 11 conferences were held between the union and the company. In all that time, the company's notoriously anti-union attorney refused to grant a single concession and did nothing but go through the motions of meeting with the union representatives. Finally, their patience exhausted, the workers voted to strike, and established a picket line at the plant on July 17.

The company thereupon brought in strikebreakers from neighboring towns in company-owned trucks. Once, when the strikers stopped one of these trucks and its driver refused to go through the line, the sheriff drove it on to the mill. Numerous attempts were made by company officials and antiunion merchants to run pickets down with their cars. The sheriff accompanied the plant superintendent to workers' homes to frighten them into returning to work. Pickets were arrested in wholesale lots, charged with "suspicion" and held incommunicado in jail for 72 hours. There were 115 such arrests during the strike. The company circulated a decertification petition among the strikebreakers in the plant, and only the company's sudden capitulation on December 9, 1948 prevented the decertification election.

In our own union, the Gurney Manufacturing Co., in Prattville, Ala., refused to negotiate after the Textile Workers Union of America had won an election by a 90-percent margin. The company's unyielding refusal to bargain precipitated a bitter strike. The company imported strikebreakers from Mississippi. Mass eviction proceedings were started against strikers occupying company-owned homes, and armed thugs were hired to force the workers back into the plant. The home of a group of strikebreakers was dynamited in an attempt to frame the union.

After 6 months, the strike was ended and the strikers returned to work without a settlement. A contract was negotiated only after the labor board finally ordered the company to reinstate all strikers, to restore their homes to strikers who had been evicted, and to bargain with the union. But it took 18 months, and a bitter strike, to conclude an agreement.

Another effect of the Taft-Hartley Act has been the dissipation of existing collective bargaining relationships and the destruction of the union. The act has created a climate in which recalcitrant employers have been able to precipitate strikes. To create such situations, employers have adopted a number of phony bargaining techniques, including firing of members of union negotiating committees, stalling negotiations until workers lose heart, making impossible counterproposals or no proposals whatsoever, and appointing management negotiators who have no power to agree to terms. The attitude of these mills was cogently summed up by the United States Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, in its decision against the Athens (Ga.) Manufacturing Co., in which the court said: "We are of the opinion that the evidence well supports the board's findings that the respondent was giving the union a run-around while purporting to meet with the union for the purpose of collective bargaining."

Once a strike is precipitated, it follows a clear and dangerous pattern which has become almost universal in the South: A restraining order, based on stereotyped affidavit forms, is secured from the local court. These restraining orders either limit picketing to a very few persons or they restrict the area of picketing so greatly that the picketing itself becomes ineffectual.

In nearly every case, complaints filed by the employer allege violation of the Taft-Hartley Act. Contempt proceedings are quickly begun. Local police arrest strikers on every imaginable charge, from inciting to riot for calling a scab a scab, to conspiracy to commit murder.

Charges of vagrancy, disorderly conduct, breach of the peace, violation of loitering ordinances, are recklessly applied. Old ordinances designed to curb the Ku Klux Klan are perverted to indict strikers and their leaders on charges of conspiracy.

In those cases where striking workers live in a mill village, the employer institutes eviction proceedings to oust the strikers and their families from their homes.

Violence against the strikers is encouraged and abetted by the employer. Denunciations against the union and its representatives are thundered from local pulpits by company-inspired ministers. So-called citizens' committees are formed and vitriolic antiunion statements and advertisements appear in the local press. Newspapers and periodicals which viciously attack the union and its representatives make their appearance. Strikers and members of their families are threatened and assaulted.

The list of unions thus destroyed is tragically long:

A collective-bargaining relationship that had existed at the Gaffney Mills, in Gaffney, S. C., since 1938 was destroyed when management refused to bargain and precipitated a strike that lasted 30 months.

A union that had been in existence for more than 10 years was destroyed when workers at the Dallas Manufacturing Co. in Huntsville, Ala., went back to work after a bitter strike that lasted 8½ months.

A long-established collective bargaining relationship at the Amazon Cotton Mills, in Thomasville, N. C., was destroyed when management refused to bargain and precipitated a strike that ended in failure after 30 months.

In Rome, Ga., one textile employer, the Anchor Rome Duck Co., determined to destroy the union, refused to bargain on any issues or to settle any grievances. When negotiations for a new contract began, the company insisted that the union abandon top seniority, the voluntary check-off, and assume full laibility for strikes and other violations of the contract. During the course of these negotiations, plant officials started to secure pistol-carrying permits for themselves and "loyal" employees. Management's attitude precipitated a bitter strike which began in March of last year. Strikers were arrested on a variety of charges. Proceedings were begun to evict striking workers from company-owned houses. One unarmed striker was shot by a company overseer; another worker was shot by a scab as he sat in his home; a third worker, a woman, was stabbed.

After 9 months the workers went back to work.

Long before the strike began, the union had filed charges of refusal to bargain. Six months after the end of the strike, but 2 years after the union's original charges had been filed with the Labor Board, the company was ordered to reinstate the workers with back pay and to bargain with the union. But by then the strikers had been replaced by scabs, the union had been destroyed.

We went through a similar ordeal at another plant in the South: The Textile Workers Union of America had been the certified collective-bargaining agency for workers at the Hadley-Peoples Manufacturing Co. in Siler City, N. C., since 1945. In January 1948, the company informed the union that it wished to terminate its contract and the union thereupon asked for a meeting to discuss a new contract. The company refused to meet earlier than the middle of February, when a brief meeting was held at which the union presented its contract proposals. The company presented no proposals of its own and the company president declared the company wished to study the union's proposals before negotiating.

A number of other conferences were held, at one of which the union offered to extend the current agreement. This was rejected, in strong language, by the company president, who turned down flat the union's proposal, for inclusion in the new agreement, of a minimum wage guaranty for pieceworkers. The union then said it would be willing to submit the issue to its members; this was done and the union's position was unanimously approved.

Following this meeting of the workers, the union's representative tried to meet with the company president, but he was unavailable, and unyielding. At a later meeting, which had been arranged by the Conciliation Service, the union indicated its belief that a compromise could be worked out and again offered to extend the current agreement until a new one had been concluded. This was again rejected by spokesmen for the company, and they threatened that no contract would ever be signed if the workers struck.

In the face of the company's refusal to bargain; the company's threat to discharge members of the negotiating committee, and its statement that it would not sign an agreement, the workers had no choice but to strike.

Picketing was peaceful, but the day after the strike started the company president called on the Governor and insisted that the State highway patrol protect his plant and workers. The Governor replied that he would not do this unless asked to do so by the sheriff. Thereupon, at the president's insistence, the sheriff visited the strike scene, but he found no trouble of any kind. At a later meeting between the sheriff and the president of the Hadley Peoples Manufacturing Co., at the home of the mayor, it was agreed that one deputy sheriff and one policeman would be stationed at the plant gates; this arrangement continued throughout the strike.

A few days later, Mitchell Bell, a well-known antiunion agent, an incorporator of the Citizens' Association, which published antiunion propaganda, and an ex-prizefighter with a record of various convictions for bootlegging liquor, visited Hoyt Phillips, the president of the local union and a member of the union negotiating committee. Bell asked Phillips, in behalf of the president of Hadley Peoples, to go back to work as an individual, and informed Phillips that the president of the company had promised to "take care" of Phillips.

From the beginning of the strike, all strikers received by mail, each week, copies of the Greensboro, N. C., weekly paper, The Beacon, and its successor, The Sun. Both featured articles, advertisements, and editorials attacking the union as corrupt and communistic and its officers and representatives in the same manner. None of the workers subscribed to these papers. None received them before the strike and wanted them. All papers were addressed as names and addresses appeared on company pay-roll records, even duplicating wrong addresses or misspelling of names as on the pay-roll records. No charge or bill was ever presented for the papers, nor was any explanation offered. The only possible source of the mailing list was the Hadley Peoples Manufacturing Co.

After the strike was several months old, an attempt was made to end it, but the attempt failed: the company persisted in its refusal to sign a contract.

When the strike was 3 months old, the union tried to arrange a conference with the company in order to settle the strike and negotiate a contract. To this, the company replied that it was its opinion that the Textile Workers Union of America no longer represented a majority of the workers and that the company had under consideration the filing of a petition for an election among its employees.

In view of this stubbornly hostile attitude, the workers, faced with certain defeat, voted to end the strike and return to work.

When the strikers applied at the plant for reinstatement, each of them was interviewed by the plant superintendent, who took their names and addresses and information concerning the type of work with which each was familiar. He informed each worker that the company would let him know when to report for work as openings occurred or as a new shift was set up. In some cases workers were refused reinstatement. In others those who went back to work were fired shortly thereafter.

In one case, the mother of two strikers, herself an active union member, had been ill when the strike began in March, and therefore not on her job with the company. When the strike ended she applied for work. The company refused to restore her employment, and she applied for unemployment compensation. The company opposed her claim and the plant superintendent testified she was unable to work. She obtained a doctor's certificate to the effect that she was able to work and to perform the work for which she had applied. The plant superintendent, who has opposed her claim for unemployment compensation, then informed her that there was no job for her.

Workers were evicted from their company-owned homes, forced to quit their jobs and move elsewhere.

The company constantly coerced its employees. When several men who had worked as machine fixers before the strike went back to work, the company demoted them to lower-paying and less desirable jobs.

This picture offers a sharp contrast to an earlier strike at this same plant. This strike also lasted 3 months, but it ended in complete victory for the workers.

Before and during the life of the Eightieth Congress, unions were viewed with hostility and disfavor, and labor was made the scapegoat for many of our ills. But the November elections brought about a salutary change in the attitude toward unions, in the climate of labor-management relations. Let me give you just one example of this:

The Textile Workers Union of America has been the collective bargaining agency for the workers of the Celanese Corp. of America for many years. In August of last year the union negotiated a wage increase, amounting to about 15 cents an hour, for employees of the major rayon yarn producers in the United States. These included American Viscose Corp., Industrial Rayon Corp., and the Celanese Corp. of America. This action established a pattern for increases to be applied elsewhere.

Some time before this, the union had been negotiating with the Celanese Corp. at its plant in Rome, Ga. Local management in Rome refused to make any counterproposals to the union's offer and indicated that it would wait for the establishment of the pattern by the parent plant in Cumberland, Md. However, when application of the pattern was discussed with the Celanese management in Rome, the company reneged on its agreement to accept the pattern, offered a much lower increase, and, in effect, told the union it could "take it or leave it."

A strike vote was then taken among the workers in Rome, although the union offered to suspend strike action if the company would agree to arbitration of the dispute. The company refused to arbitrate, and the strike began on August 14, 1948.

During the strike the company repeatedly refused mediation, either in Rome, or in Washington, where both parties had been invited to meet with Mr. Cyrus S. Ching, director of the Federal Conciliation Service. The union had wired Mr. Ching its immediate acceptance of his invitation. This was the first time a company had ever refused a requested meeting with Director Ching. The company insisted that the matter be settled at the local level, although it refused to meet for such purpose in Rome.

The day Mr. Ching had asked the Celanese Corp. to meet with him and the president of our union in Washington, the company obtained an injunction from the State court.

Some days before, the company had published full-page advertisements and mailed notices to its workers announcing that the plant would reopen on October 26, 1948. Three days later, the company again refused a union offer to meet in order to settle the strike. It proceeded, however, to obtain a total of almost 300 citations for contempt of court. The company took full-page advertisements in the papers announcing "the plant is now operating," and "you are free to enter the plant without threat of interference," but only about 140 workers went back, and the plant did not operate.

Following a court hearing, agreement was reached on the interpretation of picketing activities, particularly with respect to clear and free access in front of the employers' main entrance gates. The union pickets observed this joint interpretation to the letter, but Celanese continued with the contempt citations.

Daily hearings were held on these contempt citations and two union officers were sentenced to 20 days in jail and fines of $200 each. Several days later, 11 local union officers and members were sentenced to varying jail terms and fines.

During the strike the 10-year-old son of one of the strikers was shot by a scab, who mistook the child for his father.

The plant still remained idle, and the company's advertisements about the "plant's reopening" were replaced with warnings that employees who failed to return to work—on the company's terms—would lose their life- and health-insurance policies.

Suddenly, on December 8, 1948, the company capitulated and agreed to meet with the union representatives in Rome. At that meeting, the Celanese Corp. granted its workers in Rome the same increase it had granted its workers in Cumberland.

Sponsors of the Taft-Hartley Act have repeatedly claimed that their intention was merely to correct so-called inequities or imbalances they believed had developed in labor-management relations under the Wagner Act. Actually, however, the act has weighted the scales so heavily against labor that the unions cannot function with anything near the effectiveness or the efficiency they ought to have.

If it is the intention of your committee, and of the present Congress, to destroy the labor movement, then all you need do is to leave the Taft-Hartley Act on the statute books in substantially its present form.

But if you believe that the labor movement is an integral part of a free America, then the Taft-Hartley Act must be repealed in its entirety, and the Wagner Act must be restored.

STATEMENT BY JOHN TISA, OF THE FOOD, TOBACCO, AGRICULTURAL AND ALLIED WORKERS UNION OF AMERICA, CIO

This international union is submitting this statement particularly because this committee heard testimony the other day from one Hank Strobel, who appeared before you in the guise of a working farmer to argue in support of the Taft-Hartley Act. We think this committee should know something of the unsavory and vicious antilabor history of this individual who posed before you as a plain dirt farmer concerned with the havoc which so-called labor bosses have caused to California agriculture. This history is convincing proof that Taft-Hartley has opened the doors wide once more for those, who like Hank Strobel, are determined to weaken and destroy the labor movement.

In addition, we wish to place before this committee the facts concerning the relationship between this union and a typical large corporation, the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., which will show how Taft-Hartley has made it possible for such corporations to destroy collective-bargaining relationships which the union has struggled for years to create.

Turning back to Mr. Strobel, the impression he sought to leave with you is that he is and has been just a farmer trying to make a hard and honest living in the face of the depredations of labor bosses. Unfortunately for Mr. Strobel, his labor-baiting, labor-hating history is enshrined in the records of other congressional committees.

The Associated Farmers of California has been notorious since its exposure by the LaFollette Civil Liberties Committee some years ago as an organization which has existed for the purpose of fighting unions by the use of violence, intimidation, thuggery, espionage, and all of the other methods traditionally used by antiunion employers' associations. This same Mr. Strobel has been intimately connected with the Associated Farmers and related employer organizations in California from the beginning. In fact, Mr. Strobel was started on his career as a "farmer" by specializing in breaking unions and smashing strikes.

These facts and others will be found in a report of the Committee on Education and Labor pursuant to Senate Resolution 266 (74th Cong.), parts IV and VIII: "Employers' associations and collective bargaining in California." As far as Mr. Strobel's original connections with these employer organizations are concerned, this report says:

"As already described in this report, Henry L. Strobel entered the employ of the Grower-Shipper Vegetable Association on June 1, 1936, at $300 per month. This arrangement continued through October 1937, when the Citizens Association of the Salinas Valley agreed to pay one-half of his salary. Ostensibly Mr. Strobel was in charge of a statistical bureau, but, as this report has shown, his activities were chiefly in the field of labor relations for the two employers' associations. In the summer and fall of 1939, the citizens' association, pressed by financial difficulties, wished to be relieved of its share of Mr. Strobel's salary. In addition, it felt that his activities had taken on a State-wide character and should be underwritten by other groups. Mr. Strobel remained on the pay roll of the two associations through December 31, 1939, but effective January 1, 1940, Mr. Strobel's antiunion activities, which have been expanded to cover the State, are now supported by an annual fund of $10,000 financed by organizations and individuals in other parts of California as well as by the two Salinas associations" (pt. VIII, p. 1365).

In 1936, about 3,500 workers who pack lettuce in the Salinas Valley of California for shipment to market organized themselves into an American Federation of Labor union and struck against the shippers. The LaFollette committee report details the manner in which this strike was provoked and then smashed by the employers by the use of every strike-breaking device in the modern arsenal, from the organization of fake citizens associations to the use of open violence, terrorism, and tear gas.

And who was it that managed this campaign for the employers? Farmer Hank Strobel:

"The county unit (Monterey County) of the associated farmers was revived at this time with the aid of the Grower-Shipper Vegetable Association, whose employee, Mr. Strobel, organized and led it, becoming its first president. These new organizations aroused the shippers, the growers, and the business community by antiunion propaganda" (pt. IV, p. 480).

And here are some—by no means all—references which will sufficiently show Strobel's true policies and activities:

"Mr. Strobel, the first president of the association, stated in his account of the formation of the Grower-Shipper Vegetable Association in 1930 that one of the first official acts of the new association was to reduce wages of field help * * *" (pt. IV, p. 472).

"The association's arsenal for combating trade-unionism during strike crises contained all the usual weapons such as labor spies, guards, strikebreakers, and propaganda" (pt. IV, p. 477).

"Since the Grower-Shipper Vegetable Association has felt that the only way to control the labor supply is through the open shop, the recruiting of labor for this district has been subordinate to and correlated with the general problem of maintaining the open shop. Individuals, groups, and new nationalities have been imported into the district (Imperial Valley) to break strikes and in the hope that they might resist the magnetic power of the union movement in Salinas" (pt. IV, p. 480).

"The labor policy of the Grower-Shipper Vegetable Association was essentially simple. Its primary purpose was to maintain in the hands of employers in the lettuce industry a maximum control of labor costs free from the interference of effective employee organization and collective bargaining" (pt. IV, p. 488).

Mr. Strobel became so successful at his specialty of breaking unions that "the 1936 Salinas strike provided a pattern for much of the associated farmers activities in succeeding years" (pt. VIII, p. 1330). A few more quotes will serve to show the kind of "law and order" which Farmer Strobel helped extend throughout all the farming regions of California:

"At the shippers' meeting on August 27, the board of directors of the Grower-Shipper Vegetable Association was authorized to appoint a committee to make all plans for the conduct of the strike. The plan as finally adopted envisaged taking over all packing operations by the association for the duration of the strike and concentrating these operations in one place in Salinas and one place in Watsonville. The Salinas Valley Ice Co.'s plant and sheds were used in Salinas and the Marinovitch and Travers & Sakata sheds in Watsonville. The plan called for barricading these centers with high fences and employing professional guards to protect the property. Imported strikebreakers worked, lived, and ate within the barricaded area" (pt. VIII, p. 1351).

"In one sense, the shippers' decision to pool their packing and shipping operations during the strike proved expensive as the association had to pay out $231,309.13 in overhead expenses. To mention a few of the items, equipment and construction alone totaled $61,117.30, the transportation of employees $4,447.55, and the bill for professional guards hired by the association came to $48,935.37" (pt. VIII, p. 1353).

"In preparation for the 'Battle of Salinas,' a supply of industrial munitions was laid in, professional guards were hired and deputized, and detectives were installed" (pt. VIII, p. 1358).

"The San Francisco Examiner reported that on September 15, 1936: 'Fighting today saw scores of pickets partly overcome by tear and nauseating gas; 2 men injured seriously enough to require hospital treatment and 16 of the rioters were in jail.' The following excerpts describing the 'Battle of Salinas' are taken from the decision of the National Labor Relations Board: 'Without any warning to the crowd, when its nearest members were still about 75 feet away, the officers suddenly opened fire with their gas riot guns. The gas drove the crowd back in the direction of Main Street. Somewhat later in the morning a convoy of trucks * * * had to stop for a traffic light. A large crowd, many of whom had been driven in this direction by the gassing at the lower end of Gabilan Street, had already gathered around. When the convoy stopped, some of the bystanders ran out, cut the ropes holding the field crates on the trucks, and pulled two or three dozen off. * * * This seems to have been the signal for the commencement of another series of gas attacks. All along Gabilan Street from the enclosures to the corner of Main Street, a distance of about five blocks, gas bombing went on, particularly as convoys came through. Groups of as few as two or three were attacked with no apparent justification. At one time people were pursued into a block off Gabilan Street from both ends, and there subjected to gas bombing from two directions. * * * The gassing continued into the early afternoon and was resumed later" (pt. VIII, p. 1359).

"The California Magazine of Pacific Business reported that the 'doughty Hank Strobel' drove the first load of 'hot lettuce' through the picket lines" (pt. VIII, p. 1361).

Aside from the La Follette committee, the National Labor Relations Board also issued a decision and order with respect to the 1936 Salinas strike in which it found Mr. Strobel's association had engaged in a variety of unfair labor practices (15 N. L. R. B. 322). Among other things, the Board found that before the strike Strobel had hired a private detective agency "to find out what they could" about the union's programs, policies, and activities (15 N. L. R. B. 354), and that Strobel had not told the truth on the witness stand:

"Early in June Strobel was hired by the Grower-Shipper Association to promote better relations between the shippers and the farmers. It seems more than a coincidence that almost at once thereafter he became president of the Associated Farmers of Monterey County, a local organization which had been moribund for about 2 years but which, under his leadership, proceeded to revive, while, at the hearing, Strobel steadfastly denied receiving any instructions or suggestions from the Grower-Shipper Association to embark on this course, the inability of the usually precise Brooks to specify what Strobel was told to do, the fact that Strobel received no pay from the Associated Farmers but spent considerable time working for them while receiving his regular monthly salary from the Grower-Shipper organization, and the admittedly complete harmony between the objective of the two bodies belie his denial" (p. 339).

And because of the gruesome picture of naked violence it presents, we believe that despite its length this committee will be interested in the following quotation from the Board decision which completely exposes Strobel's defense of Taft-Hartley because it protects "the individual worker" from the 'labor bosses:"

"Early in the morning of the 16th, groups of persons appeared on Gabilan Street heading for the enclosure. At the time of the occurrence to be described, one witness estimated that they numbered about 50 individuals in the blocks close to the enclosure. No trucks had yet appeared, and there was no violence or offer of violence by the crowd. The police were on hand near the entrance, and with them a motion-picture camera crew and their apparatus, evidently waiting for some action shots. Without any warning to the crowd, when its nearest members were still about 75 feet away, the officers suddenly opened fire with their gas riot guns. The gas drove the crowd back in the direction of Main Street.

"Somewhat later in the morning a convoy of trucks, driving in from the north of town, instead of following the usual truck route, drove down Main Street to Gabilan Street. At this corner, which is the center of the town, the convoy had to stop for a traffic light. A large crowd, many of whom had been driven in this direction by the gassing at the lower end of Gabilan Street, had already gathered around. When the convoy stopped, some of the bystanders ran out, cut the ropes holding the field crates on the trucks, and pulled two or three dozen off. The trucks got away, leaving large piles of lettuce and crates in the street.

"This seems to have been the signal for the commencement of another series of gas attacks. All along Gabilan Street from the enclosures to the corner of Main Street, a distance of about five blocks, gas bombing went on, particularly as convoys came through. Groups of as few as two or three were attacked, with no apparent justification. At one time people were pursued into a block off Gabilan Street from both ends, and there subjected to gas bombing from two directions. This block contained the Labor Temple, headquarters for the Central Labor Union. When the crowd retired into the building, bombs were thrown inside.

"The gassing continued into the early afternoon and was resumed later. An active and presumably enthusiastic participant in these occurrences was George F. ('Jimmie') Cake, Pacific coast representative of Federal Laboratories, Inc., supplier of most of the gas equipment. Cake had foresightedly secured a deputy's badge and proceeded to 'consume' some of the goods which he had sold to the city and county.

"The impression of these events obtained from the record is one of inexcusable police brutality, in many instances bordering upon sadism" (15 N. L. R. B. 350).

Mr. Strobel introduced himself to this committee by saying, "My name is Hank Strobel. I am a farmer from Monterey County," and then he went on to tell you what a good thing Taft-Hartley is for the farmer and "the individual worker." In view of the record, wouldn't it have been more accurate for him to have said: "My name is Hank Strobel. Although I pretend to be a farmer, I am really a specialist in breaking unions. I believe in low wages and long hours for 'the individual worker' and that is why I am against unions. If 'the individual worker' joins a union, I hire spies to find out what is going on and arrange matters so that a strike may be precipitated prematurely so that I can break the strike and smash the union. I know all the rules for accomplishing these objectives, including the use of tear gas and other forms of violence against 'the individual worker.' I hated the Wagner Act in its original form because it protected labor's right to organize, interfered with my activities, and even led to a decision in which it was stated that I had not told the truth on the witness stand. I am in favor of Taft-Hartley because it makes it much easier for me to achieve my objective of destroying labor unions."

So much for Mr. Strobel's history. In his testimony before you, Mr. Strobel also made several references to this international union. He discussed what he called a jurisdictional dispute in the California canneries in 1946 and claimed that the canneries and farmers suffered losses of essentials crops. The committee should know that what Mr. Strobel refers to as a jurisdictional dispute was in fact an attempt on the part of workers in the California canneries to select the union they wanted to represent them. This attempt was defeated by acts of collusion between agents of the Government and the same type of employer groups represented directly by Strobel.

Whenever a perishable food commodity is involved in a strike situation, employer propaganda seeks to find a responsive audience by the use of propaganda campaigns claiming that essential food is being lost, spoiled, etc. In 1947, a Special Subcommittee To Investigate Labor Practices in the Food Industry (a subcommittee of the House Committee on Education and Labor) heard numerous cannery employers on the west coast testify concerning incidents in the California canneries in 1945 and 1946. In these hearings, members of this subcommittee questioned these witnesses very closely to establish whether any food was lost. In questioning J. Paul St. Sure, attorney for the California Processors and Growers—the association of employers involved in the 1945–46 cannery situation—Congresman Wint Smith, chairman of the subcommittee, stated: "Now I was rather attentive to the statement that during this 1945–46 period there was no loss to the grower by reason of this jurisdictional dispute." (Hearings before a Special Subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor, House of Representatives, San Francisco, vol. 1, p. 230.) St. Sure had previously stated, " * * * * we were able, despite the very complex labor situation in which we found ourselves, to operate without serious loss even during the later part of the war period when food processing was so essential" (p. 229).

Mr. St. Sure, in answer to Congressman Smith's comment on the fact that no losses were suffered, then delivered himself of an analysis of the manner in which an employer's association can operate to prevent loss to any single employer. His remarks are not only a complete answer to Strobel's charges but are also highly pertinent to the committee's consideration of the secondary-boycott provisions of the Taft-Hartley law. Mr. St. Sure demonstrates in the quotation which follows the formula by which an organized group of employers can defeat a strike against any one of them. He said:

"Yes; that was primarily the result of what we believe was an experiment which demonstrates the validity of and the desirability of joint employer operation in situations of this kind. It is the only way that we know that we can equalize, first, economic bargaining positions, and, secondly, that we can avoid losses within an industry short of a complete industry shutdown. In 1937 and 1941 we had economic strikes in the industry, and we had some experience at that time endeavoring to prevent grower loss and packer loss by diverting from the field the product which had been purchased from the farmer to some other cannery which could handle it. It was believed that it would be difficult, let us say, for the California Packing Corp. to pack for the Libby-McNeil Co., and for Libby-McNeil to pack for some farmer co-op, but we found it could be done; and the procedures which were developed during those earlier years were actually brought to almost perfection in 1945. An industry committee was established, with responsibility for diversion of product, and, in the event there was a shutdown of a plant in any area, all other plants in the group, up to the maximum plant capacity they might have, accepted the produce and packed it for the account of the struck packer, without profit; in order, first, to protect the grower from loss; second, to protect the operator from loss of his product and his market, and likewise for the purpose of effectively providing a method of combating the union pressures which were being applied by keeping the industry going" (p. 230).

The secondary-boycott provisions of the Taft-Hartley law force workers to fit in neatly with exactly the type of employer arrangement St. Sure describes. In the case of the situation he discusses, lack of economic strength on the part of the workers kept them from completely shutting down the operations of the California Processors and Growers and refusing to handle "hot" goods shifted from plant to plant. Had the Taft-Hartley law been in effect at the time of this dispute, it would have been illegal for the workers to take such action even if they had had the economic strength to do so. Yet why should one employer who makes such mutual arrangements with another to break strikes be given legal protection against peaceful measures which the union might take against him?

In the light of the extremely lucid exposition of the manner in which the canning industry prevented the loss of crops during the dispute, the committee can evaluate the general value of Strobel's testimony that the California canners were "tied up for 50 to 60 days in jurisdictional disputes" and that the entire spinach crop was lost. As we have shown, this is not the first time that Strobel has not been exactly accurate even under oath.

Following a general attack on all of those who had organized agricultural labor or workers engaged in processing farm products, A. F. of L., CIO, or otherwise, Strobel accuses FTA of striking against the asparagus growers in 1948.

The accusation is quite true. FTA is proud of the fact that some 5,000 asparagus field workers became effectively organized for the first time in 1948. The Associated Farmers have little reason to point with pride to the fact that the asparagus growers refused completely and finally to grant recognition to the union, which they readily admitted represented their employees. Since agricultural workers have never been covered by any Federal or State law which protects their right to bargain, the only recourse they had was to strike. This strike for recognition—not for a "100-percent closed-shop contract," as claimed by Strobel—was entirely similar to the struggles which labor was forced to conduct against antiunion employers in the 1930's when refusal to recognize unions was one of the common causes of strikes. This refusal is still the basic program and reason for existence of the Associated Farmers. What Strobel has done in his testimony, therefore, is to show you that his basic program is still the same as it was in Salinas in 1936, violent antiunionism.

In referring to the strike of the asparagus workers and to other strikes of agricultural workers in his testimony, Hank Strobel has performed a service. He has brought before Congress once again the fact that agricultural workers are pariahs as far as Federal laws are concerned. There will continue to be agricultural strikes and they will increase now that the labor shortages of the war period are over, until the time when legal protection of the right to organize is extended to these workers.

We turn now to our relations with the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. of Winston-Salem, N. C., to present to you one of the clearest examples of big business use of the Taft-Hartley law to end collective-bargaining relations with a union.

The Reynolds Co. is, as you know, one of the kings of the Tobacco Trust. It is the largest tobaccor firm located in one city in the country. Its plants sprawl over scores of acres of Winstom-Salem, which it dominates economically, politically, and socially. At peak employment, more than 12,000 workers are on the Reynolds pay roll. Obviously the wages and working conditions of these workers set the tone for business conditions in Winston-Salem and a huge area around it.

Before 1944, the workers at Reynolds had made sporadic attempts to organize over a period of years. In 1944, they succeeded in winning recognition through the orderly use of the National Labor Relations Board, which was then operating under the Wagner Act. The Taft-Hartley Act was still in the future, and though the company used all of the standard devices for stalling recognition of the union, it signed a contract with FTA Local 22 after the workers had voted for the union by a better than 2 to 1 majority.

The first contract brought a number of gains to the workers. Seniority was recognized for the first time. Grievance-adjustment machinery was set up. An arbitration system was established. A wage case was taken to the National War Labor Board and a substantial improvement in minimum wages was won, the rate being set at 55 cents an hour.

These gains were made without strike or stoppage. The second contract was negotiated in 1945, with the main improvement bringing time and one half pay for work over 8 hours in 1 day and 40 in 1 week. The third contract, negotiated without strike or stoppage and also without intervention of any Government agency, brought $3,000,000 in wage gains to the workers and the community. A minimum wage of 65 cents was set for all workers, including those in the leaf houses and other seasonal tobacco trades. These rates, incidentally, were the highest ever secured for this kind of work in the Tobacco Belt.

All of these gains were reflected in gains to the city of Winston-Salem. Retail business improved. The workers bought more food, clothing, and other necessities. Unlike Reynolds, the workers' wages are spent on immediate needs, and spent with the merchants of the home community.

Reynolds' profits, in fact, did not suffer from its collective-bargaining relations with FTA Local 22. By 1946, Reynolds net profits after taxes were close to $28,000,000 which was 42 percent above 1945. Price increases on cigarettes were due to add at least another $45,000,000 in the next year without the necessity of producing any more cigarettes. Dividends stood at 20 percent, while top executive salaries ranged up to $200,000 a year.

In April 1947, the union served the regular notice for renewal of the contract. A wage increase of 24 cents was asked, plus other gains. The Reynolds Co. flatly refused to make any concessions, even though the wages it paid averaged 21.9 cents an hour below the national level in the cigarette industry.

All appeals to the company for genuine collective bargaining failed, and the workers were forced to go on strike. After 38 days of strike—the first in the history of FTA relations with Reynolds—an agreement was signed bringing the workers roughly 12 cents an hour in wage increases.

By this time, the shadow of the Taft-Hartley law was lengthening over collective bargaining in the United States. The Reynolds Co. was quick to take advantaage of the new situation. Provisions of the contract were steadily ignored. Workers weer arbitrarily laid off. Seniority was ignored. Grievance adjustment machinery, carefully built up over the years, was shunted aside.

In 1948, the company, one of the richest and most protitable companies in the world, announced bluntly that there would be no more contract between it and FTA Local 22. Union recognition, won by a 2 to 1 election and certified by the United States Government was withdrawn. Twelve thousand workers—and the community in which they live—were left without the protection and the security that a union contract brings.

Relationships between the workers and the company have steadily deteriorated since the passage of the Taft-Hartley law. Lay-offs and arbitrary firings without regard to seniority have become the rule. Speed-up of the workers has increased without check. At present, Reynolds workers are employed only 4 days a week, although the company boasts that its cigaret production is still at the top of the list.

Typical of the Reynolds Co. attitude of its workers since passage of the Taft-Hartley law was the treatment of Mrs. Carrie Speaks, a vice president of FTA Local 22, who was suddenly fired in February 1948, for allegedly passing four defective packages of cigarettes. The value of a package of Camels before taxes is about 4 cents. Mrs. Speaks had 15 years of seniority in Reynolds.

Mrs. Speaks was fortunate, the arbitrator held that she had been wrongfully discharged, saying: "For a person who has some 15 years of service with the company, and service which on the whole seems to have been satisfactory, it would seem reasonable that so extreme a penalty as discharge would be imposed only after the fullest deliberation and only after the exhaustion of all other measures."

Another Reynolds worker, this time with 28 years' service, was not so fortunate. He was summarily discharged for allegedly stealing a package of Camels. This worker had joined FTA Local 22 in 1943. The theft was not proved, but lacking the protection of a union contract, he remains without a job.

These two instances are typical of the intimidation and insecurity that are the rule in the absence of orderly contractual labor-management relations. The tearing up of the union contract by Reynolds Tobacco was made possible by the Taft-Hartley law. The effect on the individual worker is tragic. Twenty-eight years of service in one plant of one industry does not fit him for other work, and in a one-industry community this can mean permanent unemployment with its bad social consequences.

The effect on the community in which such events take place is, of course, far more widespread. Due to the Taft-Hartley law, and the way in which it is applied by a ruthless corporation, whole communities can and do revert to the status of company towns, where the corporation rules the city and its people with an iron dictatorship.

The lack of stable, contractual labor-management relations produces very bad effects in any community. We have selected the case of the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. of Winston-Salem, N. C., not only as an example of damage done to the interests of the workers involved but also to the community as a whole.

In place of orderly contract relations, we find confusion and chaos. The union, which has helped both workers and community to a better status, is now shut out by a company which acts within the framework of the Taft-Hartley law to lower the wages and worsen the conditions of the workers and the community where its profits are made.

We submit that the repeal of the Taft-Hartley law and the restoration of the Wagner Act must be carried through at once as the first step toward restoring the rights of American workers to the men and women of Winston-Salem, N. C. Taft-Hartley is an invitation to antiunionism which individuals like Strobel and large corporations like Reynolds have shown they know how to use.

STATEMENT OF JOSEPH CURRAN, PRESIDENT OF NATIONAL MARITIME UNION OF AMERICA, CIO, AND CHAIRMAN OF CIO MARITIME COMMISSION

I am making this statement for the consideration of the committee in my official capacities as president of the National Maritime Union of America, CIO, and as chairman of the CIO Maritime Committee, composed of the National Maritime Union of America, Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers, National Marine Engineers Beneficial Association, International Fishermen and Allied Workers of America, American Communications Association, and American Radio Association.

I urge the desirability of removing whatever present restriction is deemed to exist on prevailing employment practices in the maritime industry, and the necessity for eliminating any doubts as to its legality by repealing the Taft-Hartley Act and restoring the Wagner Act. I also submit our experience that in the so-called national emergency in the maritime industry last year, which called forth the application of the injunction provision of the Taft-Hartley Act and imposed an 80-day waiting period, no constructive purpose was achieved. Instead, additional problems were generated, delaying and hampering agreement.

As the head of a union which has been victimized by the application of the national emergency injunction provision of the Taft-Hartley Act, I feel particularly qualified to testify that the Taft-Hartley Act contributed neither to industrial peace nor to effective collective bargaining. On the contrary, it introduced confusion, conflict, and chaos.

The threat to the existence of the hiring hall practice in the maritime industry, as interpreted by the National Labor Relations Board under the Taft-Hartley Act, is an illuminating example of the unrealistic approach of the act to the problems of labor and management in the maritime industry. Here is a practice which had been developed in the last decade to overcome the historical evils attendant upon the hiring of seamen. Yet the hiring hall, which took the place of "crimp joints" and other even less savory institutions, is, in the view of the National Labor Relations Board, prohibited under the Taft-Hartley Act. This created a situation desired neither by the ship operators nor the unions, yet, by the act of the Eightieth Congress, the maritime industry was threatened with being thrown back to the inhuman conditions which deprived seamen of dignity and security and relegated them to paying "blood money" for jobs while groveling for a chance to work.

The desirability of continuing the present hiring hall practices was attested to by representatives of the shipowners at the hearings before the President's Fact-Finding Board appointed under the Taft-Hartley Act in connection with the dispute between the maritime union and the shipping interests last year. At that time it was conceded that even though the merits of continuing these practices were acknowledged, the ship operators were then unwilling to continue them by reason of an opinion of their counsel that the employment practice clause of the contracts was in violation of the Taft-Hartley Act. Except for the last-minute agreement on August 18, 1948, to continue the present employment practices, subject to a decision of the United States Supreme Court on its legality, the Nation would have faced a maritime strike on this principal issue after September 2. A national emergency would, therefore, have been created by operation of the Taft-Hartley Act. This, mind you, because the Taft-Hartley Act was seeking to prohibit a practice that both parties desired to continue. This strike would surely have taken place last fall at the end of the 80-day injunction period unless the hiring hall was preserved. Such a strike would have been the principal contribution of the Taft-Hartley Act to industrial peace in the maritime industry.

What is this hiring hall, for which the maritime unions were prepared to strike? In the report of the House Ways and Means Committee to Congress in 1946, on the subject of providing equal treatment of seamen and nonseamen under the employment insurance laws of the various States, it was stated: "Under the contracts in effect between the maritime labor unions and the maritime employers, the hiring hall is the normal agency through which the employer recruits seamen and, in some cases, licensed personnel." It further described the hiring hall as "the established employment procedure" of the industry.

In an industry where stability of employment does not exist, where personnel turn-over is a constant factor, some participation in the hiring process by a union is indispensable if organization is to exist at all. No comparison can be drawn between the union-security problem of a union representing factory workers, for example, and a maritime union's need for a hiring hall. The first is essentially a device to protect the status of the organization and thereby to enable it more effectively to promote the welfare of its members.

The hiring hall, on the other hand, exists primarily to protect seamen against discrimination—not only for union activity, but for race, creed, color as well. It is also the only tested means of protecting seamen against employment practices which in the past were notorious. It was the means of putting an end to hiring seamen through crimps, boarding houses, saloons, of forcing them to pay for their jobs, either with money or by catering to shipping masters. It put an end to the shape-up, and of the practice of shipping workaways.

It is a commonplace fact that every major maritime strike revolved about the hiring hall, and despite the fact that in the early days of modern organization in the industry, strike after strike was lost, seamen continued their struggle until the hiring hall became an accepted practice.

Expressing the wishes of their members, the maritime unions have fixed, as one of the conditions of employment, that seamen are to be obtained only from their union hall. Since job seeking is a need which recurs constantly in the industry, it assumes an unusual importance. Instead of submitting to the need of searching for jobs at company offices, at docks, at the thousand ond one places where a seaman in the past found employment, now, through their union, they demand that they be hired through their organization.

Should they be compelled to obtain work in the manner dictated by the Taft-Hartley Act as applied by the National Labor Relations Board, seamen, in effect, would be compelled to surrender the right to bargain on the terms for which they will work and to withhold their services unless satisfied. When men are forced to work under conditions in which they have no voice, they are no longer free. If they cannot refuse to defend their dignity against job-begging, they have lost their ability to protect themselves. The heart of maritime labor organization is the hiring hall. It is the nexus between the union and the men on the ships. When that is destroyed, the men are dispersed; they lose effective force.

It is impossible to keep a seaman forever on board his ship. Eventually he must leave, for rest, for recreation, to see his family. Unless he is replaced by another seaman from the union, the door is wide open for the introduction of nonunion elements. The shipowner is let free to subvert all union influence.

In sum, therefore, to outlaw the hiring hall would have two results. The seaman would no longer be free to contract for the sale of his services. He might no longer, through his bargaining agent, make it a condition of working that he be hired in rotation from lists maintained by his union. He would have to offer his services for acceptance in whatever manner the employer elected.

The second result would be that he had lost the services of his union. Although the right of organization and to bargain collectively are basic rights, constitutionally protected, he might not even discuss the question of hiring. An area of bargaining essential to him would be forcibly removed from his reach. His union would be permitted to negotiate wages and hours, but not the manner in which he would receive employment. At the very outset of the employer-employee relationship, he would be cut off from the assistance of his organization.

To appreciate the unremitting intention of seamen to retain the hiring hall, we must consider the nature of a seaman's employment. When a seaman boards his ship, he is completely dependent on its owner or master. When the shoreside worker finishes his day's work, he is a free agent. But the seaman depends upon the employer for food and lodging as well as employment. He lives at his work without means of visiting home or partaking in the daily life of his family. He is subject to order and discipline not only at work but during leisure hours as well.

When a shore worker differs with his foreman, he is always free to quit on the spot. A seaman must continue obeying orders at the risk of being locked up or charged with mutiny.

The Maritime Labor Board report to the President and to the Congress on March 1, 1940, summarized these conditions as follows:

"Legally the seaman is restricted. Once he signs shipping articles he becomes a member of a group apart whose rights and duties are closely circumscribed by a special code of laws. Economically he is insecure; his right to industrial self-government is often unrecognized and his collective bargaining challenged, especially when in conflict with navigation laws. Politically he is virtually disfranchised owing to frequent absence at election time. Yet, no other group of industrial workers is asked, or is expected, to show the compliance, discipline, loyalty, courage, and the spirit of self-sacrifice, demanded of seamen by the employer and the public. Taking his cue from the traditional status of the seamen, the employer often regards him as irresponsible and treats him accordingly. Instead of encouraging responsible unionism by conferring responsibility, many employers assume the traditional disciplinary role in preference to recognizing that self-respecting equality is the essential condition of responsible contractual relationship. And the public, uninformed of the social and economic factors underlying sporadic outbursts of strikes, accepts the superficial explanation that they are simply due to subversive or irresponsible agitators."

Under these conditions the special need for the present kind of hiring practices for seamen through the union hiring hall can better be appreciated.

In the light of these considerations, it should be apparent that not only the protection of seamen but the existence of the unions as an instrument for the seaman's protection would have great difficulty surviving elimination of the union hiring hall.

Examine the way in which the union hiring halls operate. Under the rotating system, the unemployed seaman who has been longest without work is first to secure employment when a vacancy occurs. Employment is based upon priority of registration at the hall. Ship operators notify the hiring hall of the number of men needed in various ratings. The man at the head of the list for that particular line of work is sent to the representative of the company in question. He may not insist upon shipping on any particular vessel or for any particular company.

An applicant may twice turn down a job offered him without losing his place on the registration list, but if he declines the third job offered him, his name is dropped to the bottom of the registration list. If the union has not supplied a replacement within an hour before sailing time, the companies may obtain the needed personnel for other sources.

Such a system equalizes opportunities for placement in the same occupation and prevents favoritism and collusion. It does not postpone immediate reemployment of regular employees or those who are absent due to illness or injury or because they are on vacation or leave of absence. This does not interfere with continuous employment but merely provides replacement for those who quit or are unable to ship out again.

Employers can still reject any applicant not acceptable on legitimate grounds such as inefficiency, drunkenness, failure to appear on the job on time, unfitness for employment, continuously bad record and the like.

The hiring hall operates on a fair, honest, and equitable basis, prevents union discrimination or blacklisting and provides equal opportunities for job getting.

Yet, despite the merits of continuing the union hiring hall by contract with ship operators, the Taft-Hartley Act introduces a discordant note. Our first direct contact with the problem developed during the negotiations between the NMU and Cleveland Lake Tankers and Great Lakes Transport and the Texas Co. These contracts, which expired January 19, 1948, contained provision for the hiring hall practice. When the companies were confronted with the union request that this employment practice not be disturbed in succeeding contracts, we were met with the absolute rejection of this request on the basis of a legal interpretation that the Taft-Hartley Act prohibited continuance of the hiring hall.

Negotiations proceeded at a slow and fruitless pace because of this barrier. Finally the union authorized a strike in the Great Lakes in an effort to apply economic pressure. The companies filed unfair labor charges against the NMU as violating section 8 (b) (3) of the act. We were then exposed to the fastest action any union ever had from the National Labor Relations Board. Certainly, under the Wagner Act no union ever had an employer hailed into a hearing as precipitously as was the NMU on the basis of the charges filed by these employers. Despite our protests of insufficient time to prepare and our being tied up with the negotiations covering the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, the Board proceeded with the hearing on the complaint. At the same time negotiations between the maritime unions and the Atlantic and Gulf coast ship operators also bogged down on the issue of the hiring hall.

By June 15, 1948, the refusal of the employers to continue this employment practice became the principal issue for striking the industry. It was obvious that the employers were relying upon the Federal injunction under the Taft-Hartley Act and so avoided real collective bargaining as the deadline approached.

As anticipated by them, the Taft-Hartley Act was invoked and a Presidential Fact Finding Board was designated. At the hearing before the President's Board it again was evident that the employers were depending upon governmental intervention. The principal issue, again, was the continuance of the hiring hall employment practice. On June 14 a court order issued, initiated by the Federal Government, restraining the parties from making any changes in the wages, pay, hours, terms, and conditions of employment other than by mutual consent. On June 23, 1948, on request of the court, the union and the companies agreed to preserve the status quo during the life of the injunction issued on that date. A similar injunction applied to the Great Lakes controversy.

Just prior to these events, and on June 11, 1948, the Atlantic and Gulf coast ship operators filed a charge with the NLRB that the NMU was engaged in unfair labor practices through its insistence upon renewal of the employment clause. Complaint was quickly issued by the Board and hearings were held. The trial examiner following the ruling in the Great Lakes case and reported against the union. However, no Board order has yet been issued in the Atlantic and Gulf coast case.

No real negotiations took place for the next month, with the ship operators resting on their oars. But, when it was apparent that the union would not abandon its position, the ship operators adopted a more realistic approach to the problem in an effort to avoid the strike which would inevitably have occurred at the end of the injunction period, September 2, 1948.

On August 18, 1948, agreement was reached preserving the hiring hall subject only to a final determination by the United States Supreme Court of its legality. Curiously enough, the very next day announcement was made that the NLRB had, on August 17, 1948, issued an order against the NMU in the Great Lakes case. The petition of the NLRB for enforcement of this order is still pending before the circuit court of appeals.

The conservative New York Herald-Tribune, on August 20, 1948, commented editorially on "The Hiring Halls" in part as follows:

"The Board has rejected the contention that the peculiar characteristics of the maritime industry require union control of employment. Their duty, as the decision points out, is to administer the law as written and not to pass upon the wisdom of its provisions. However, anyone familiar with the shocking conditions under which seamen were employed—including being drugged and shanghaied aboard ship—in the days before the unions were strong will agree that union hiring halls have brought urgently needed reforms, as well as some abuses.

"The decision against the National Maritime Union in the Great Lakes case poses squarely the question of need for revision of some of the terms of the Taft-Hartley Act. We have suggested before that a blanket prohibition against the closed shop, for example, may not be the best way to cure abuses that exist in some closed-shop situations; and experience indicates that there are other parts of the act which need reconsideration. Some provisions need tightening, such as that directed against feather-bedding, and others need to be relaxed or at least clarified."

It is significant that during the injunction period the kind of negotiations, which the employers had previously suspended, took place which would otherwise have been concluded by June 15, the expiration date of the contracts. It was evident that the injunction period was being used in the collective-bargaining process against the unions. Practically on the eve of the termination of the injunctive period, when the unions would have been as free to strike as they would otherwise have been on June 15, agreement was reached, the hiring hall was preserved and wage increases and other improvements resulted.

However, the lapse of time not only caused confusion and uncertainty, but created the additional problem of delayed application of wage and other benefits and of retroactivity. This is a common problem which occurs whenever collective bargaining goes beyond the termination date of a contract. It was aggravated in this case by the fact that several months had passed since the terminal point of the contracts.

Certainly, no one can argue that the Taft-Hartley Act in any aspect contributed to industrial peace upon the basis of this experience. Any speculation that the injunction prevented a June 15 strike is overcome by an examination of the situation on the west coast. There the longshoremen's strike took place at the conclusion of the injunction period of grace being, as it was aptly termed, a "heating up" rather than a "cooling off" time.

It is my earnest conviction and belief that if no injunction had been applied to the maritime unions on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, the employers would have settled with us prior to June 15 and avoided the necessity for a period of uncertainty, uneasiness, national anxiety, and threatened disturbance.

Any successful effort by law to stop strikes through the use of injunctions makes second-class citizens of the workers who are so repressed. No conceivable justification exists for forcing men to work against their will in a democracy and depriving them of the right to strike. It is the price we pay for living in a democracy.

The practical approach to averting strikes depends upon the capacity of unions and management to reach agreement at the bargaining table and not upon the injunctions and prohibitions of the Taft-Hartley Act. The Wagner Act provided a climate in which collective bargaining could function effectively with a minimum of Government participation. The Taft-Hartley Act has contributed nothing to real industrial peace and its continuance on the statute books will provoke rather than quiet conflict between labor and managament.

STATEMENT OF JOHN GREEN, PRESIDENT, INDUSTRIAL UNION OF MARINE AND SHIPBUILDING WORKERS OF AMERICA, CIO, ON THE REPEAL OF THE LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT OF 1947 AND ENACTMENT OF THE LABOR RELATIONS ACT OF 1949

Before discussing the effects of the Labor-Management Relations Act upon this union, it is necessary to bring this committee up to date on the history of the union, and its attempts to stabilize the industry which it represents.

Prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, we appeared before the United States Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare and, at that time, made a statement in opposition to the Taft-Hartley Act. Attached to that statement were two addenda, one of them being a story of shipbuilding stabilization, a history of tripartite bargaining between labor, industry, and Government.

This union has been outstanding because of its demand for some rational framework for collective bargaining in our industry. Our industry is primarily important in its relation to our national defense. We recognized the defense character of the industry as early as 1935, when we first proposed to the Government the creation of a stabilization committee, to establish a fromework for our collective-bargaining relationships. This framework would eliminate most of the violent industrial unrest which had characterized the industry after the First World War, and during the early part of the 1930's.

It was not until a time close to the outbreak of the war, however, that the Government initiated the stabilization committee which we had been requesting for over 5 years.

On November 27, 1940, Mr. Sidney Hillman, at that time Commissioner in charge of the Labor Division of the National Defense Advisory Commission (subsequently appointed Associate Director General of the Office of Production Management), announced the creation of the Shipbuilding Stabilization Committee, composed of representatives of labor, the shipbuilding industry, the United States Navy, the United States Maritime Commission, and the OPM.

At the time the committee was organized, labor shortages were already occurring in certain shipbuilding occupations. This was especially true of ship carpenters, loftsmen, and shipfitters, while there was also an inadequate supply of marine architects, shop electricians, marine gas-engine machinists, and template makers. A 500-percent increase in the total number of workers in the industry was expected by September 1942, according to the estimates of the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The committee was established, as stated by Mr. Hillman, to explore ways and means of stabilizing employment in the country's shipyards, in order to insure the most efficient and speedy construction of ships for defense. It was generally understood that the committee would undertake a detailed investigation of wage rates and working conditions, with particular emphasis upon the migration of workers from yard to yard, and its effect upon production. At the time the Shipbuilding Stabilization Committee was appointed, it was suggested that if the stabilization plan worked out satisfactorily it might later be applied to aircraft construction. Stabilization was acceptable to all three interested groups. Labor favored it because such a system was akin to its desire for uniformity of pay for equivalent jobs, and the removal of major working conditions from a local area of dispute. The industry saw in stabilization an opportunity to remove one item of competition normally beyond their control—unequal labor costs. Government, of course, wanted more and more ships with stabilized wages and costs.

The first members of the Shipbuilding Stabilization Committee were as follows:

(1) Labor.—(a) A. F. of L.—Harvey Brown, president of the International Association of Machinists, and John F. Frey, president of the metal trades department; (b) CIO—John Green, president of the Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America, and Philip H. Van Gelder, secretary of the same union.

(2) Industry.—Gregory Harrison, for the Pacific Shipyards; H. Gerrish Smith, president of the National Council of American Shipbuilders, for the Great Lakes shipyards; E. A. Lidell, for the Gulf shipyards; and Prof. H. L. Seward, representing the Atlantic shipyards.

(3) Contracting agencies.—Joseph W. Powell, Special Assistant to the Secretary of the Navy (Capt. C. W. Fisher, U. S. Navy, as alternate), Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission.

(4) OPM.—Morris L. Cooke, industrial engineering consultant to the Labor Division of the OPM, chairman, and Thomas L. Morton, executive Secretary.

The shipbuilding industry group which met to formulate a policy for the Shipbuilding Stabilization Committee was truly representative of the views of management, because the 21 members present represented 42 yards employing at least 90 percent of the workers in the industry. It cannot be said that management was forced into its participation in the shipbuilding stabilization agreements. All of the parties agreed that the zone standards agreements were to be formulated by national zonal conferences in four ones, and were to be arrived at by a process of collective bargaining resulting in unanimous concurrence with the provisions of the agreements.

At the national conferences called in each of the four zones, the zone standards agreements were worked out. The Government took an active part in most of the negotiations of these agreements, and was signatory to the agreements. These agreements were not local collective-bargaining agreements. Their provisions were inserted, in some cases, and in others incorporated by reference into such local agreements.

All four zone standards agreements set the following types of working conditions:

Standard skilled mechanics' rate on all zones but the Gulf, $1.12; Gulf zone, $1.07.

Overtime rates.

Night-shift premium.

No-strike and no-lock-out pledge.

Agreement on arbitration for all disputes.

A provision against limitation on production.

A duration clause.

In 1942, the membership of the Shipbuilding Stabilization Committee was increased and, in the same summer, a national conference was held to amend all four zone standards agreement. The amendments to the agreements established a wage rate of $1.20 throughout the United States for standard mechanics. They also established the procedure for a yearly wage review to be conducted by the Shipbuilding Stabilization Committee. They established the Shipbuilding Stabilization Committee as the body for the interpretation of and ruling upon the agreements; and they abolished calendar premium days. Further, the zone standards agreements were amended to apply for the duration of the national emergency, as proclaimed by the President of the United States. This was also unanimous.

Because of the issuance on October 3, 1942, of Executive Order 9250, the wage reviews of 1943 and 1944 as outlined by the Chicago amendment to the zone standards agreements, were held by the National War Labor Board. The wage review for 1945 was held by the National Shipbuilding Conference in Colorado Springs, where an 18-cents-per-hour increase was granted by majority vote of government and labor, with management dissenting. However, all parties to the Colorado National Conference agreed that the zone standards themselves could only be amended or terminated by unanimous consent.

Since the wage review of 1945 was held so late, the Shipbuilding Stabilization Committee voted to hold the 1946 wage review in January of 1947. However, management in the industry, by unilateral determination, was resolved to scuttle the zone standards agreements, even though it was officially determined that the agreements could only be dissolved by the consent of all three parties. When the time came for the 1946–47 wage review, management refused to allow the review to convene, by refusing to have a quorum present at the meetings of the Shipbuilding Stabilization Committee. In other words, by their absence, they unilaterally abrogated this tripartite agreement.

This union had been attempting, since 1945, to avert a major strike in the industry by having management agree to continue the application of zone standards, even after repeal of the declaration of the emergency. Management refused this continuance, as was their right. Yet, they insisted upon scuttling the zone standards before they had the legal right to do so. (A history of the Shipbuilding Stabilization Committee until December of 1946 is attached herewith as exhibit A.)

The scuttling of the zone standards agreements led directly to the shipyard strike in the summer of 1947. Management, by refusing to allow the convening of the wage review, under the auspices of the Shipbuilding Stabilization Committee, and at the same time, presenting identical demands to the union for 1947 negotiations, seemed to be taking the attitude that "We will bargain nationally, but we will not allow you to do so."

The demands presented to the union in 1947 were identical throughout the country. These demands seemed to be conditioned by the imminent passage of the Taft-Hartley Act. There was no doubt in the union's mind that the passage of this act indefinitely prolonged the shipyard strike of 1947.

This union has had a long and honorable history in attempting to solve the basic fundamental issues which make for peace in collective bargaining. We have grave misgivings as to what will happen in the rest of industry in the United States if restrictive and offensive labor legislation is allowed to continue. We have had our own experience of what effect mere talk of the passage of such legislation had upon our negotiations, upon our industry, and upon our collective-bargaining disputes.

EFFECT OF THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT UPON THE SHIPYARD STRIKE OF 1947

There is no doubt in our minds that the demands which shipyard management made upon the union in 1947, which led to the shipyard strike, were directly conditioned by the discussion in the Eightieth Congress on the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act.

At a meeting of the IUMSWA wage conference in Manhattan Center, New York, on June 18, 1947, it was brought out by the various negotiating committees that the demands of management upon the union were the same for the following yards:

Bethlehem Steel Co.—all seven yards on the Atlantic coast.
Todd Shipyards Corp.—two yards in the port of New York.
Maryland Drydock Co.
Federal Shipbuilding & Drydock Co.
New York Shipbuilding Corp.

The demands made, which were almost identical, yard by yard, were the following:

Abolition of maintenance of membership, either a provision that good standing was to be recognized only as payment of dues, or complete abolition of union security, this was even before the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act.
Special concessions on seniority for certain preferred employees.
Special concessions on the incentive system.
Modification of call-in pay clauses.
Modification of vacation clauses.
Elimination of supervisors from the bargaining unit.
Elimination of pay for handling and investigation of grievances during working hours.
Elimination of zone-standards references from the collective-bargaining agreement.
Special causes on assignment of work and maintenance of productivity.
Special clauses on union liability in court.

A good many of the demands made by management in the summer of 1947 were identical to the law which was subsequently passed.

For example, a section of the Taft-Hartley Act states that it is unlawful "to cause an employer to pay or deliver any money or other thing of value in the nature of an exaction for services which are not performed or not to be performed."

The employers in the industry were using the above as a pretext for refusing to grant pay for handling grievances during working hours. This is one of the issues which indefinitely prolonged the shipyard strike.

The investigation of grievances prior to presentation to management is a time-honored practice in our industry. Our places of employment are vast, usually covering many acres of ground. An employee-representative (steward) whose responsibility it is to represent the aggrieved person, may be stationed many yards from the point of the supposed infraction.

To present the case properly, he must have time to ascertain the facts. Sometimes, after investigation, he may find that there is no basis for complaint. Then he tells the complainant that there is no grievance. The steward will explain the contract, the Government regulation or shop practices; the worker will be satisfied, at least in part.

If the complaint was justified, the steward would proceed to take up the grievance, usually settling it with the foreman.

In all this, because of adequate investigation and proper action by the steward, there has been little or no friction. There has certainly been no diminution of production. Nor were any festering sores permitted to grow in the field of labor-management relations.

The imminence of the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act (and its passage during the strike) led to an all-out attack upon this custom. Today, because of the language of the act, we have had to incorporate in our agreement some limitations upon grievance investigation. Without the time to investigate thoroughly, a steward refers the grievance to the next higher step. This does two things: first, it clutters up the grievance procedure and, second, it causes delays and thus creates an impression that management is stalling and the grievance machinery cannot function.

The question of the supervisors was another thing which indefinitely prolonged our strike. This topic will be dealt with later in this presentation. The question of call-in pay, because of the section in the act concerning payment for work not performed, became a burning issue during the strike, after the Taft-Hartley Act had been passed.

As a result of the break-down of the grievance machinery, there are wildcat stoppages, demonstrations, etc., which the union opposes, but for which it is expected, by management at least, to assume responsibility. Of course, management forgets that, under the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, union responsibility has been made impossible of attainment, because of the ban on the closed shop, and the limitations on the right of the union to discipline its members.

EFFECT OF THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT UPON THE UNION

The Taft-Hartley Act, in its preamble, says that its purpose is to promote industrial peace, "by encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining and by protecting the exercise by workers of full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choosing, for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment or other mutual aid or protection." With these objectives no one, in or out of the labor movement, can have a quarrel.

The act has definitely not attained the objectives mentioned in the preamble.. We do not think it advisable to burden this committee with a statement of all the trouble this union has undergone since the passage of the act, or with every single major and minor work stoppage that has occurred since the passage of the act, which was caused by the act. However, there are a number of major effects which the act has had which we think it important to stress.

1. Effect of the exclusion of supervisory employees from the benefits of collective bargaining and from the protection of the law.—The national constitution of our union forbids the inclusion of foremen within the union. However, the Taft-Hartley Act excludes all supervisory employees from the benefits of legal protection of collective-bargaining rights. This exclusion even covers work leaders in our shipyards, who are not permitted, under the NLRB interpretation of the act, to be represented by the union. These leaders, many of them, are the founders of the union.

Because of the contraction of the industry after the First World War, and the subsequent expansion during the Second World War, most of the supervisory staff in the industry below the rank of foreman, are members of our union. These are the men who were the original founders and officers of the union. The same ability which made a man recognized by his fellow men as fit for union leadership would normally cause the man to be recognized as fit for industrial leadership.

We are not here talking of ship foremen. We are talking about the little straw bosses who merely have the power to lead a small group of men on a job. Some of them were hourly paid employees, and still remain so. Some of them were on a salary. They were not challenged to any great extent as members of the union until the Taft-Hartley Act came into being.

Naturally, when a company seeks to discredit a union, the first weapon it will use is to strike at the leaders of such union. Where the leadership, because of the composition of the industry, is mostly contained in the lowest ranks of supervision, the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act made it extremely simple for a company to undertake a campaign of wholesale intimidation and discrimination. Virtual reigns of terror prevailed in some of our shipyards.

Let us illustrate by one example. In the Maryland Drydock Shipyard, a good deal of the leadership of the union was in the lowest supervisory ranks, that is, among working leaders and leaders. We had been fighting since 1943 to be recognized as the collective-bargaining agent for this group. (Although the Wagner Act never removed the protection of its prevention of unfair labor practices against the supervisors, the NLRB for some time would not certify unions of rank-and-file employees as the collective-bargaining representatives of supervisors.)

After the Jones & Laughlin case, when the Board decided that the same group which represented rank-and-file workers might also represent supervisory groups, we won an election and were recognized as the representatives of leaders and working leaders. Then the Taft-Hartley Act was passed, which removed even the protection of the guaranty against unfair labor practices from supervisors, and the shipyard strike of 1947 intervened.

Immediately after the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, and during the strike, the company established, with certain of its supervisory employees, a Maryland Drydock Supervisors' Association and signed a contract with this association.

All of the supervisory employees who refused to cross the union's picket lines during the strike were either demoted or discharged immediately after the strike was over.

When the union brought the case of a great number of these supervisors to arbitration, the arbiter was forced to rule that, under the provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act, he had no authority to hear the case. In March of 1948 we filed with the NLRB in Baltimore, a charge by this union that, by its intimidation of supervisors and others, the company is clearly seeking to intimidate rank-and-file employees to such an extent that this comes under the unfair labor provisions of even the Taft-Hartley Act. Yet, the Board's Baltimore office has indicated it intends to dismiss these charges, after 1 year of inaction.

The case of the supervisors in Maryland Drydock, under the Taft-Hartley Act, is clearly set forth by some of the statements of these leaders and working leaders. (A few of them are submitted herewith as exhibit B.)

We do not care to inundate this committee with statements of supervisors all over the country. We think that these two statements are clearly indicative of what has been happening under the act.

In the case of the Bethlehem Steel Co., this union has been fighting since the 1947 strike to correct discrimination shown by the Bethlehem Steel Corp. against its leaders and work leaders. Finally, an arbiter's award was recently handed down sustaining the position of the union in this case in all particulars.

After the settlement of the Bethlehem strike, the company and the union signed a side letter of agreement, agreeing that the company would not discriminate against any employee for participation in the strike, and the union would not discriminate against anyone who did not participate. Despite the agreement, the company demoted 74 leaders who refused to scab.

The union brought up the leaders' case under this side letter of agreement immediately after the strike. The decision in favor of the union was handed down on April 20, 1948, ordering the company to reinstate the supervisors and to negotiate with the union on the question of which ones should be reinstated. Negotiations were completely unsuccessful, and the case was brought back to the umpire shortly thereafter. Hearings were held during September, October, and November, and the final decision was handed down in February 1949.

It may as well be stated that the umpire felt so strongly on the matter that, for the first time in the history of arbitration with this company, he assessed future damages if the company failed to comply with the award.

(These two arbiters' decisions are herewith attached as exhibits C and D.)

Had we had to rely upon the Taft-Hartley Act, these 74 leaders would have been without remedy.

No one truly conversant with modern industrial establishments can claim that the wage differentials paid to the lower ranks of supervision are sufficient to repay such employees for their noncoverage by legal safeguards against discrimination, intimidation, and other forms of unfair labor practices. Is a 10 to 20 cents an hour wage differential to preclude a supervisor from supporting a bona fide strike of rank-and-file employees? Is such a wage differential to subject him to discriminatory discharge, unprotected by law, and unappealable to any Government agency? Can the Congress actually mean to go back to the days when blacklists and "yellow dog" contracts will be applied to supervisors?

The overwhelming evidence upon the exclusion of supervisors from the benefits and protection of laws protecting collective-bargaining rights, is that this means discrimination, intimidation, and terrorism among the rank and file.

2. The Norfolk Shipbuilding Co. case, and the effect of the transfer of the office of general counsel to an autonomous division.—The Norfolk Shipbuilding Co. case has been going on since 1944, as far as this union is concerned. The introduction of the Taft-Hartley Act caused this case to drag for 2 years, from 1947 until 1949, until court enforcement could be obtained.

In June of 1944, the union petitioned for a collective-bargaining election in the yard of the Norfolk Shipbuilding Corp. The NLRB ordered this election, which then went into a run-off on October 10, 1944. The Board certified the union as the collective-bargaining agent for the yard.

After the union had been certified as the collective-bargaining agent for the yard, we requested negotiations with the company. The company refused to negotiate. The case was brought to the attention (since the war was on) of the National War Labor Board's Shipbuilding Commission, which ordered the company to negotiate. The company still refused to negotiate a contract.

The case was then brought back to the Shipbuilding Commission, and eventually to the National War Labor Board, which handed down the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement in 1945. The company refused to sign the collective-bargaining agreement.

All during 1944 and 1945, the company was discharging union members. The union was continually filing unfair labor charges before the NLRB.

Finally, in January of 1946, the NLRB held a hearing on the unfair labor practice charges. The trial examiner issue an intermediate trial report sustaining the position of the union on April 16, 1946. The company appealed this intermediate report to the full Board. A hearing was held by the full Board and the Board issued an order sustaining the position of the union in August of 1946. The Board order required the reinstatement of all the employees discharged, with full pay for time lost.

The company proceeded to ignore the order of the Board and waited for the Board to take the case to court. However, as this committee will remember, the Board at that time was very much rushed, and just as the Board was about to take the case to court, the Taft-Hartley Act was passed. From the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, we waited until November 1948 until we were notified that the Board had instituted proceedings against the company in the Fourth Circuit of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals. This was 1½ years since the passage of the act. Presumably, the office of the general counsel was too busy to take the case to court. The union had no right to take the case to court, which we would have done before the case was taken before the circuit court. Naturally, the court ordered the company to comply with the NLRB order.

This type of delay in prosecution of a union's unfair labor practice charges is not a single instance. We have been informed by other unions that the same thing has happened to them in more than one case.

3. General experience with the workings of the Taft-Hartley Act.—The unworkability and rank stupidity of many of the sections of the act have been increasingly acting as a goad in our negotiations and in the general functioning of the union.

Our union, while opposed to the act, has complied with its provisions. We needed no act to make our financial statements available to our members or the public, this was always done, or to declare that we were non-Communist.

In September 1941, we incorporated into our national constitution a clause which says, "Communists, Nazis, or Fascists, or members of the Ku Klux Klan, or anyone adhering to these philosophies shall be barred from holding positions of responsibility or authority in this union or any of its subdivisions, and any person advocating the overthrow of the Constitution of the United States shall be barred from office in this union."

At our convention held during February 1948, the delegates instructed our union to continue vigorous opposition to the act, but, at the same time, to comply with its registration provisions. We shall continue to oppose the law, yet, until the law is amended, repealed, or declared unconstitutional, we would like to comply. Under the act and its present interpretation, we cannot.

According to the present interpretation of the act, our financial report must be filed 1 day after the end of the union's fiscal year. This is impossible. We request an extension and the union is granted 90 days in which to file its national financial report and those of its constituent locals. We have over 100 locals who come under the act. We cannot, unless a prohibitive sum is expended for auditing services, complete all necessary audits. Therefore, this union which is instructed by its convention, because of interpretation of the act, may be forced to channel all of its cases involving the NLRB through the national organization, for the locals will have to be in noncompliance, although all of the affidavits will be filed and although the union and its locals have signified the intention to comply.

Employers have used the act to bedevil us in negotiations. One instance comes to mind immediately, that of the Merrill-Stevens Shipyard in Florida.

We have within our ranks many ship-repair employees. These men may not have steady work. Yet they are required to report to their jobs. For a number of years, in order to compensate these workers for their carfare, etc., our contracts mutually agreed to by management and labor, and approved during the war by public agencies, have contained call-in pay provisions which stated that when a worker was ordered to report, and there was no work available, he was compensated for his time and expenses (and some of our members travel considerable distances to report to work) by the payment of a sum representing a specified and agreed-upon number of hours pay.

The Merrill-Stevens attorneys seemed to think that this payment or the payment of an increase retroactively was in violation of the act. Whether it was or not was resolved; meanwhile the negotiations were fruitless and protracted.

There is much red tape and even more silly interpretations. One such insists that sergeant-at-arms are officers of our local unions, even though our national constitution spells out in article IV, section 11, the number and titles of our local union officers. This constitutional provision states "each local shall annually elect a president, vice president, recording secretary, treasurer, financial or executive secretary and three trustees by the vote of the local membership." These constitute our local union officers. Subsequent sections spell out their duties.

In a separate paragraph in the same section is the following: "The president shall appoint a sergeant-at-arms and sentinels to assist him in maintaining order and to see that all members present at meetings are in good standing."

It is evident that a sergeant-at-arms who is appointed and not elected, and whose sole function is to help the president maintain order, is not an officer of the local union. He has no greater responsibility, other than aforementioned, than any other rank-and-file member in shaping policy or in the carrying on of the union's business. But the Board insists that he file affidavits as an officer of the local, even though the local president may choose to appoint a different member at each meeting to serve in this capacity.

This may seem picayunish, but it is a problem for us. Not only is the act, in our opinion, unfair and burdensome to unions, but the interpretations make it even more onerous.

Some of our locals' members are engaged in repairing and maintaining ships. Employment in this field, as in the building trades, is intermittent. Contractors cannot maintain permanent staffs. The union, prior to the passage of the act, maintained hiring halls for the convenience of such employers. In this way, a constant source of labor was available as jobs were let.

This eliminated the vicious "shape-up," with the men waiting around until a foreman chose a "gang." It helped build up a corps of permanent employees; it reduced the casualness of jobs and it helped stabilize waterfront employment. At the same time, it gave the waterfront worker, because of steadier employment, an opportunity to develop skills and competence. It helped stabilize his income and gave him a chance to plan a better home life on the basis of steady income. More important than this, the hiring hall eliminated on the water-front the pernicious and criminal practice of the "kick-back." No longer did a worker secure a day's work by bribing a foreman or by working under the scale.

When ships dock, they need to be cleaned and may have need for minor repairs. These are performed at dock side, and must be done quickly as the ship invariably has a schedule to maintain.

Some days there may be more work than men available, other days, less. By eliminating the closed shop and the concommittant hiring hall, waterfront labor is in serious jeopardy of having to return to the days of the "auction block" with its slave-like conditions of bidding for human labor.

Gentlemen, we submit that according to the protestations of the proponents of the Taft-Hartley Act, the law was designed to promote industrial peace; in this instance it attempts to do this at the expense of human dignity and justice.

In one port we have a local with about 50 collective-bargaining agreements with employers who contract for dock-side work.

Without a hiring hall, these employers, none of whom are gigantic in terms of financial resources, must maintain a crew even if there is no available work, so that these men will be ready when work becomes available. We wonder if this is not a violation of that section of the act which prohibits pay unless work is performed. We do know that this is costly, uneconomical, and solves no problems. The local representing these employees has about 1,000 members. Under "closed shop" agreements, the employers would call the union office and request sufficient workers to perform a specific job. The union would see to it that competent labor was provided, allocating the work so that each member received a fair share of the work on the basis of skills required.

All this is illegal now. Serious problems arise; there is constant bickering and the contractors now vie with each other for particular men. Certainly, this is not conducive to industrial peace.

There is much more that is oppressive to labor in the act. We would like to cite another instance, occurring during our recent strike because of the act. A small group of scabs attempted to form a union, and petitioned for an election while our members were in the picket line. Only the settlement of the strike, made possible by the loyalty of the majority, forestalled the creation, through connivance, of what could only have been a company union.

The act is truly unworkable. The union does not like to bother the Members of the Congress of the United States with its problems, but, as many of you have been administrators, we think you will understand what we mean when we say that the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act has caused us to issue over 100 form letters of instruction to our locals (these are 100 different letters of instruction); has caused us to maintain a new series of files which contain absolutely nothing but locals' filings under the act, so that we can check when these filings are lost, as they frequently are; has caused us to purchase 10 new filing cabinets and all the supplies incidental thereto, and has taken one person full time to do absolutely nothing but see that the locals remain in compliance under the act.

SUMMARY

This union had had long experience in attempting to solve the basic fundamental issues, which cause peace in collective bargaining, on a tripartite basis.

If restrictive and offensive labor legislation and regulation is allowed to continue, the progress of labor relations in this country will be marked by increased strife, increased disruption, and increased accumulation of hatreds which may take generations to wipe out. The Taft-Hartley Act, to our minds, is such legislation. It will not lead to industrial peace. In our own case, it has already led to industrial unrest and intensified antagonism between management and labor.

There is no doubt that the demands which shipyard management made upon the union and which led directly to the shipyard strike of 1947 were based upon a prescience of the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act. The passage of the act in the midst of that strike prolonged the strike for many months.

The Taft-Hartley Act has not attained the objective of promoting industrial peace. The exclusion of supervisory employees from the legal protection of collective-bargaining rights; from protection against discrimination, intimidation, and other forms of unfair labor practices, made it extremely simple for a company to undertake a campaign of wholesale intimidation and discrimination against union leadership, where such leadership is contained in the lower supervisory ranks.

The Taft-Hartley Act, because of the division of powers between the Board and its general counsel, has delayed prosecution and court charges in cases of labor's unfair labor charges against an employer. It has not delayed prosecution of unions.

The Taft-Hartley Act is cumbersome, unwieldy, and many of its minor provisions are completely unworkable. The exclusion of the hiring hall restored, in many instances, the vicious "shake-up" on the waterfront. It returned the hiring of longshore workers to the days of the auction block.

The Taft-Hartley Act has intinitely facilitated the formation of company unions.

The Taft-Hartley Act will mean the virtual end of any union which will strike to obtain legitimate collective-bargaining objectives, because of the recognition of scab labor.

In summary, we must conclude that the longer this law remains on the statute books, the longer will be the period required to erase its history from the minds of labor, and the longer will be the period required to quieten the antagonism and hatreds which have arisen between labor and management as a result of this act.

THE STORY OF SHIPBUILDING STABILIZATION; A TRIPARTITE AGREEMENT

Early history.—On November 27, 1940, Mr. Sidney Hillman, at that time Commissioner in charge of the Labor Division of the National Defense Advisory Commission (subsequently appointed Associate Director General of the Office of Production Management), announced the creation of the Shipbuilding Stabilization Committee, composed of repreesntatives of labor, the shipbuilding industry, the United States Navy, the United States Maritime Commission, and the OPM.

At the time the committee was organized labor shortages were already occurring in certain shipbuilding occupations. This was especially true of ship carpenters, loftsmen, and shipfitters, while there was also an inadequate supply of marine architects, shop electricians, marine gas-engine machinists, and template makers. A 500-percent increase of the total number of workers in the industry was expected by September 1942, according to the estimates of the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Experience during the First World War had proven how exceedingly grave were the problems created by an even lesser expansion in the shipbuilding industry. Strikes had occurred in the summer and fall of 1917 with the country already at war. Practically the entire shipbuilding program on the Pacific coast was disrupted. The system of competitive bidding was leading on the one hand to a spiralling of wages and pyramiding of costs to the Government, and on the other to futile movement of men from yard to yard and city to city.

In the fall of 1940 there existed an extreme lack of wage uniformity. Skilled burners and welders along the Atlantic coast were being paid as much as $1.267 and as little as $0.621. This was leading to unnecessary migration of labor and adversely affecting production.

The committee was established, as stated by Mr. Hillman, to explore ways and means of stabilizing employment in the country's shipyards, in order to insure the most efficient and speedy construction of ships for defense. It was generally understood that the committee would undertake a detailed investigation of wage rates and working conditions, with particular emphasis upon the migration of workers from yard to yard, and its effect upon production. At the time the Shipbuilding Stabilization Committee was appointed it was suggested that if the stabilization plan worked out satisfactorily it might later be applied to aircraft construction. Stabilization was acceptable to all three interested groups. Labor favored it because such a system was akin to its desire for uniformity of pay for equivalent jobs. The industry saw in stabilization an opportunity to remove one item of competition normally beyond their control, unequal labor costs. Government, of course, wanted more and more ships with stabilized wages and costs.

The first members of the Shipbuilding Stabilization Committee were as follows:

(1) Labor.—(a) AFL—Harvey Brown, president of the International Association of Machinists, and John P. Frey, president of the metal trades department; (b) CIO—John Green, president of the Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America, and Philip H. Van Gelder, secretary of the same union.

(2) Industry.—Gregory Harrison, for the Pacific shipyards; H. Gerrish Smith, president of the National Council of American Shipbuilders, for the Great Lakes shipyards; E. A. Lidell, for the Gulf shipyards; and Prof. H. L. Seward, representing the Atlantic shipyards.

(3) Contracting agencies.—Joseph W. Powell, special assistant to the Secretary of the Navy (Capt. C. W. Fisher, U. S. Navy, as alternate, Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission).

(4) OPM—Morris L. Cooke, industrial engineering consultant to the Labor Division of the OPM, chairman, and Thomas L. Morton, executive secretary.

The shipbuilding industry group which met to formulate a policy for the shipbuilding stabilization committee, was truly representative of the views of management, because the 21 members present represented 42 yards employing at least 90 percent of the workers in the industry. It cannot be said that management was forced into its participation in the shipbuilding stabilization agreements. All of the parties agreed that the zone standards agreements were to be formulated by national zonal conferences in four zones, and were to be arrived at by a process of collective bargaining resulting in unanimous concurrence with the provisions of the agreements.

The first zone standards agreement to be negotiated was one covering all shipyards doing new construction work on the Pacific Coast. The Bethlehem Steel Co., shipbuilding division, declined to participate in the conference to formulate the agreement on this coast, but declared its willingness to abide by the working standards agreed upon by the conference. The agreement drawn up on the Pacific coast was submitted to the principals and reviewed and accepted by them, including management, the procurement agencies representing Government and labor. This Pacific zone standards agreement merely set general principles. In this Pacific conference at the first session only labor and management were active conferees. In all other conferences, the Government took an active part.

The Pacific coast zone conference finished formulation of the zone standards on April 21, 1941. The three remaining zone conferences were held as scheduled for the Gulf coast, the Atlantic coast, and the Great Lakes. The Gulf coast zone standards agreement was more detailed than those of the other zones, because both the employers and the union representatives on the Gulf coast wanted to incorporate the zone standards bodily into local agreements rather than to translate general working conditions into specific clauses.

All four zone standards agreements set the following types of working conditions:

Standard skilled mechanics' rate on all zones but the Gulf, $1.12; Gulf zone, $1.07.

Overtime rates.

Night-shift premium.

No-strike and no-lock-out pledge.

Agreement on arbitration for all disputes.

A provision against limitation on production.

A duration clause.

The zone standards were not local collective-bargaining agreements. The provisions of the zone-standards agreements were incorporated into the local agreements, sometimes in toto and sometimes by reference. They were zonal agreements between management, Government, and labor.

It was felt that the shipbuilding stabilization committee alone, under whose auspices the zone conferences were called, would have the power to interpret the zone standards.

In 1942 the shipbuilding stabilization committee was revised. Industry evinced a desire to have 12 representatives instead of 6 (industry acted through the National Council of American Shipbuilders), and later it again increased representation. The Government added 2 representatives of the War Department.

An administrative order of Donald Nelson on August 1, 1942, established the new committee, giving it the following powers:

(a) To develop procedures for and conduct an annual review, and, if necessary, special reviews of wage rates; to recommend and take appropriate steps to bring about such changes in wage rates as the review indicates are required.

(b) To consider and determine all questions with respect to interpretation, application, and coverage of zone standards and the securing of compliance therewith provided that the committee shall not alter or amend the zone standards (which can only be done by zone or national conference).

(c) To establish or maintain approximate uniformity within zones or subzones in respect to length of shifts.

The committee was not granted the authority to alter or amend existing local agreements, except where such agreements were in conflict with zone standards.

When war broke out in December of 1941, it was contended that continuous operation of shipyards was necessary. The Pacific coast zone groups had a conference on January 13 and 14, 1942, which agreed to abolish calendar premium days, to pay time and one-half for the sixth shift, and double time for the seventh shift and holidays.

Chicago national conference.—The National Shipbuilding Conference began in Chicago on April 27, 1942. The very next day the conference recessed until May 16, leaving a working committee to dispose of its problems and to draw up national amendments to the zone standards agreements in the interim.

This conference was most important, in that it was the first time that representatives of management and labor met on a national and not on a zonal scale. It marked the beginning of Nation-wide planning for the shipbuilding industry, and the elimnation of wage differentials for "standard skilled mechanics." At many points during the meeting, it very much looked as if the conference would be forced to adjourn without accomplishing anything, but finally the zone standards were amended to the satisfaction of the majority, and accepted by unanimous vote.

The meeting had originally been called to arrive at a uniform national system of wage adjustments to the rising cost of living, which had not been done by the first zone standards. The faulty adjustment clauses in the zone agreements had raised the question of the specified wage adjustments scheduled in each of the four zones. It was recognized that price stabilization, as promised by the Office of Price Administration, would probably shift the level of retail prices in the United States back to that of the middle of March 1942. If this were to be the case, and the wage adjustment clauses in the zone standards agreements were to be acted upon before this became effective, after such price stabilization had been established, the real wages of shipyard workers would be higher than those of any other group in the community. Moreover, if wages were actually adjusted according to zone standards, the latter would become more divergent than ever before; and the practical measure of stabilization achieved throughout the country—$1.07 per hour for the Gulf Coast zone, and $1.12 for the other three zones would be ruined. For example, according to a weighted percentage change in the cost of living, that of the Gulf Coast rose 12 percent, the Pacific coast rose 13 percent and that of the Atlantic coast and Great Lakes area would not rise the 5 percent necessary for any wage adjustment as authorized by zone standards.

At the final meeting of this conference "Amendments to the Pacific coast, Atlantic coast, Great Lakes, and Gulf Coast zone standards" were adopted and forwarded to the procurement agencies.

These amendments made the following adjustments in the four zone standards;

(a) Wage rate for all standard (or standard first class) skilled mechanics was increased to $1.20 per hour in all four zones.

(b) All other employees receive an increase of 8 cents per hour, except in the Gulf zone, where the following schedule applied:

Wage rate per hour:	Increase, cents
Up to 69½ cents	9
From 70 to 79½ cents	10
From 80 to 89½ cents	11
From $0.90 to $1.06½ cents	12
$1.07 and above	13

(c) Upon inclusion of repair work in the Pacific coast zone standards, this increase, retroactive to April 1, was to apply. (The Pacific coast zone standards were the only agreements which did not include repair and conversion work.)

(d) Rates to remain in effect until June 1, 1943, on or about which date, and yearly thereafter, a wage review shall be conducted under procedure to be developed by the Shipbuilding Stabilization Committee.

(e) Calendar premium days were to be abolished.

(f) Sixth shift worked—time-and-one-half rate.

(g) Seventh shift worked—double-time rate.

(h) The following were to be considered shifts worked:

(1) Time lost through injuries in the course of employment.

(2) Time lost through lack of work, or other reasons beyond employees's control.

(3) Time lost because of holiday shut-down.

(i) Overtime and shift premiums for repair and conversion work to be referred to zone conferences.

(j) Employees might waive right to vacations, but should receive vacation pay, over and above wages for work, at the time the vacation was due.

(k) Establish training programs.

(l) The shipbuilding stabilization committee has no power to alter or amend zone standards, but shall interpret and apply them.

(m) The shipbuilding stabilization committee might convene conferences to establish approximate uniformity in length of shifts.

(n) The effective dates for the above provisions were:

(1) Pacific coast, April 1.
(2) Atlantic coast, June 23.
(3) Gulf coast, August 1.
(4) Great Lakes, June 2.

Further, the zone standards agreements were altered to apply for the duration of the national emergency, as proclaimed by the President of the United States. This was also unanimous.

It should be noted that the abolition of calendar premium days in the shipbuilding industry took place almost 4 months prior to President Roosevelt's Executive Order 9240.

Later history—Wage reviews.—Because of the issuance on October 3, 1942, of Executive Order 9250, the wage reviews of 1943 and 1944 as outlined by the Chicago amendments to the zone standard agreements were held by the National War Labor Board. The wage review for 1945 was held by the National Shipbuilding Conference in Colorado Springs, where an 18 cents per hour increase was granted by majority vote of Government and labor, with management dissenting. However, all parties to the Colorado National Conference agreed that the zone standards themselves could only be amended by unanimous consent.

Since the 1945 wage review had been postponed until December, it was felt by the stabilization committee that to hold the 1946 wage review at the customary time, in June, would be meaningless. Therefore, the stabilization committee voted to hold the 1946 wage review in January of 1947. The shipbuilding workers still have an equity in the 1945 wage review which has not yet been held. Even if the national emergency were declared at an end by the President of the United States or by joint resolution of Congress, the equity of the workers in the 1946 wage review to be conducted under the auspices of the shipbuilding stabilization committee would still remain, and the review, according to the promise of the committee, would still have to be held.

Since the wage review of 1945, management has been taking the attitude that the zone standards agreements should be done away with, even prior to the end of the national emergency. As a matter of fact, eight management members of the shipbuilding stabilization committee have submitted their resignations to this committee. Management does not want to abide by its agreement of 1941 and 1942. It is trying unilaterally to dissolve its collective-bargaining contract. Labor takes the position that management cannot be allowed unilaterally to dissolve a collective-bargaining agreement, even though such agreement be national in its scope. Such allowance of dissolution by a single party would lead to the abrogation with impunity of every collective-bargaining agreement in the United States. Management must abide by its contract and by its pledged word.

The termination of the zone standards agreements was set by the Chicago amendment to such agreements at the end of the national emergency. This termination date can be changed only by the unanimous consent of all parties, because to change this date would be amending the zone standards. Also, to change participation in the zone standards agreements can be done only by unanimous consent, because it would, in effect, be amending these standards. Thus, one party cannot withdraw without the consent of the other two. The termination date of the zone standards agreements cannot be changed except by the unanimous consent of the parties.

During the wage review of 1945 the Government procurement agencies indicated their desire to withdraw from participation in the national conference, although promising to recognize the force and effect of the zone standards agreements. Both management and labor refused to allow a party to the zone standards to withdraw without unanimous consent, and would not give the Government agencies consent to withdraw.

Management has attempted to stop the working of the shipbuilding stabilization committee itself by refusing to have a quorum present at the last two meetings of the committee. This is an indirect method of single-handed and arbitrary elimination of responsibility under the collective agreements.

This union has always taken the position that the zone standards agreements and the stabilization committee should be continued after the termination of the state of national emergency, as proclaimed by the President of the United States. The other two parties to the zone standards agreements—namely, management and Government—have refused to agree to our proposal to extend the termination date of the zone standards agreements. In turn, they cannot shorten or abridge the termination date of the zone standards agreements without unanimous consent, nor can they destroy the previous action of the shipbuilding stabilization committee setting the 1946 wage review date for January 1947 without destroying the effectiveness of the zone standards agreements.

Even when the President of the United States abolished all wage and salary controls he recognized the equity of labor in awards and gains previously granted by the wage and salary stabilization bodies.

The shipbuilding workers have such an equity in the 1946 wage review. This cannot be destroyed without a complete abrogation of the tripartite collective agreement.

The amendments to the zone standards agreements adopted at Chicago specifically stated the following with regard to the wage review:

"The rates herein established and put into effect shall remain in effect until June 1, 1943, on or about which date a wage review shall be conducted under procedures to be developed by the shipbuilding stabilization committee and thereafter annually on or about June 1, a like review will be conducted by that committee."

Management, by refusing to allow a quorum of its representation to be present at the last two meetings of the stabilization committee, and thus obstructing the conduct of the wage review, is not abiding by the terms of its contract, which is still in full force and effect.

Management is attempting unilateral abrogation of a tripartite agreement.

EXHIBIT B

STATEMENT OF FRANK W. BEMRICK

(Age, 42; electrician leader)

JANUARY 22, 1948.

History of employment.—My last period of employment at the Maryland Drydock Co. began in August 1933. My hourly rate at that time was 62½ cents an hour. I was not rated as a first- or second-class electrician at that time, but instead I was classified merely as an electrician.

During the time between the date of my employment and February 1939 I received numerous increases in pay, all of which were small (a few cents an hour). The increase referred to here raised my hourly earnings up to 86 cents an hour, and the increase (2 cents an hour) received as a result of the first agreement between local No. 31 of the Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America and the company raised my hourly rate of pay up to 86 cents an hour.

As stated above, I was merely rated as an electrician, but the newly signed agreement brought with it four classifications of electricians and four rates of pay, two each for the first- and second-class classification. The rates of hourly pay were 76 and 82 cents an hour for second-class electricians, and 88 and 94 cents for first-class electricians.

A group of electricians, one of whom was myself, filed grievances for increases in pay which, if granted, would have raised our hourly earnings up to 94 cents. The grievances referred to here were filed early in 1940, and the company denied our requests.

However, late in the summer of 1940 I finally received the top rate of pay (94 cents an hour) for first-class electricians.

In September 1940 I was promoted to the position of temporary supervisor and received a bonus of 5 cents an hour for the supervisory responsibilities and duties required of temporary supervisors. I was assigned to work on the night shift (4:30 p. m. to 12:30 a. m.). I also received 5 percent of my base rate for the first 8 hours of work on the night shift. When I was required to work beyond the end of the second shift (12:30 a. m.), the payment of the night-shift differential promptly ended, but, of course, I received a premium of time and one-half after the first 8 hours of work.

My duties on the second shift consisted primarily of the supervision of electricians who were installing degaussing systems. Degaussing systems are a layer or coil of numerous electrical wires that protect ships against magnetic mines which, at the time, were proving to be quite devastating to Allied shipping.

Effective March 3, 1941, I was one of hundreds of other employees who received an hourly increase of 6 cents which raised my base pay up to $1 an hour. The hourly increase coupled with an additional 5 cents an hour premium raised my total hourly earnings up to $1.10 an hour.

The increase in the base rate and the added bonus for temporary supervision resulted from demands by the local union. Needless to say, the company reluctantly agreed to the union's demands.

I was now working on the day shift, having been reassigned to it early in 1941.

In June 1941, the shipbuilding stabilization commission granted the shipyard workers an increase of 12 percent an hour which raised my base rate up to $1.12 an hour. Again, in June of 1942, the shipbuilding stabilization commission awarded the shipyard workers an increase of 8 cents per hour. The shipbuilding stabilization commission award raised my base pay up to $1.20 an hour.

I was still receiving the hourly premium of 10 cents for temporary supervision. The term "temporary supervisor" can be best described as a misnomer because I had supervised other employees continuously since first receiving a promotion to that level.

On September 21, 1942, I was promoted to the next highest level of supervision—working leader. Because the bonus (10 cents) for temporary supervision had increased my hourly earnings to $1.30 an hour, the increase (8 cents) received as a result of promotion to working leader raised my total hourly earnings up to $1.38 an hour.

On July 12, 1943, I was again promoted, this time to the position of leader. The promotion carried with it an hourly increase of 5 cents which boosted my base rate up to $1.43.

I did not receive any more wage increases until February 5, 1945, when I was granted an hourly increase of 5 cents, but I still retained the classification of leader. This increase, of course, did not affect my supervisory status, but it did result in raising my hourly earnings up to $1.48.

In May 1946, the local union was finally able to force the company to effectuate an 18-cents-an-hour wage increase for its employees. The award had been made by the shipbuilding stabilization commission. As a result of the effectuation of the shipbuilding stabilization commission award, my hourly rate of pay was raised to $1.66.

My last wage increase (18 cents) came in August 1947, and it was the result of an agreement between the company and a newly formed supervisors' organization which is known as the Maryland Drydock Supervisors' Association.

Commendation for excellent work.—I am forced to admit that my foreman never praised my work, but top representatives of management quite frequently praised my work as well as that of other supervisors.

On or near the commission dates for naval auxiliaries or other large outfitting and reconversion jobs, the company's representatives, almost invariably, called together the supervisors in charge of the jobs and highly praised them for their excellent work. The jobs referred to here are mentioned in the latter part of this statement.

The company officials who praised us were: John McLay, works manager and vice president; Fred Liedtke, assistant works manager; Gerald Stein, production superintendent; Joseph Murphy, production superintendent.

As stated above, my foreman, William Seifert, never praised my work at any time, but he did tell me in 1944 that I was the only supervisor capable of supervising a big rewiring job on the steamship E. H. Blum.

The originally installed wiring proved to be defective which necessitated rewiring the engine room in its entirety.

I supervised the installation of all new electrical cables (feeders) for machinery, ranging from ventilators (fans) to the fire pump, the largest single piece of electrically driven machinery. Other pieces of electrically driven equipment included: ice machine; forced-drafe motors, forward, center, and starboard; air compressors, aft and forward; cargo priming pumps: forward, center, and starboard main circulators, forward and aft; and many other motors and machines too numerous to mention.

The feeders installed ranged in size from 2 conductor, 6,530 circular mills (an electrical term denoting the electrical conductivity of cables) to others which were 3 conductor, 250,000 circular mills. The length of the cable varied from 30 to 180 feet.

The ship's owners' (Atlantic Refining Co.) representative was Mr. Lee Lineburg, chief electrical inspector, who later asked me to assume responsibility for a big electrical job similar to one which had caused the company serious trouble which resulted from damaged cables.

I told Mr. Lineburg that I could not select my jobs, but I could do only what my foreman, William Seifert, told me to do.

Union activity.—I was a member of local 31 from its inception in the fall of 1938, and I am still a member in good standing.

I was elected to positions on the union's negotiating and grievance committees and served on both until my terms expired. The negotiating committee's duties terminated with the signing of an agreement by the company and the union on February 21, 1940, but the grievance committee served the union for the full year 1940.

I was elected shop steward of the electrical department in December 1940, and served the department until April 1941.

I was the union's representative on the safety advisory board of the company for the year 1940. I attended a safety school, and I also attended, as a company representative, a conference of shipyard representatives which was held in New York City. Mr. George H. French, president of the company, attended the conference, and he was accompanied by Messrs. W. P. Hall and George A. Bopp, assistant to the president and personnel manager, respectively.

I was one of the union's supervisory witnesses at the NLRB hearing in April 1943. Mr. M. H. Goldstein represented the union, and the hearing was before Mr. Will Maslow, trial examiner, for the Board. I was a working leader at that time.

I was reelected to the local union's trial board in 1943 and served on the board until the end of 1945. The period served on the board exceeded 2 years.

I was elected shop steward for the supervisors on the night shift, and served until the expiration of the agreement for supervisory employees. The agreement was signed by both parties in December of 1946, and it expired June 23, 1947. The agreement provided for maintenance of membership, and the check-off of dues which obviously revealed that I was a member of the union. The company was also notified that I was one of the union's shop stewards for supervisors.

I was also a member of the union's top strike committee in 1946 and 1947—the strike policy-making body of the local union.

I was picket captain for the local union daily from 9:30 p. m. until 9:30 a. m. In order to enter the plant, the company's top executives were forced to cross our picket lines. They, undoubtedly, saw me at the head of the picket line as I was certainly conspicuous enough. Officials of the company who saw me were: Messrs. French, Hall, McLay, Jory, Murphy, Dauterich, Bopp, Stein, and Lake who hold the respective positions of president, vice president, vice president and works manager, assistant to the president, production superintendent, industrial relations manager, personnel manager, production superintendent, and employment manager.

Of course, many others too numerous to mention observed my militant conduct on the picket line.

While picketing the company in July 1947, Mr. Jerry Hnyla, assistant foreman of the electrical department, told me that William Seifert, my foreman, wanted me to call him by phone.

I phoned Mr. Seifert the same morning, and he asked me numerous questions. He wanted to know if I was in favor of the strike, and I told him that my daily presence on the picket line plainly indicated that I was. In reply to another of Mr. Seifert's questions, I told him that I was very much in favor of belonging to the same union that represented the nonsupervisory workers, and, of course, I was solidly for the union.

Mr. Seifert also asked me if I wanted my vacation, and I told him that I was already on vacation.

I sent a letter to Mr. French that criticized the company's failure "to grant us our just demands." The letter also reminded Mr. French that it was "the failure of industry members of the shipbuilding stabilization to appear at the wage-review meeting last January 2, 1947," that caused the strike.

The letter also stated that Mr. French, "by attempting to resign from the stabilization committee," sabotaged "the wage functions of this committee."

The letter also urged Mr. French to "make a sincere, above-board effort to agree on a contract." And, I concluded the letter by stating that I was "standing back of local 31's negotiating committee."

Mr. French sent me a letter in reply, the text of which follows:

"Your reply to my letter of July 2 didn't tell me very much about what's on your mind. The form letter the union gave you to send me was both inaccurate and misleading. I covered that subject in my letter of July 7.

"I'm asking you, man to man, to tell me straight from the shoulder what you think about this strike. I'd like to hear from you whether you agree with me or disagree with me. Your comments and ideas may help to lead us to a settlement.

"How about it? Use the enclosed envelope. Your replies will be treated confidentially."

I attended a meeting called by Mr. French at the Lord Baltimore Hotel July 24, 1947, and walked out of the meeting when Mr. Hall took exception to some of the statements made by Vic Mastropiorio. I was one of a large group of the more militant supervisors who left the room in anger and disgust over the rotten treatment that our spokesman had received.

The company's top executives were present at the meeting, and all of the foremen and assistant foremen were there, too. Most of the working leaders, leaders, and sergeants and lieutenants of the company's guard force attended also.

Mr. French and Hall told the supervisors that the company would not bargain with local 31 for supervisors. They suggested that the supervisors form an independent union. The supervisors elected a negotiating committee which negotiated an agreement in the relatively short period of 1 week, and it was signed July 31, 1947.

I was one of a group of supervisors who patrolled the street in front of the Lord Baltimore Hotel and distributed leaflets and urged the supervisors not to attend the meeting.

About a week or 10 days after the agreement was signed, some of the supervisors began to return to work. Many of the supervisors remained loyal to local 31 and continued to picket the plant. Of course, as stated heretofore, I was a picket captain and could readily see and hear what happened on the line.

The pickets called the returning supervisors scabs, rats, bums, stooges, and many other uncomplimentary names that cannot—for obvious reasons—be printed here.

By publishing incorrect and padded figures of the number of supervisors who had returned to work, the company managed to swell the ranks of returning supervisors daily. The local union's leadership realized that the loyal supervisors would soon be left "holding the bag" and ordered them to return to work. It was then, and only then, that I returned to work.

After returning to work on Thursday, August 14, 1947, Mr. French called all of the supervisors together in the mold loft and told us he would tolerate no funny stuff and if any of us had a chip on our shoulders, we had better get it off. I had picketed the plant up until 9 a. m. that very morning. I worked until noon that day and knocked off as I had been picketing all night.

The next day, Friday, August 15, 1947, I applied for and received my 2-week vacation because I could not bring myself to cross the picket lines of the hard-fighting, nonsupervisory workers who still showed no signs of giving up the battle, even though the plight of many of them was rather desperate.

Several years prior to the strike in November 1943, I was one of a group of electrical supervisors who walked out of a meeting between the top executives of the company and the electrical supervisors who were demanding union recognition.

We then struck the yard for 4 days and returned to work upon being ordered to do so by our local union leaders. Many of the striking supervisors were about to be inducted into the armed services because the company had notified the draft boards that we no longer worked for them, which was, of course, an extremely essential industry.

In May 1943, I was instrumental in ending a work stoppage in the electrical department among the workers on the second shift. I was unable to locate Myril Webster, one of the assistant foremen of the electrical department, but Jerry Stein, production superintendent, helped me to convince the workers they were wrong. The electrical department was strongly organized at the time, and the men apparently trusted me because I had an excellent reputation as a unionist.

Discharge.—I was discharged by William Seifert, foreman of the electrical department, about 4:55 p. m. Wednesday, October 22, 1947. The reason given for the discharge was "unsatisfactory."

Mr. Seifert told me in the presence of John Conley, Jr., "Frank, I'm sorry, but I have to fire you." I asked Mr. Seifert if the discharge was his doings or if he had received orders from the main office. He did not give a direct answer to the question, but evasively replied, "I'm still foreman."

I was given a written pass out of the yard, and I was paid until 5 p. m. as I had started to work at 3:30 p. m. that day, which was customary for me.

During the 1½ hours spent working that day, I had lined up my subordinates (mechanics, helpers, and handymen) on four repair jobs.

I had been told at 3:30 p. m. that day by Mr. Conley that I was to report to Mr. Seifert at 4:45 p. m. When Mr. Seifert discharged me, Mr. Conley told me he was very sorry and he hoped that I would get my job back.

I have many reasons for feeling that the company retained supervisors in the electrical department who were less competent than myself and to support this contention, I will give a brief history of their employment and their capabilities or the lack of the same.

Hugh Taylor, leader.—Mr. Taylor was first employed by the company in 1940 as an electrican. He was promoted to the rank of working leader and worked under my direct supervison in 1943, and was assigned by me to supervise lighting installations (wiring and fixtures.) We were converting a ship of Dutch registry into an armed Army transport.

Mr. Taylor also worked under my direct supervison when he was still a working leader in 1943 on the 42, a ship that had been built at a Pascagoula, Miss., shipyard. It was hardly more than a hull with housing, masts, stack, boilers, engines, etc. We were completely outfitting this ship and making it into a naval auxiliary. Mr. Taylor was also in charge of lighting on this vessel. His work did not meet with my approval as he did not possess enough experience which required me to supervise him too closely, so I made arrangements (there are many methods) to prevent Mr. Taylor from being assigned to work for me on other jobs.

Mr. Taylor was promoted to leader in 1944 while he was working as a go-between for the company, and his duties required him to see that the Conlon Electric Co., a subcontractor, received all of the material it needed to complete a ship on which its men were working. He could best be described as a material checker or expediter or a materialman.

John Himes, leader.—Mr. Himes was first employed by the company in 1940 as a mechanic. He had worked for me as my helper at the United States Coast Guard depot in Curtis Bay, Md., about 1930. He was laid off or fired for playing about this time.

He has never worked under my direct supervision at the Maryland Drydock Co., but I can honestly state that he is not a marine electrician. I relieved Himos on degaussing jobs when he was working the day shift and I was working the night shift, and of course, had ample opportunity to observe that he certainly left a lot to be desired as a marine mechanic and supervisor.

It was generally known that during the war, Mr. Seifert complained bitterly about Himes losing time (absenteeism) when the jobs under his supervision reached a critical stage or as we say in the shipyard, "the going got tough."

Himes was promoted to leader in 1943 while checking on work being done by a subcontractor, Blumenthal Kahn. To the best of my knowledge, he has never been in complete charge of a big job.

Ernest Bermick, leader.—Mr. Bermick was hired as an electrician about 1941 or 1942. He worked for me as a mechanic on LST's (landing ship tanks). He was promoted to supervisor (I am not sure of the rank) a year or so after being hired. He very frequently lined up with my working leaders (day-shift men). "Lining up" is a term meaning exchanging information concerning jobs between the outgoing and incoming shifts.

When I was taken off the night shift, he took over my duties on the second shift. His work was most unsatisfactory as I had to get my men to rip out work that his men had installed which did not meet with the approval of Navy inspectors who, of course, would not O. K. it.

Richard Hogan, leader.—Mr. Hogan started to work under my supervision October 1942 on the night shift. He was classified as a helper. He was promoted to a handy man February 8, 1943. He had been a CP (constant potential) set operator (CP sets generate the current used in electric-welding operations). His duties required him to make adjustments by turning knobs which kept the machines operating efficiently. This was not a skilled or laborious task, and when women were first employed in the shipyard, they were given those jobs. About 1941 Mr. Hogan was promoted to the rank of temporary supervisor. He was demoted to electrician shortly after the end of the war in 1945 and was repromoted to working leader in 1946. He was promoted to leader shortly after

I was discharged. Hogan also worked under my direct supervision in 1947. He has less experience than Himes, Taylor, and Bernick, and he could not be relied on to do good work which required me to supervise him closely.

Himes, Taylor, Hogan, and Bernick all returned to work before the local union's leadership ordered them to do so.

John Conley, Jr., assistant foreman, electrical department, also worked for me when he was a helper and I was a mechanic.

James Gutermuth, leader, electrical department, was fired by John Baldwin, foreman, drydock department, and I arranged to get his transferred to the electrical department.

Albert Bauman also worked for me as a helper when I was a mechanic.

Vince Vaise, Charles Hart, Robert Linden, Charles Bush, George Deveau, and Jack Glennon all worked under my supervision as a mechanic, helper, or supervisor, and they are still working for the company.

All of the men named herein were hired after me.

Supervisory duties.—My duties as a supervisor required me to be at work at 3:30 p. m., which is 1 hour before the starting time of nonsupervisory employees.

The ships requiring various kinds of repairs or installations were listed in a book. The number of men who will be assigned to each job is also listed. If conditions made it necessary for a change in the work schedule, the assistant foreman was the person who informed of the change.

I had direct supervision at the time of my discharge of six gangs of men, two to a gang. I selected the men that I felt best qualified for each job and gave them the location of the ship, a written order of the work to be performed, and a written order on the storeroom for materials if the job required it.

If a ship was away from the yard, which was frequently, I arranged for the men to be transported to the job by boat or truck. When ships on which we were working were scheduled to sail, it was my responsibility to see that every reasonable effort was made to finish the job or jobs. If we could not finish the job at 12:30 p. m. (the end of the regular shift), it was necessary for me to get permission from one of the top officials from the main office to work overtime to enable the ship to meet its sailing date.

I was required to keep an accurate account of the time worked by the men on each job, and I also turned in a daily time report showing the amount of time worked by such men on each job. In addition to this, I was required to keep an accurate record of the material used on each job.

After the strike, the company began to require the presence of some of the supervisors, including myself, at the production meetings. Top management representatives were present at the meetings and production problems, work schedules, and the work schedule for Saturdays and Sundays were discussed.

An average night's work consisted of the following:

Job No. 5288, item 4 Steamship Beckley Scem, bulk-cargo carrier; install radar; two gangs; four men; location, No. 1 Pier, main yard.

Job No. 5400, item 33; Steamship Wm. Halstead, freighter; install float lights; one gang; two men; location, No. 3 Pier, Pratt Street plant.

Job No. 5140, item 99; Steamship Philip Livingston, freighter; install anchor light; one gang, two men; anchorage.

Item No. 146; Install three floodlights, one forward, two aft.

Job No. 5424, item 12; Steamship Joyce Kilmer, freighter; renew 1 glass and rim for light in crew mess; 1 gang; two men; location, Pratt Street plant.

When employed as a temporary supervisor, I received 5 cents more an hour for supervising 30 to 40 men. We were working from 8 p. m. to 8 a. m. on the Navy transport U. S. S. George B. Elliott. The job was the first big Navy reconversion. I also supervised electrical repairs on two large Navy tankers, the U. S. S. Mattole and the U. S. S. Maumee. Those jobs were reconditioning jobs.

In 1941–42, while employed as a working leader, I supervised men in the conversion of two large luxury liners into transports. The ships were the President Madison and the Tasker H. Bliss.

In 1942 I also supervised the outfitting of several LST's that had been built at the Bethlehem Fairfield shipyard.

I also supervised electrical installations on four large Navy tankers, the U. S. S. Patuxent, Stillwater, Millicoma, and Monongahela.

All of these jobs were big jobs that required a wide variety of electrical work, including wiring, power, motors, communications, fighting lights, and many other types of electrical work.

In 1943, while employed as a working leader, I was in charge of the electrical work on the U. S. S. San Gay, an Army transport and an auxiliary, the A. O. 78.

In 1943 I was in charge of the liner Keta Barce, which was being converted into a troop carrier. The conversion was scheduled to be completed in 30 days, and I had 11 supervisors and about 120 employees under my supervision and that of my 11 subordinate supervisors.

In 1944–45, while employed as a leader, I was in charge of the outfitting of numerous naval auxiliaries including the A. R. 17 and 21 and the A. R. G.'s 4 and 5. These were tremendously large jobs that required electrical work of almost every description.

I had three working leaders under my supervision, and they in turn had from three to five temporary supervisors under their supervision. Each temporary supervisor had about 12 to 20 employees under their supervision. We were outfitting two ships at the same time the A. R. G.'s 4 and 5 and the R. R. 17 and 21. I was responsible for about 100 employees on each ship.

In the latter part of 1945 I was removed from the Navy side of the yard and reassigned to the commercial side. I supervised extensive repairs to the M. V. Horbrand, which had been heavily damaged by an explosion. I also supervised a big repair job on the steamship Simon which had been badly damaged by fire. I also supervised a general overhauling of the tanker steamship Stanvac Capetown.

I was the leader in charge of the conversion and outfitting of four Victory ships into troop carriers. The ships were the Marshall, Rennsalaer, Webster, and Montclair Victorys.

I also acted as a go-between for the company and Catos & Shepherd, a subcontractor, responsible for the conversion of the ship Goucher Victory into a troop carrier.

Catos & Shepherd also attempted to convert the Rennsalaer Victory and failed, and I was given the job and completed it.

After the war, I worked at the company's Pratt Street plant for several weeks at several different times. I was in charge of all repairs of vessels berthed there.

In 1946 I also had charge of the reconversions of Navy transports steamship Mormacmoon, steamship Robin Sherwood, and the steamship Robin Wently. We were reconverting the ships into combination cargo and passenger vessels.

I also supervised the electrical work on the company's oil barge, the Jacob Pilsch, and the newly built ferry boat, Governor Herbert O'Connor.

Some of the work on the jobs listed herein required, among other things, installation of radar, telephones, alarm bells, lighting, motors, generators, fans, switchboards, public-address systems, controllers, fire-fighting systems, smoke indicators, and of course, repairs of almost every decription.

In June 1944 I was called off my vacation by Mr. Seifert and sent to the Brooklyn Navy Yard. I took 4 men with me and observed the installation of some electrical work that would be done by the Maryland Drydock Co. in the very near future.

I was also sent to look over some work on ships in the laid-up fleet in July 1946 and May 1947.

I helped to prepare an electricians' handbook which was widely used by employees in the electrical department.

Authorities.—I could recommend transfers, promotions, discharges, and suspensions, but the foreman had to give his approval and top representatives of the company had to approve all promotions and increases in pay.

I did not attend the production meetings until after the strike, and my advice was never sought as the supervisors (leaders and working leaders) merely listened to top representatives of management.

This is a factual statement, and its contents are to the best of my knowledge true.

FRANK BEMRICK.

STATEMENT OF CHARLES E. BOCK

(Age, 28; shipfitting leader)

FEBRUARY 19, 1948.

History of employment.—I was first employed at the Maryland Drydock Co., about February 1936. My classification was shipfitter helper and my rate of pay was 45 cents an hour.

I progressed from the helper's classification through the third-, second-, and first-class shipfitting classifications fairly rapidly.

I was a helper for approximately 2 years, third-class mechanic about 6 months, second-class mechanic about 6 months, and a first-class mechanic for about 6 months, after which I was promoted to the position of temporary supervisor.

The promotion to temporary supervisor occurred in 1940, and I worked as such until the autumn of 1942 when I was promoted to the position of working leader. I held the position of working leader until I was promoted to leader in 1943.

I am not sure of my hourly rates of pay up to the time I became a temporary supervisor, but I am fairly certain that I received $1.38 an hour as a working leadern until I was promoted to leader when my hourly rate of pay was changed to $1.43.

I received an hourly increase of 5 cents in February 1944, but my classification was not changed. This increase raised my hourly earnings to $1.48, which I continued to receive until all employees were granted an 18-cents-per-hour increase in May 1946.

This increase was awarded by the Shipbuilding Stabilization Commission. I received no more increase in pay until August 1947, when I received 18 cents per hour increase as a result of negotiations between the Maryland Drydock Co. and an independent union known as the Maryland Drydock Supervisors' Association.

This raised my hourly earnings to $1.84 which I was receiving on the date of my discharge.

Mr. Vernon Tydings, hull superintendent, praised the work I was doing on several occasions when I received promotion during the time I was supervising.

Mr. George Loskarn who later became hull superintendent also praised my work at the time I was rated as working leader.

Mr. Alolph Voit warmly commended me on my work just prior to the times I was about to receive promotions of a supervisory nature.

I first joined local No. 31 in February of 1939 and was a member at the time of my discharge.

I was on the supervisors' negotiating committee in 1946, and after the agreement between local No. 31 and the company was signed in December 1946. I was a shop steward for superivsors until the contract expired in June 1947.

As shop steward, I represented the shipfitters, ironworkers, and steel fabricators. These classifications represent three different departments.

I picketed very frequently during the strike and in addition to regular picket duty, I did extra duty every morning when the company was having some success in getting supervisors to cross our picket lines.

All of the company's executives could have and should have seen me on the picket line as they had to cross it to enter the plant.

Messrs. George H. French, president; John McLay, vice president; Purnell Hall, vice president; Douglas Danterich, manager of industrial relations; George Bopp, personnel manager; Harry Lake, employment manager; William Jory, assistant to the president; Adolph Voit, foreman, shipfitting department; George Roth, assistant foreman, shipfitting department; Jerry Stein, Martin Castle, Walter Goetz, and Joseph Murphy, production supervisors, main office, are some of the company's executives who crossed the line when I was picketing.

The first and only agreement for supervisors signed between local union and the company included a check-off provision which, of course, enabled the company to know that I was a member of the union.

I testified in behalf of a man who had been given a disciplinary lay-off when the union was attempting to get an arbitrator to award the man pay for all time lost.

Early in 1947 I filed a grievance for equalization of time in my department. My foreman, Mr. Voit, told me I was going to get in a lot of trouble for my union activity.

Mr. Voit called on me at my home in July 1947 at the time I was still on strike. He wanted to know how I was making out and I told him O. K. He then suggested that I might be able to do O. K. but others may not be so fortunate.

He then questioned me concerning my views on the company union and I told him that as far as I was concerned, no company union was any good for the workers.

Mr. Voit asked me how I had voted on the strike question, and I told him I had voted for the strike and was in favor of it.

Mr. Voit then asked me if I had returned the ballot sent me by Mr. French which inquired of me how I felt about the strike. I said, "No." He asked me why, and I told him I saw no sense in it.

Mr. Voit then told me I was making a serious mistake, and I had better think it over.

Just before leaving, Mr. Voit told me that the statements I had made would be held against me.

I attended a meeting called by Mr. French for supervisors July 24, 1947, and walked out in disgust and rage when Mr. Hall refused to give a union spokesman an opportunity to present our views supporting our right to representation by local 31.

At a second meeting of the supervisors, I picketed the hotel in which it was to be held, distributing leaflets and urging my fellow supervisors not to attend. This meeting was held Thursday, July 31, 1947, and on Saturday, August 9, Jack Tygeson, rigger leader, and I visited the homes of many supervisors urging them to support local 31 and to disavow any affiliation with the company union.

We were able to get numerous forms signed that provided for their support, and the previously mentioned disavowal of the company union.

I was discharged about 4:45 p. m., October 22, 1947. I was discharged by Mr. Voit and the reason given was "unsatisfactory supervisor."

On the day of my discharge, I met Mr. Voit at the entrance to the mold loft, and he motioned for me to come in the mold loft. I entered the loft and then entered Mr. Voit's office which is located in the mold loft.

Mr. Voit asked me to give him various records and drawings which listed insurance damages and illustrated the ship's construction—frames, plates, strakes, etc.

I gave them to Mr. Voit, and he handed me my discharge slip with one hand and shook hands with me with the other. He said, "Charlie, don't ask me any questions now, but you are fired."

He appeared to be terribly upset and had some difficulty in telling me of my discharge.

I accepted the release and left the yard. The next day I returned to the yard and was cleaning out my locker when Mr. Voit approached and told me not to leave the yard until I talked to him.

When I finally talked to Mr. Voit, he said, "Charlie, you know how I feel about you and your work, and I want you to know that this is none of my doings."

He also told me, "If there is any way possible, I will get you your job back."

I then went to see Mr. A. R. Leighton, president of the supervisors' union, and after he listened to my story he said that I had every right in the world to file a grievance. (The agreement between the company and the supervisors' union provides for grievance procedure.)

He told me that John Himes was the union's representative for handling grievances, left his job, and took me to see Mr. Himes. We had to walk approximately 150 to 200 yards to the ship where Himes was working. Leighton went aboard the ship to get Himes. I waited about an hour for Himes and upon returning, Leighton said, "Johnny will take care of you."

Mr. Himes then took me to see an electrician leader, Jack Devine.

After telling Himes and Devine my story, Himes asked me if I knew what it was all about and I told him I didn't.

Himes asked me if I wanted to file a grievance and I said, "Yes."

Himes then suggested talking the matter over with Mr. Voit, but after I told him that I thought Voit had nothing to do with it, he told me he would go over to the main office.

I suggested to Himes that it seemed proper for me to accompany Himes, but he refused to take me along and went to the main office alone.

He returned after about 1½ hours and told me that he could do nothing for me. I have no way of knowing whether or not he tried to help me.

Shortly after this, I met Mr. Leighton again, and he inquired about my grievance. I told him that nothing was done for me, and he then told me that he had no previous knowledge of my discharge, and he was awfully sorry.

After my return to work, Mr. French addressed a meeting of supervisory employees in the yard. He told us that he intended to make it (his talk) short and sweet. He acted very tough and stated that any supervisors entertaining ideas of breaking up the association had better get them out of their heads. He also told us that if we were looking for trouble we would get it, and if any of us had a chip on our shoulders, we had better get it off.

Gabe Matson and Chris Mack, supervisors in the fabricating shop and ironworking department, respectively, suggested to me that I ought to join the association. I interpreted this as a threat and made application for membership in the supervisors' union, but I do not know if the application was accepted.

Mr. Voit also told Fred Gavin, working leader, shipfitting department, and myself after the strike that we had better get on the right side of the fence.

Some of the shipfitting supervisors who had less seniority than I, but were retained by the company, are B. Antowiak, P. Morgan, A. Leighton, F. Gavin, R. Undutch, J. Tracy, B. Yonkin, W. Roohner, G. Kroon, J. Schmidt, and G. Bador. Bador was transferred from the labor department to the shipfitting department.

As stated herein, all of those men were promoted to supervisory positions after myself, and all of them are still supervising.

For example, A. Leighton had the extremely simple job of making some steel scrap tubs, and after completing that job he was promoted to a supervisory position.

P. Morgan, G. Bador, and G. Kroon worked under my supervision as working leaders.

I believe that my foreman recognized the inferior qualifications of the following men because they were still employed as working leaders at the time of my discharge: R. Undutch, J. Schmidt, G. Kroon, J. Tracy, B. Yonkin, and W. Roohner.

In addition to my feelings along these lines, my foreman apparently placed great trust in me because he hardly ever visited my jobs unless the main office issued a list of incomplete items and he then merely asked me questions about them.

My duties required me to report at 7:45 a. m. (15 minutes before the nonsupervisory workers) at which time I would go directly to the office of the mold loft. I then contacted my foreman to find out if he desired to discuss anything with me. I then picked up my specifications and the line up from the line-up book. By checking the line-up book, I could determine the progress made by the night-shift workers.

When my workers reported to me at 8 a. m., I assigned the men to that particular job for which I thought they were best suited. I would also tell the service craft supervisors (riggers, burners, welders, ironworkers, etc.) where they should start in order to facilitate the repairs or changes needed.

During the course of the day, I went from ship to ship (I supervised 3 to 8 ships at the same time) and checked the progress being made, made suggestions, and lent assistance wherever I could.

On occasion, I was required to attend meetings for the purpose of discussing the progress or the lack of the same on jobs to which I was assigned.

About 2:30 p. m. I prepared my leaders report which showed the badge numbers of the men under my supervision and the number of hours worked on each job. If a man worked on more than one item (job) my report had to indicate it.

I also prepared my line-up sheet which indicated the type of service and the amount needed by the workmen on the night shift in my department.

About 4 p. m. I lined up the supervisor in my department who was relieving me and explained just what I wanted done and suggested how it might best be done.

I supervised the work on many large jobs during the war including the following:

Navy tankers: A. O. 78, A. O. 77, U. S. S. Patuxent, U. S. S. Monangahela, U. S. S. Millicoma, U. S. S. Stillwater, U. S. S. Saranac.

These were new tankers that had been built in other yards, but were sent into our yard for the necessary outfitting that would make them ready for warfare.

"Old" S. S. America. This was the largest ship the Maryland Drydock Co. ever handled and was converted from an Army transport to a ship suitable for carrying GI brides and babies.

Naval auxiliaries: A. R. G. 4 repair ship, A. R. G. 5 repair ship, A. R. B.'s (several) repair ships, A. P. A. Navy transport.

These were new or relatively new ships that required a tremendous amount of converting, installing, etc.

In addition to the jobs previously listed, I supervised the conversion, outfitting, and repairing of jobs so numerous that I couldn't possibly remember all of them.

I worked on the Navy side of the yard which handled almost all of the jobs of the kind described herein. My foreman told me a number of times that my work was satisfactory, and my work on the Navy tankers must have been especially good as my foreman asked me to go on the night shift for a few weeks when the work on Navy tankers began to lag. He told me I could have my choice of any 14 men in the department, and after agreeing to try to help him, I transferred to the night shift and was able to help bring the work up to schedule. I was thanked by my foreman and the hull superintendent who was

Mr. Tydings at that time. Mr. Tydings had also been foreman of my department before Voit got the job.

I could recommend raises for the men working under my supervision, but Mr. Voit very frequently strenuously objected and very often I appealed to Mr. Francis Plagman, shop steward of our department, for help.

I was not able to effectively recommend transfers or discharges as my foreman almost always decided matters of this kind.

Before and after the strike, I attended meetings of production superintendents (main office) and supervisors of rank below or equal to myself. These meetings were called when it became necessary to discuss production problems on big jobs that were behind schedule or when the completion date of the job drew near.

The production supervisors (main office) would ask leaders and working leaders when we thought we would finish certain items and after getting our opinions, they almost always slashed the amount of time that we thought was needed.

Our suggestions were almost always ignored because the production supervisors set their own completion dates.

SUPPLEMENTAL STATEMENT OF CHARLES E. BOCK

My duties required me to lay out work, take measurements, get material, instruct and assist men under my supervision, make templates, and many other jobs normally done by men under my supervision.

Whenever men needed help, I, of course, felt that in the interest of production, I was obliged to assist them. It was necessary to use tools to instruct them and demonstrate to them the most efficient and least laborious method of doing jobs.

During the course of a day's work, I found it necessary to do the relatively small jobs that would ordinarily be done by my men, but by doing them myself, production was naturally boosted. The company, needless to say, constantly demanded more production which made it imperative for me to use tools in order to keep pace with production requirements.

This kind of work kept me busy about 65 percent of the time. The remainder was spent in (1) checking the progress of the men in gang or gangs; (2) recording the amount of time spent by each of the men in my gang; (3) accompanying inspectors and shipowners' representatives when surveys were made of shell damage (surveys were made to determine the type and amount of work to be done); (4) estimating the number of man-hours required to do jobs; (5) writing out orders on store for supplies and other material; (6) conferring with my foreman to determine if anything of importance had developed since the last time I saw him or discussed matters with him; (7) reporting difficulties that arose from time to time. This was required sometimes because I was not authorized to make every decision even though I knew how to overcome problems.

EXHIBIT C

Bethlehem Steel Co. (Shipbuilding Division), Baltimore Yard, Baltimore, Md., and Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America, local No. 24.

Umpire decision No. 19–A. Grievance Nos. 1964, 1967–99 (inclusive), 2001, 2002, and 2004. Date of hearing, March 16, 1948. Date of decision, April 20, 1948.

Nature of case.—Claim of the union that after the 1947 strike the company violated paragraph 2 of the side letter of November 10, 1947, by its failure to restore some 36 or more employees to their former positions as leaders.

Introduction.—The May 6, 1946, agreement between the parties expired on June 23, 1947, and a strike began on June 26, 1947. The strike was terminated on November 10, 1947, when the current agreement became effective.

Just prior to the strike, the 36 complainants in the specific grievances involved in this case, and perhaps others who might be covered by grievance No. 1964 (a general grievance), were working as hourly rated leaders at the Baltimore yard. After the strike, all these employees were recalled to work but, except for one employee covered by grievance No. 1987 who is not now employed, they started work as mechanics and not as leaders. As of the date of the hearing, it appears that none of them had been restored to a job as leader (hourly rated or salaried).

A leader (snapper at some yards) is the lowest rank of supervision. Some leaders remain leaders almost continuously unless demoted for cause or promoted to higher ranks of supervision. However, at repair yards, fluctuations in yard employment and in activity of various departments occur from time to time in addition to changes in the general level of shipyard activity. For these reasons, there may be occasional shifting back and forth between work as a leader and as a mechanic, with corresponding changes in rate of pay. At some yards, some leaders carry dual classifications (leader and mechanic), and the shifting may even be on a day-by-day basis.

Ever since there has been a collective-bargaining relationship between the parties, there has been a difference of opinion between them as to the status of hourly rated leaders. The union contended that they should be and actually were in the bargaining unit as defined in the contract and as illustrated by yard practices. The company held the point of view that they should not be in the bargaining unit. The definition of the bargaining unit in the 1942 contract was claimed to be somewhat ambiguous on this matter, and there was much difference of opinion as to how it had been interpreted by the parties themselves at the various yards. In a disputes case before the National War Labor Board's Shipbuilding Commission, the union requested a change in the wording of the contract section defining the bargaining unit. The requested change would definitely have included hourly rated leaders. The Shipbuilding Commission denied this request and also denied a counter company request for contract language which would have specifically excluded such leaders. The basis for this Shipbuilding Commission action was that questions as to the scope of the bargaining unit were matters for National Labor Relations Board procedures or for interpretation of the parties' own contract language. The language of the 1942 agreement which had been in question was continued unchanged in the 1943 agreement, and the parties were ordered to submit to arbitration, under the terms of the agreement, such questions of interpretation of the parties' own language as might be within the jurisdiction of the umpire.

Subsequently, an umpire appointed by the parties conducted hearings and decided in favor of the union position at the yards then covered by the agreement.

When it came time to negotiate the terms of the next agreement (dated May 6, 1946), the clause of the contract defining the bargaining unit again remained unchanged in this respect, but the umpire's findings under the prior contract had clarified its meaning. And for the first time, a wage scale for leaders became a part of the negotiated wage scale. Thus, under the 1946 agreement (which was in effect until June 23, 1947), it is clear that leaders were in the bargaining unit. By signing that agreement, the company agreed to their inclusion, although it should be said that it did so despite top management's continued belief that the status of leaders should have been otherwise.

One of the major issues in the 1947 strike was a renewal of this perennial argument in terms of a company request to exclude hourly rated leaders from the bargaining unit. Technically, the result of the 1947 agreement was a compromise. Hourly rated leaders were left in the bargaining unit by leaving the language unchanged, and a wage scale for such leaders is included in the appendix to the agreement. Salaried leaders were excluded from the bargaining unit, as had been the case at all times. Thus, simple examination of the contract would indicate that the company had failed to obtain its objectives. However, the company really won "this round" because under the terms of paragraph 3 of a side letter of November 10, 1947, the company has the right (not subject to review by the union or the umpire) of changing leaders from hourly rated to salary, or vice versa. The hourly rates and salary equivalents are roughly comparable, and the duties are very similar. Therefore, the net result of the November 10, 1947, settlement is that, since November 10, 1947, it is solely within the discretion of the company whether any leader is in or is not in the bargaining unit. It can take an hourly rated leader out of the unit by the simple device of putting him on salary, and the union has no recourse to arbitration. Since the union signed these November 10, 1947, documents, it has agreed to that result, despite its continued position that the situation really should be otherwise. Thus, the union now is in the same general position occupied by the company during the period of the 1946 agreement. Without any change in the contract language, the union won its point under the 1943 and 1946 agreements by arbitration. The company won its basic argument for the 1947 contract by paragraph 3 of the side letter.

The above résumé of the history of the general status of leaders is given here in the introduction as a statement of facts. While the parties might differ in minor respects as to my recounting of the story, the testimony at the hearing on March 16 would indicate that there can be no substantial disagreement as to this background.

It has been noted that the employees involved in this case were classified as hourly rated leaders when the strike began. After the strike had continued for several weeks, it began to appear that it would be a long one. Negotiations were stalemated and at some point the company began to sponsor a back-to-work movement. Some salaried employees were active in attempting to persuade employees to return, and the company began to achieve some success at this yard. One of the first company objectives was to persuade all leaders to return. As part of this program, the company sent a notice to all leaders (including the leaders involved in this case) and to certain other supervisory, engineering, and clerical employees. These notices were form notices, dated on or about September 6, 1947, and are illustrated by the following sample copy:

"SUPERVISORY, ENGINEERING, OR CLERICAL EMPLOYEE

"Name: McGuire, Raymond A.

"Symbol and No.: YB–22. Date: Sept. 6, 1947.

"Until further notice, you are hereby notified to report for work to perform your regularly scheduled duties during the strike which has been called by the Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America."

In addition to the notices, it appears that certain high-rated supervisory employees contacted these leaders by telephone, personal visits, and special meetings.

On September 8, 1947, the company amended the personal records of all the employees involved and apparently did likewise for all hourly rated leaders by changing their classification from hourly rated leader to salaried leader. An appreciable number of leaders did return to work, and the evidence indicates that most of those who did return have retained their leader classification and rate of pay as salaried leaders.

It also appears that at some time or times subsequent to September 6, 1947, all or some of those leaders who had not returned to work were somehow advised that, if they did not return by September 24, 1947, they would be demoted to mechanics' jobs. In any event, the complainants in this case did not return to work by September 24 and in each and every case their personnel record cards show that they were demoted to mechanic classification and rate of pay as of September 24, 1947.

When the strike was finally terminated, the parties signed a new and revised labor agreement dated November 10, 1947, and also a side letter of the same date. This case requires interpretation of paragraphs 2 and 3 of this side letter, reading as follows:

"2. The employees who were on June 23, 1947, on the pay rolls of the respective companies at such yards will be returned to work as soon as the orderly resumption of operations will permit. Neither the companies nor the union will discriminate against any such employee because he participated in or opposed or failed to participate in the strike or any action in support of the strike, and any claim that this provision has been violated in respect of any employee may be taken up as a grievance in accordance with the provisions of article XIX of the main agreement. The length of service of an employee shall not be deemed to have been broken during the period of the strike.

"3. The bargaining unit as defined in section 1 of article II of the main agreement shall not include any employee classified as "quarterman." The companies have advised the union that since June 25, 1947, they have placed on salary certain snappers and leaders who were previously paid on an hourly basis and that they intend from time to time to place additional snappers and leaders on salary. The question whether such snappers and leaders who have been or shall be so placed on salary shall be included in the bargaining unit defined in the main agreement shall remain open for further negotiation between the parties and neither such question nor any other question involving such snappers or leaders shall be handled as a grievance under the provisions of article XIX of the main agreement."

As noted earlier in this introduction, the complainants in this case (except McGuire) did return to work after the strike settlement, but in no single instance had any one of them been reinstated to a job as leader (salary or hourly rated) as of the date of the hearing. In each case they were assigned to work with the tools as mechanics and were paid at the mechanic rate applicable to such work with the tools.

The union's principal claim is that the company violated paragraph 2 of the side letter by its action with respect to these individuals. The company disclaims any violation of paragraph 2 and claims that its action is fully covered by paragraph 3.

It will be noted that paragraph 2 specifically provides for grievance procedure, including arbitration, in any case of an alleged violation of that paragraph. On the other hand, paragraph 3 specifically exempts certain matters under that paragraph from grievance procedure and arbitration. For this reason, a question of umpire jurisdiction has arisen.

A subsidiary question has also arisen as to grievance No. 1964. This is a general grievance reading as follows:

"The company has violated article III, section 5, and article XIII, of the agreement and paragraph 2 of the letter of November 10, 1947, for termination of the strike, by failing to restore hourly paid leaders who participated in the strike and did not return to work until the formal termination of the strike to their positions as hourly paid leaders.

"The union requests that the above-mentioned employees be restored to their positions as leaders, held by them at the inception of the strike, and be reimbursed with all wages lost by them by reason of the company's action described above."

The company claims that this general grievance is not properly before the umpire.

The specific grievances covering the 36 individual employees vary as to wording but not as to substance. An illustrative sample of these individual grievances is No. 1967, which reads as follows:

"The union charges the company with discriminating against Vincent Elliott for participating in the strike against the company.

"Vincent Elliott was a leader for 4 years before the strike. After he returned to work the company put him back to work as a mechanic.

"Therefore, the union requests that Vincent Elliott be restored to a leader's classification and be paid for all loss of pay due to the company's action."

Position of the union.—(1) These cases are positive proof of a company policy at this yard to punish hourly rated leaders who failed to join the back-to-work movement by refusing to reinstate them to a job as leader.

(2) Most of these men have long service at the yard, and their length of service as leaders varies from 1 to 17 years. Men with less yard service and no experience as leaders have been promoted to take their places.

(3) Except for the simple fact that these employees remained loyal to the union throughout the strike and refused to return to work at company request, no reasons have been advanced by the company to explain its refusal to reinstate them to their jobs as leader.

(4) This is an obvious violation of paragraph 2 of the side letter of November 10, 1947. It is also a violation of article III, section 5, and of article XIII of the agreement.

(5) The general grievance (No. 1964) is a proper grievance. It is necessary because a few employees similarly situated may have been afraid to initiate a separate grievance.

(6) The company has also violated assurances given in a letter to the director of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service.

Position of the company.—(1) The umpire is precluded from accepting jurisdiction in these cases for the following reasons:

(a) Paragraph 3 specifically excludes such questions from arbitration since all the complainants were known by the union to have been reclassified as salaried supervisors and then demoted before the strike settlement.

(b) Paragraph 2 of the side letter is not even applicable to these employees since it refers to employees and an employee is defined in the agreement as not including salaried leaders.

(2) Even if the umpire should overrule the company's jurisdictional arguments, he would have no authority to order back pay or to order reinstatement either to hourly rated or salaried leader jobs. There are no hourly rated leader jobs left at this yard.

(3) In addition to the above arguments, grievance No. 1964 is a general grievance and of a type not properly in the grievance procedure.

(4) Paragraph 2 is not a guaranty that every employee will be reinstated on November 10, 1947, to the same job and rate of pay he held prior to the strike.

(5) The company observed all commitments it made in the letter to the Director of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service.

Opinion.—As this matter is presented, it is clear that the umpire cannot make specific findings here as to individual cases. The argument on both sides was on the general issues involved and not on the facts and circumstances surrounding each separate grievance. The basic issue here is whether the umpire has jurisdiction. And even if the umpire holds that he does have jurisdiction, the next question is whether his authority includes the possibility of granting the relief requested by the union.

At the outset it is advisable to examine the provisions of the main contract referred to by the union in its claims of contract violation. Article III, section 5, reads as follows:

"Section 5. The company will not discriminate against any employee or applicant for employment at any of the yards by reason of his membership in the union or by reason of any union activity on his part not in contravention of any provision of this agreement, or because of race, creed, color, sex, national origin, or membership in any lawful organization." [Italics supplied.]

This section of the agreement is not without meaning in the case. All the individuals involved in this case presumably were members and are members of the union before, during and after the strike. By any possible interpretation of either the May 6, 1946, agreement or the November 10, 1947, agreement, they were "employees" up to June 23, 1947, and after November 10, 1947. Prior to the strike they were hourly rated leaders who were in the bargaining unit. After the strike, the company action of demoting them to mechanic classifications unquestionably made them "employees." There was no contract during the strike But even if it should be assumed that the word "employee" had any meaning during the strike, all of these individuals were "employees" by the company's own testimony except for the brief period of September 8 to September 24, when the company unilaterally classified them as salaried leaders.

Whatever may be said about the advisability or inadvisability of this particular strike, it was a legal one. It was officially called by the union at the expiration date of an agreement and therefore was not contrary to article XVIII (prohibition of strikes and lockouts). That article begins:

"During the term of this agreement * * *"

The corresponding clause of the 1946 contract includes the same provision In short, the strike in question was not "* * * union activity * * * in contravention of any provision of this agreement."

Nor was the participation of any hourly rated leader in that strike any violation of the contract. Both before and after the strike, hourly rated leaders were and are in the bargaining unit and, as members of the bargaining unit, have the same right to participate in strike activity as any other employee.

While I do believe that article III, section 5, is material to the case, it was not discussed extensively at the hearing and will not be discussed further here. The reason is that paragraph 2 of the side letter of November 10 is a more specific reference to the same subject matter and in a very real sense is a clarification of and further acknowledgment of the company obligations regarding discrimination as they relate to this particular strike situation. Paragraph 2 also includes other provisions, as will be noted later. All that I am saying here is that article III, section 5, and that portion of paragraph 2 referring to company discrimination should be examined simultaneously in appraisal of this case.

The union also claims a violation of article XIII, seniority. Without discussing this matter in detail and without ruling out possible consideration of seniority in some future phase of these cases, I do not believe that article XIII has much significance in deciding the issues which will be determined by this decision.

We will not turn to interpretation of paragraph 3 of the side letter. It has been reproduced in the introduction. What did the company gain by that paragraph? In the first place, it reaffirmed something which is already implicit in article II where in the bargaining unit is defined. The matter reaffirmed is that salaried leaders are not in the bargaining unit and that the union has no right to represent them in grievance procedure including arbitration unless the company should so agree. There is a reference to "further negotiation between the parties" but that, in effect, means that, unless the company should change its present policy, salaried leaders are excluded from representation by the union in any way, shape, or fashion.

Secondly, and probably more important, paragraph 3 gives the company the right to take any hourly rated leader out of the bargaining unit by the simple device of transferring him from hourly rated to salary. Nor is that right restricted quantitatively. At this yard, the company has seen fit to date to abolish hourly rated leaders entirely. Evidence indicates that it has not done so at its other repair yards. Because of repair-yard fluctuations in demand for leaders at any particular time, there are obvious advantages to the company in case of transfer to have at least some hourly rated leaders who can move in and out between mechanic and leader as production requirements dictate. But, for whatever reason, if the company decides to have all of its leaders on salary and therefore out of the bargaining unit, paragraph 3 gives it that right.

As I read paragraph 3 and examine the evidence presented at the hearing the two points made above were the principal company objectives during the strike and at the time of the strike settlement. To repeat, the company won its basic argument that it should be able to decide without veto power by the union or by an umpire whether any or all of its leaders should be in the bargaining unit.

But that is not the issue in this case. The simple fact is that, during the strike and specifically on September 24, 1947, when the company felt that these leaders were exhibiting loyalty to the union rather than to the company, it made a unilateral determination that these employees were no longer fit to be leaders and demoted them. Nor did it change that decision in any significant respect after the strike settlement on November 10 which included the placing of joint signatures on paragraph 2. The issue is whether that company policy and action is in accordance with paragraph 2 of the side letter and article III, section 5, of the agreement.

Before proceeding to an examination of the intent of paragraph 2, it is necessary, first, to consider the company argument that the complainants are not covered by paragraph 2 because they were not "employees" within the definition of that term. I have already considered this matter in a discussion of article III, section 5, but will repeat it here briefly. These individuals as hourly rated leaders were in the bargaining unit and were "employees" on June 23, 1947, under the terms of the 1946 contract. By the company's action of demoting them to mechanics, they were "employees" on November 10, 1947. If we use either the 1946 or 1947 definition of an "employee" and extend it through the strike period when there was not any contract, they were "employees" for all of that period except the period from September 8 to September 24 when the company gave them a paper rating of salaried leaders. On both technical and realistic grounds, they are covered by paragraph 2.

It has already been noted that paragraph 2 reinforces article III, section 5, of the contract as to the company's obligation not to discriminate against these employees. It even goes so far as to include:

"* * * any action in support of the strike * * *." [Italics supplied.]

Proceeding under that part of the paragraph, the company has even reinstated voluntarily employees who were arrested on the picket line and some who spent time in jail.

Paragraph 2 goes beyond company obligations and introduces something not even intimated in article III, section 5. I am referring to the reciprocal obligations assumed by the union. To put it very bluntly, when the union signed paragraph 2, it agreed to treat "scabs" as "brothers." The union represents all employees in the bargaining unit. It agreed to forget that, in the face of financial necessity and company pressure, many employees had gone back to work in spite of picket lines and union pressure. It agreed to represent those employees impartially and not to discriminate against them in any way.

In short, any realistic appraisal of either the language or spirit of paragraph 2 can lead only to one conclusion. The parties agreed to let bygones be bygones and just as far as is humanly possible wipe out the whole strike incident as something which had best be forgotten. That is the only meaning of paragraph 2, and it is a meaning which is important to the cause of future good relations between the parties. Nor am I as umpire just preaching a sermon in this matter. Paragraph 2 is the parties' own language "sweated out" at the end of a long strike which had been costly to both sides.

Viewed in the light of paragraph 2, the simple fact that every hourly rated leader who did not respond to the company's back-to-work movement during the strike has been refused reinstatement to a leader job cannot be construed as anything but a company violation of paragraph 2 of the side letter and of article III, section 5 of the main agreement.

There is one principal company argument which has not been discussed heretofore. The last sentence of paragraph 3 contains the words:

"* * * neither such question nor any other question involving such snappers or leaders shall be handled as a grievance under the provisions of article XIX of the main agreement." [Italics supplied.]

In effect, the company argument is that, even if these individuals were discriminated against because of strike activity, that discrimination was countenanced by paragraph 3 and the union agreed that nothing could be done about it. To put it even more bluntly, the company's argument is that these 36 odd men at the Baltimore yard were sacrificed in the strike settlement. I will readily agree that the words "any other question" can cover a good deal of territory. There is some territory they are known to cover. The preliminary words "such question" refer only to possible future bargaining (not arbitration) concerning the bringing of some or all formerly hourly rated, now salaried, leaders back into the bargaining unit. From past experience on leader and snapper cases, the additional words "any other question" undoubtedly include the general subjects of promotion, demotion, coincident with reduction in work force, etc. But to say that these words mean a negation of paragraph 2 as respects these 36 odd individuals at the Baltimore yard would mean that a "sleeper" was deliberately negotiated. My prior discussion of the meaning of paragraph 3 indicates clearly that the union gave up much when it signed the side letter. But the evidence does not indicate that the union gave up any paragraph 2 rights as respects these individuals. To repeat, when one examines the reciprocal obligations assumed by the union in paragraph 2 and the company's own actions as respects other individuals arrested on the picket line, as well as the obvious meaning of paragraph 2, it simply does not make sense that 36 people should be carved out as exceptions.

Having found a general company violation of paragraph 2 and of article III, section 5, as respects at least some of these individuals, what is to be done about it?

The company is unquestionably correct in its contention that I have no authority to order that any or all of them be reinstated as salaried leaders. Company determination must be final as to who is to be a salaried leader.

I would have authority to reinstate all or some of these individuals as hourly rated leaders. They were hourly rated leaders before the strike. This classification of employees is in the bargaining unit and within my jurisdiction. There is a rate of pay for hourly rated leaders specifically included in appendix 1 of the contract. But this possible action runs head-on into a finding I have already made, namely, that, if it so chooses, the company has the right to put all leaders on salary. The company is correct in its contention that the inclusion of a classification and rate of pay in the contract is not proof that it must be used. The most that can be said for its inclusion in the current Baltimore yard contract is that it is some indication of joint intent to use the classification which had not yet been borne out by subsequent company action. But if I should order the company to reinstate all or some of these employees to hourly rated jobs as of November 10, 1947, with or without back pay, it would be possible for the company to transfer them to salary and then immediately demote them again to mechanics. If the company wanted to take that action, there would be no technical ground for recourse by the union. The company has sole control of its salaried force.

In view of these practical difficulties, I would prefer not to order reinstatement of any or all of these employees as hourly rated leaders. But that does not mean that there is no remedy. The umpire has the authority to order damages payable by the offending party to the complaining party. In short, if it becomes necessary to do so, I can assess damages against the company for its violation of paragraph 2 and of article III, section 5, such damages to be payable to the aggrieved employee.

With this finding which may be a sword of Damocles held over the company's head, I return the matter to the parties for further negotiation.

It was noted early in this opinion that in no event would I be able to make a specific finding as to each individual case on the basis of the evidence at hand. The company is correct in its general position that paragraph 2 is not a guarantee that each and every employee will be reinstated to precisely the same job he held prior to the strike. My findings that there was a company violation does not necessarily mean that good reasons may not have existed for failure to reinstate some of these men to leader jobs.

The first and most obvious consideration in any individual case would be whether on November 10, 1947, or subsequently, the volume of work available would permit or require reinstatement. If the volume of work had declined, then the demotion of some leaders would have been necessary, entirely irrespective of the principal issue in this case.

In connection with the above paragraph, brief mention should be made of the letter addressed by the company to the Director of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service. It read as follows:

"This will advise you, as Director of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, that Bethlehem Steel Co. and Bethlehem-Sparrows Point Shipyard, Inc., do not have any intention of placing hourly paid snappers and leaders on salary as a device for terminating their employment because of their membership in the union or their union activities."

Technically, that is not a letter which I am empowered to interpret since it is entirely outside the contract. However, it was a part of the strike settlement, and it is my considered opinion that it does not add much to the case on either side of the argument. It is clear that it is not a guarantee that hourly rated leaders, placed on salary, would remain as leaders. The company could not make the commitment if for no other reason than that production requirements might not necessitate retention of that many leaders. It was addressed to Cyrus S. Ching and not to the union, because the union does not represent salaried leaders. At least in this case, the company has not used paragraph 3 for the purpose of "terminating the employment" of any employees. But I cannot agree with the company that the Ching letter is confirmation of the company's alleged right to ignore paragraph 2 as to those 36 employees.

Another factor which might require consideration in individual cases would be whether the employee involved had demonstrated before the strike that he was not properly performing his duties in his capacities as this first rank of supervision. By the terms of paragraph 3, the company has acquired some closer control of its supervisory forces. Some control always existed. If an hourly rated leader demonstrated that he was not representing the company in his supervisory capacity, the company always had the right to discipline him by demoting or by discharge if the evidence warranted it. While the men were hourly rated, the only difference was that the right to demote or otherwise discipline was subject to grievance procedure. I have underlined the words "before the strike" as noted above. The basic company error in this entire case, in view of its commitments under paragraph 2, was in reaching the conclusion that continued participation in the strike disqualified an employee from future good and acceptable service as a leader. I have considerable sympathy with the company position that, if an individual has first loyalty to the union and only secondary loyalty to the company, he may find it difficult to be a good supervisor, even in this lowest rank of supervision. But whatever the theory may be on this point, these men, rightly or wrongly, were in the bargaining unit when the strike was called by their union. In a strike situation it simply is not sound to say that because a union man refused to "scab" he can never properly represent the company in this rank of supervision. It is possible that the strike experience may prove to have disqualified some of these individuals for that type of work. But to assume that it has done so without even giving the employee the right to a trial is not within the meaning of paragraph 2 any more than it would be to say that the union would be correct if it held that because a man had "scabbed" during the strike it should be free to relieve itself of its obligation to him under paragraph 2. In short, if a leader had had a satisfactory record as a leader before the strike, and if production requirements permit his reinstatement to a leader job, it is my considered opinion that paragraph 2 contains a minimum obligation on the company to give that individual a reasonable trial period before it pronounces him unfit for work as a leader.

There remains for discussion the question as to grievance No. 1964, which is a general grievance. In this sort of case, if the union had filed nothing but the general grievance without any bill of particulars supporting it, I might agree with the company that it was out of order. Charges of discrimination are usually individual worker cases and need specific reference either by separate grievances or by listing of the aggrieved along with the general grievance. But as respects the issue being decided by this decision, it is a general issue and there may be something to the union argument that in the situation prevailing immediately after the strike some few individuals might have been afraid to press a grievance. I rule that the grievance is in order but that, if the union intends to add any individuals to the list of leaders claiming to have been discriminated against, it must do so within 20 days after the date of this decision.

Decision.—(1) The company of this yard is guilty of a violation of paragraph 2 of the side letter of November 10, 1947, and of article III, section 5, of the agreement of the same date by virtue of its wholesale refusal to reinstate to a leader job all those hourly rated leaders included in the bargaining unit who failed to respond to a company request to return to work during the 1947 strike.

(2) This decision makes no finding as to any individual case. The matter is referred back to the parties for further negotiation at step 3 with the provision that, if any unresolved issues remain 30 days after the date of this decision (or longer if the parties agree to an extension of time), these unresolved issues may be referred back to the umpire for determination.

(3) The finding made in (1) above carries with it a corollary finding that damages may be assessed against the company arising out of such violations as may subsequently be determined in any individual case. The extent and amount of such damages, if any, in any individual case cannot, of course, be determined apart from the facts of that case.

(4) Under the circumstances of this case, the company objections to general grievance No. 1964 are dismissed. However, if the union intends to present any additional individual claims under this grievance, it must do so not later than 20 days after the date of this decision.

Bethlehem Steel Company (Shipbuilding Division), Baltimore Yard, Baltimore, Md., and Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America, Local No. 24.

Umpire decision No. 24–A (supplement to decision No. 19–A). Grievances Nos. 1964, 1967–1999 (inclusive), 2001, 2002, and 2004. Dates of hearings, September 20, 21, 22, October 14, and November 15 and 16, 1948. Date of decision, February 9, 1949.

Nature of case.—Determination of remaining issues in connection with above-numbered grievances.

Introduction.—Decision No. 19–A outlines the general background of these cases.

The basic issues presented to the umpire at the hearing preceding issuance of that decision were questions of umpire jurisdictions, and a preliminary appraisal of the general problem presented by these grievances. No testimony was offered or taken at the hearing on March 16, 1948, regarding specific grievances except as illustrative examples of the general problem. The summary decision of 19–A reads as follows:

"1. The company at this yard is guilty of a violation of paragraph 2 of the side letter of November 10, 1947, and of article III, section 5, of the agreement of the same date by virtue of its wholesale refusal to reinstate to a leader job all those hourly rated leaders included in the bargaining unit who failed to respond to a company request to return to work during the 1947 strike.

"2. This decision makes no finding as to any individual case. The matter is referred back to the parties for further negotiation at step 3 with the provision that, if any unresolved issues remain 30 days after the date of this decision (or longer if the parties agree to an extension of time), these unresolved issues may be referred back to the umpire for determination.

"3. The finding made in (1) above carries with it a corollary finding that damages may be assessed against the company arising out of such violations as may subsequently be determined in any individual case. The extent and amount of such damages, if any, in any individual case cannot, of course, be determined apart from the facts of that case.

"4. Under the circumstances of this case, the company objections to general grievance No. 1964 are dismissed. However, if the union intends to present any additional individual claims under this grievance, it must do so not later than 20 days after the date of this decision."

Subsequent to receipt of that decision and in connection with item 4 above, the union filed complaints covering 38 individuals, thus completing its claims under grievance No. 1964. The other individual grievance had listed 36 individuals. The total number of claimants involved in these proceedings is therefore 74 named persons.

After the full coverage of the cases had been determined by including the grievance No. 1964 employees, the parties met on May 20, 1948, in an attempt to resolve the differences between them. No agreement was reached at that meeting. The company offered to pay monetary damages to some of the claimants in amounts not disclosed to the umpire but refused to reinstate any of the claimants to leader jobs or to make any provisions for the disposition of claims of continued discrimination after the proposed settlement. The union would not accept this company offer. On May 24, 1948, the union requested that the unresolved issues be referred back to the umpire.

On the first day of resumed hearings September 20, 1948, the umpire suggested to the parties that another attempt be made to resolve all or at least some of the individual cases. A recess was called, at which time the representatives of both parties conferred among themselves separately. At the conclusion of this recess, the company representatives reported that the company was not in a position to make any offers, even as to a single individual, and that any further direct negotiations between the parties would therefore be futile. In view of this position, it was obvious that the hearings must proceed for the purpose of taking testimony and evidence on the general positions of both parties and on the arguments and testimony with respect to each of the 74 claimants. This process required a total of 6 days of hearings (September 20, 21, 22, October 14, and November 15 and 16). At the conclusion of the hearings, permission to file briefs was granted both parties. The company brief was submitted to the umpire under date of November 29, 1948, and the union brief under date of December 2, 1948. Briefs were exchanged.

It will be noted that in item 1 of decision No. 19–A, I found the company guilty of a violation of paragraph 2 of the side letter of November 10, 1947, and of article III, section 5, of the main agreement of the same date by virtue of its wholesale refusal to reinstate to a loader job those loaders who had failed to respond to the company's request to return to work during the 1947 strike. In item 2 of the same decision, amplified by discussion in the opinion, I found that the general conclusion reached in item 1 was not a necessary conclusion in each and every individual case.

While the detailed testimony at the last 6 days of hearings amplified very materially the more limited and general nature of the testimony given on March 16, 1948, review of decision No. 19–A discloses only one important error in statement of facts in the text of that decision. At the March 16, 1948, hearing, the umpire assumed that the union testimony meant that no hourly rated loader as of June 25, 1947, who had not come back to work during the strike had yet been reinstated to a loader job. The company did not state otherwise, either at the hearing or in its brief. A full résumé of the facts in this connection (see company brief in the instant case, pp. 10 and 11) shows that between November 10, 1947, and March 15, 1948, a total of 55 salaried leaders had been made in the departments involved in this proceeding. Of this total 21 men had been hourly rated loaders as of June 25, 1947, and had not come back to work during the strike. Only 1 of those 21 men is a complainant in the instant cases. The remaining 34 salaried loaders made in these departments between November 10, 1947, and March 15, 1948, were not loaders (salaried or hourly rated) just prior to the strike.

By a letter mailed after receipt of the company brief, the union objects to the introduction in evidence of the lists of names and dates of salaried loaders made subsequent to November 20, 1947. (See company brief, pp. 10 and 11.) This union objection is made on the ground that this is new evidence, that an agreement had been made at the hearing not to introduce new evidence, that these facts were known during the hearing and that the introduction of the lists now, together with the agreement not to file reply briefs, precludes the union from raising questions as to the lists. Technically, the list objected to by the union is now evidence. However, the argument made by the company proceeding from that list was made by the company on numerous occasions during the hearing. Fragments of the list were also introduced during discussion of individual cases. The only realistic objection the union can have to introduction of the list now is that it did not have readily available at the hearing a complete list of salaried leaders appointed since November 10, 1947, and therefore did not have a full opportunity to "shoot at" the qualifications of the new appointees in contrast to the qualifications of the claimants. I am overruling the Union's objections to introduction of the list in the company brief for the following reasons, some of which have already been observed:

(1) The company's basic argument proceeding from the list was made on several occasions at the hearings.

(2) The totals from the lists are disclosed in another set of data supplied at the hearing by the company to the umpire and the union. (See company brief, p. 8).

(3) Fragments of the list are in the evidence as to individual cases, both as to names and dates.

Because some time between November 10, 1947, and March 15, 1948, in the departments involved it did make salaried leaders of 21 men who had been hourly rated leaders on June 25, 1947, and had not come back to work during the strike, and because between March 15, 1948, and September 15, 1948, it made leaders of an additional eight men (six of whom are claimants in these cases), the company holds that the basic promise as to facts which apparently prompted the umpire to write item I of decision No. 19–A has been removed and that no pattern of discrimination existed. The union holds otherwise. Consideration of this matter will be deferred to a later section of this decision. The subject is noted here because it is a part of the background which is necessary to an understanding of the position of the parties.

It is manifestly impossible to itemize all the contentions and arguments made by the parties during 6 days of hearings. This is particularly true with respect to the testimony in the 74 individual cases. I shall attempt to set forth below only the more important general arguments.

Position of the union.—(1) In each and every one of these cases there is evidenced a pattern of discrimination which goes back solely to the fact that these men did not respond to the company's requests to go back to work during the strike.

(2) Discrimination continues in each instance until such time as the company restores all the individuals to a leader's job.

(3) In view of the additional evidence in these cases, the umpire should reconsider those portions of the opinion in decision 19–A which indicated that he would not order reinstatement of individuals as salaried leaders and that he probably would not order reinstatement as hourly rated leaders.

(4) Reductions of the work force did not justify the company's failure to reinstate these men to leader jobs.

(5) The various claims now made by the company as to alleged incompetence of these men in their leader jobs prior to the strike should be ignored for the following reasons:

(a) In most cases the company allegations were never made to the men or to the union and appeared for the first time at these hearings.

(b) In any event most of the claims are either vague or immaterial or occurred long before the strike.

(c) The best evidence of the competency of these leaders is that they were voluntarily selected for the job by the company in the first place and in most instances served for an extended period of time in a leader capacity. Some of them were selected or reappointed only a few months before the strike.

(d) The company appears to have had no doubts about the competency of these men when it urged them to come back to work as leaders during the strike.

(e) The company witnesses who testified on these points were not competent to testify about these men because they had little or no direct contact with them. Quartermen who have real knowledge of their ability did not appear.

(f) The company has exhibited no such close scrutiny of the qualifications of these former hourly rated leaders who did come back to work during the strike at company request.

(6) In a number of instances discrimination has been carried to the point where these men have been requested to act as leaders and have in fact acted as leaders since the strike, but at mechanic's rate of pay.

(7) The union reiterates its original request that each claimant be ordered restored to a job as leader (hourly rated or salary) and that he be compensated in full for all loss of earnings beginning November 10, 1947, and continuing until such time as the leader job is restored.

(8) In the event that the umpire should persist in his fallacious preliminary conclusion that he is not empowered to order reinstatement as a salaried leader and that he should not order reinstatement as an hourly rated leader, then money damages should be awarded as follows:

(a) Back pay to each individual equal to the difference between the appropriate hourly rated leader rate and the rate actually earned, beginning November 10, 1947 and continuing until such time as the individual is restored to a leader job, plus

(b) An unspecified amount of compensation to each individual to compensate him for more intangible losses, such as:

(1) Easier working conditions on leader jobs.

(2) Loss of prestige because of the demotion.

(3) Loss of likely prospects for promotion to still higher paying supervisory jobs, plus

(c) An unspecified amount of punitive damages to each individual because of the company's persistent adherence to an untenable position even after decision No. 19–A, plus

(d) An award to the union in amount of $50,000 to compensate it for damage to union prestige arising from the company violations.

Position of the company.—(1) The alleged pattern of discrimination charged in this case never existed, as is evidenced by the fact that 29 men (including 7 claimants) who were leaders on June 25, 1947, have been reinstated to a salaried leader job between November 10, 1947 and September 15, 1948.

(2) In each individual case the qualifications of the claimant were considered equally with the qualifications of others available to be appointed whenever a vacancy as leader occurred after November 10, 1947. No discrimination was shown.

(3) The reduced work force after the strike obviously required fewer leaders. There are even more claimants than jobs available throughout the entire period beginning November 10, 1947, and ending September 15, 1948. In one extreme instance there are 4 claimants and no leaders at all in the department.

(4) Company witnesses were competent to testify as to the ability of those men as leaders before the strike. The factors which prevented their reappointment as salaried leaders after the strike developed at supervisory meetings where careful attention was given to the qualifications of all persons available for leader jobs.

(5) It is admitted that some of the supervisory testimony and opinions as to individuals were vague and intangible. However, qualifications of leadership are necessarily so and are not always subject to precise, objective language or analysis. It is primarily because of this fact that the company sought and obtained in paragraph 3 of the side letter of November 10, 1947, the sole right to select and maintain the supervisory force. Evidence of the validity of management's opinions in this particular is found in the fact that yard operations have been performed more efficiently since the strike.

(6) Specific reasons for management's decision in each case were developed at the hearing and are summarized in the post-hearing brief (pp. 16 to 57).

(7) The union allegation that some of these claimants have been performing leader work at mechanic's rates of pay is without foundation in fact. In each case the claimant has not had the responsibilities of a leader.

(8) The company has presented its brief and argued its case in the belief that the umpire will adhere to his preliminary conclusions, namely, that he will not order restoration of any of these individuals to a job as a leader.

(9) Since there has been no discriminatory action, no money damages can be awarded. In any event, the umpire could not award the type of damages requested by the union.

(10) In appearing before the umpire in these proceedings the company has made it clear that it is not waiving its original position and that the umpire lacks jurisdiction in these cases.

Opinion.—It is both desirable and necessary first to appraise the general arguments of the parties in these cases rather than to attempt to analyze all the voluminous evidence in each individual case. Some repetition will be avoided and the issues will be more sharply focused.

Basic nature of discrimination in these cases.—During the course of these proceedings, a considerable amount of criticism, sarcasm, and some improper abuse was heaped by the union attorney on departmental foremen who testified for the company. The evidence does indicate that some foremen were more equitable than others in attempting to avoid discrimination against leaders who had not returned to work during the strike. There are some departments at this yard where the union has made no claims of discrimination. In some departments claims have been made but the evidence of real discrimination is weak. In other departments management's actions in some of these cases are indefensible by any standards.

On the surface this varying picture by departments would indicate that responsibility does lie with the foremen. But over-all review of these cases and the direct testimony of the yard manager convinces me beyond any reasonable doubt that the basic responsibility for the discrimination which may exist here must rest on top yard management. Basic policy in this matter was determined by top management. Individual foremen may have escaped discriminatory action by realistic handling of the situation, by some side-stepping of the logic of company policy, or by luck in not having to really face up to the problem because all or most of their leaders did return to work during the strike. But the policy itself was discriminatory despite top management's apparently sincere belief to the contrary.

The first act in this policy was the unilateral action of the company which occurred on September 24, 1947. On that date each and every leader who had not responded to the company's call to return to work was demoted to mechanic. On June 25, 1947, the company had a total force of 340 hourly rated leaders at the yard and 266 in the departments involved in these proceedings. The evidence is that during the strike (on or about September 8, 1947) every one of those hourly-rated leaders was offered a salaried leader job and was so reclassified on September 8, irrespective of his desires in the matter. Most of these offers were made by personal contact of a higher-rated supervisory employee. As noted in decision 19–A, that reclassification on September 8 was validated subsequently by paragraph 3 of the side letter of November 10. However, the subsequent demotion on September 24 of all those leaders who had not returned to work by that date was simple, unadulterated discrimination as a part of strike tactics. It is not over province to appraise the strike tactics of either party. Undoubtedly the union's strike tactics could be subject to a good deal of valid criticism if that were a part of this inquiry. All I am saying here is that as of November 10, 1947, when the strike was terminated by a signed agreement, including paragraph 2 of the side letter, each and every one of the former leaders who had been demoted on September 24 stood in the position of having been discriminated against by virtue of the nature of that demotion. Decision 19–A need not be repeated here. The core of that decision is that paragraph 3 of the side letter of November 10 did not validate the company's discriminatory act of wholesale demotions on September 24 and that paragraph 2 required that the company remove the discrimination if it persisted in any individual case.

When the agreement was signed on November 10, 1947, the question which should have been obvious to the company was:

"What steps should be taken with regard to the September 24 demotions in order to fulfill the company's obligations under paragraph 2 of the side-letter?"

The first and probably basic top-management violation of paragraph 2 occurred on November 10 when it apparently did not ask itself the above question. It wrongly assumed that the demotions of September 24 were valid accomplished acts and that all these former leaders were properly classified as mechanics.

On November 10, there were two possible ways by which management could have fulfilled its paragraph 2 obligations to these men:

(1) To offer immediate temporary restoration of all these men to a salaried leader job (or hourly rated at the company's option) with an explanation that after the post-strike work force had been determined, some adjustments probably would be necessary; or

(2) To place some or all of these men temporarily on mechanic's work with the tools with an explanation that just as soon as the work force had been readjusted, they would be given full consideration for available leader jobs on a par with leaders who had returned to work during the strike.

Neither of these two possible courses of action were taken. All these claimants and all others in like status who are not claimants were simply put to work with tools as mechanics. If any explanations were made at all, the men were told that they would be considered for leader vacancies when and if such vacancies should arise.

Some 200 former leaders had returned to work during the strike and were on a salary basis. On November 10 what the company really did was to conclude that these two hundred-odd men were assured of leader jobs more or less indefinitely because of their loyalty during the strike. The other one hundred and forty-odd men would be given consideration only for vacancies over and above the two hundred-odd jobs already filled. This action standing by itself perpetuated for an indefinite period two psychological groups of actual or potential leaders, the "loyal" and the "disloyal." This was not in accord with the spirit and intent of paragraph 2, which was to "let bygones be bygones."

I have indicated above that there were two possible ways by which the company could have fulfilled its obligations under paragraph 2. The first of these (immediate offer of a salaried leader job or immediate restoration to an hourly rated leader job) would have had certain advantages for the sake of clarity of a real no-discrimination policy, but I am convinced that it could not have been made a mandatory action. Before the strike ended, some 65 percent of employees had already returned. Work was in progress under the direction of leaders who had returned. There was no assurance as to how many strikers would return or just when they would return. Some leader jobs had been eliminated entirely, as will be developed later. It was obvious that there would be somewhat fewer leader jobs in total because of reductions in work force. To have reinstated all former leaders to a leader job temporarily would have created very considerable confusion at least for a few days. As noted in decision B–19, paragraph 2 is not a guaranty that every employee would be returned to precisely the same job he held on June 25, 1947.

For the above reasons, I conclude that in fairness to the obvious problems faced by the company, it is only equitable to conclude that at least a 2-week period should have been allowed management in which time it could determine the size of its work force, the approximate number of leaders required and the identity of leaders who would be retained. A 2-week period (up to November 25) was allowed all hourly rated employees in which to return without loss of seniority. In short, I conclude that no damages should be assessed in any case for the period between November 10, 1947, and November 25, 1947. However, I also conclude that on or about November 25, the company should have made at least a basic preliminary line-up of its available leaders and that former leaders who had returned to work after the strike should have been considered for their merit and ability along with the two hundred-odd leaders who had returned during the strike, rather than to consider them as totally separate groups.

It is this top-management decision (which apparently still persists) to consider the two-hundred-odd leaders who returned during the strike as men in "untouchable" jobs for the sole reason of their loyalty during the strike which represents a part of the real discrimination in these cases. Most of these two-hundred-odd men would properly be entitled to their jobs in any event. But to make these jobs virtually "untouchable" was a discriminatory policy and contrary to the intent of paragraph 2. Moreover, it is contrary to management's principal objective in negotiating paragraph 3 of the side letter. What the company wanted was to have control of its supervisory force in order to obtain the best possible supervisors. With all due respect for the right kind of loyalty, I do not believe that any management would say that loyalty is the sole qualification for supervisory jobs and that a single act of loyalty overrides all other considerations such as experience, merit, and ability.

The next top-management policy which has inherent in it seeds of discrimination, relates to instructions to foremen and subsequent management action in the filling of leader vacancies after November 10, 1947. Mr. Reynolds testified that a part of this policy was that if a former leader was as good as other available men who had not been leaders, he was to be given preference. But along with these instructions to foremen, there was an admonition to make sure that all leaders selected would fit in with "the new system." Review of the detailed evidence in the individual cases makes it abundantly clear that some foremen understandably interpreted these instructions to exclude men from consideration if there was any suspicion that they might not be "loyal" supervisors. Let us look at the facts as to what happened under this policy.

From November 10, 1947, to September 15, 1948, a total of 77 leaders were made in the departments involved in these proceedings. Of these 29 (approximately 38 percent) were men who were leaders before the strike and who did not return to work during the strike. The remaining 48 (62 percent) were men who had not been leaders on June 25, 1947. No figures are available as to how many of the 48 new leaders returned to work during the strike as mechanics. However, most individual instances cited were such cases. For these 48 jobs, filled by new men, there were a total of 67 men available who are claimants in these cases and there may be others who have filed no claims. In short, less than one out of three former leaders who failed to report to work during the strike had been considered fit to again become a leader some 11 months after the strike had ended. In contrast to the figures only 21 of the 145 leaders who were working in these departments before the strike ended had left a leader job for any reason during the same 11-month period. Quits and promotions to higher supervisory jobs account for some of these 21 changes. The evidence indicates that discharge or demotion has occurred in only a handful of cases.

As the company points out, the fact that 29 former hourly rated leaders have been made salaried leaders is proof that there was no hard and fast discriminatory policy. But the over-all picture shows that "loyalty" remained the dominant factor and that these 29 men promoted only because the factors of superior experience, ability, and merit were so overwhelming that they could not be ignored.

At the risk of lengthening an unusually long opinion, I would like to make my position clear as to this factor of loyalty. There is nothing wrong with the company idea that close cooperation among all ranks of supervision, insistence on yard discipline, insistence on good quantity and quality of work and real loyalty to the company are necessary attributes of supervision in all ranks. If a leader cannot measure up to such attributes, he should not be a leader, salaried or hourly rated. But what the company has done is to say that leaders engaged in a legal strike at the expiration of a contract in which they were in the bargaining unit by agreement of the parties were disloyal to the company by remaining out on strike and refusing to help break it. These men were faced with a difficult decision when the September 24 deadline was fixed by the company. They failed to respond to the company request at a time when the much easier thing to do was to go back to work. At this yard, the backbone of the strike had already been broken by September 24, and most of these men were smart enough to recognize the fact. In several instances, the testimony of company foremen and the men themselves concerning their September discussions frankly discloses that the conversations were conducted in a spirit of mutual respect for each other's position, and the leader refused the request to return to work more in sorrow than in anger. Moreover, as those men testified, one by one, at the hearings in the instant cases, I think any impartial observer would conclude that there was remarkably little bitterness in their attitude. The occasions were rare where there was any reason to suspect any real underlying disloyalty to the company.

In about 10 years of arbitration I have had the occasion to listen to a good many employees and supervisors. Based on that experience, I am of the sincere opinion that the average attitude and demeanor of this group of claimants indicates strength of character, fairness, and intelligence which is above average. With a few possible exceptions, this group of men simply do not line up as the lower one-fourth of a post-strike leader force. Nor do they represent a group of men whose basic loyalty to the company can seriously be questioned. Continuous length of service at this yard (excluding some prior service canceled by seniority rules) varies from 5½ years to almost 42 years and averages 10 years and 8 months. Net length of service as leader, according to official employment records, varies from a few days to 19 years and 10 months, with an average of a little over 4 years. To that figure should be added a small indeterminate amount of time due to the fact that in many cases the official employment records do not show informal service as leader before reclassification. In short, these employees are a stable, responsible group of employees with a record of service to the company which belies any conclusion that they could be basically disloyal by any realistic use of the word.

Review of remedies available to the umpire.—The union has requested that I review and reconsider certain conclusions reached in decision B–19.

The first of these is that I have no authority to order reinstatement to a job as salaried leader. The reasons for that conclusion are stated fully in decision B–19 and need not be repeated here. The simple fact is that paragraph 3 of the side letter gives the company the right to have only salaried leaders if it so chooses, and by the clear terms of the November 10, 1947, agreement the umpire has no authority to order the promotion or reinstatement of any employee to a job which is outside the bargaining unit.

The second of these conclusions is that whereas the umpire does have the authority to order reinstatement to a job as hourly rated leader, I would probably not exercise that authority. The reasons for that conclusion were explored in part in decision B–19, and will be summarized here as follows:

(1) In paragraph 3 of the side letter, the company obtained the right to eliminate hourly rated leaders entirely if it should choose to do so. It has made that choice at this yard and reinstatement to a new realistically nonexistent classification might well be considered as running counter to a company contractual right.

(2) If reinstatement to hourly rated leader should be ordered, the company could comply with the order and then immediately transfer the employees to jobs as salaried leaders where they would be outside umpire jurisdiction and subject to demotion again without effective opportunity to challenge such action.

With some justification, the union has attacked the second of the above reasons by claiming that I am assuming company technical compliance with a decision and then reversion to discrimination as a real evasion of the order. The union is correct in its belief that I should not assume anything less than full and realistic compliance with an umpire decision. In some 4 years of arbitration at Bethlehem shipyards, I have yet to know of a case where either party has failed to realistically comply with a mandatory umpire award. Both sides have fought hard up to the end of umpire proceedings, but there has been full and realistic compliance when the award has been issued. This second reason crept into the first decision primarily because it could be a possible outgrowth of the first reason.

Another reason not previously discussed is of almost equal importance with the first. I have criticized the company for perpetuating what I have labeled the "loyal" group of former leaders and the "disloyal" group. As long as the company persists in its present position at this yard that it should have only salaried leaders, even full and ample compliance with any ordered reinstatement to jobs as hourly rated leader would likewise perpetuate the present distinction between the two groups. What this yard needs is a final conclusion to this controversy. It simply would not contribute to harmonious relations or to effective supervision if, as a result of this decision, there should be a large group of salaried leaders and a small group of hourly rated leaders created by an umpire award.

Certain aspects of this problem have some relation to the next topic to be discussed. However, the general conclusions reached in the first decision are hereby reaffirmed. I will not order reinstatement of any of these employees either to a salaried leader job or to a regular hourly rated leader job. The mandatory award will be confined to money damages in cases where discrimination has existed, still persists, or may persist in the future.

Union claims that claimants have been doing supervisory work at mechanics' rates.—In a number of instances, the union and the claimants in these proceedings have alleged that since the strike they have continuously or intermittently performed supervisory functions but at mechanics' rates of pay. Some of these claims have substantial support in the evidence. Others are weak.

In this matter, it is important to observe the prestrike use of the hourly rated leader classification at this yard. The evidence makes it abundantly clear that the distinction between a mechanic and an hourly rated leader was a fuzzy one and varied by departments. In the first place, it was a fairly common and apparently an accepted practice to gradually break in a mechanic for supervisory work by assigning him work with increasing supervisory responsibilities and then finally to reclassify him after he had proven his supervisory ability. Secondly, there was a varied pattern as to whether a leader did or did not also perform productive work. In some departments, a leader was but little more than a straw boss. He worked with his gang and also exercised certain supervisory responsibilities. In other departments, the leaders did no productive work of any consequence. In the third place, it was not uncommon in short periods of slack work to continue to classify and pay a man as a leader but by actual practice to put him back to work with the tools until work picked up again. Finally, there are a few instances where an employee may have been classified as a leader to give him a little more pay because of experience and ability when in fact he was still a mechanic, had few, if any, supervisory duties, and should have been classified as a specialist rather than as a leader.

This varied practice obviously makes it difficult for the umpire to appraise the union claims in these cases. Partially for this reason, I will not attempt to make a decision here as to the specific merit or lack of merit to the union claims where this allegation is a factor. In each case this argument is so intermixed with the claim of discrimination for other reasons that it would be difficult to separate. In general, these union claims are strongest in those departments where for a period of months after the strike (the so-called reorganization period in these departments), the ratio of leaders to mechanics shows an abnormally small number of leaders when compared either with the prestrike figures or the figures as of September 15, 1948.

The most important outgrowth of this part of the argument at the hearings is the conclusion that management has not yet realized all the implications of its decision to eliminate hourly rated leaders entirely. While there were hourly rated leaders, the fuzzy nature of the distinction between mechanic and leader was an accepted part of the relationship between the parties. Proof of that fact is that to my recollection there have been few, if any, umpire cases at this yard where reclassification to hourly rated leader has been requested because of the nature of the work performed.

But when top management decided to eliminate hourly rated leaders entirely, the necessary logic of that position was that there must be a clean-cut line drawn between supervisory and productive functions. All supervision now belongs to salaried employees who are to do no productive work. Hourly rated mechanics cannot be expected to exercise supervisory functions. This last statement does not mean that a mechanic may not give instructions to employees of lower classification, such as helpers and handymen who work in his gang. The typical relationship between a mechanic and a helper is traditional and accepted in any supervisory set-up. But if there are two or more mechanics in a gang working on the same job, the logic of the company's new supervisory set-up requires that one mechanic have no more supervisory responsibility than the other mechanics in the same gang.

The testimony at the hearing made it very clear that at least in some departments, the company has proceeded on the assumption that it "can eat its cake and have it too." It has sought to retain the fluid and fuzzy distinction between mechanic and hourly rated leader which is probably a generally beneficial set-up for the company and at the same time take all supervisors out of the bargaining unit by concentrating supervision in the salaried leaders. Foreman Kunkle's testimony was the most apt illustration of this position, but it also appeared to a greater or lesser degree in testimony of other foremen.

If the company persists in its decision not to have any regular hourly rated leaders, it must either correct its practices in these respects or face the obligation of payment of hourly rated leader rates on at least a "while engaged" basis when any real supervisory duties are performed. The hourly rate for leader is still in the contract and it would be applicable whenever a mechanic performs any real supervisory duties under the company's revised supervisory set-up.

Factors advanced by the company as reasons why discrimination has not existed in individual cases.—In decision B–19 I indicated that despite some obvious discrimination which existed in these cases that decision was a general one and would not necessarily apply to all individual cases. Moreover, in some instances, discrimination may have existed for a period of time but could not be found to be a realistic charge against the company for all the period of time since November 10, 1947. In individual cases are there good and sufficient reasons why the company should not have offered a leader job to a claimant after the strike? If a leader job should have been offered to a claimant, on what date should the offer have been made? And if the offer had been accepted do the facts indicate that the employee could legitimately have been demoted to mechanic on some subsequent date?

The union has objected vigorously to this line of approach to the problem. Its basic contention is that discrimination has existed continuously and will exist until such time as the company offers a leader job to each claimant and keeps him on that job at least long enough to prove that discrimination has ceased to exist. There is an aura of simplicity to this contention which is attractive to the umpire. Moreover, if punitive damages were required in these cases that would be an easy answer to the grievances. However, the facts in these cases simply do not support that sort of a decision. The individual cases vary all the way from cases where the union has no realistic claim at all to cases where there is no possible sensible defense for the company action. The difficult job confronting the umpire, in fairness to the union, the claimants, and to the company, is to attempt to appraise the merits of each case and determine it accordingly.

I have analyzed the reasons advanced by the company in the several cases and find that they may be listed as follows. In each individual case some one or a combination of these reasons has been advanced.

List of company reasons for failure to offer leader jobs to claimants:

(1) Leader job eliminated.

(2) Number of leader jobs in a department reduced due to smaller work force.

(3) More claimants than promotions after the strike.

(4) Problems of assigning leaders by shifts.

(5) Failure to return to work after the strike.

(6) Employee quit some time subsequent to return to work after strike.

(7) Alleged refusal of claimant to accept salaried leader job offered to him after the strike.

(8) Alleged discriminatory attitude shown by claimant against nonstrikers after the strike.

(9) Alleged specific factors in claimant's prestrike leader record which are claimed to disqualify him for a job as a salaried leader:

(a) Limited supervisory experience.

(b) Alleged poor quality or quantity of work performed by crews working under claimant.

(c) Alleged inability to get along with men.

(d) Alleged friction or lack of cooperation between leader and higher ranks of supervision.

(e) Alleged inability to plan work.

(f) Alleged favoritism in assignment of work, etc.

(g) Alleged inability to perform supervisory work due to age or physical condition.

(h) Alleged drinking during working hours.

(i) Alleged language difficulty.

(j) Prestrike leader job was temporary replacement for leader who was in military service.

(k) Alleged superior supervisory experience obtained by new leaders at other yards.

(l) Wouldn't work Sundays.

(m) Alleged "know it all" attitude.

(n) Alleged to be poor disciplinarian.

Complete elimination of leader jobs (hourly rated and salary) in a department exists in only one instance. Since the strike, no leader jobs have existed in AJ (fire) department. Examination of evidence justifies the management action of eliminating all leaders in this department. In substance this department has reverted to its prewar supervisory set-up. There were no leaders (then known as inspectors) until sometime in 1941 when the work force began to increase sharply. The present work force is comparable to the 1940 work force when there were no leaders. Moreover, the union claim that the three claimants are still performing supervisory work is weak. The claims of Elliott, Sablowski, and Eversmier are dismissed.

In a substantial number of other departments, the company has shown that the working force has declined and that the number of leaders has likewise declined. The general picture is that immediate poststrike employment in most departments was substantially less than on June 25, 1947, and that it continued to drop over the next 11 months. The number of leaders shows a somewhat different pattern. There was an even more abrupt decline in number of leaders when comparing the prestrike and immediate poststrike figures. However, from that point on, the general trend of leader employment has been upward, both absolutely and more markedly in relation to the general trend of employment. The following table shows these trends.

Employees below leader rank and leaders in all departments involved in this case

Date	Number of employees below rank leader	Number of leaders	Ratio (leaders to men supervised)
June 25, 1947	4,266	266	1 to 16.
Nov. 21, 1947	3,417	[1] 159	1 to 22.8.
Mar. 1, 1948	3,089	189	1 to 16.3.
May 10, 1948	2,667	206	1 to 12.9.
Sept. 15, 1948	2,401	201	1 to 11.9.

[1] Includes 145 leaders who came back to work during strike, plus 3 former leaders who had been given salaried leader jobs after strike, plus 2 new leaders.

The union has contended that the company should be required to reinstate each and every claimant to a leader job. This is equivalent to holding that once a man becomes a leader, he should remain on that job if his work is satisfactory, irrespective of yard employment. That position cannot possibly be sustained. It is obvious that the company did not need as many leaders to supervise 3,417 employees as it needed for 4,266 employees. If there had been no discrimination of any sort, a necessary shake-down of the yard-work force after the strike had terminated would have meant some demotions. No supervisory ratio is sacred, but if the same ratio existing as of June 25, 1947, had been maintained, about 214 leaders would have been required right after the strike in contrast to 266 before the strike. As the work force declines, there is a usual relative increase in the amount of supervision required. This is indicated at this yard by a prestrike ratio of 1 to 16 when 4,266 men were supervised and a 1 to 12 ratio on September 15, 1948, almost a year after the strike, but when only 2,401 employees were supervised. Without attempting to fix any precise number, it is quite obvious that in the absence of any type of discrimination, the total number of leaders would have been less after the strike and some of the claimants in this case would have been among those demoted. It would be unrealistic and unfair to the company to hold that all of these claimants are entitled to damage because each and every one of them did not become a leader after the strike. The company clearly has a right to determine the total size of its working force, including the right to determine the total size of its supervisory force. That right can be challenged successfully only to the extent that some other right of employees is involved or to the extent that some other contract provision is violated, or in this case on a showing that discriminatory practices existed in this connection.

One of the other principal points made by the union in respect to size of the leader force is its claim that in some departments, the company deliberately held down the number of leaders to require claimants and others in like position to work for a considerable period of time at mechanic's wages as punishment for not having returned during the strike. The over-all ratio of leaders and men supervised which have been noted above gives some substance to this claim. If the total are broken down by departments, the supervisory ratio remains relatively constant in a number of departments. Leaders have been added and demoted as the work force has increased or decreased. However, in some departments, the picture is even more exaggerated than the over-all totals. O and S departments are illustrative.

Supervisory ratio (leaders to men supervised)

Date	Department
	O (burning and welding)	S (outside hull)
June 25, 1947	1 to 20.6	1 to 12.3.
Nov. 21, 1947	1 to 35.8	1 to 24.4.
Mar. 1, 1948	1 to 24.5	1 to 12.8.
May 10, 1948	1 to 14.6	1 to 10.4.
Sept. 15, 1948	1 to 14.7	1 to 8.4.

In each instance, the department winds up on September 15, 1948, with about 50 percent more supervision relatively than before the strike. But during the immediate poststrike period, the departments were operating about with half as much supervision as before the strike. The company attempts to explain this picture in these and a few other departments by pointing out that a reorganization had begun in these departments early in 1947 but that it could not be effectuated fully until after the strike. This explanation may have something to do with the picture, but it is not very convincing. The picture in these departments would seem to cast very substantial doubts on the advisability of the company decision to eliminate hourly rated leaders. If 50 percent more supervision is required after the reorganization has been completed, it is quite obvious that the productive employees in these departments will have to be substantially more efficient just to offset this increase in supervisory overhead cost. It may also be noted that some of the strongest union claims that former leaders have been doing supervisory work at mechanic's wages occur in these reorganized departments. It is also not just a coincidence that these claims are strongest during the period of a few months after the strike when the number of supervisors was abnormally low in these departments.

Discussion of this phase of the case is summarized by concluding that wherever there appears to be any reasonably logical relationship between the number of leaders and the number of men supervised, management's general right to determine the size of the work force will not be questioned, and I will appraise the claims with the full realization that a reduction in the leader force was both logical and necessary. However, in those departments where the supervisory ratio just does not logically make sense, I will give consideration to the union contentions that claimants and others in like status were discriminated against by forcing them to work at mechanic's rate as punishment for not returning to work during the strike and that claimants did supervisory work at mechanic's rate of pay.

In some departments there are more claimants than men promoted to leader jobs after the strike. It is the company position that there can be no case at all for discrimination on the part of the surplus number of claimants when this is the fact. It is obvious that this situation can exist because of the decline in the size of the work force. If the total number of leaders has declined, there can be more claimants than promotions, even when new leaders have been made since the strike. Earlier in this decision, I concluded that full compliance with the no-discrimination obligations of paragraph 2 might well have required the post-strike demotion of a leader who had returned to work if a claimant had superior qualifications in all other respects. This conclusion means that the company could be incorrect in its position on this phase of the case. However, in most instances, the total decline in the leader force is so substantial that the number of valid claims would not often exceed the number of promotions since the strike.

The evidence indicates that there have been varying practices both before and after the strike as to shift assignments of leaders. Leaders have been transferred from one shift to another. However, in some departments, such transfers have happened infrequently, if at all. Individual shift preference is a factor in some cases as well as some indication of a natural desire to keep a leader with men he knows. In some instances, it appears that leaders who returned to work during the strike transferred to shifts they preferred and that management has considered these transfers as final and as a bar to restoring claimants to leader jobs either on their prestrike shift or to any leader job.

individual cases which include the shift assignment problem must be appraised on the facts of the particular case. Space does not permit discussion of these individual cases here. Moreover, in many instances, this phase of the problem cannot well be segregated from other aspects.

The following claimants have not worked at the yard since the strike: McGuire, Francis, DB—pipe and plumbing; McGuire, Ray, YB—maintenance; Wernel, Walter, YB—maintenance.

Francis McGuire refused a mechanic job immediately after the strike and quit.

Ray McGuire worked during the strike up until September 7, 1947, the union having raised no objection up to that point to the continuance of yard maintenance work. When salaried jobs were offered to all hourly rated leaders who could be reached as of about September 8, 1947, and hourly rated leaders were eliminated, Ray McGuire refused the salaried job on the ground that it represented a loss of take-home pay. Simultaneously, the union withdrew its permission to continue maintenance work with the union approval and McGuire did not work after September 7, 1947. After the strike he refused a mechanic's job. Wernel did not work during the strike and did not return to work after the strike.

In these cases, the union claims that the discriminatory act of demotion was the sole reason the employees did not return to work and that they are entitled to reinstatement and damages. With the probable exception of Wernel, it is clear that these men refused employment at mechanics' jobs after the strike because they did feel they had been discriminated against and because they did not want to accept the lower-rated jobs. However, their claims for damages must be denied. It is an important part of grievance procedure that an employee does not quit work when dissatisfied but files a grievance which will be processed to a fair conclusion. When those employees elected to quit, they forfeited their claims even if discrimination did exist.

The following employees returned to work after the strike but quit at some subsequent date: Duval, Edwin, JA—joiner; date quit, March 12, 1948; Henneman, George W., S.—hull (shipfitter); date quit, January 5, 1948. These employees have no claim after the date they quit their employment for the reason discussed in the preceding section.

Duvall was first made a leader on March 10, 1947. On the same date, another employee (Church) was made leader. Duvall had longer yard service than Church, but Church had been a leader and assistant foreman at Fairfield for 4 years. A reduction in the leader force in this department from eight to seven was justified after the strike. Employment had dropped from 93 on June 25, 1947, to 76 on November 21, 1947, and to 61 on March 1, 1948, which is about the date Duvall quit. In view of these facts, the union claim of discrimination is dismissed.

Henneman also had very short leader experience prior to the strike. He was first made leader on January 27, 1947. This is not a strong case for discrimination. It is dismissed.

The next group of employees to be considered includes those claimants in whose cases there is a company claim that the employee was offered a salaried job after the strike and refused it. These employees are Sunderland, William H. D—dock; Reinfelder, Jos. P., DP—pipe and plumbing; Faust, John Vincent, O—burning and welding; Golden, Lawrence B., S—hull (chipper and caulker).

As general proposition, a bona fide offer of a salaried leader job would remove any basis for discrimination after the date of the offer. The principal question in these cases relates to whether the company did make a real offer and whether the terms of the offer were discriminatory.

Sunderland was visited by his foreman in September 1947, at which time he frankly admits stating that he did not want a salaried job. Up until the time his grievance was filed on May 5, 1948, it is clear that he did not specifically ask for restoration to a leader job. Nor did the company at any time offer him such a job. Sunderland was 56 years old as of November 10, 1947, is somewhat hard of hearing, and has another physical disability. He had almost 27 years of service at the end of the strike, of which about the last 20 years were continuous service as a leader. The company advances the refusal of a salaried job in September 1947 and his physical disabilities as the reasons for its action in his case. A new leader was promoted on March 29, 1948. The evidence indicates that Sunderland's refusal of a salaried job in September 1947 may well have given his foreman the impression that it was a final answer to any such company offer. However, it is equally obvious that an answer to this question given during the strike should not have been accepted by the company as a final answer. All of the claimants and some in like status who were promoted to leader after the strike refused a salaried leader job during the strike. The only difference may have been in the manner of refusal and the specific nature of a discussion, if any, with a foreman at that time. Sunderland's long unbroken experience as leader should have entitled him to every consideration. His physical disabilities are not adequate reason for the action taken. They have existed for at least 5 years and did not prevent him from holding the top leader job in the department throughout the war. Department employment dropped somewhat after the strike, and I will give the company the benefit of the doubt in this case for the period of time up to March 29, 1948, when a new leader was appointed. In spite of the discussion during the strike, the company had a clear obligation to discuss the subject again with Sunderland at that time. And any possible question as to his position was removed shortly thereafter when he filed grievance.

Reinsfelder was a leader on the second shift. In the latter part of January he was offered a salaried leader job on the day shift on which he was then working. He refused that offer but said he would accept a salaried leader job on the second shift. However, employment on that shift had then dropped to a point where only one leader was required and the other leader on that shift has about 40 years' service. There was a substantial decline in employment in this department, justifying fewer leaders after the strike. No other promotions were made in the department until after the offer had been made to Reinsfelder. At the hearing Reinsfelder admitted freely that he had not been the victim of discrimination. In effect, he withdrew his own grievance. This claim is therefore dismissed.

Faust has over 14 years' service, but had a fairly short period of service as a leader prior to the strike. He had been working day shift for about 5 years and was a day-shift leader when the strike began. On November 27, 1947, the company offered him a salaried leader job on second or third shift. He told his foreman that he probably would not be able to work nights and confirmed the statement the next day. He was not again offered a leader job although a number of promotions on day shift were made later. In this case, the evidence is clear that the November 27, 1947, refusal was not a refusal of a salaried leader job as such, but only because it was not on the shift on which the employee had worked for some time and the shift on which he had been a leader. This sort of refusal does not justify forgetting about him for all times. Because he has relatively short service as a leader, and because there was justification for some decline in number of leaders in O department, further consideration of his case will be deferred until other cases in this department are examined.

About 1 week before the hearing of his case, a quarterman offered Golden a salaried leader job. He gave no definite answer, stating that he would want to discuss the matter with the union. He said that if he had to give an immediate answer, it would have to be in the negative. He asked for time to think it over and it is not too clear whether that request was or was not granted. At the hearing he said that he would accept a salaried leader job. The late offer of a salaried job (November 1948) certainly does not remove any otherwise justifiable claim of discrimination up to the date of the offer. Moreover, under the circumstances of this case, Golden's vacillation for a few days in giving an answer should not deprive him of a renewal of that offer, unless the job had been filled in the meantime. The evidence indicates that the job had not been filled as of the date of the hearing, when Golden did answer definitely in the affirmative. His claim on other grounds will be considered later in this opinion.

At the hearing, the company asked a few claimants a hypothetical question along the following lines:

"Would you accept a salaried leader job now if it were offered to you?"

The answers ranged from a positive "Yes" to a flat "No." Since these questions were only presumptive and it was made clear that a job was not actually being offered, it is clear that these answers should be substantially disregarded in deciding these cases.

Another general question which fits in logically at this point is the union request for damages for claimants who were offered salaried jobs and accepted them at various dates after November 10, 1947. These individuals and the dates of promotion to salaried leader jobs are—

	Department	Date of promotion
Kotofski, Stanley	O—Burning and welding	Apr. 19, 1948
Seal, James E.	do	Do.
Gorski, Joseph	R—Rigging	Apr. 26, 1948
Strubing, John	do	Do.
Patrick, Brady	S—Hull (erectors)	Apr. 1, 1948
Alder, Benjamin H	S—Hull (shipfitters)	Mar. 15, 1948
Dixon, Lawrence E	S—Hull (chippers and caulkers)	Jan. 13, 1948

Except for a special question regarding Gorski and Strubing, it is clear that the acceptance of a salaried leader job eliminated any claim for damages after the date of promotion. Questions as to whether discrimination existed prior to the date, and, if so, for how long, will be deferred for consideration along with other claimants in the same department.

Gorski and Strubing were first-class hourly rated leaders before the strike.

Gorski had been first made a leader on August 11, 1941, had been demoted to rigger on September 10, 1945, and had been remade as a leader on December 2, 1946. Strubing was a leader continuously from January 25, 1943, and had been a leader, first class, since June 4, 1943. Both men were offered second-class salaried leader jobs on April 26, 1948, and accepted, filing their grievances shortly thereafter under the general grievance (No. 1964). The union claims that the company's salaried offer of a lower hourly rate equivalent was a form of discrimination, that both men should be paid damages not only for the period prior to their promotion but also after their promotion in an amount equal to the difference between first- and second-class rate. The company holds that their promotion disproves discrimination at any time, that the union has no right to represent these men now that they are salaried leaders, and that the umpire has no authority to decide the dispute about a salaried leader's rate of pay.

There is no question but that I have the jurisdiction to decide whether these two men were discriminated against prior to April 26, 1949, when they became salaried leaders. The jurisdiction question after that date ties in with another problem which will be discussed later, namely, whether a possible company offer of a salaried leader job to a claimant after the date of this decison will eliminate all discrimination unless the offer is to a job fully comparable to the one held prior to the strike. I conclude that I do have the authority to decide whether an offer of a salaried job which is lower rated than the claimant's prestrike job does or does not remove discrimination after that date. Specific disposition of the Gorski and Strubing cases will be deferred until examination is made of the relative position of those two men among other claimants in the department involved.

In one case (Harry W. Mohr, S—Department—shipfitters), the company claims that the claimant refused to talk to and work cooperatively with nonstrikers after the strike and otherwise showed plainly that he could not then be trusted to impartially supervise men. The company frankly concedes that Mohr did a satisfactory job before the strike, although his length of service as a leader was short. Mohr's own testimony at the hearing indicates that whereas he is intellectually fully conscious of his own and the union's no-discrimination pledge under paragraph 2, he has not yet reached the point of really forgetting the strike experiences enough to be a salaried leader. This conclusion impels me to dismiss his grievance. This is one of very few cases where there is any real indication from the evidence that the strike experience temporarily made an employee unfit for salaried leader work.

Up to this point in the opinion, most of the discussion has been directed to post-strike factors or events which have been advanced by the company as reasons for its refusal to offer leader jobs to those men. The next general category of reasons advanced by the company relate to the claimants' pro-strike leader records. On page 19 under item 9, I have listed reasons a to n, inclusive, one or more of which were advanced by the company in various individual cases.

With all due regard to the large amount of truth in the company assertion that good qualities required in a leader are hard to describe and that negative qualities are equally difficult to sustain, about 75 percent of foremen testimony on these assertions was a rather sorry performance. The major weakness in much of this testimony was not that it was vague and intangible, although that was true in many instances. I would expect any foreman's judgment of an individual leader to be somewhat general. Even more serious weaknesses in this category of testimony, some of which are not the fault of the company witnesses, were—

(1) It is very obvious that the prostrike leader record of most men who came back to work during the strike and who are now salaried leaders has never been subjected to this sort of analysis.

(2) When these foremen and their quartermen and higher ranks in management were making leaders to fill vacancies after the strike, and if there was no discrimination in this regard as the company insists, it is clear that in at least some cases they were discarding men because of minor demonstrated weaknesses as leaders in favor of men who had never been leaders and where there was no real assurance that the new men would be any better, if as good.

(3) The minor nature of the prestrike weaknesses in many of these men is made evident from the fact that many of them heard the nature of the charges against them for the first time at the hearings in their cases. If a leader had a really serious prestrike weakness, it is extremely unlikely that he would not have heard about it while he was on the job. I am sure that Bethlehem supervision was not so spineless that a serious fault of a leader would not have been called to his attention.

(4) In at least a few cases, claimants were made or remade as leaders only a short time before the strike by the same foremen who now hold them unfit to act in that capacity. Even before the strike, a review of my earlier decision will show that the inclusion of hourly rated leaders in the bargaining unit did not interfere with management's right to select leaders. Recognizing that even the best of foremen will make a mistake on occasion, it is just not logical to assume that these foremen would make so many mistakes before the strike and then have an almost perfect record in this respect as to their post-strike selections.

Despite these limitations to the company's testimony, I indicated in decision No. 19–A and hereby reaffirm the conclusion that if there were factors in a leader's prestrike record which represented real and substantial cause for failure to reinstate after the strike, they should be given full weight. An even more tangible evidence of my position in that respect is decision No. 5–A (Boston yard) where I upheld the company in the only other case of this general character which was even appealed to arbitration at any of the Bethlehem Atlantic-Coast yards.

Among the reasons given by management, at least a few require some general comment.

Among the claimants, there are a number of men who had had very limited leader experience before the strike. There are also a number whose employment records show that they were the ones who had been demoted on earlier occasions when the work force had declined drastically and then had been remade later. As a general proposition their claims are necessarily somewhat weaker than the claims of men who had a long continuous record as leader since I have already concluded that some restriction in size of leader force after the strike was both logical and necessary.

Alleged friction or lack of cooperation between leaders and higher ranks of supervision is an important factor. As I noted in decision 5–A (Boston yard) and have already observed earlier in this opinion, efficient supervision cannot be achieved if there is real disunity in the supervisory ranks. Management testimony in this respect was directed primarly to claimants Seipp, Glodek, Maczka, and Merzendorf. As respects Glodek, management added the observation that he had exhibited a "know-it-all" attitude on occasion.

While Seipp's case is not too strong on other phases of his prestrike record, the company assertions on this particular point were not very convincing. Maczka exhibited some bitterness over his treatment after the strike, but the company evidence as to his prestrike record in this particular was not strong. Nor was there any appreciable evidence of a real prestrike uncooperative attitude on the part of Merzendorf. As to Glodek, there is some indication that he may exhibit a "know-it-all" attitude at times. I can imagine that there were occasions when he was a bit irritating. However, the indications are that this is something of a mannerism and not a basic lack of cooperation. In my judgment, this fault needs correction but is not serious enough to override his obvious qualifications and good record in other respects. In passing, and without mentioning any names, it may be observed that one or more company witnesses exhibited a much more pronounced "know-it-all" attitude at the hearings than is even indicated by Glodeck's record or attitude.

Age or physical condition represent one of the more difficult phases of this case. It is obvious that advanced age or serious physical disability decreases a leader's efficiency. And I have no doubt whatever but that two or three of the claimants in these cases are less efficient now than they were a few years ago. Over the period of time during which I have acted as umpire at Bethlehem yards, it has been my general observation that Bethlehem has an above-average record of a fair and even indulgent policy in its handling of employees who have passed the peak of efficiency due to age or physical disability. It would be unfair to the company to penalize it in this case because of this excellent record. However, I cannot feel otherwise but to believe that the company use of the failure of these long service men to return to work during the strike as an occasion for demoting them was a discriminatory act. In none of these cases is there any indication that before the strike these men had been warned that their days as leaders were numbered. All of them had served faithfully through the war period. There is no indication that the company has demoted other leaders in comparable positions who did come back to work during the strike. And with one possible exception, the evidence is that as mechanics these men are now performing more strenuous work than is required of a leader.

Drinking during working hours is a serious charge. If proven, it is a good cause for even more severe disciplinary action than demotion. In two cases (Buker and Bready), the company alleges that before the strike these men were found guilty of drinking during working hours. There are differences in the testimony as to Buker but it is evident to me that he was warned about drinking on three different occasions before the strike by quarterman Kerr, including a warning on the last occasion that he would be taken off the job if the offense was repeated. Moreover, Buker finally admitted that he had been warned on one occasion about 1 month after the strike. In addition, Buker's prestrike record is weak on other counts. As to Bready, there is no disagreement over the fact that he was warned on two occasions. In the first instance, there is a difference of opinion as to whether he was guilty. On the second occasion, Bready frankly admits that he had been drinking during lunch period. This is the only real charge against Bready. He had been a leader continuously for over 7 years and the company frankly admits that he is a good leader. In this case, it is quite obvious that Bready's good qualities as a leader were sufficiently satisfactory to more than offset the offenses cited. Since these incidents occurred some time before the strike and nothing but a verbal warning resulted from discussion of them, and in view of Bready's otherwise good record, there was no sound basis in this case for having denied him a leader job after the strike.

In one case (Webster), the claimant had been appointed as a leader upon the induction into the Army of the regular leader. This leader returned from military service shortly before the strike, and Webster frankly admits that he went back to his regular mechanic's job at that time and did no leader work thereafter. This is not a case of discrimination. Necessary demotion after the regular leader had returned simply did not "catch up" with Webster before the strike started.

One or more of the new leaders promoted since the strike had had extensive supervisory experience at other yards before transfer to the Baltimore yard. In cases where these men are compared with claimants who had only a few months of leader experience before the strike and might have been demoted in any event due to reduction in the work force, some recognition of this prior experience elsewhere is justified. In some earlier cases, I have supported the union in its position that experience at Fairfield, and so forth, is a factor which should be given some consideration in classification of an employee.

The fact of an opinion which is already unduly long does not permit detailed analysis of the various other prestrike reasons advanced by the company in individual cases. Omission of further specific reference to these company claims and the union answers to them does not mean that they are disregarded entirely. They will be given such weight as they deserve in appraising the situation in each department and in each case.

Except for those individual cases which have already been decided in whole or in part in the opinion up to this point, it is necessary for me to appraise all the various arguments of the parties and to weigh them, arriving at a specific decision in each case. Since I have already written general comments on most of the major factors advanced by either party, I will make no attempt to set forth the reasons for the specific application of those comments to each of the remaining individual cases. The decision in each of these cases will be my best estimate of all the factors involved.

Union demands.—Although the union sought to convince me that my preliminary decision as to ordered reinstatements should be reconsidered, its other specific requests were all expressed in terms of money damages.

The first of these claims is that money damages should be paid each claimant in an amount equal to the difference between wages actually received and the appropriate leader rate for a period beginning as of November 10, 1947, and continuing until the claimant is restored to a leader job. The measure of damages suggested (difference in hourly rates) is an appropriate measure. I have already indicated that if damages are due, the beginning date in any case will not be earlier than November 25, 1947. I have also indicated that in individual cases the duration of discrimination if any, may vary both as to beginning and ending dates. In my opinion, where discrimination still exists, the union's request for continuing liability is not a desirable answer. After all the time that has already elapsed, the parties need a final conclusion to these cases. However, the union is correct in its general position that in cases of continuing discrimination, the cutting off of company liability as of the chance date of an umpire award would not be equitable to these employees. In such cases, I will not order reinstatement to a leader job but I will give the company a period approximately 2 weeks after the date of this decision to determine whether it will offer a leader job to the individual. My jurisdiction cannot extend beyond June 23, 1949, in any event, that being the terminal date of the current agreement. If in any case the company does not offer a comparable leader job to these named individuals, I will award a lump sum additional payment which will approximately equal loss of wages up to June 23, 1949, plus a somewhat smaller amount of punitive damages in such cases. The sum which is determined for such possible use is a flat figure of $300 per individual. Of course, the company can avoid payment of such an additional sum to any or all the named individuals by making a bonafide offer of a comparable salaried or hourly rated leader job. If the claimant should refuse to accept such an offer, the company's liability to that individual is terminated as of the date of the offer.

The union has also requested punitive damages to the individuals for the reasons outlined in the review of the union position (items 8-B and 8-C). Except for that part of the potential $300 per individual award which has just been mentioned, which is over and above actual loss of wages, I find no basis for granting these union requests.

The union has also requested damages to the union itself in the amount of $50,000. While I have found that the company has been in error in a number of important respects in these cases, I find no basis for awarding damages in excess of those required to "make whole" those individuals who have been discriminated against. This union request is denied.

Decision.—(1) The claims of discrimination in the various individual cases covered by this award are determined as noted below for the period beginning as of November 10, 1947, and ending as of February 26, 1949. In all cases except those where the claim is dismissed, money damages are due and payable for the period of time specified in that case in an amount equal to the difference between wages actually earned and the wages which would have been earned if the employee had continued to be classified and paid at the same hourly rated leader job which he occupied as of June 25, 1947.

(2) The claim of John E. Becker (S-3409) that he was discriminated against because he was not reappointed as leader has been denied in (1) above. However, he was discriminated against by demotion to driller, third class. If the company has not already done so, Becker shall be reclassified as driller, first class and he is entitled to retroactive pay equal to the dierence between first class driller rate and third class driller rate for all time worked after Nov. 10, 1947.

(3) With respect to Strubing (R-154) and Gorski (R-73), the decision in (1) above covers only the period up to April 26, 1948. Beginning April 26, 1948 and continuing up to February 26, 1949, they shall also be paid an amount of damages equal to the difference between first class hourly leader rate and second class hourly leader rate or the difference between first class salaried leader rate and second class salaried leader rate, whichever is lesser. If on or before February 26, 1949, the company does not promote these two men to first class salaried leaders, an additional lump sum amount of damages shall be paid to them equal to the rate of pay difference noted above multiplied by 40 hours per week and calculated to continue to June 23, 1949.

(4) As to the terminal dates of all damage payment calculated noted in (1), (2), and (3) above, if since the date of the last hearing, the company has corrected the discrimination found by offer of a leader job comparable to the one held prior to the strike, the damages due will be reduced accordingly by substituting the date of the job offer.

(5) With the respect to the following-named employees, reinstatement to leader jobs (hourly rated or salaried) is not ordered. However, in the event that on or before February 26, 1949 the company does not make a bona fide offer to those named individuals of a leader job (salaried or hourly-rated at company option) which is comparable to the job held before the strike as to classification, an additional lump-sum damage payment of three hundred dollars ($300) shall be paid to any such named individual to whom such an offer is not made.

(6) If any of the individuals named in (5) above should refuse to accept a bona fide company offer made between the date of receipt of this decision and February 26, 1949 of a comparable leader job (salaried or hourly rated at company option), such refusal will remove any obligation on the part of the company to pay the $300 damage sum noted in (5) above. However, any such refusal will not affect the damages awarded to that individual under (1) above.

STATEMENT OF JACOB S. POTOFSKY, GENERAL PRESIDENT, AMALGAMATED CLOTHING WORKERS OF AMERICA, CIO, ON H. R. 2032

My name is Jacob S. Potofsky and my address is 15 Union Square, New York, N. Y. I am general president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America.

I desire to express my appreciation to the committee for this opportunity to appear before it and to present the views of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America.

I wish at the outset to make clear to the committee that we of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America are unalterably opposed to the continuation of the Taft-Hartley Act. We request its immediate repeal and the immediate enactment of H. R. 2032 with the minor technical and perfecting amendments referred to by CIO General Counsel Arthur Goldberg in his testimony before the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee on S. 249 on February 3, 1949. This would constitute a reenactment of the Wagner Act.

The past 21 months have made it absolutely clear to all enlightened Americans that the Taft-Hartley Act was not as its proponents represent, an attempt to equalize the relationship between management and labor. In its origins and in practice it represents a serious attempt to weaken the entire trade-union movement.

The grave fears which we expressed concerning the Taft-Hartley Act at the time of its passage have been confirmed in countless decisions by the NLRB and its coordinate general counsel. The Taft-Hartley Act has to an extent hitherto unheard of in our history injected the Government into the field of labor relations. As a consequence, we have already gone a long way toward replacing free collective bargaining with Government intervention on the side of the employer.

As the eminent labor-relations authority, William M. Leiserson, a former member of the National Labor Relations Board and former Chairman of the National Mediation Board, observed in an article which appeared in the New York Times magazine section on February 6, 1949, the Taft-Hartley Act "did decide by congressional fiat vital issues of rules and working conditions involved in labor contracts under the guise of determining legitimate rights. In doing this it purported to further the policy of collective bargaining, but its concern that 'strikes and other forms of industrial unrest or concerted activities [shall not] impair the interest of the public' led it to prescribe 'rights' which had the effect of determining disputed issues and removing them from the field of collective bargaining."

The Taft-Hartley Act placed the Government squarely on the side of management and thereby placed in management's hands various weapons for use against labor in the event management saw fit to utilize them. That management in the industries in which we operate has in the main seen fit not to take advantage of these antiunion devices thus provided is to their credit.

But let us not be deluded into thinking that all of management which has seen fit to abstain from recourse to the Taft-Hartley Act was motivated by enlightened considerations. Employers, particularly some of the giants of industry, have refrained from exploiting the antiunion provisions of the act because they were fearful of the effects upon the public mind which full exposure would have brought about. Further, industry was enjoying unprecedented prosperity during this period and had been unwilling to precipitate any struggle with labor. Finally, the committee should understand that many of the antiunion provisions can be put to their most effective usage only during a period of decline in our economy.

Further, the full impact of the law cannot be weighed solely by reference to the decisions of the NLRB and its general counsel. As was to be expected, the law has created a climate which has seriously hampered organization of the unorganized workers in American industry and has lent encouragement to the antiunion employer in his efforts to defeat the just demands and aspirations of the labor organization already representing his employees. In addition we find that various State and local governments have been encouraged by this Federal example to enact repressive antiunion legislation. Indeed, in several States the legislatures have enacted into law measures which have gone beyond the Taft-Hartley Act.

As was predicted by the President in his historic veto message of the Taft-Hartley Act, the act has resulted in confusion and chaos. Differences of opinion as to the meaning of the statute arose almost immediately after its passage between the NLRB and its general counsel. Members of the joint legislative committee created by the statute, the so-called legislative committee created by the statute, the so-called watch-dog committee, found themselves in disagreement with each other and with the NLRB regarding interpretations of particular provisions of the statute. The statute also engendered conflict between State labor-relation agencies and the NLRB. These chaotic conditions were in marked contrast to the conditions which obtained during the era of the Wagner Act. The Wagner Act, a statute limited in scope and carefully drawn in its inception, had after some 12 years of administrative and judicial interpretation a well-defined meaning. Employers and unions were well acquainted with its scope and application.

The Wagner Act puts its faith in collective bargaining, in representatives of management and workers resolving their differences and hammering out a collective agreement around the bargaining table. While the Taft-Hartley Act paid lip service to collective bargaining it actually relied on governmental dictation of the terms of the bargain. Thus the Taft-Hartley Act sought to remove from the area of collective bargaining various terms and conditions concerning which management and labor had previously been free to determine for themselves. Specifically, it denies the parties the right to bargain collectively with reference to union security. In fact, it all but destroys union security. It achieves this result (1) by barring the closed shop and other forms of preferential hiring outright, (2) by permitting only an extremely limited form of union security, and (3) by not permitting even this weakened type of union security to be effectively implemented. Union security is rendered meaningless by confining it only to discharges for failure to pay dues. The effect of this provision has been to deny unions the power to procure the discharge of spies, contract breakers, and stool pigeons.

Thus, the Taft-Hartley Act has in the name of creating "responsibility" in labor organizations deprived unions of the only means of enforcing conformity with agreements. As Father Jerome L. Toner, formerly of Catholic University, observed in a study of the operations of the closed shop: (1) Labor relations are considerably smoother as a result of the closed shop; (2) trade-unions have demonstrated genuine responsibility under closed-shop contracts, and have contributed substantially to the improvement of production; (3) the closed shop will probably be the rule rather than the exception within the next decade.

The soundness of these conclusions is borne out by our experience in the clothing industry. As a matter of fact, representatives of the clothing industry in testifying before the Senate committee while the Taft-Hartley Act was under consideration declared that the closed shop had been an effective aid to creating responsible unionism.

It is plain from our experience that the opposition to union security does not stem from any genuine concern over the rights of individuals. The opposition to the closed shop is merely but one facet of the basic antiunionism of certain employers.

The Taft-Hartley Act further interfered with free collective bargaining by imposing technical and rigid restrictions upon bargaining with reference to health and welfare funds and pensions.

As was to be expected, these efforts to restrict collective bargaining ended in failure. It is a truism in labor relations that collective bargaining, if it is truly to reflect the needs of the parties, must be unhampered. It cannot, hampered and restricted as it has been under the Taft-Hartley Act, operate successfully. Collective bargaining, if it is to serve as a socially useful process, cannot be circumscribed by legislative obstructions.

The Taft-Hartley Act further interfered with the functioning of free collective bargaining by imposing impractical and unworkable restraints on the right to strike, and, in certain circumstances, entirely outlawing strikes. Thus, unions have been seriously weakened in their relationship with employers.

The right to strike must remain unfettered if collective bargaining is to operate successfully. It is the existence of the strike power which creates the conditions necessary for the give and take which characterizes good-faith collective bargaining.

As we have seen on numerous occasions since the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, employers free of the fear of strike action have remained stiff-necked and obdurate throughout negotiations with their employee representatives.

Collective bargaining presupposes and requires equality of the parties. Such equality is wholly absent where unions must negotiate under the restraints imposed upon them by the Taft-Hartley Act.

The most serious limitation upon the right to strike is not, however, expressly spelled out in the act. As with reference to many of the restraints which inhere in the Taft-Hartley Act several provisions must be read in conjunction with each other before the full implications of the act are understood. The National Labor Relations Board has by thus harmonizing several provisions of the act concluded that employees who strike for economic reasons are subject to replacement and, in the event of their replacement by strikebreakers, only the strikebreakers are entitled to vote in any subsequent bargaining election. Thus, employees, even where the specific strike restraints contained in the act do not apply, are effectively restrained from taking strike action. That strikes must be conducted at the risk of loss of their jobs and destruction of their union constitutes a powerful deterrent. An employer able to secure sufficient replacements is given an easy method of ousting a union from the plant. It requires no elaborate argument to show how this interpretation of the Taft-Hartley provisions will operate in time of increasing unemployment when replacements are readily available. Employers thus fortified may with little risk deny out of hand legitimate union demands.

The statute in the guise of granting freedom of speech to employers has sanctioned all-out employer attacks upon employee unionization. The decisional and administrative interpretations of the Board and general counsel have thus gutted the concept of employee freedom to join unions of their own choosing. Yet, at the same time, the Board has applied the act to employees in such a manner as to render employee recourse to speech coercive and thus deny workers their constitutional liberties. The application of this double standard is but one more illustration of the many inequities rampant in the Taft-Hartley Act.

Finally, the Taft-Hartley Act has marked the return of government by injunction. In the period which preceded the passage of the Norris-LaGuardia Act the courts by their indiscriminate and unwarranted usage of the Norris-LaGuardia Act effectively throttled employee organization and activity. Now, as then, the courts are being utilized to interfere with employee freedom to organize and to deny unions an opportunity to improve employee standards. Injunctive restraints upon employee activity have no proper place in our industrial society.

I have sought in this brief time to bring to the committee's attention only a few of the glaring inequities contained in the Taft-Hartley Act. As I have demonstrated, that statute both in its design and operation is a partisan and dangerous piece of legislation. Each day that it remains in operation gives further evidence of its antiunion character.

In behalf of the 375,000 members of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America I ask this committee favorably to report out H. R. 2032 and thereby once more restore free collective bargaining and the democratic right of employees to join unions of their own choosing.

The passage of H. R. 2032 will represent a return to the guiding principles of our free economy and society—an implementation, not a denial of, the basic guaranties contained in our Constitution—freedom of speech, freedom of press, and freedom of assembly. The democratic principles and safeguards provided by our Constitution for application in the political sphere will once again apply in the economic sphere.

The power and control over industrial relations which the Taft-Hartley Act shifted to Government for use by employers will be returned to where it rightfully belongs—the bipartisan industrial government composed of representatives of the employers and representatives of the workers.

We seek a return to that code of industrial relations consistent with our democratic traditions, that code under which free collective bargaining flourished and democratic trade-unionism grew.

These views which I have expressed before you today in behalf of our membership are, as I have already pointed out, shared by nearly all scholars in the field of labor relations. In addition, many employers now recognize that the law was narrowly partisan and punitive.

Business week, an influential publication in the business community, conceded in its December 18, 1948, issue that the law is unsound. It stated:

"What was wrong was that the Taft-Hartley Act went too far. It crossed the narrow line separating a law which aims only to regulate from one which could destroy.

"Given a few million unemployed in America, given an administration in Washington which was not prounion—and the Taft-Hartley Act conceivably could wreck the labor movement.

"Any time there is a surplus labor pool from which an employer can hire at least token strike replacements, these four provisions, linked together, presumably can destroy a union."

But, most significantly, the people spoke with unmistakable clarity in our last election. It was their collective wisdom that the Taft-Hartley Act should be repealed and the Wagner Act restored. Their decision cannot and certainly should not be ignored. Your campaign pledge to them must be redeemed.

Let us demonstrate to our own people and to a watching world the vitality of our democratic process. Let us conclusively establish that our representative form of government is truly government by consent of the governed; that our representative form of government accurately reflects the desires of the people and translates their desires, without temporizing, into action. Only in this way can we give tangible substance to our democratic forms. Only in this way can we perpetuate our democratic ideals at home and establish them abroad.

Statement of Germain Bulcke, Vice President, International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, CIO

Effect of noncommunist affidavits in stultifying collective bargaining

The experience of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union in the west coast maritime strike last fall shows how the Taft-Hartley non-Communist affidavits can be used to stultify collective bargaining. The ILWU is a noncomplying union. Its officers stand instructed by the membership not to sign the affidavits.

The union's reason for not signing the affidavits is set forth in a policy statement adopted by its executive board on December 17, 1947: "Compliance needs to be accompanied by concessions to the employers which spells loss of gains to the workers. Moreover, the purpose of the non-Communist affidavits has now emerged crystal clear—they were meant to create a false issue and smoke screen behind which the workers could be and are being robbed."

How accurate this analysis turned out to be appears from the story of the west coast maritime strike. The strike took place on September 2, after negotiations which had been going on ever since February. Up to the last minute the Waterfront Employers Association and the union bargained back and forth on the economic matters at issue. These included the union demands for a wage increase, an 8-hour work shift, Sunday on, improved safety rules, and a number of other issues.

Meanwhile, the employers carried on a vigorous publicity campaign directed at the individual longshoremen, urging them to accept the employers' offers, while their news releases breathed optimism that a settlement was near. At no time throughout the months of negotiations was there any mention of the non-Communist affidavits. The record is clear that, had the men accepted the employers' last offer, this issue would not have been raised.

The day the men struck, however, the Waterfront Employers Association met and adopted the following resolution:

"Fourteen years of strikes, disruption, and chaos in the maritime industry on this coast caused directly by union leadership following the Communist Party line have culminated in the strike announced by Harry Bridges Thursday, September 2.

"The Waterfront Employers Association of the Pacific Coast and the Pacific American Shipowners Association and their members are now convinced that survival of the industry and the public welfare demand adoption of the policy hereby declared:

"That these associations and their members cease to bargain or contract with any labor organization unless each of its officers file with the National Labor Relations Board, in pursuance of law, his affidavit he is not a member of the Communist Party or affiliated with such party, that he does not believe in and is not a member of or supports any organization that believes in or teaches the overthrow of the United States Government by force or by an illegal or unconstitutional method."

This position was implemented by a series of newspaper advertisements signed by WEA and the Pacific American Shipowners Association.

On September 16 there was an ad with the caption "Which flag do we fly?" showing two flags—one of the United States and the other of the U. S. S. R. "You can't do business with communism because communism wants chaos and not agreement," the text stated. "Nothing stands in the way of reasonable progress in our labor relations except the Communist ideology governing certain labor leaders."

Another ad, published on October 4, announced that "We cannot have peace with irresponsible Communist Party-line leadership" and showed a photograph of Harry Bridges drinking cocktails with V. Molotov. What the ad neglected to point out was that the occasion when the picture was taken was a reception during the United Nations Conference on May 7, 1945. Present at that reception were many outstanding businessmen, including Adrien Falk and Henry F. Grady.

Then, on October 15, the employers ran an ad showing a facsimile of the non-Communist affidavit form and pointing out that "as one guaranty of responsible union leadership, we have asked that officers of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union and the Marine Cooks and Stewards Union sign this non-Communist affidavit." "Are we asking too much?" the ad was headed.

They were. They were asking that the union membersihp reverse its position on the affidavit issue. But this the membership refused to do. In a special referendum vote, conducted immediately after the employers announced what the Coos Bay (Oreg.) Times called editorially their sit-down position, the membership of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union reiterated their support of the officers in their refusal to sign the affidavits by a vote of 10,740 to 376. At the same time the members turned down the employers' last offer by a vote of 10,780 to 236. Following this vote the union offered to reopen negotiations. The WEA refused.

So there was a complete stalemate. The employers even carried their "sit-down" to the point of refusing to honor their contracts with the United States Army to handle Army cargo, despite the union's announced willingness to supply men. On September 10, the San Francisco News ran a strike story headed "Employers block cargo movement for Army." The WEA issued a statement which read in part:

"This industry has made a decision with respect to Army cargoes. It will not continue to handle them if it requires dealing with Communist party-line labor leaders, self-sworn to the destruction of the American merchant marine."

The Army, under the necessity of moving its cargo, canceled its contracts with WEA members and signed new ones with independent stevedore contractors who were not averse to doing business with the union.

Similarly, the WEA refused to permit ships to operate to Alaska. Governor Gruening, of Alaska, wired the WEA that the longshoremen were "ready and willing to load all Alaska ships." The WEA replied that there could be no compromise "with Communist party-line union leaders" and called upon the Governor:

"Let us, therefore, stand fast together and purge this scourge from the maritime industry and thereby effect a water-front peace based on integrity and responsibility, one which will insure lasting peace and uninterrupted shipping service in the Alaska trade."

On October 16, Bridges wrote the WEA that the officers would step out of the picture and the union would elect a strictly rank-and-file bargaining committee. This proposition was likewise rejected, and the employers' "sit-down" continued.

About this same time, the national CIO, at the request of the ILWU, sent Vice President Allan Haywood out to the coast to seek a basis for reopening negotiations. "Haywood," according to the New York Times for October 16, "has asked that the employers drop their demands for union non-Communist affidavits in return for a national CIO guaranty of future contracts with the maritime unions."

This proposal, too, was turned down. Frank Foisie, then president of WEA, told a press conference (New York Times, October 16): "Our subcommittee made it plain to Mr. Haywood that we demand non-Communist affidavits. Our position is unchanged."

On the basis of Mr. Haywood's report to national CIO of his failure to budge the WEA from their position, Philip Murray made public the following letter (New York Times, October 21):

"The unions have repeatedly offered to resume negotiations or accept the good offices of a neutral third party. * * * The employer associations have adamantly rejected every such offer.

"The shipowners have announced instead that they will not deal with the elected negotiating committees of the unions. The direct challenge by these employers of the right of workers to select negotiating committees of their own choosing is a threat to every labor union in the country. It represents an attempt to establish a new pattern of company unionism."

Ultimately—a month later, on November 7—a formula was worked out with the assistance of national CIO and Almon E. Roth, president of the San Francisco Employers' Council, under which the WEA dropped its demand that the union officers sign affidavits. Under this formula, designed as a face saver for the WEA, the CIO agreed to renew an earlier understanding by which the CIO gave the WEA certain guaranties of contract performance.

Negotiations, resumed on the basis of this formula, took place in a wholly new atmosphere. Frank Foisie, for years president of WEA, and the lawyers who had spoken for him were all absent.

On November 25 a joint statement was issued by the parties which read in part as follows:

"Negotiating committees for the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union and the Waterfront Employers Association agreed today to settlement terms which they will recommend to their respective memberships.

"Terming the new pact one based on complete good faith, union and employer spokesmen joined in the prediction this contract and this new spirit can mean a new era for west-coast shipping.

"Operation under the long-range peace plan, a 3-year contract to 1951, CIO contract underwriting, improved grievance machinery, plus the new spirit of friendly cooperation which pervaded all meetings, formed the basis for predictions of water-front peace in the years ahead.

"The agreement is conditioned only on ratification by memberships."

The union won many of its basic demands, including a 15-cents-per-hour wage increase, 1 day off each week, a 9-hour shift, and a much improved grievance machinery designed to minimize the resort to arbitration.

In the 2 years 1947 and 1948, there were 55 arbitrations. In the 3 months since work was resumed on December 6, not a single dispute has gone to arbitration. The "new look," as it is called on the coast, appears to be working. The old arbitrary attitudes are gone or going, and disputes are being settled on the job.

On March 3 and 4, a joint conference was held by WEA and ILWU to consider ways of building up Pacific coast shipping and providing more jobs for longshoremen. John E. Cushing, president of Matson Navigation Co., opening the conference for the WEA, said:

"The fact that we are at this table keynotes the meeting better than words. Out of this meeting and others which we hope will follow can come more jobs for our ships and men."

And Kenneth H. Finnessey, of States Steamship Co., in summing up the achievements of the conference, said:

"The contract and spirit has served us well for the full quarter of a year since December 6. We have settled all of our disputes without a single arbitration. We have had no delays to cargoes since we went back to work. We have a new spirit, and we know that if we supplement it with the right kind of action we can turn it into new jobs for all hands.

"In the past 2 days we have found areas of mutual interest in which we can work jointly, and to translate these areas into more longshore and ship jobs we have agreed to the appointment of working committees who will develop these identities of interest and turn opportunities into jobs and pay checks."

Meanwhile, the WEA has announced a complete reorganization. O. W. Pearson, executive vice president of the Marine Terminals Corp., of Los Angeles, will be president. Frank Foisie, former president, according to the WEA news release (March 7) "is abroad on an industry study of cargo-handling operations."

The reorganization symbolizes a basic change in policy. The old policy of get tough with the unions has been replaced by one of mutual respect and cooperation. Had this policy been adopted earlier instead of the policy of demanding the signing of the affidavits, the strike would probably not have occurred.

SINCE THE WEST COAST LONGSHORE STRIKE—HOW TAFT-HARTLEY IS DESTROYING PEACE ON THE WATERFRONT

In this statement the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union wishes to discuss the current collective-bargaining relations between the union and the Waterfront Employers Association; and the manner in which the Taft-Hartley Act, and more specifically the general counsel of the NLRB is actively operating to destroy the existing collective-bargaining agreement and bring chaos to the waterfront.

The problem we face is immediate and critical.

All of the hard and honest work of both parties to this agreement, all of the efforts to rehabilitate shipping on the west coast, will be thrown into the ashcan if the general counsel is successful in his objective—to prove that our contract is illegal and invalid. Even as the employers and the union are working to make this new contract work, the general counsel is bending every effort to bring about its end.

The current collective-bargaining agreement was reached only after every possible obstacle of the Taft-Hartley Act was overcome. Later in this statement, under the subheading "The west coast longshore strike—how the Taft-Hartley Act created a prolonged labor dispute," the ILWU discloses the manner in which the act impeded collective bargaining and forced strike action.

Since the settlement of the strike and the return to work under the new agreement on December 7, a new atmosphere has developed on the water front. With a change in the leadership of the employers' association, the efforts of both parties to live under the new agreement have already borne some fruit.

In the 2 years 1947 and 1948, there were 55 arbitrations. In the 3 months since work was resumed on December 6, not a single dispute has gone to arbitration. Disputes are being settled on the job.

Both parties are trying to live with each other under the new agreement, and we have been getting along. Jointly, employer and union are trying to persuade shippers in other parts of the country that stability has been restored to the water front on the west coast.

This new agreement was reached only after the most prolonged and bitter struggle. It was reached despite the Taft-Hartley Act. And now we see the general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, himself the instrument and embodiment of the Taft-Hartley approach to collective bargaining, setting out to destroy the contract.

We have an agreement both parties want to keep. We have an agreement that the industry is trying to sell to shippers as a stable, long-running arrangement. And then along comes the NLRB's Mr. Denham to announce publicly that our agreement is not worth the paper it is printed on.

These are the facts.

On June 10 the Waterfront Employers Association filed unfair labor charges against the ILWU and other maritime unions on the west coast. The charges were that the union, in insisting on certain hiring practices which WEA alleged were unlawful, was committing an unfair labor practice. This was part of the harassment to which the union was being subjected in those days.

The Board issued a complaint based on these charges on August 20, immediately after the WEA made its first wage offer and while the NLRB was conducting its ballot on the offer.

Hearings began on September 1, the day negotiations broke down and the day before the injunction was due to expire. They continued during September and early October at a time when the WEA itself was clearly in violation of the act by refusing to bargain with the ILWU. The general counsel's office on several different occasions refused to withdraw its complaint despite the employers' open violation of the act. The case lay dormant after this.

Subsequently negotiations between the parties were resumed in mid-November. The men returned to work on December 6, and final agreement was reached on new contract terms on December 17.

Soon thereafter the general counsel's office decided to amend the complaint against the ILWU and reopen the record to include the newly negotiated agreement. The general counsel was saying in effect that he considered our contract illegal. A hearing was ordered for April 5, 1949.

To the members of the ILWU, to the employers, to the shipping industry on the west coast, Mr. Denham was announcing that the new contract would have a short life if he had his way.

Mr. Denham is out to end our hiring hall. But he knows, and everyone else familiar with the west-coast maritime industry knows, that the longshoremen are simply not going to lose their hiring hall and return to the jungle of the shape-up that continues on the east coast. The longshoremen had to strike in 1934 to get the hiring hall; in 1948 they were again on strike, from September 2 to December 6, to keep the hiring hall. We know, the employers know, the industry knows, that the only rational and efficient method of operation in the industry is through central dispatching and rotary hiring from the hall.

As far as the NLRB cases are concerned, the position is as follows: We are convinced that neither the complaints in this case nor the evidence adduced in support of them justify any action by the Board under the Taft-Hartley Act. We simply do not think that Mr. Denham has any case against us.

However, in view of the review being made of the Taft-Hartley Act by this Congress, both the employers and the union asked Mr. Denham, as a minimum, to permit the cases to lie dormant until we could see how the Taft-Hartley Act was amended. This seemed a proper and reasonable request, in view of the legislative situation, and especially in view of the anxiety of the employers, who originally filed the charges, and the union to live with the new agreement.

Mr. Denham refused our joint request.

Representatives of both the Waterfront Employers Association and the ILWU met with Mr. Denham again at some length last Thursday, March 17, 1949. At that time the WEA formally asked that the proceedings be dismissed and the charges withdrawn.

This, then, is the situation facing Mr. Denham. The employers, who originally made the charges last June, now appear and ask that the charges be withdrawn and the proceedings end. They and we want the contract to continue. Neither party wants the contract disturbed.

But Mr. Denham says "No." Emphatically not; he is out to invalidate this contract.

The regulations of the Board provide, of course, that charges can be withdrawn at any stage in the proceedings. The ILWU and the WEA were informed that, when the request for withdrawal was formally submitted to the trial examiner, the general counsel would object strenuously. We were told by Mr. Denham that it was quite unlikely that the trial examiner would agree to dismiss the proceedings unless the general counsel would concur in the request of the employers. He told us unequivocally that he would not concur.

This, then, is the situation we and the entire west coast maritime industry face. The general counsel, the instrument of Taft-Hartley, is riding off determinedly to destroy the west coast longshore contract despite every possible representation from the parties themselves.

Can the members of the ILWU be criticized for questioning the motives behind all this? Frankly, we are convinced that behind this fever to destroy our contract lies a diabolical desire by some people in this country to stimulate unrest on the water front. Wreck our contract; destroy our budding healthy relations with the employers; drag out the old red herring; and what do you have but the ideal climate in which hysteria can be whipped up in the Halls of Congress and Taft-Hartley kept on the books.

Perhaps even the general counsel might be able to keep his job if the situation were blown up high enough.

We are not going to stand for this kind of treatment. We want this case against the ILWU quashed. We want this Congress to wipe the Taft-Hartley Act off the books. So long as we have this monstrosity to plague us, situations such as this one will be repeated over and over again.

THE WEST-COAST LONGSHORE STRIKE—HOW THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT CREATED AND PROLONGED A LABOR DISPUTE

The experiences of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union in the Pacific coast longshore industry demonstrate that the Taft-Hartley law has impeded collective bargaining and forced strike action. The Waterfront Employers Association of the Pacific Coast, with a long record of antiunion policy, seized upon the act as a weapon to weaken or if possible destroy the union and to obtain from it concessions which otherwise could not be hoped for. The national-emergency strike provisions served only to postpone a show-down. Because the union was strong, the employers' strategy failed and the outcome of the strike was not only a victory for the union but also a change of policy on the part of the employers' association.

The important facts in the chronology of the strike follow. It is necessary to summarize them to provide a background for the analysis of the effects of the act.

Beginning in February 1948, informal meetings were held with the WEA at their request to discuss changes in the longshore agreement (which was due to expire on June 15) "necessary to bring our agreement into line with the law"—meaning the Taft-Hartley law. The changes they proposed related to the hiring halls and to hiring procedures.

These discussions proved futile, apparently because of differing interpretations of the law but actually because the WEA was seizing upon the law as a means for eliminating union security. They insisted that certain changes were necessary in the agreement in order to bring it into conformance with the law, but they were unwilling to accept alternative union-security provisions suggested by the United which were clearly legal.

Thereupon, the union sent official notice on April 5 that it wished to open the contract for amendment. At the same time the United submitted its economic demands.

A number of negotiating sessions were held in April and May but proved similarly futile. The union took a strike referendum in May which resulted in an 89-percent vote in favor of striking on June 15 if no satisfactory agreement had been reached by that time. On May 11, the United States Mediation and Conciliation Service entered the picture, and its representatives were present at all subsequent negotiations during May.

These negotiations likewise were entirely futile. Agreement was reached on nothing. It was obvious that the WEA anticipated an injunction under the national-emergencies provisions of the act and were consequently unwilling to bargain in good faith, despite the overwhelming strike vote. There were indications, indeed, that the WEA actively sought an injunction.

On June 3, President Truman appointed a board of inquiry. The board conducted hearings on June 7 and 8 and reported its findings to the President on June 11.

On the same day, the Attorney General sought an injunction prohibiting the strike, and on June 14 the Federal district court in San Francisco issued a temporary order against the ILWU and the WEA restraining them from strike action. On July 2, the court, with apparent reluctance, issued an 80-day injunction, following hearings on June 21, 22, and 23.

On June 16, the union submitted additional demands to the WEA, and further negotiations were held during the last days of June. The Federal conciliator, present at all these sessions, stated at their conclusion on July 1 that the employers had not changed their position throughout negotiations. Similarly futile sessions were held later in July and early in August.

The board of inquiry met again on August 10, just before the expiration of the statutory 60-day period. The WEA submitted the so-called last offer, which, in fact, was the first offer they had made. The union submitted a statement on the issues and on the futile negotiations which had taken place (exhibit 1). The board reported to the President on August 13.

Thereupon, in accordance with the law, the National Labor Relations Board conducted a vote among the longshoremen, car and dock workers, and ships' clerks to ascertain whether or not they wished to accept the employers' last offer. Meanwhile, negotiations were taking place and the employers had sweetened their wage offer, raising the proposed increase from 5 cents per hour to 10 cents per hour, and attempted to have the Board's ballot contain the new offer. The Board, however, following the statute, submitted the last offer.

On September 1, the Board certified that out of 26,965 employees eligible to vote, not a single man had voted "yes" or "no." The ballot had been completely boycotted. A copy of the NLRB certification is attached as exhibit 2.

Likewise, on September 1, negotiations which had been taking place day and night broke down. While substantial agreement had been reached on the hiring-hall issue, the parties were quite far apart on basic issues of wages and working conditions, and the employers had refused to back down on certain union-busting demands.

On September 2, Judge Harris declared that the injunction had expired. The strike was on.

The very next day, on September 3, the WEA announced through the press that they would not deal with the ILWU until and unless all its international, district, and local officials had complied with Taft-Hartley by signing the Taft-Hartley non-Communist affidavits. This issue had not been raised in negotiations.

Thereafter, throughout the first 2 months of the strike, the employers carried on a public campaign of vilification against the union's officials. It was obvious that they hoped by raising the issue of Taft-Tartley compliance to split the union and force a change in leadership.

The union's response to this was a referendum ballot on two issues: acceptance of the employers' final offer which the union negotiating committee had repected on September 1, and the question of compliance with Taft-Hartley. The men voted 10,837 to 235 against the employers' offer and 10,795 to 376 against compliance.

On September 25 Mayor Ebner Robinson offered to mediate the strike. The union accepted but WEA refused. They stood pat on their refusal to meet with the United until it complied with Taft-Hartley.

They took the same position in exploratory sessions with Allan Haywood and R. J. Thomas sent out by President Philip Murray at the request of ILWU to see if they could get negotiations going again.

Finally, when it became apparent to certain of the large shipping companies that the union was becoming stronger, not weaker, and that the men were solidly behind the union officials, negotiations were resumed under the terms of a formula worked out by Almon Roth of the San Francisco Employers' Council. The agreement to negotiate was signed on November 17.

Work was resumed on December 6 and final agreement reached on new contrat terms on December 17. The union won a 15-cents-per-hour wage increase, a scheduled day off each week, a reduction in the daily work shift, continuance of the existing hiring machinery pending final court action, and many other benefits.

Meanwhile, the union was subjected to the additional harassment of prolonged proceedings before the NLRB. On June 10 the WEA filed unfair-labor-practice charges against ILWU, charging that the union was insisting on certain hiring practices which they alleged were unlawful under Taft-Hartley.

The Board issued a complaint, based on these charges, on August 20, immediately after the WEA had made its first wage offer and while the NLRB was conducting its ballot on the offer.

Hearings began on September 1, the day negotiations broke down and the day before the injunction was due to expire. They continued during September and early October at a time when the WEA was in clear violation of the act by refusing to bargain with ILWU. The general counsel's office on several different occations refused to withdraw its complaint despite the employers' open violation of the act. The case is still in the hands of the trial examiner.

THE "NATIONAL EMERGENCIES" PROVISIONS OF TAFT-HARTLEY

The cooling-off period.—It is apparent from the foregoing summary review of the events of the Pacific coast longshore strike that the "national emergencies" provisions of the act were wholly ineffective from the standpoint of preventing a tie-up. They simply postponed a show-down that under the circumstances was inevitable. All the facts making a maritime strike a national emergency on June 15, which were brought out by the parade of Government witnesses at the injunction hearings, were just as much facts on September 2 when the injunction was dissolved.

While the emergency provisions of the act proved entirely ineffective in preventing a strike, they were effective in a way unintended by the framers of the law. The employers' complete refusal to bargain because they were sure an injunction would be obtained, topped by the Government's intervention obviously at the behest of the employers, together so outraged the union membership that instead of "cooling off" they "warmed up."

The union's original position was that it would not move to open the contract if satisfactory agreement could be reached on the hiring-hall issue in preliminary sessions. When agreement proved impossible because the WEA was simply using the issue of conformity with the law to secure long-sought disruption of union security, the union opened the contract and submitted economic demands. The membership recognized that the employers were seeking to take something away and give nothing in return, using the excuse of Taft-Hartley.

That this was the employers' tactic is admitted even by Senator Ball's committee in its recent report, Labor-Management Relations, West Coast Maritime Industry. The report stated on page 43:

"The position taken by the employers consistently through the past 14 years clearly demonstrates, however, that the Taft Act did not create the issue which gave rise to the strike; it merely gave legal support to certain of the proposals repeatedly advanced in the past by the employers."

When it became apparent, in May, that the WEA was angling for an injunction and in consequence unwilling to bargain in good faith, the membership overwhelmingly voted to authorize a strike. Such a vote would have been impossible earlier.

Then, after the issuance of the restraining order, the union submitted additional demands. Moreover, throughout the injunction period, when the contract grievance machinery was in abeyance, the men obtained a variety of improvements in their conditions by local action by militant action on the job. For example, in San Francisco, the men won the Sunday closing of the port, which was one of the union's additional demands. The employers tried to push the Department of Justice into bringing contempt proceedings but not action was brought, presumably because it was clear even to the Justice Department that a satisfactory adjustment of issues between the union and employers could not be obtained by legal action and in the absence of willingness by the employers to bargain in good faith.

The results of the utilization of the "national emergencies" provisions were the postponement of the strike, the toughening up of the union position, and an ultimate settlement with union gains in excess of original demands. The basic factor causing the strike was the intransigent position of the employers. The cooling-off process did nothing to change this; a strike was necessary.

The futility of the whole procedure was recognized by Judge Harris during the proceedings leading up to the issuance of the injunction. The union was demanding at that time (in June) that, except for the union-preference clause which it was willing to drop, the sections of the collective-bargaining agreement dealing with hiring and the hiring hall were legal and should be retained subject, however, to renegotiation if the Supreme Court should hold them unlawful. The WEA said that several sections were unlawful and must be eliminated. Judge Harris remarked (transcript, vol. 3, pp. 324–325):

"Apart from my duty resting upon this court, as indicated under the terms of the act, I feel that there is a duty on the part of the litigants—that is, the defendants and the employers' counsel—and when I speak of litigants I do so in the over-all sense—to compose their differences.

"As pointed out yesterday afternoon in my colloquy with counsel, the nub of the controversy seemed to hinge, as indicated by the report, upon the hiring-hall problem, as well as preferential hiring. I cannot conceive of either side taking an adamant position with respect to the legal problems there involved. And I speak somewhat gratuitously now. No doubt a formula may be adopted in the light of experience in connection with the Fair Labor Standards Act wherein agreements were entered into subject to the ultimate disposition by courts of last resort, or a court of competent jurisdiction.

"I, of course, cannot enforce or compel counsel to enter into a collective-bargaining agreement, but at the same time I feel that a duty rests upon the employers as well as the employees.

"I shall not undertake to ask Mr. Plant [the WEA attorney] again what his attitude is, but I trust it will not be an adamant one."

And further (transcript, vol. 3, pp. 316-317):

"My point is this, and it may appear inferentially or expressly in the record: That the employers are represented by lawyers, the employees are represented by lawyers, the respective views of those lawyers are equally entitled to merit from their respective viewpoints. Now if it appears, as pointed out by Mr. Gladstein [the union's attorney] during the course of his remarks, that those counsel for the respective sides maintain that position with equanimity and with completeness during the period of 80 days, what would be served? What could be served? Would that be a cooling-off process? * * * In the final analysis, legal propositions are passed on by the court. If in the experience of the employers and the employees in the past they have had comparable problems, no doubt under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the same pattern may be adopted."

It is quite apparent from these statements by Judge Harris that he thought the 80-day "cooling off" period would be ineffective and that he granted the injunction with reluctance.

Retroactivity.—Another feature of the operation of these provisions is that the workers are compelled by law to work at a wage rate which they believe to be unfair and are seeking to adjust. This both outrages their sense of justice, because the Government is in effect intervening on the employers' side, and inevitably raises the issue of retroactivity. In this case the union offered on September 1, just before the strike, to settle the wage issue on the basis of 15 cents per hour without retroactivity or 13 cents per hour retroactive to June 16. The final settlement was 15 cents without retroactivity. Thus the postponement of the settlement, caused by the act, has resulted in a net gain of 2 cents per hour in the base rate.

The board of inquiry.—The board of inquiry was entirely ineffectual if its supposed function was intended to be anything more than the formal one of informing the President of the positions of the parties.

The board was, of course, prevented by the explicit provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act from making any recommendations. The act provides (sec. 206): "Such report [by a board of inquiry] shall include a statement of the facts with respect to the dispute, including each party's statement of its position but shall not contain any recommendations."

Nevertheless, the board of inquiry is supposed to "ascertain the facts with respect to the causes and circumstances of the dispute." In this instance, the board was given just a week (it was appointed on June 3 and reported on June 11) to investigate the causes and circumstances of a dispute which involved not only the west coast, but the east coast, the Gulf, and the Great Lakes; which involved not only the ILWU but all the CIO maritime unions; and which had its roots in years of controversy. A real investigation would have required several weeks if not months. There was clearly no intention even of finding the facts, let alone trying to be of assistance in reaching a settlement.

When reconvened at the end of the 60-day period, the board's only function was to receive the employers' final offer and to pass it along to the NLRB. The perfunctory character of the whole business was demonstrated by the fact that only one board member attended this second hearing.

The NLRB ballot on the employers' "last offer".—The purpose behind the inclusion of this procedure in the Taft-Hartley Act is presumably to insure that the union's members are fully informed of the employers' position and consequently cannot be led into a strike which they would disapprove on the basis of all the facts. The procedure is based on the assumption that union leadership, for some unexplained reason, derives a benefit from leading the union into an unnecessary strike.

What the ILWU membership thought of the solicitude of Congress for their welfare is clear from the 100-percent boycott of the ballot. The ballot was a complete farce.

As already indicated, by the time the ballot was taken the employers had already sweetened their offer.

Moreover, as soon as the employers made an offer which the union's negotiating committee thought might conceivably be good enough to weaken the effectiveness of a strike, the offer was put to a referendum vote of the membership, by the union.

Collective-bargaining issues raised by the law.—(1) The hiring hall.—The award of the three-man National Longshoremen's Board, appointed by President Roosevelt and headed by Archbishop Hanna, which was the basis for the settlement of the 1934 strike, provided that longshoremen in all the major Pacific coast ports were to be dispatched through hiring halls jointly maintained and jointly operated. Any man who had worked 12 months as a longshoreman during the previous 3 years was entitled to be put upon a list of "registered" longshoremen, such lists likewise to be maintained and administered by a joint committee. All registered longshoremen were entitled to dispatch through the joint hiring hall on such a basis as to insure an equal division of work opportunities. Actual dispatching of the men, in accordance with orders from the individual employer and following dispatching rules laid down by the joint labor relations committees, was put in the hands of a union-selected dispatcher.

The joint hiring hall was designed to eliminate on the one hand the well-recognized evils of the shape-up which prevailed in San Francisco and, on the other hand, the more subtle evils of the employer controlled hiring halls which were in effect in Seattle, Portland, and Los Angeles. No reputable student of labor relations supports the shape-up with its inevitable results of discrimination, speed-up, and casual work. But the evils of the employer-controlled hiring halls are less obvious. The longshoremen knew well enough, however, that while the ostensible purpose of these halls was decasualization, they were antiunion in intent and effect. They were characterized as follows by the Maritime Labor Board (Report to the President and to the Congress March 1, 1940, footnote 19, p. 144): "Both the early decasualization schemes in Seattle, Portland, and Los Angeles and the Longshoremen's Association of San Francisco succeeded in breaking the regular longshore unions on the Pacific coast in the years from 1922 to 1934." (The Longshoremen's Association of San Francisco was the notorious Blue Book union, a company union inspired and dominated by the WEA.)

The joint hiring halls as established in 1934, therefore, were necessary to protect the men in their right to bargain collectively without interference or coercion by the employers.

One further protection proved necessary. In 1937, again following a major coast tie-up, the union won a contract clause providing for preference for union members. This was interpreted by the arbitrator to cover preference both in registration and in dispatching.

That in 1937 the union had still to protect itself from the antiunion attacks of the employers has been very clearly demonstrated by the analysis of the WEA made by the La Follette committee. The committee's studies showed that the WEA was attempting to undermine and discredit the union's elected leadership and was engaging in a program designed to weaken and disrupt the union. Without going into the substance of the committee's findings it is sufficient to quote the headings of sections of the report (Employers' Associations and Collective Bargaining in California; part VII. A study of Labor Policies of Employers' Associations in the San Francisco Bay area, 1935–39):

"Collaboration of water-front employers in the opposition to the growth of unionism.

"Efforts of water-front employers to divide and disrupt unions.

"Attacks on union leadership."

A few excerpts from the report are attached as exhibit 3.

Since the adoption of the preference clause in 1937, there has been no change in the basic procedures for registration and dispatching of longshoremen. But the passage of the Taft-Hartley law gave the employers an opportunity to challenge these procedures. In February 1948 the WEA informed the union that their lawyers advised them that the following changes were needed in order to bring the longshore agreement into conformance with Taft-Hartley:

(1) The preference-of-employment clause must be dropped.

(2) An "impartial" dispatcher must replace the union-selected dispatcher.

(3) Joint control over registration of new men must give way to unilateral employer selection.

The union proposed in reply that preference for registered men replace preference for union men, and that in adding men to the registration lists, preference be given to men formerly employed in the industry. With regard to the other two items, the union replied that its lawyers said that they were not contrary to the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law. The union also made some proposals for substitute union-security language to replace the security provided by the preference clause.

The unwillingness of the employers to give any serious consideration to the union's position made it clear to the union's negotiators that the WEA was simply seizing upon the Taft-Hartley law as an excuse for weakening the union. Very piously the employers insisted they didn't want to make the suggested contract changes but that they were forced to do so by the law.

During the later negotiations just prior to the issuance of the injunction, the union had modified its position to propose that the union-preference clause be dropped, and that the other provisions in dispute be continued pending final determination of their legality by the United States Supreme Court.

A similar provision had been in the longshore contract for several years on the question of overtime. While maintaining that the longshore method of paying so-called overtime rates during certain night hours satisfied the requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act, the employers nevertheless feared that an ultimate court decision might hold the contrary—as in fact it did, in the Huron Stevedoring Co. case. To protect themselves against this eventuality, the employers demanded, and won, a contract provision giving them the right to open the entire contract for renegotiation in the event of an adverse court decision.

The union's proposal with respect to the hiring provisions was precisely similar. The WEA refused to accept this, though as indicated above, Judge Harris, who reluctantly granted the 80-day injunction which postponed the strike, quite strongly urged such a solution upon the parties.

By the end of August, when the injunction was about to expire, the employers had come around to the union's position on this point and were willing to continue existing hiring procedures subject to renegotiation in the event of an adverse court ruling.

At the very time, however, that they were taking this position in negotiations, they were pressing unfair-labor-practice charges against the union before the NLRB, holding that it was violating Taft-Hartley in insisting on retaining existing hiring and registration provisions and practices. Hearings before the Board began on September 1, the day that negotiations broke off. The union felt that the employers' good faith in offering something in negotiations which they were seeking to take away in proceedings before the Board was at least subject to doubt.

On September 3, as noted earlier, the day after the strike began, the WEA announced through the press that they would not meet with the ILWU until brought into compliance with the Taft-Hartley law by its officers signing the so-called non-Communist affidavits. Union counsel sought to have the Board dismiss its complaint against the union on the obvious ground that the charging parties were themselves in violation of the law by refusing to bargain with the elected representatives of a majority of the men.

The subservience of the general counsel of the NLRB to the employers is evident from the fact that he was unwilling to withdraw the complaint.

Hearings growing out of the unfair-labor-practice charges continued for the better part of a month. The matter is now in the hands of the trial examiner.

Meanwhile the strike was concluded. The new agreement between ILWU and WEA retains the old registration, preference, and dispatching provisions. An addendum provides for alternative provisions in the event of an adverse court decision. A copy of this addendum is attached as exhibit 4.

(2) The question of supervisory employees.—Another issue precipitated by the passage of the Taft-Hartley law concerns supervisory personnel. In the longshore industry the supervisors are known as walking bosses. They direct the work of the several gangs working on a ship.

The walking bosses are all former longshoremen and almost all of them are members of ILWU. For years the union has been seeking collective-bargaining rights on their behalf, but the employers have been unwilling to concede the right of the bosses to self-organization.

While this has been the predominent position, the Waterfront Employers of Washington, which bargains on a State basis with longshore and ship clerks unions in the State of Washington, has long had a contract with the walking bosses in that State, who are members of the International Longshoremen's Association, AFL. Likewise, in Portland, Oreg., the bosses (who there are member of ILWU) have for many years had a memorandum of agreement concerning wages, hours, and working conditions signed by individual employers, not by the association. But nowhere have the employers been willing to deal with ILWU on behalf of the bosses.

The employers took the position that they would not bargain with ILWU because they had no evidense that the union represented the bosses. So the union instituted representation proceedings under the Wagner Act, as election was ultimately held by the Board, and ILWU was certified as bargaining agent for all the bosses on the Pacific coast except those in Washington. The certification was dated May 13, 1947 (case No. 20–F–1615).

The next month the Taft-Hartley law declared that employers had no obligation to bargain with their supervisors. So the WEA took the position that the certification was without force and effect. The bosses struck for recognition, first against one company in San Francisco and then against another company in Los Angeles. The employers in Los Angeles closed the port in retaliation. The arbitrator under the contract ruled that the employers' lock-out violated the contract and that the longshoremen were likewise in violation for respecting the bosses' picket lines. So the whole thing was called off.

Again, the employers' hand was strengthened by the Taft-Hartley law and again a strike was precipitated which otherwise would not have occurred.

As part of the settlement of the recent Pacific coast strike, the WEA agreed that a committee of employers of walking bosses in each port would sign a contract with representatives of bosses so long as the bosses were not members of the longshoremen's locals. Such contracts are now being negotiated. The bosses have thus finally won substantially the recognition they have long sought. The bosses have set up their own ILWU locals.

The Taft-Hartley law created a similar problem in connection with certain supervisory workers among the ship clerks, an occupational group closely related to the longshoremen. Even since 1934 these supervisory clerks have been members of the union, covered by contract. However, in the recent negotiations the employers said they would no longer deal with the union for these men. Their decision not to do so, they indicated, arose out of the fact that they no longer are obligated to do so. The demand to exclude these supervisors from coverage under the clerks' contracts was finally dropped in negotiation. The new contracts include them.

In the matter of a proceeding by Presidential Board of Inquiry appointed pursuant to Executive Order No. 9964 to Report on Certain Labor Disputes Affecting the Maritime Industry of the United States, Involving Controversies Between and Among Waterfront Employers Association of the Pacific Coast; Pacific American Shipowners Association; Shipowners Association of the Pacific; International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union; National Marine Engineers Beneficial Association; National Union of Marine Cooks and Stewards; American Radio Association; Pacific Coast Marine Firemen, Oilers, Watertenders, and Wipers Association

AUGUST 10, 1948.

STATEMENT OF THE INTERNATIONAL LONGSHOREMEN'S AND WAREHOUSEMEN'S UNION

On August 6, 1948, the ILWU received a wire from Harry Shulman, Chairman of the President's Board of Inquiry on Labor Disputes in the Maritime Industry, requesting submission of a written statement of this union's position in current negotiation for new agreements, such statement to be submitted to the reconvened Presidential Board of Inquiry on August 10, 1948.

We submit the following statement:

During the hearings of June 7 and 8 before this Presidential Board of Inquiry, the ILWU related the complete lack of progress which had been made in negotiations for new agreements up to that date. We stated that the primary reason for the lack of progress was the employers' assurance that this Board would be established and that an injunction would follow its report. The union argued that an 80-day Taft-Hartley injunction would only postpone real negotiations for 80 days, and consequently postpone settlement of the union's just demands for the same period.

Events occurring since that time have completely justified this position. It is, at least, helpful that in issuing its report to the president of June 11, 1948, the board of inquiry has recognized its role in these proceedings. "The appointment of the board of inquiry has, of course, increased the possibility of an application for an issuance of an injunction. And that has alleviated for the time being the pressure for settlement which a threatened strike would otherwise impose." (Report to the president, June 11, 1948, pp. 12–13.)

A temporary restraining order followed by a temporary injunction were dutifully issued by the court. In issuing the temporary injunction, the court ordered the parties to engage in collective bargaining in good faith, although the union's request that the court appoint a master to supervise such negotiations, enforce the order, and report back to the court, was denied.

Since the date of the court order a series of meetings have been held for the purpose of collective bargaining. The discussions which took place during these meetings are summarized in exhibit 1–A attached. Also attached as exhibit 1–B is a list of the union's demands as of this date with regard to the various contracts involved.

Now this board reconvenes for purposes of reporting to the president the current position of the parties, the efforts which have been made for settlement, and the employer's last offer. There has been no change in the employer's position since the board first reported to the president. In fact, there has been no change in the employer's position since negotiations first began early this year. They have made no efforts to reach a settlement. They have made no offer for settlement—"last" or otherwise. On the contrary, they have made only demands of their own—demands which, if accepted, would deteriorate wages, hours, and working conditions. The union, on the other hand, has consistently attempted to meet employer proposals with reasonable counterproposals—to meet the employers' "no" to union demands with reasonable suggestions for settlement.

We can state that we have worked hard and long toward a settlement—and that we have neither caused nor desired the complete lack of progress.

EXHIBIT 1–A

SUMMARY OF NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN INTERNATIONAL LONGSHOREMEN'S AND WAREHOUSEMEN'S UNION AND WATERFRONT EMPLOYERS' ASSOCIATION OF THE PACIFIC COAST, JUNE 28–AUGUST 6, 1948

In accordance with the court's temporary injunction and in the hope that further negotiations might be more fruitful than earlier sessions, the union participated in negotiations with the Water Front Employers' Association, under the auspices of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, on June 28, 29, and 30, July 1, and July 19. A negotiations meeting was scheduled for August 6, but the employers on that date refused to proceed with negotiations until a local grievance had been settled.

No progress was made toward reaching a settlement of any of the demands of either party, though the union exerted every possible effort to make the negotiations effective. The union made counterproposals to all the employers' demands. The association, on the other hand, advanced counterproposals to only two of the union's demands, both of them involving substantial wage cuts. They were obviously not made in the expectation that they would be seriously considered. And, with respect to its own demands on the hiring hall, the association was unwilling to state whether it would lock the men out in order to secure their demands in the event the restraining order was lifted.

At the close of the July 1 meeting Mr. Bridges asked Conciliator Lewis whether he could see any change in the association's position since the start of negotiations. Mr. Lewis replied that he could not. At the July 19 meeting counsel for the employers suggested adjournment on the basis of "no progress." Nevertheless the union continued the session and made additional counterproposals.

The influence of the court order in preventing or postponing bona fide negotiations by the association was apparent throughout. This experience confirms the union's prior experience that the association is willing to negotiate only when it is under pressure to conclude an agreement as of a specified time.

The influence of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service was nil. Their concern was never in negotiation but simply in "clarifying the issues." However, clarification never proceeded to the point of appraisal. The Service made no attempt, either in joint sessions or in separate sessions with the union, to ascertain what issues the union considers paramount or how far it would be willing to go in compromising any of its demands. The Service made no recommendations whatsoever. Its only function was, by requiring the parties to meet, to force the employers to go through the motions of negotiating. A summary of the discussions follows:

Discussion of certain preliminary issues.—At the union's insistence several issues were discussed as a preliminary to negotiating upon the parties' demands.

There were, first, two matters of back pay due to longshoremen and clerks under earlier agreements. Winch drivers were entitled to some $100,000 in retroactive pay under agreements reached in 1946. The clerks were entitled to some $50,000 in retroactive pay under an agreement dating back to 1945. Neither group had been able to collect because the association took the position that they could not pay the men until the employers were themselves reimbursed by the Army and Navy. The union said it would not conclude any new agreement until the association had honored its old ones. Under this pressure the payments are now being made.

The union asked for assurance that whatever agreement may subsequently be reached on the union's money demands, be retroactive to June 16. Neither party has had a happy experience with retroactivity as the preceding paragraph shows and there has been, in fact, determination by both parties to avoid retroactivity. However, the Government restraining order in this instance, which prevented the union from taking action to secure its demands, makes necessary a departure from this policy. The union pointed out that each day of work under the terms of the old agreement is money in the employers' pockets and a loss to the men.

Another group of preliminary issues involved the coverage of the contract. The union's position was that it was necessary to know who is to be covered by a contract, before negotiating its contents. The union insisted on an official statement of the association's attitude toward continuing contracts for supervisory clerks, walking bosses in Portland, and watchmen. All these groups, members of ILWU, have had contracts for years with one or more of the associations or with employers who are members of the associations. The association stated that it demanded exclusion of supervisory clerks from coverage; that it would not renew the contract with the Portland bosses; and that it would not sign a contract with the watchmen as long as they remain members of ILWU.

The union said that this is a strike issue; there will be a strike unless agreements are reached for all ILWU groups who have previously been covered by contracts. The union stated further that it is unwilling to negotiate some of its members out from contract coverage. The president of the union charged the proposal was a union-busting proposal designed to weaken the union.

The union asked the Conciliation Service to recommend exclusion of these groups from the court order. It argued that under present circumstances these groups are helpless. The order to bargain is meaningless because the association says it will not sign contracts which include them, while at the same time their hands are tied so they cannot take action to maintain the collective bargaining rights they have enjoyed for years. No question of representation had arisen, nor is there any allegation by the employers that their position is dictated by the necessity of observing the law.

Again, it is apparent that Government intervention is in part responsible for the present impasse.

On another issue of coverage, the association stated that it refused to negotiate with ILWU walking bosses in California. These workers have never been able to secure a contract, though certified by the NLRB.

With regard to the clerks, the union insisted as a preliminary to negotiations, upon agreement that when a contract is signed it shall be coastwide (for California and Oregon) rather than on a port basis. The association was unwilling to agree. The union said this was a strike issue.

Finally, the union insisted on its right to know with whom it is negotiating and what employers will be covered by a contract when reached. This, too, the union said, is a proper preliminary to negotiations.

The union states it wished to negotiate a separate contract for foreign flag vessels, and that decision on this point was a prerequisite to negotiating the contents of the longshore agreements. The demand for a separate contract for foreign vessels arises principally out of the need for particularly stringent safety conditions on these vessels, as the union pointed out. Secondly, because many foreign ships operate under laws or union contracts more favorable in their provisions regarding hours of work than is true of American vessels, the union wants different hours provisions. For example, agreement might be reached to eliminate Sunday work or greatly to reduce overtime work. Thirdly, the union stated it would like different holiday provisions on foreign ships.

The association tried to allege that these proposals were intended as devices to injure the competitive position of foreign flag vessels. The union stated that there was no intention to influence the competitive relationship between American and foreign ships in any way whatsoever. Nor, is the demand intended to split the association since the contract would be signed by the association on behalf of foreign companies.

Most of these preliminary issues are, therefore, still unresolved. On all of them the association refused to move from its original position. And on each of them the union asked for a recommendation from the conciliators. The conciliators refused to make any recommendations.

The individual issues—Retroactivity.—Immediately after the issuance of the temporary restraining order on June 14 the union submitted a demand that wage increases and any other money matters which might be agreed upon in the future be retroactive to June 15, 1948. This same demand was discussed on the first day of the current negotiations meetings with the Conciliation Service. The employers refused to enter into such an agreement for retroactivity stating that the proper time to discuss possible retroactivity is when agreement is reached on wages or other money matters. To quote the employer representative in those sessions: "If the union wishes a blanket answer now on the question of retroactivity, the answer is 'No'."

The union asked the conciliators for a recommendation on this point and the conciliators stated that they would not make any recommendations at that time.

Wages and hours.—The union has requested an 18 cents per hour increase in the basic rate of pay and outlined the basis on which this request is being made. The employers have taken the position that any consideration of wages is dependent upon an agreement with regard to the hours section of the contract because of the recent Supreme Court decision with regard to proper determination of overtime. The union continually reiterated that it is the employers' responsibility to bring the contract into conformance with the decision and that the contract would have been in conformance long ago if it had not been for the resistance of the employers. However, the employers refused to consider a basic wage increase apart from the question of overtime.

The employers submitted a proposal which would constitute substantial wage decreases. That proposal was as follows: (a) That the first 40 hours in any week be paid at an agreed upon rate which the parties would negotiate starting from the present basic rate of pay; (b) that this agreed upon rate would be paid for the first 40 hours of night work and also on holidays, Saturdays, and Sundays. At the present time hours of work in excess of 6 hours between 8 a. m. and 5 p. m., and hours from 5 p. m. to 8 a. m. and holidays, Saturdays, and Sundays are worked at time and a half of the basic rate of pay. Therefore a good faith employer proposal on the basis which the employers are suggesting would have started from a basic wage rate of over $2 per hour rather than the present $1.67 rate from which the employers propose to start negotiations.

The employer proposal as it stands constitutes a substantial wage decrease and therefore cannot be interpreted as anything other than a provocative offer designed to make agreement impossible.

At the July 19 meeting the employers stated that they would bring in a proposal on hours and scheduled days off at the next meeting. However, they refused to produce the proposal at the August 6 meeting, using local grievance as an excuse.

Vacations.—The union has proposed that the vacation provisions in the various contracts be amended so that a substantial majority of the workers will receive vacations and the present provisions for vacations will become meaningful. The employers refused to consider such a proposal and instead suggested their oft-repeated proposition—an increase of 5 cents on the basic wage rate in lieu of vacations. Since practically all of the men who now qualify for vacations receive 2 weeks consisting of 80 hours' pay at the basic rate, or approximately $130, the employer proposal would mean a 50 percent decrease in vacation pay. This would have the practical result of eliminating vacations altogether for the majority of men since most men could not afford to take time off on such a basis.

The union submitted a counterproposal, namely, that the money in lieu of vacations proposed by employers be paid into a central fund from which all men would receive vacation pay. The employers refused to consider this counterproposal.

Steam schooners.—The union has submitted several demands with regard to the steam schooner agreement. One of these demands is that a definition of the term steam schooner be written into the agreement. Despite the fact that both parties to the agreement are fully aware of the meaning of this term, they were unable to agree on the definiton of a steam schooner. Conciliator Lewis suggested that the parties were in agreement at least on one question, i. e., that a definition of steam schooners be written into the contract. The employers said they would not go that far. They would only agree that the definiton of which they approved be written into the agreement.

The remaining demands of the union with regard to the steam schooner agreement were discussed in the briefest possible manner for "clarification."

Nonmembers of the Waterfront Employers Association.—The employers have submitted a very interesting demand to the effect that nonmembers of their association shall not receive longshoremen from the hiring halls unless the association gives prior approval. This proposal really means that the association can use the joint hiring hall to force recalcitrant employers into the association if they are to obtain workers. The union suggested that the WEA is asking for preference of employment for itself and is asking the union to join in the lockout of nonmembers of the association. The union agreed that nonmembers obtaining men from the hiring hall should pay their pro rata share of the upkeep of the hall. These arguments made no impression upon the employers who repeated that men are not to be dispatched to nonmembers through the hiring hall without the consent of the WEA.

They further stated that any empolyer who joins the WEA during the term of the agreement shall automatically become a party to the agreement and therefore entitled to preference in obtaining men from the hiring hall. The union suggested that the counterpart of that proposal was that men who joined the union during the term of the agreement automatically become registered longshoremen and therefore entitled to preference of employment. The employers replied that this was not acceptable.

The union then asked for an understanding that the agreement is to cover only members of the WEA at the time of signing the agreement and that employers who joined the WEA during the term of the agreement shall become party to it only by mutual consent. This was unacceptable to the employers.

Other union demands.—The remaining demands of the union with respect to all groups of workers were discussed very briefly for "clarification" only with no counterproposals forthcoming from the employers and no suggestions or recommendations from the Conciliation Service.

The hiring hall and related issues.—The union has repeatedly pointed out that it has no demands with regard to the hiring hall and related issues which have been raised by the employers. The union has repeatedly proposed that any disagreement on such matters should be referred to final decision by the courts. The soundness of this position was reflected by the statements of the court on June 23, 1948, in the restraining order and injunction proceedings. Some of these statements follow:

Excerpts from reporter's transcript No. 28, 123–H, volume 3, in the Matter of United States v. ILWU, in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, southern division, before Judge Harris, June 23, 1948:

Judge Harris, in agreeing to extend the temporary restraining order, says:

"Apart from my duty resting upon this court, as indicated under the terms of the act, I feel that there is a duty on the part of the litigants—that is the defendants and the employers' council—and when I speak of litigants I do so in the over-all sense—to compose their differences.

"As pointed out yesterday afternoon in my colloquy with counsel, the nub of the controversy seemed to hinge, as indicated by the report, upon the hiring-hall problem, as well as preferential hiring. I cannot conceive of either side taking an adamant position with respect to the legal problems there involved. And I speak somewhat gratuitously now: No doubt a formula may be adopted in the light of experience in connection with the Fair Labor Standards Act wherein agreements were entered into subject to the ultimate disposition by courts of last resort, or a court of competent jurisdiction.

"I, of course, cannot enforce or compel counsel to enter into a collective-bargaining agreement, but at the same time I feel that a duty rests upon the employers as well as the employees.

"I shall not undertake to ask Mr. Plant again what his attitude is, but I trust it will not be an adamant one" (tr., vol. 3, pp. 324–325).

Judge Harris, in agreeing to extend the temporary restraining order, further said:

"My point is this, and it may appear inferentially or expressly in the record: That the employers are represented by lawyers, the employees are represented by lawyers, the respective views of those lawyers are equally entitled to merit from their respective viewpoints. Now, if it appears, as pointed out by Mr. Gladstein during the course of his remarks, that those counsel for the respective sides maintain that position with equanimity and with completeness during the period of 80 days, what would be served? What could be served? Would that be a cooling-off process? * * * In the final analysis, legal propositions are passed on by the court. If in the experience of the employers and the employees in the past they have had comparable problems, no doubt under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the same pattern may be adopted" (tr., vol. 3, pp. 346-347).

"The COURT. It seems to me, gentlemen, a pity somewhat when as you are, without committing one or the other, more or less in substantial accord with regard to give and take on the problems that may be regarded as major or minor, yet you find yourselves stymied, so to speak, on a proposition of law. As I indicated, if that is the situation, all of the cooling-off process in the world isn't going to modify or otherwise give any comfort to either party on that score in 80 or 120 days or 6 months, until a court of review speaks with authority, and that is the Supreme Court of the United States, or some circuit court, so I can't see any stultification on the part of either when there is a controversy in which each one's views are set forth wholeheartedly and strenuously on both sides with respect to the application or nonapplication of certain provisions of the Taft-Hartley law, or that any stultification results in entering into a collective-bargaining agreement based upon provisions that have endured over a period since 1936; is that correct?

"Mr. GLADSTEIN. 1934, Your Honor.

"The COURT. 1934. The Taft-Hartley law has not been reviewed on many occasions by our Supreme Court. No doubt it will go before them in varied forms" (tr. vol. 3, pp. 461-462).

The employers, however, have refused to consider the union's counterproposal to employer demands with regard to the hiring hall, namely, that the present practices be continued unless or until an ultimately binding court decision holds them to be illegal, in which event the agreement would be subject to termination and renegotiation upon 5 days' notice by either party. This is the same solution which the employers insisted upon placing in the contract with regard to the Fair Labor Standards Act (referred to by Judge Harris above), at a time when the parties were in disagreement as to the proper interpretation of that act.

In summary, the union has no demands with regard to the hiring hall and related issues, and there will be no tie-up over these issues, unless the association plans to lock out to obtain their demands. In negotiations, the association refused to state what actions they would take if they were free to move, in the absence of an agreement. The conciliators made no attempt whatever to ascertain the association's intentions in this regard.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

In the matter of Waterfront Employers Association et al. and International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, CIO, et al. Case No. 20–X–1

CERTIFICATION

Following submission of the Final Report to the President of the United States by the Board of Inquiry (created pursuant to sec. 206 of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, by Executive Order 9964, dated June 3, 1948),

It is hereby certified that:

1. Pursuant to section 209 (b) of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, the National Labor Relations Board on August 30 and 31 conducted a "final offer" ballot among the employees members of Waterfront Employers Association et al., in each of the 12 groups set forth in the above-mentioned Final Report of the Board of Inquiry (pp. 29 to 58, inclusive). The results of said ballot are as follows:

Number of eligible employees (in all 12 groups)	26,965
Ballots marked "Yes"	0
Ballots marked "No"	0
Ballots challenged	0
Total ballots cast	0

2. Pursuant to section 209 (b) of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, the National Labor Relations Board, on August 31, 1948, commenced the conduct of a "final offer" ballot among the employees of the members of Pacific American Shipowners Association et al. Said ballot is being conducted by mail and cannot be completed until October 1, 1948, because the eligible employees are on board ships which are on the high seas and touch port only infrequently.

3. Inasmuch as the National Labor Relations Board has been informed by the parties to the dispute involving the employees of the Alaska Steamship Co., Northland Transportation Co., and Alaska Transportation Co. that said disputes have been settled, no "final offer" ballot has been conducted among said employees pursuant to section 209 (b) of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947.

Dated at Washington, D. C., this first day of September, 1948.

By direction of the Board:

FRANK M. KLEILER, Executive Secretary.

WHAT THE LAFOLLETTE COMMITTEE SAID ABOUT THE WEA

Based on evidence obtained in hearings held in San Francisco in January 1940, and on extensive investigations conducted by its staff, Senator LaFollette's subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor issued a report in 1943 entitled "A Study of Labor Policies of Employers' Associations in the San Francisco Bay Area, 1935-39." Quoted below are excerpts from this report.

(a) The following excerpts throw light on the work stoppages occasioned by the "hot cargo" issue in 1935 and 1936. Judge Sloss, acting as arbitrator under the longshore contract, decided in the Santa Cruz Packing Co. case that the union had no right to refuse to handle hot cargo. The LaFollette report comments:

"Regardless of the technical merits of this ruling of the arbitrator, it would appear that the existence of a strongly entrenched, organized 'antiunionism' which was resisting the solidification of unionism in industries related to the waterfront, was a leading factor in the series of disputes involving the 'hot cargo' issue. So long as this organized antiunionism existed and employers to a collective agreement lent their support or allegiance to it, the committee is of the opinion that employers seeking to enforce a contract against work stoppages did not come into court 'with clean hand.'"

And further:

"In any event, the collaboration of the waterfront employers in the opposition to the growth of unionism in industries allied to the waterfront, coupled with their continued participation in the Industrial Association, was sufficient to discolor their relationships with the waterfront unions and to invite a failure of the collective agreement concluded after the general strike in 1934" (pp. 1051 and p. 1052.)

"Ironically, organized antiunionism was able to place the responsibility for its own guilty acts upon the unions and upon collective bargaining as an institutional device." (Statement following a discussion of hot cargo disputes in 1935 p. 1052).

"The activities of employers organized into 'negotiatory' associations were not confined to cooperation with organized antiunionism to prevent the development of collective bargaining in allied trades and industries. They acted through their 'negotiatory' association to weaken the union organizations with which they had contracted. An outstanding example of this practice is revealed in the conduct of the employers' associations on the San Francisco waterfront" (p. 1053).

(b) The next excerpts show that the WEA, then as now, was trying to tell the unions who its leaders should be. On July 15, 1935, according to the minutes of the WEA—

"Mr. Plant (the president of the association) agreed that the radical leadership was the present issue * * *

"This position was confirmed at a meeting [of WEA] on July 18 when the following resolution was adopted:

"'That this association approve in principle the cooperation of the conservative leaders and that a committee be appointed to work out a plan to be presented to the association and make the necessary contacts.'"

The "conservative" leadership referred to was Joe Ryan, whom the employers were in touch with.

And the report continues:

"This decision not to take direct action to settle the so-called 'hot-cargo' issue, but, rather to maneuver it in such a way as to eliminate a local union leadership deemed undesirable, stand out in a statement made at an early meeting advocating a different course by Roger Lapham."

His statement reads:

"Signing the May 31 agreement has brought about a situation that is intolerable for lack of united action, but we decided when the agreement was made that it was to force a crisis and we did it with full knowledge of the risks to drive a wedge between the conservatives and the radicals, as it was known that as long as Bridges was in control we could get nowhere. We finally reversed ourselves in order not to embarrass Ryan, but agreed to pursue aggressive tactics afterward" (p. 1056).

"Even representatives of the Waterfront Employers' Association, a unit with extended experience in San Francisco as a negotiatory group, did not wholly accept the proposition that it is the right of employees to select their own bargaining representatives. In his Report on Programing for Negotiations filed on May 11, 1939, with the Waterfront Employers' Associations of the Pacific Coast, John Cushing, who was in charge of that responsible function, stated:

"'I may hold views contrary to the majority of you here but I firmly believe that there will be no relief from what we are now enduring as long as the present union leadership with its policies is in the saddle. To me that and that alone is the key to the problem.

"'As long as that leadership continues I think any hope of restoring efficiency or doing more than resisting daily job-action, is close to impossible. I would not vote against spending money for programs of enforcement on the job but I would feel that it was money wasted. It is treating for symptoms without coming anywhere near the root of the disease.'

"In that spirit the report continued with specific recommendations for action. They are worth noting because they are reflective of psychological attitudes that breed drawn-out labor struggles in which the leadership of the employer group has for its objective the destruction of the leadership of the employee group. They read:

"'Concretely then, I believe (1) we should consider sharpening our most effective weapon. On some real issue we should invoke coast suspension for a local dispute. Frankly I know we could not maintain it long enough to accomplish any main purpose but as a test to ourselves of our own strength and as a warning to the opposing leadership I believe it would be worth its cost. Concretely, I would like to see this meeting appoint a committee to work with our officers in exploring the feasibility of such a program' (p. 1126).

* * * * * * *

"'(6) Finally, we should prepare our own minds and the minds of those to whom we are responsible so that if a strike is forced on us we will go through with it and steadfastly refuse under any conditions whatsoever to make our peace again with the present union leadership and the philosophy it represents.

"'That leadership today is fighting for its life. We haven't begun to fight as yet.'

"The following cryptic minutes should, in the years that are to come, give pause to any public opinion which assesses an unmixed blame on the unions for strikes or the failure to settle strikes quickly and peaceably:

"'Upon motion of Mr. McGowen, seconded by Mr. Winkler, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"'Be it resolved, That Mr. Cushing's Report on Programing for Negotiations Ahead be adopted'" (p. 1127).

(c) Here is a summary statement of the employers' program:

"Three examples of 'indirect pressures' have been selected. They are—

"(a) An attempt to divide the organized unions which confronted the employers at the bargaining table and, thereby weaken their bargaining power or replace a leadership that was repugnant to the employers.

"(b) The development of a so-called suspension program, which was designed either to destroy the collective bargaining arrangement, or provide an opportunity for isolating and circumventing a militant segment of the unions with which the employers had collective agreements.

"(c) Collaboration in personal attacks upon the leadership of an outstanding union, designed to intimidate the leaders or damage the prestige of the union before the public" (p. 1053).

EXHIBIT 4

ADDENDUM TO COAST LONGSHORE AGREEMENT

Hiring hall.—If registration, hiring, dispatching, or preference provisions of this agreement are suspended in any way as a result of legal action or injunction proceedings, then such provisions shall be opened for negotiations for substitute provisions complying with the law, and the substitute provision hereinafter set forth shall apply for the period of negotiations:

(a) Working preference to registered men.

(b) In making additions to the registered list preference shall be given to men with previous registration in the industry and who were not dropped from the list for cause.

(c) In reducing the number of men registered in keeping with the requirements of the industry men last registered shall be the first removed.

(d) Nonunion men being dispatched through the hiring hall shall pay to the union an equal share of the cost of maintenance of the hiring hall and the procurement, administration, and enforcement of the contract, which sum shall not exceed that being then currently paid by members of the union in the form of dues and general assessments. Such nonunion men shall be liable for said amounts only prospectively from and after the date this provision becomes effective, and only while such provision is effective.

Negotiations shall be carried on for a period of 120 days or until agreement is reached whichever is sooner. If agreement is not reached by the end of the 120-day period the above substitute provisions shall continue in effect.

In the event that any outside authority acts to nullify in whole or in part the above substitute provisions if invoked or any substitute provisions which may have been agreed to in negotiations the parties agree to resist such action. If nevertheless the provisions are nullified in whole or in part there shall be further negotiations for a period of not less than 120 days in an effort to agree upon new subsitute provisions which comply with the law. In the event no agreement is reached within the 120-day period or in the event any agreement which may be reached is nullified in whole or in part either party hereto may cancel this agreement upon 5 days' written notice.

(c) In the event the above substitute provisions are invoked as herein provided the first two paragraphs of subsection E of section 11 of the agreement may be renegotiated and the third paragraph thereof shall be amended by adding thereto the following:

It is also understood that either party may cite before the labor relations committee any union or nonunion longshoreman whose conduct on the job or in the hiring hall causes disruption of normal harmony in the relationship of the parties hereto and by action of the joint committee longshoremen found guilty of such conduct may be suspended or dropped from the registration list. The standards of conduct imposed hereunder shall be the same for all longshoremen.

(Initialed by parties.)

NOVEMBER 24, 1948.

STATEMENT OF ALBERT J. FITZGERALD, GENERAL PRESIDENT, UNITED ELECTRICAL, RADIO AND MACHINE WORKERS OF AMERICA, CIO, RELATIVE TO NECESSITY FOR REPEAL OF THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

We appear here on behalf of the United Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers of America to speak for repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. Although innumerable instances can be cited of injustice and hardship the specific provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act have inflicted upon working people, we do not intend to address ourselves in our necessarily brief appearance here to a catalog of complaints against the various provisions of the law.

The Taft-Hartley Act operates as a whole against our membership and against the people. It operates as an important factor in the economy of the United States. Because it operates against the interests of the people, it exerts a malignant influence upon the economy.

This judgment of the act is the one expressed by the people at the polls last November. It is certainly appropriate to remind Congress that the decision as to whether the Taft-Hartley law should or should not be repealed has already been made by the people. In doing so the people expressed their final decision as to whether or not the Taft-Hartley Act is an antilabor law.

It is obviously an antilabor law and was intended to be so. The people have voted that an antilabor law has no proper place on the statute books of the United States.

Corporation spokesmen appearing before the Labor Committees of the Eighty-first Congress have attempted to persuade Congress to ignore the people's clear mandate to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act by arguing that the Taft-Hartley Act is not an antilabor law. They have sought to bolster this specious argument by avoiding the basic issues that underlie the law as a whole and the consequences to the lives and welfare of the people that arise from its operation. Big business spokesmen seek to bury these basic issues by insisting that the law must be fought only on a piecemeal basis. They would like the debate on whether or not the Taft-Hartley Act is an antilabor law to be prolonged forever and the Taft-Hartley Act retained for the duration of the debate.

In our opinion, that question is settled.

The real Taft-Hartley issue between the corporations and the people is that the corporations enjoy an antilabor law and want to keep it and the people suffer under the Taft-Hartley Act and want to get rid of it.

The corporation spokesmen anxious to keep the Taft-Hartley Act argue that the unions of American working people have grown into monster organizations which are constantly threatening the country with national paralysis.

A moment's common-sense reflection exposes the nonsensical nature of their chief point of pressure in favor of an antilabor law.

It is an obvious fact that the whole economic life of America is dominated by the great corporations. They determine what prices the whole American people shall pay for the necessities of life; their policies determine the American cost of living and the American standard of living; their policies determine whether the American people shall be employed or shall be forced to endure mass unemployment. They have the power to profiteer, the power to deny work to the people, the power to impose mass hunger and misery upon America, and they have shown from generation to generation that they are fully aware of this power and use it ruthlessly for the accumulation of profit.

The Temporary National Economic Committee had the following to say about big-business control of the economy several years ago:

"Speaking bluntly, the Government and the public are 'over a barrel' when it comes to dealing with business in time of war or other crisis. [Italics ours.] Business refuses to work, except on terms which it dictates. It controls the natural resources, the liquid assets, the strategic position of the country's economic structure, and its technical equipment and knowledge of processes. The experience of the World War, now apparently being repeated, indicates that business will use this control only if it is 'paid properly.' In effect, this is blackmail, not too fully disguised." (TNEC Monograph No. 26, Economic Power and Political Pressures, pp. 172–73.)

We point this out to show the absurdity of the claim that the union organizations of American workers constitute a monopoly against which the corporations and the country need legislative protection. Taking wealth as the simplest measure of economic power, the comparative position of labor and the corporations can be indicated by a simple illustration from our own industry. One single corporation in our industry possesses at least twice as much wealth as the combined total possessions of every member of this union, which covers the employees of practically the entire electrical industry.

The big business spokesmen demanding retention of their Taft-Hartley Act are in no position to plead "national paralysis" as a reason for repressive legislation against unions. The many experiences of economic paralysis this country has suffered have none of them been due to unions, but to corporation agreed for profits regardless of consequences.

The Taft-Hartley Act was passed in a spirit of hysterical vindictiveness against labor because, for a few weeks in early 1946, American workers struck to regain a portion of the losses in their buying power that they had lost from corporation price increases. At the highest point of the 1946 strikes, 1,700,000 workers were on the picket lines and the average duration of their fight was a few weeks. Contrast this with the genuine economic paralysis caused by the corporations in the 1930's. Fifteen millions were jobless, and the period of mass unemployment lasted for almost a decade.

This very day, as demonstrated by a recent study of unemployment figures prepared by this union, almost 5,000,000 people are unemployed in the United States, while the period of their unemployment is already far beyond the period of the 1946 strikes and has no forseeable end. No figures in government or industry today are screaming "economic paralysis" at the corporations. The advocates of the Taft-Hartley law who raise this bugaboo against unions are being very quiet about the real situation and its causes.

The Wagner Act was framed in the worst period of economic paralysis ever endured by this country. Its framers were close to the big business crash of 1929 and were forced by the immensity and scope of the crisis to take an honest look at the situation when they wrote the country's basic labor law.

In the Wagner Act itself the framers of the law declared:

"The inequality of bargaining power between employees who do not possess full freedom of association or actual liberty of contract, and employers who are organized in the corporate or other forms of ownership association substantially burdens and affects the flow of commerce, and tends to aggravate recurrent business depressions, by depressing wage rates and the purchasing power of wage earners in industry, and by preventing the stabilization of competitive wage rates and working conditions within and between industries." [Italics ours.]

Fresh from the experience of the 1920's, when big business ran the country to suit itself and ran it into the crash of 1929, the framers of the Wagner Act perceived the obvious fact that the economic health of the country depends upon the ability of the great mass of the people to protect their earnings, their working conditions, and their living standards against the profit hunger of the corporations. As a majority of the people of the United States depend upon wages from corporations for their entire livelihood, it was equally obvious that collective bargaining through strong unions, independent of employer influence, was the method by which the people could combine for the protection of their own interests.

Therefore, as a measure for the advancement of the economic interests of the people as a whole, and as a necessary protection to the economic health of the Nation, the Wagner Act was passed to promote and protect collective bargaining.

It was a good law because it was passed to advance the interests of the majority. It was an honest law because its individual provisions were in harmony with and contributed to the advancement of its main purpose, the protection and strengthening of collective bargaining.

Someone might argue, "In this respect the Taft-Hartley Act is as good as the Wagner Act, for the very words you have quoted from the Wagner Act appear also in the Taft-Hartley Act."

No conclusion could be more false. The Taft-Hartley Act does hypocritically pretend to foster collective bargaining, but virtually every provision of the law is designed to tear down collective bargaining, to aid employers to frustrate it, and to weaken the organizations of working people formed to carry collective bargaining into effect.

This the Taft-Hartley Act does by its provisions for injunctions and law suits against unions by both employers and Government, by limitations on the right to strike, by direct strike breaking, by decertification proceedings, by splitting up bargaining units, by fostering employer interference in labor organizations under the phony disguise of "protecting free speech," by limiting the right of union members to choose their own leadership and policies under the politically discriminatory affidavit provision, and in many other ways.

In addition to the direct provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act which nullify the law's stated purpose of maintaining collective bargaining as a national labor policy, the administration of the law has brought out even more clearly its anti-labor nature.

In practically every struggle of any consequence of the people to improve their wages or conditions or general welfare, the Government has been found intervening on the side of the employer to help him to defeat his employee's efforts to protect or to improve their standard of living. The Taft-Hartley law is constantly used as a direct instrument for strikebreaking, by bans on picketing, by wholesale firings of strikers, by refusal to reemploy strikers and strike leaders and by refusing to strikers the right to vote in NLRB strike-breaking elections.

The strike-breaking activities of the National Labor Relations Board and its general counsel cannot be shrugged off as bad administration of a good law. The fact is that the Taft-Hartley Act is of such a nature that it cannot be administered otherwise than as an instrument to aid employers to defeat the efforts of working people to protect and advance their standard of living. The framers of the Taft-Hartley Act took good care that that should be so when the law was written. As Senator Robert A. Taft declared shortly before the Taft-Hartley Act was adopted, the law "covers about three-quarters of the matters pressed upon us very strenuously by the corporations."

In addition to its direct economic intervention on behalf of the corporations to defeat the economic interests of the people, the Taft-Hartley Act contains a provision designed to aid employers to capture control of the unions, to turn them away from serving the interests of workers.

This is the anti-Communist affidavit provision.

It can be taken for granted that the union leadership and the union policies that best serve the interests of the membership will be least acceptable to the leaders of industry, and that the charge of communism will inevitably be raised by the corporations against those unions, leaders, and policies which they seek to capture or destroy.

Powerful industrialists sponsored the affidavit provision in the Taft-Hartley Act and are strenuously urging upon Congress that it be retained and extended. They have told Congress along what political lines union membership must be split and where and how to impose a veto over the right of American men and women to choose their own leadership. They regard this, and correctly so, as the first and most important step toward regaining corporation control over the organizations of their workers, the return to company unionism and the destruction of the independent labor movement in the United States.

The unqualified right of working people to organize and operate their unions without interference is an absolute essential if collective bargaining is to serve the interests of the people.

This very point was deemed so fundamental that it was expressly stated in the Supreme Court decision which upheld the constitutionality of the Wagner Act.

In his majority decision the then Chief Justice of the United States, Charles Evans Hughes, wrote:

"We said that such collective action would be a mockery if representation were made futile by interference with freedom of choice."

In testimony before the Labor Committee of the Eightieth Congress, given on this question before the Taft-Hartley Act was adopted, the officers of the UE pointed out:

"The maintenance by our membership of the equal rights of every member, 'regardless of craft, age, sex, nationality, race, creed, or political beliefs' does not constitute adherence by the organization or of any individual member to any particular political philosophy, any more than it implies adherence to any particular creed, or membership in any race or sex.

"But it does most strongly affirm the right, not only of the individual member to hold any office or position in the union for which he may be chosen by his fellow members, but also the right of all members, collectively, to elect any member they may choose to any office or post in the UE.

"This is the strongest possible insurance that the membership will continue to control this union, and that no group—political, religious, fraternal, national, or any other—will ever be able to dominate the union."

It is this principle that the employers wish Congress to destroy, to take control of the unions away from the membership and destroy their power to protect and advance their interests.

Against the titanic economic power of the corporations, the working people of the United States have no other instrumentality than their unions to protect and advance their standard of living.

It should be obvious that the economic well-being of the country depends upon the economic well-being of the majority of its people. The economic health of the country requires an increasing standard of living for the people of the country—it cannot be maintained at present inadequate levels.

What are the consequences to the Nation of a fundamental national labor policy which places the power and influence of the Government squarely against the efforts of the people to improve their standard of living and which weakens and breaks down the unions, the only instrumentality through which the people can effectively protect and advance their economic interests?

The endlessly recurring series of depressions in past American history proves that the economic well-being of the country cannot safely be left in the hands of the corporations.

A recent example from the electrical industry will illustrate.

The 1920's were a golden period for our industry's corporations. General Electric Co. net profits increased from $26,000,000 in 1920 to $70,000,000 in 1929. Other companies increased their profits in like measure. But while industry was doubling and trebling its profits through merciless speed-up and exploitation of its employees a National Industrial Conference Board survey reveals that the average wage in the industry rose 43 cents a week, and for a slightly longer workweek. In that golden decade, industry ran industrial relations as it chose, treated its employees as it chose and was blessed with an administration and Congress of which it wholeheartedly approved. Just as industry is doing today, the corporations piled up record-breaking profits.

Then industry, having everything its own way, ran the country into the greatest crash in its history. That was real economic paralysis, and it is from precisely the same source that real economic paralysis always threatens.

It was as a measure of counteraction against that threat that the Wagner Act was adopted, to place in the people's hand a measure of power to protect their own economic interests, and in doing so, to protect the economic interests of the country.

In the sharp business recession of 1938 the working people of the United States, through their unions, were able to prevent industry from driving through wage cuts and speed-up in the crisis. For the first time in the history of this country, the workers were able to moderate the effects of a sudden crisis and prevent their employers from deepening the crisis by wage cuts and speed-up and the exploitation of human misery.

Under the Taft-Hartley Act what economic situation faces our country?

Corporation profits are at the highest point in history, completely overshadowing the profit records before the crash of 1929. The profits after taxes of the two largest electrical corporations total more than $200,000,000 for 1948.

The workingman's share of the national income is falling.

Leon J. Keyserling, vice Chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, last month told the Joint Committee on the Economic Report:

"Compensation of employees, which was 58.1 percent of the national income in 1929 and rose to 65.9 percent in 1939 declined * * * to 61.5 percent in 1948. It is thus approaching the 58.1-percent level of 1929 which most students of our economy now regard as too low and contributory to the depression which followed."

The employers are extracting tremendously increased production and profits per man-hour from their employees.

National Electrical Manufacturers Association figures, published January 29, 1949, in the Electrical World reveal that worker productivity for the electrical industry has increased 11 percent between 1947 and 1949.

In the same period productivity in the largest electrical manufacturing concern in the world, the General Electric Co. has increased 14 percent.

Annual profits per worker have increased enormously throughout industry, the rate of profit per worker now running from $1,000 to $2,000 a year. In the General Electric Co. profits per worker, figured on an annual basis, have increased 167 percent from the beginning of 1947 to the end of 1948. Westinghouse profits per worker, figured over the same period on the same basis, have increased 203 percent.

Already more than 80,000 members of our union have been laid off.

There are 5,000,000 unemployed today in the United States.

It is obvious that the most serious cracks have developed in the national economy, directly due to corporation profiteering, to inadequate purchasing power, and to corporation extraction of more production and profit per worker.

In this situation, to continue a law which hampers and thwarts the efforts of working people to protect their economic interests would be the most irresponsible folly.

This situation poses clearly the real issue between the advocates of the Taft-Hartley Act and the great majority of the American people who demand its repeal.

Those who support the law are taking the position, without admitting it, that the economic welfare of the United States and its people must be left completely at the mercy of the corporations.

The advocates of repeal believe that the economic well-being of the country depends upon the successful efforts of the people to protect and advance their standard of living.

In addition to the fundamental economic issue that divides the corporation spokesmen for Taft-Hartley and the people is a fundamental political issue involving the basic rights and liberties of Americans

We have already pointed out that the basic economic purpose of the Taft-Hartley affidavits is to take control of the unions away from their members. The political issue involved is equally grave and deep.

During the recent hearings on the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act conducted by the Senate Committee on Education and Public Welfare, the heads of the two largest corporations in the electrical industry, Mr. Charles E. Wilson of General Electric Co. and Mr. Gwilym Price of the Westinghouse Electric Corp., appeared to urge that the Taft-Hartley Act be retained. Both laid the heaviest emphasis upon retaining the Taft-Hartley affidavits.

In a statement submitted to the Senate committee on this point, this union declared

"Most unfortunately for Americans, powerful forces in our country today have coerced and frightened so many of our countrymen into fearing that a war against the Soviet Union is necessary and inevitable, that almost any outrage against the rights and liberties of the people passes virtually without challenge if presented under a cloak of anticommunism.

"Many who in their hearts bitterly oppose and resent the whittling away of the traditional rights of American citizens to think, and speak, and vote as they please, to choose their own associates and to be judged on the basis of their acts and their acts alone, today fear to speak out in defense of those rights. They fear vituperation, slander, persecution, public and private, loss of reputation, and loss of livelihood.

"We consider it our duty to place ourselves among those who speak for liberty in America.

"We believe that the Congress of the United States is a forum where the rights of the American people should be defended zealously and fearlessly. It should be a tribunal to protect the people's liberties.

"It was not such under the Eightieth Congress.

"Then the Senate and the House of Representatives joined in telling the working people of America, 'You must divide your members according to their politics. There are men and women among you whom you must not choose as leaders, no matter what your judgment of their lives, their deeds or the program they offer for your approval. You must make them second-class members of your union, because, in our view and in the view of your employers, these members think forbidden thoughts, read forbidden books, speak forbidden words, advocate forbidden policies, choose forbidden associates, vote as it is forbidden to vote. If you refuse to degrade these members of your union, if you insist upon maintaining equal rights and privileges for all, we will do all we can to aid your enemies against you.'

"That is the essence of the Taft-Hartley affidavits. It is wrong, dead wrong, and no amount of argument will ever make it right.

"The bold assertion, 'It's a free country, isn't it?' is rooted deep in the American's pride in his democratic rights. What answer can an American working man give to that question when political discrimination, political prohibitions and penalties are written into the basic labor law of our country?

"Mr. Wilson of General Electric and Mr. Price of Westinghouse demand that the Eighty-first Congress perpetuate and aggravate that crime against the people's rights.

"What paltry benefits they offer in exchange!

"When asked what good the affidavits had done thus far, Mr. Wilson was able to cite only the fact that they had helped him to break a union contract with Government protection, and to gloat over a few instances of politically motivated disruption in the union. Mr. Price of Westinghouse cited no benefit at all.

"Yet the heads of the two most powerful electrical trusts in the world urgently demanded that the political discrimination embodied in the Taft-Hartley Act be continued and extended.

"Mr. Wilson of General Electric demands that all union leaders, from top national officers down to and including shop stewards plus all union employees be compelled to swear away the American right to choose their own brand of political thinking. Employers, he declares, should be expressly excused from dealing with representatives of unions that do not meet such requirements.

"Mr. Price of Westinghouse goes even further. He demands that the affidavits be kept. Further, he demands that the Government should prosecute union leaders with a view to their removal from office.

"Mr. Price says: 'If the Government has evidence to support charges that the leaders of any union are guilty of violating any existing laws and are unfit to continue in their positions of responsibility, this evidence should be produced and used by the Government to prosecute such leaders.'

"Mr. Price knows, of course, that union leaders are not exempt from prosecution and punishment for criminal acts * * * far less so, in fact, than the heads of great corporations. What he demands here is that a new and unconstitutional punishment be established for representatives of working people, the punishment of removal from union office.

"Continuing, Mr. Price demands, 'If present laws are inadequate, new legislation should be enacted. * * *'

"That is to say, in plain English, a new crime must be legislated into existence in America, the crime of 'unfitness,' political unfitness.

"That proposal come straight out of the labor laws of Nazi Germany under Hitler. Such a proposition cannot possibly be justified otherwise than by recourse to the basic political dogmas of fascism.

"In return for this subversion of American democracy, Mr. Wilson and Mr. Price offer to sign affidavits themselves.

"What an empty fraud. Mr. Wilson of General Electric and Mr. Price of Westinghouse, the one the head of the biggest electrical trust in the world, the other a Mellon banker, are willing to swear that they are not Communist! All they ask in return is that ideas be made a crime in America, and that they be allowed to choose which ideas shall be forbidden by law to American workers.

"Their offer to match oath for oath (although they place strings even on that) is not designed to improve the Taft-Hartley Act, or to make clear the issue here involved; it is to cover up the issue. The issue of the affidavits is not to determine which side can outswear the other; it is what kind of a country our America is going to be, a land where men are free to think as they please and can be punished only for proven acts against the law, or a country where ideas and words are crimes and to be accused is to be adjudged guilty.

"Upon this point Senator Wayne R. Morse, of Oregon, declared in a speech at the last CIO convention: 'The loyalty affidavits, which must be filed before the procedures of the Board can be used, are an insult to patriotic labor leaders and to the members they represent. It is no answer, in my opinion, to "equalize" the provision by making it applicable to employers as well. And it is no answer to say you ought to have required an affidavit to be signed by the employers that they are anti-Fascist. The point is not a point of equalization. The problem is to eliminate the section from the law because in my judgment you cannot square that section with sound American principles of civil rights in this country.'"

It is most significant that in the law by which the corporations seek to deprive the working people of the United States of effective power to resist corporate exploitation and to improve their economic welfare, it was found appropriate to include a provision striking at the fundamental liberties of the people.

It is not too much to say that the affidavit provision of the law is the most evil and vicious of all its provisions, for it is only by striking down the democratic rights of the people that the corporations can hope to maintain and perpetuate their power to impose unemployment, hunger, and misery upon the people by profiteering and speed-up.

We urge the Eighty-first Congress to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act.

It injures the people. It hampers their efforts to improve their standard of living.

It is a deadly danger to the national economy.

It is subversive of American democratic rights.

It has been judged and condemned by the people at the ballot box.

For the good of the country, the Taft-Hartley Act must be wiped out, and the Wagner Act restored in its place.

STATEMENT SUBMITTED BY HAROLD CAMMER, ATTORNEY, REPRESENTING INTERNATIONAL UNION OF MINE, MILL, AND SMELTER WORKERS, CIO

The International Union of Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers, CIO, is taking the opportunity of submitting this statement principally to place before this committee a case history which demonstrates conclusively that, despite all the distortions and hypocrisies of the supporters of the Taft-Hartley Act, the act has generated industrial strife and is being utilized by antilabor employers to destroy labor organizations.

Before presenting this case history, however, this international union desires to reiterate its deep and determined opposition to the Taft-Hartley Act. Since the CIO and its representatives are presenting detailed analyses of the provisions of the act and how they have worked in practice, we have no desire to burden the record of this committee further on the general issue of Taft-Hartley except to point out that the opposition we expressed to the Taft-Hartley bill when it was before Congress has proved itself fully justified. Instead of a National Labor Relations Board protecting labor's right to organize, we now have a Labor Board dominated by an employer-minded majority and a viciously antilabor general counsel making full use of the opportunities afforded by Taft-Hartley to undermine the hard-won rights of labor. We have witnessed the full-scale return of the hated injunction which labor, after 50 years of agitation, believed had been forever eliminated. We have seen the steady deterioration of labor's most basic rights—the right to strike, the right to picket, the right to employ the peaceful weapon of the secondary boycott against its enemies, the right to bargain for union-security clauses and for welfare funds. We have seen the destruction of the most elementary political rights, the right of unions to participate freely in national elections and the right of the membership to choose their own officers free of dictation from Government and from employers. We have seen many more serious steps taken in the same direction of carrying out the basic purpose of the Taft-Hartley Act to weaken organized labor in America to the point where company unionism or worse will express the national labor policy.

These are some of the reasons why we believe that the Taft-Hartley Act should be repealed and the Wagner Act reenacted.

The case history in Taft-Hartley which we wish to present to the committee involves the American Zinc, Lead & Smelting Co. We select this history (although there are others) because it involves a current lengthy strike of our membership and because Howard I. Young, president of the company (and also president of the American Mining Congress, the national organization of the mining industry) testified at some length before the Senate committee on February 19 on this same legislation. We want to tell you something about this strike and about Mr. Young's testimony.

Although Mr. Young touched on other issues, his testimony dealt principally with section 9 (h) of Taft-Hartley, the non-Communist affidavit provision. Mr. Young would have you believe that he comes forward only as a patriotic, self-sacrificing American doing battle against the enemies of his country. "This strike was called by a Communist-dominated union," says Mr. Young, "after we had refused to recognize or deal with it until its officers would sign the non-Communist affidavits specified by the present labor law." We felt that soon or later we were going to have to face the issue of communism; and in view of the critical international situation in the spring of 1948, we became convinced that it was in the national interest for us to face the situation immediately. For this reason, in May 1948, we announced to the International Union of Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers and to the local unions at our Fairmont City, Ill.; Hillsboro, Ill.; Columbus, Ohio; and Metaline Falls, Wash., plants, that we would not recognize this union nor negotiate with it, until its officers and the officers of the locals filed the non-Communist affidavits as specified by the law. Our contracts with all of these locals expired on June 30, 1948."

These statements do not correspond with the facts. What are the facts?

Mr. Young's company operates seven plants, and this international union has represented the employees at four of them for some years. These four plants are a mine at Metaline Falls, Wash.; a zinc smelted at Fairmont City, Ill.; and zinc oxide plants at Hillsboro, Ill., and Columbus, Ohio. Our last contracts covering these plants were due to expire on June 30, 1948, and since they contained the usual 60-day notice provision, we served notice of our demands before May 1.

It is obvious from these few facts that Mr. Young must have left something out when he testified that he announced in May that he would not negotiate unless the affidavits were filed. It would have been too late for Mr. Young to take this position after May 1 because if the union had also not given notice before May 1, the contracts would have renewed themselves.

What did Mr. Young omit? He omitted the fact that there were negotiations between the union and the company before the company announced its refusal to deal further and that therefore Mr. Young began to wave the flag so furiously only because he was determined to resist the union's economic demands.

The facts are that after the union gave its notice, the parties had their first negotiating session on May 5, at which time the union presented its demands for a wage increase, a health and welfare program, a pension plan, severance pay, sick leave, and holidays with pay. These demands were discussed and the company took them under advisement. On May 7, 2 days later, the company's personnel manager telephoned the executive board member of the international union who was participating in the negotiations and offered to renew the agreement without change if the union would drop its demands. Since the union refused this proposition, the parties met again on May 11, at which time details concerning the pension plan were furnished to the company pursuant to its previous telephonic request made to the executive board member by its personnel manager. The non-Communist affidavits were mentioned by the company for the first time at this meeting, but the company refused to say whether they intended to make this an issue. It was not until May 13 that the company announced that it would refuse to negotiate with the union unless the affidavits were filed.

These undeniable facts demonstrate that Mr. Young has taken to waving the flag—the last refuge of scoundrels—only because the affidavit issue gives him a convenient excuse for refusing to bargain in good faith. If this union was a "good" union, or to use Mr. Young's word, not a "militant" union, Mr. Young would not have the slightest interest in the affidavits. This is shown by his willingness in May to renew the agreement with this union if it dropped its economic demands and the fact that he raised the affidavit issue only when the union insisted that he negotiate in good faith on the demands of the membership.

We challenge Mr. Young to contradict these facts and particularly we challenge him to prove the following statement which he made in answer to a question by Senator Pepper:

"We had a provision in our contracts which we have had for years, that we must meet with them 60 days prior to the date of expiration of the contract, and open negotiations for a contract.

"We served notice on them prior to that date that we would not negotiate with them unless they signed these anticommunistic affidavits." (Hearings before Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, typewritten transcript, Feb. 19, 1949, p. 4263.)

Since the 60-day notice had to be given in writing, of course, Mr. Young should have available a copy of the notice which he swore he sent to the union at least 60 days before the expiration of the agreement on June 30, 1948. We challenge him to produce a copy of any such notice.

Mr. Young's testimony also flatly contradicts the record insofar as his relationship to this union before the 1948 negotiations is concerned. Mr. Young, while attacking the leadership of the international union, was at pains to say that he believes that his employees are "good loyal Americans" but that they have been misled by the officers of the international union. Yet strangely enough, Mr. Young has had occasion in the past to call upon the international union to help him in his relations with our local unions. It is unfair and hypocritical for Mr. Young to turn the facts upside down, so to speak, when he has always found this international union prepared to cooperate in developing sound and stable labor relations at his plants. In view of his great show of patriotism, Mr. Young may recall the part the international union played during the war in seeing to it that its no-strike policy was obeyed by the local unions.

A further irony and inconsistency of Mr. Young's position is that in reviewing our past relationship at a recent mediation session before the Federal Conciliation Service, Mr. Young was particularly bitter about a person who was formerly our executive board member for the district which includes local 82 at Fairmont. Mr. Young reminded us then that he had complained to the international union on a number of occasions about this person's irresponsibility and lack of equipment for his task. Mr. Young did not tell this to the Senate committee nor did he tell the committee that this particular individual also cloaked his activities under the banner of anticommunism, and that in fact this individual was finally thrown out of the ranks of both the international and local union for his disruptive activities.

In view of this history, what can be said of Mr. Young's attack on this international union except that he seeks to exploit the prevailing anti-Communist hysteria and the non-Communist affidavit issue not for the good of the country or for the sake of the "good loyal Americans" who are presently engaged in a strike against him, but in order to smash the union which is leading the strike.

That this is so is also demonstrated by Mr. Young's position at the recent mediation session. At Columbus, Ohio, one of the four plants now engaged in the strike against Mr. Young's company, Mr. Young entered into an agreement with a rival union during the course of the strike despite the fact that by a vote of 3½ to 1 the employees had rejected that union in an NLRB election only a couple of weeks before the agreement was made. Mr. Young now takes the position that this agreement he has made with a union which does not represent his employees makes it impossible for him to deal with us in an effort to settle the strike at that plant. However, said Mr. Young at the mediation conference, he would be glad to deal with us for the other three plants if we would only forget about the Columbus plant.

Does Mr. Young really care then whether we file the affidavits—or is his real interest in splitting the ranks of our union and of his striking employees? The latter have already given Mr. Young his answer. Despite the severe hardships imposed on them as a result of this protracted strike, all four local unions have reiterated their determination to stick together and not permit Mr. Young's illegal activities and hypocritical propaganda to divide or confuse them.

In addition to the use of the affidavit smoke screen and his plain violation of the law in dealing at Columbus with a union which does not represent his employees, Mr. Young has resorted to the other methods used by employers who seek to break strikes. He has imported strikebreakers; he has made use of local law-enforcing machinery to have his employees charged with everything from disorderly conduct to kidnaping; he has secured sweeping injunctions which have interfered with peaceful picketing and under which he has sought to have strikers punished for contempt.

No, gentlemen, although Mr. Young seeks to pose as one whose only interest in the non-Communist affidavit is that of a patriotic American concerned with the welfare of his country, the record proves that Mr. Young is merely using the flag in a despicable effort to conceal his greed for profits and his determination to smash any union which impedes the full gratification of that greed.

The record of our relations with Mr. Young, particularly in connection with the strike and events leading up to it, is a record which demonstrates that the non-Communist affidavit provision of the Taft-Hartley Act is a provision which must be repealed. Its principal use thus far has been to furnish antiunion employers like Mr. Young with what they regard as a useful weapon against unions and against strikes. These gentlemen are not really concerned with the affidavits What they are concerned with is economics; they will deal with unions which act like company unions, even if they do not file the affidavits, and they will fight unions which truly represent their members, even if they do file the affidavits.

Another effect of the non-Communits affidavit provision is illustrated by our experience at Mr. Young's Columbus plant. The provision has stimulated the unprincipled and disastrous practice of "raiding," whereby a union which has purified itself by filing the affidavits interferes with the bargaining relationships of unions which have not done so. Our experience at Columbus shows how unscrupulous employers use certain unions as convenient strikebreaking agencies.

Our members resent being told by Mr. Young or any other employer who their leaders should be. Our membership also resents any such interference with their democratic rights by Congress and believes that the non-Communist affidavit provision is productive of nothing but harm. Our experience with Mr. Young's company shows that the provision generates industrial conflict instead of mitigating it. The provision should be repealed.

Aside from the affidavit issue, Mr. Young's statement and testimony before the Senate committee are completely self-revealing in exposing the kind of employer who appreciates Taft-Hartleyism. Thus, Mr. Young pines for the conditions which obtained after World War I when, according to him, we had "industrial democracy." The National Industrial Recovery Act and the Wagner Act guaranteeing labor's right to organize changed all that, but Taft-Hartley has now corrected the situation and that is why, according to Mr. Young, it should be retained. In plain language, what Mr. Young wants is a return to the days when his employees were unorganized, when he had "one happy family," and when, as the records of the La Follette Civil Liberties Committee reveal, his company was free to hire notorious thugs and strikebreakers like Pearl Bergoff, king of the strikebreakers, to smash any attempt by its employees to better their conditions by joining unions.

Mr. Young and other like-minded employers in the American Mining Congress who believe that this international union can be destroyed had better rely on some history rather than repressive legislation like the Taft-Hartley Act. The membership of this union has always demonstrated its courage and its understanding of the issues. Faced with some of the most vicious and Fascist-minded employers in America (Mr. Young admitted in his testimony before the Senate committee that some employers are fascist-minded), our membership has always demonstrated its ability and its willingness to fight for their basic rights. For decades, this union, in its efforts to do no more than establish the right to organize and bargain collectively, was faced with all the weapons which have been available to the Howard Youngs: the use of injunctions, of thugs, strikebreakers, and spies, even the use of martial law to drive hungry workers back to the job.

We believe that Howard Young and his colleagues should be reminded that this international union was formed and continued its existence over a period of several decades when it was next to impossible to maintain a union in America's basic industries. This was one of the few unions which was able to do so. And it did so in the face of the most determined and violent employer opposition.

The fact is—and it is a fact of which we are proud—that this union was first organized in a jail cell in Idaho in 1893 by a few men who had been imprisoned by local authorities working with the corporations because they had dared protest against intolerable conditions. In the half century since that time this union has engaged in some of the most bitter struggles in American labor history. Also in Idaho in the Coeur d 'Alene district in 1898, the same forces antedated Hitler by setting up concentration camps for the imprisonment of striking miners. In Colorado for many years our membership was compelled to engage in one pitched battle after another against company thugs, gangsters, and State police paid by the corporations. On another occasion, the leaders of the international union were kidnaped in Colorado and taken to Idaho to stand trial in one of the most notorious frame-ups in our history. In 1914 Pinkerton agents employed by the Anaconda Copper Mining Co. destroyed our union hall by bombing. Much of the hatred felt by organized labor in this country against the use of State militia stems from the use of such mercenaries on a large scale throughout the western mining camps for the purpose of attempting to destroy this union. The leaders of this union, like Frank Little, have been executed on false charges growing out of their activities on behalf of the membership. One of the most disgraceful episodes in our history took place in 1917 when the Phelps-Dodge Co. engineered the famous Bisbee deportations, in the course of which 1,500 miners and their families were herded into cattle cars without water and dumped in the middle of the New Mexico desert.

Despite these and many other similar episodes, this international has continued to survive and to fight for the interests of its members. We ask only that the Congress of the United States not throw its weight in support of the Howard Youngs. Congress did so with the Taft-Hartley Act. We have no doubt that the current strike against Mr. Young's company, now more than 8 months old at one of the plants and more than 7 months old at the other three, will be settled in a matter of hours as soon as Mr. Young realizes that he can no longer depend upon Taft-Hartley to do his dirty work for him.

STATEMENT BY BERNARD MOONEY, SECRETARY-TREASURER, UNITED OFFICE AND PROFESSIONAL WORKERS OF AMERICA, CIO, ON REPEAL OF THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

We speak as representatives of more than 50,000 organized office and professional workers in all major cities of the United States, employed in insurance, financial, commercial, publishing, motion-picture, radio, direct mail advertising, technical and industrial, social-service, and other allied white-collar fields.

Four months after the November elections we still face the problem of negotiating major contracts with the Taft-Hartley law hanging over our heads.

We are alarmed at the reports appearing almost daily in the press that the Eighty-first Congress is prepared to abandon its campaign commitment for outright repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and to substitute in its stead a new labor-relations act which is nothing more than Taft-Hartley with its face lifted. We are alarmed at the delay in action on Taft-Hartley repeal.

Like millions of other Americans, we voted at the polls in November for outright repeal of this law, which has already repeatedly shown itself a union-busting instrument of employers and which is aimed at repression of the liberties of American working people.

In these days of rising unemployment and top-heavy profits, the continued existence of the Taft-Hartley law is clearly intended to paralyze the resistance of union members to speed-up and wage cuts, thus accelerating a depression of tremendous proportions, creating even greater misery and destitution than the last.

We, as white-collar workers, one of the lowest-paid groups of Americans, charge in particular that:

(1) The Taft-Hartley Act has held down white-collar living standards.

The facts show that white-collar workers have been one of the groups hardest hit by inflation. Since 1946 white-collar salaries have fallen another 13 percent behind the cost of living. The number of sales and clerical workers' families without liquid assets increased from 12 to 17 percent between early 1947 and 1948.

The average weekly earning of a bank worker in 1947 (and this average includes the pay of executives and supervisors) was $54.98. In that year the Heller committee of the University of California estimated that the least on which a white-collar family of four could live decently was $97 a week.

White-collar salaries have been low historically because white-collar workers were late in organizing. The establishment of our union, the UOPWA, in 1937, represents the first major effort in this country to bring collective bargaining to the white-collar fields. These historical inequities have grown relatively greater in the last few years. Taking 1939 as a base year, the Federal Reserve Bank of New York shows that by September 1948 the index of average weekly earnings of clerical and professional workers had reached 170, while those of workers in manufacturing had reached 228, those in public utilities 186, and those in trade and service 194. Consequently it can be seen that the economic status of white-collar workers is relatively even worse than those of other workers.

The Taft-Hartley Act, by hampering organization and encouraging employer resistance to bargaining, has left literally thousands of white-collar workers at the mercy of inflationary price rises, caught between low salaries and high-living costs, forced to use up their small savings accounts to meet current bills.

The National Industrial Conference Board gives the following figures on white-collar salaries:

Clerical average weekly salaries, October 1948

Boston	$36.50	Newark	$38.23
Chicago	41.61	New York	40.84
Pittsburgh	39.92	Philadelphia	36.38

Major cities, United States (13 office jobs combined), $40.21 average weekly.

The above statistics compared with minimum budget studies indicate that white-collar workers' salaries are below or barely meet subsistence levels.

Minimum budgets, 1948:

(a) Single workingwomen, living with family, New York City, $40.56 (New York State Department of Labor).

(b) Single workingwoman, living alone, San Francisco, $42.65 (Heller budget).

(c) White-collar family of four, $100.18 (Heller budget).

(2) The Taft-Hartley Act has increased employer resistance to the organization of white-collar workers.

Employers have always tried to deny white-collar workers the right to organize. White-collar workers need unions fully as much as industrial workers. They share neither the fruits nor functions of management. Offices are becoming increasingly mechanized and conditions more and more closely approximate those of factory workers.

Employers, however, are anxious to have a free hand to cut overhead when profits decline and to solve some of their problems at the expense of their white-collar workers. White-collar workers seeking to organize have always been faced with fierce opposition.

Under the old Wagner Act the organizing group had at least some measure of equality in meeting the situation, some recourse to an impartial agency. Today the old "cease and desist" order (under which the employer is ordered to stop interference with organization) is a hollow mockery. Today through the Taft-Hartley Act the employer is given so many powers of "free speech"—i. e., freedom to coerce, browbeat, and threaten workers with loss of their jobs if they join a union—so many ways to "prove" that a worker was not fired for union activity that the employees are left virtually defenseless and with no recourse except direct economic action to enforce their collective-bargaining rights.

Under the Taft-Hartley Act, as happened in the Brooklyn Trust Co. in New York, the employer can begin to act against the employees while they are in the process of organization—firing, demoting, and intimidating workers. As a result they are faced with the almost impossible dilemma of giving up the union and putting up with inadequate salaries and poor conditions or of taking action before they are solidly organized and in a position to command majority support.

Even where workers are ready to act unitedly to enforce their right to organize and bargain, as recently happened in an engineering design office in Newark, N. J., the Taft-Hartley law permits the employer without penalty simply to remove his business elsewhere and leave the workers not only without organization but without jobs.

(3) The Taft-Hartley Act gave the employers a go-ahead signal to attempt to destroy existing white-collar organization.

The main obstacle to the unlimited ability of employers to underpay and overwork white-collar workers has been the existence of organization in the white-collar fields.

The UOPWA, in the 12 years of its existence, had doubled salaries for its members in such large offices as Title Guarantee & Trust Co., International Harvester, Fort Wayne, Ind., the home offices of the New York motion-picture companies, the New York direct-mail houses, and many others. It has brought new security and many gains to over 30,000 industrial insurance agents employed by Metropolitan, Prudential, and John Hancock, to employees at Columbia Broadcasting System, Federal Telecommunications Laboratories, and Federal Radio & Telephone Corp. In 1 month—December 1948—it negotiated over a million dollars in new increases.

The high standards set by the union, often averaging $8 to $15 a week more than those in unorganized offices, have had an incalculable effect in raising standards for all white-collar workers. Salary gains and classifications made by the UOPWA often set the pattern for thousands of employees who had perhaps never heard of the union. The very existence of the UOPWA stands as a threat to employers who want a free hand to cut salaries and throw employees out of jobs in an arbitrary and ruthless fashion.

The employers now saw in the Taft-Hartley Act their opportunity. It gave them many weapons with which to help them try to destroy peaceful collective bargaining relationships of long standing.

Best of all, they could with impunity simply refuse to bargain with the union which represented their employees, forcing the workers to go through months of struggle to re-prove its right to represent the workers.

This became the established pattern in the white-collar fields. Employers who had been dealing for years with the UOPWA not only refused to bargain but took it upon themselves to try to get the workers out of the union by promoting raids, slandering its leaders, stirring up factional troubles, and internal disruption. The pattern varied but only in detail.

In the recent Prudential case, 2–RM–70 et al., both the AFL and an independent union filed petitions for certification alleging units inappropriate for bargaining. These petitions sought to displace the UOPWA as the collective-bargaining agent of some 14,000 insurance agents. The employer also filed a petition seeking in the alternative a State-wide unit and a system-wide unit—the latter being the UOPWA contract unit. In the absence of the employer's petition, the Board would have dismissed the various union petitions for the reasons indicated. Instead, relying upon the employer's petition, they directed an election in a collective-bargaining unit with respect to which no claim of representation had been made. The employer had, of course, used the filing of its own petition as well as the others as an excuse to stop collective bargaining.

In the Prudential case, the employer has issued literature attacking the leaders of the UOPWA in the most extreme and intemperate language. Charges have not been filed against the company for these publications in view of the present attitude of the Board in its interpretation of 8 (C) as it relates to employers.

Likewise, various motion-picture companies in the fall of 1948 issued leaflets attacking the UOPWA as an excuse for their failure to renegotiate collective agreements with the union. The union did not file unfair-labor-practice charges for the reasons already referred to.

The most serious offender is Metropolitan, which has a long record of unfair labor practices, which were the subject of many months of hearings before the State labor-relations board some years ago. This company has clearly written and distributed literature the unmistakable intent of which is to warn employees against union activities. Here again no charges have been filed, on the theory that it would be a waste of time in view of the Board decisions.

The length of time between filing petitions and Board orders has been much greater than under the Wagner Act.

In the insurance industry petitions were filed by the UOPWA with respect to agents in the following areas on the dates indicated: New Jersey, November 16, 1948; Massachusetts and Greater New York, November 30, 1948; Illinois, December 3, 1948; Michigan, December 17, 1948.

None of these cases have gone to hearing despite our repeated requests, the absence of any legal issues, and the fact that the UOPWA has for many years been the collective-bargaining agent of these employees. In the Prudential situation UOPWA's petition for a Nation-wide election filed on November 11, 1948, was withdrawn as herein indicated by reason of the Board's failure to process the petition and its disregard of it by its decision of December 30, 1948, in which it acted upon petitions filed by the company and two rival unions.

In the insurance and motion-picture fields the major employers have used the fact of nonfiling for the purpose of union busting. In none of these cases was there any question as to the continuance of the UOPWA as the collective-bargaining agent. The union in each of the cases has prior collective-bargaining agreements. Yet, the Prudential, Metropolitan, and the major motion-picture companies refused to deal with the union and issued literature attacking it. When these steps compelled the filing of materials referred to in section 9 of the act, both Prudential and Metropolitan continued to refuse to deal with the UOPWA.

The Board itself has, of course, taken an extreme position with respect to section 9 (h). On December 30, 1948, in the Prudential case, it issued a decision holding that the national union (UOPWA) could be on the ballot provided that any locals which engaged in collective bargaining with respect to the unit involved in the case also complied. UOPWA is the only international union of the three involved that engages in collective bargaining to the exclusion of local union bargaining. When it showed this to the Board's agents on January 17 and the morning of January 19, the Board on January 19 amended its decision to provide that locals must comply merely because of their existence.

The Conciliation Service has been ineffective as a means for settling labor disputes. It did have some value prior to the amendments to the act. However, at the present time all that an employer has to do is assert the existence of a representation dispute and a refusal to meet with the union. This was done by Metropolitan recently, and as a result the Conciliation Service failed to call any meeting although requested to do so by the union.

Prior to the amendment of the statute, the New York State Labor Relations Board handled various banking and title insurance cases. Since the amendment, the Board has been prevented by the general counsel of the National Board from doing so.

The handling of UOPWA work by the general counsel of the Board has been extremely unsatisfactory. We are satisfied that the union has not been treated fairly by the general counsel. The Metropolitan petitions have now been pending several months without any action taken by the general counsel's office. The Prudential petition filed by UOPWA was not acted upon during the 7 weeks it was pending. The Prudential case involving the very serious questions of unit was handled perfunctorily by the Board's agents and an election in inappropriate units was stopped only upon the protests of the UOPWA and CIO. The unfairness of the postdecision developments is already indicated. Board personnel generally, including the regional directors, have been far less cooperative with UOPWA than under the Wagner Act. Efforts to secure conferences with members of the Board, to take only one example, have proved unavailing, although it was admitted that AFL attorneys were able to secure this type of access.

Hon. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY,
The House of Representatives, Washington 25, D. C.

DEAR MR. KELLEY: The attached letter is respectfully forwarded to you at the request of Mr. S. R. Morrow, vice president, the Bloch Bros. Tobacco Co., Wheeling, W. Va., in order that you may learn at first hand what has been his company's experience under the Taft-Hartley law.

Your earnest consideration of Mr. Morrow's statements is requested.

Sincerely,

EDWARD F. RAGLAND, Executive Secretary.

Mr. EDWARD F. RAGLAND,
Executive Secretary, Associated Tobacco Manufacturers,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR ED: Referring to our telephone conversation of Wednesday afternoon, our company wishes to make the following statements with respect to the effect of the Taft-Hartley law on our labor negotiations, and would appreciate it very much if you will see that they are presented to the proper committee.

In our negotiations of October 1945, without prior notification the union walked out of the conference room at noon, October 15, leaving approximately 40,000 pounds of tobacco in process. This step was taken by the union although they had repeatedly told us that they would give us ample notice in order to complete the manufacturing of any tobacco in process.

The result of this walk-out was that our people lost 5 weeks' pay before a settlement was reached. This amounted to approximately $49,002.71. We believe this could have been avoided had the Taft-Hartley law been in effect at that time, as settlement probably could have been made during the 30-day cooling-off period without loss to either the employees or the company.

In 1947 we were threatened with a picket line by a union that had no contract with the company. We believe the unions having contracts with the company had no sympathy with the threatened picket line and felt that under the Taft-Hartley law, they could so express themselves. It is our firm belief that due to the Taft-Hartley law, a shut-down was avoided and our people lost no time or earnings whatsoever.

Very truly yours,

THE BLOCH BROS. TOBACCO CO.,

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS,
Washington 1, D. C., March 21, 1949.

HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY,
Chairman, Special Subcommittee, Labor-Management Relations Act,
House Committee on Education and Labor,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KELLEY: On Tuesday evening, March 15, 1949, a Mr. Clarence Mitchell, labor secretary, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, testified before your special subcommittee with reference to H. R. 2032. In transcript volume 7, starting on page 1754, Mr. Mitchell referred to the International Association of Machinists as barring Negroes from membership through a provision in its constitution. On page 1764 of the same transcript volume, he has made further accusations against the I. A. of M.

Speaking for the International Association of Machinists I wish to emphatically state that there is nothing in the constitution or ritual of the International Association of Machinists which bars Negroes, or any other race from membership. The International Association of Machinists has Negro members enrolled in our organization. We have had, and still continue to have, Negro members prior to the enactment of any FEPC State laws.

Any inference or statement made by Mr. Mitchell which inferred that the International Association of Machinists barred Negroes through its constitution, its ritual or bylaws is entirely incorrect.

The situation referred to by Mr. Mitchell on page 1764 of the transcript volume 7 does not pertain to the Labor-Management Relations Act as this is a railroad which is covered by the Railway Labor Act.

I trust that this letter will be inserted into the record to correct this erroneous indictment of the International Association of Machinists.

Very truly yours,

H. W. BROWN, International President.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE,
Washington 1, D. C., March 23, 1949.

HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY,
Chairman, Special Subcommittee,
House Committee on Education and Labor,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN KELLEY: Mr. Harvey W. Brown, president of the International Association of Machinists, has suggested in a letter dated March 21, 1949, that the testimony which I presented on behalf of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People contains false statements about his organization. I have reviewed my testimony before writing to you and find nothing in it which I cannot prove to the satisfaction of any reasonable person.

Mr. Brown refers to page 1764 of the transcript and says that this "does not pertain to the Labor-Management Relations Act as this is a railroad which is covered by the Railway Labor Act."

I presume that he is speaking of the case of Calloway Gaddis who is employed by the Texas & New Orleans Railroad. I will not insult the intelligence of the members of your committee by assuming that they did not know this very obvious fact. I also cited a case involving the Brotherhood of Railway Carmen in Kansas which is likewise covered by the Railway Labor Act.

The whole point of my testimony was that the Gaddis case is typical of how colored people are treated in the South by the machinists. That is, they are forced to join separate unions and do not have proper representation. I am enclosing copies of correspondence on the Gaddis case which I believe amply prove this point. You will note from this correspondence that the local lodge wishes to settle this complaint, but apparently has been prevented from doing so by higher officials.

Nothing in Mr. Brown's letter refutes our charge that only court action, FEPC regulations, and pressure from local lodges have changed the pattern within his organization. The correspondence in Mr. Gaddis' case eloquently supports our case. We are fully prepared to support our entire testimony with an overwhelming amount of evidence which we have compiled through the years.

It will be greatly appreciated if you will also make my letter and the enclosures a part of the record.

Sincerely yours,

CLARENCE MITCHELL, Labor Secretary.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE,
New York 18, N. Y.

(Attention: Mr. Clarence Mitchell, labor secretary.)

GENTLEMEN: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of November 19, 1948, concerning Calloway Gaddis, Jr.

Please be advised that Calloway Gaddis, Jr., was discharged March 22, 1944, for cause by his employer. The International Association of Machinists did not take any seniority rights away. He chose a representative other than the regular constituted collective-bargaining agency to represent him at a hearing and, by certain actions, waived his rights to any remedy under working rules.

Yours truly,

(Signed) W. O. HAMMOND, General Chairman.

LABOR DEPARTMENT,
NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE,
Washington, D. C., November 19, 1948.

MR. W. O. HAMMOND,
General Chairman, International Association of Machinists,
3704 Birchman Avenue, Fort Worth, Tex.

DEAR MR. HAMMOND: One of the members of our organization, Mr. Calloway Gaddis, Jr., who is employed in the Texas & New Orleans Railroad shop in Houston, has directed our attention to a problem he now faces.

Mr. Gaddis began work with the T&NO on July 16, 1924. He worked continuously without interruption until March 24, 1944, on which date he was charged with insubordination. He remained off the job until December 27, 1944, when he was restored to the service with full seniority. The company credited him with his seniority as of the date of July 16, 1924.

According to the information before us, he was advised by the company that his seniority date was changed from July 16, 1924, to December 27, 1944, upon the request of the International Association of Machinists.

Since that time, Eastman Lodge No. 1537, which represents workers in Mr. Gaddis' class, has voted to recommend that the seniority be restored. A copy of the letter on this matter is enclosed for your information. Unfortunately, although the lodge voted on February of 1947 to request favorable action, this action has not yet been taken.

In my opinion, it is best to discuss cases of this kind on a face-to-face basis, and, for that reason, I made an effort to do so with the officials of the IAM in Washington. It was suggested that I might take this matter up with Mr. Earl Melton, the general vice president in Birmingham, Ala. Mr. Melton, in turn, has referred me to you.

I would appreciate it if you would let me know whether Mr. Gaddis will be restored to his proper place on the seniority roster.

Fraternally yours,

CLARENCE MITCHELL, Labor Secretary.

(Enclosure.)

HOUSTON, TEX.

MR. W. O. HAMMOND,
General Chairman, District 51,
Fort Worth, Tex.

Subject: Action of membership to restore Calloway Gaddis' seniority.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Following your instructions in progressing the Gaddis case I have obtained 138 signatures out of 166 through a waiver of seniority rights on the machinists' helpers list, in our move to have Calloway Gaddis resume his original position on seniority roster as of July 16, 1924, instead of his present position of December 27, 1944.

Second, in terminating my assignment in obtaining these signatures, I presented these cases again to the membership at our last regular meeting held July 25, 1947, and it was moved, seconded, and carried "that the local chairman and committee proceed and send the necessary papers of information needed in having seniority date restored to Calloway Gaddis to the general chairman that he may act on this information immediately and further that this meeting go on record as approving this action."

I wish to say that there are approximately 20 signatures that could not be obtained because these people are no longer here either because of death or quits. I know of the remaining eight, six have told me personally that they have no objection to Gaddis having his seniority restored over their position, but they were not required to sign anything when his seniority was taken away and the other two refrained because they could not read or write.

Enclosed also with list of names you will find statement signed by Mr. N. F. Seneschal past local chairman, as you requested. I hope that we will be able to close our files on this case soon as there is much organizational work to be done and also we are in need of all possible time to devote to other matters of importance in connection with our union work here.

Yours very fraternally,

FRANK SILVA,
Local Chairman of I. A. of M.
W. H. JONES, Shop Committee.

AUGUST 11, 1947.

MR. FRANK SILVA,
Local Chairman, Houston 10, Tex.

Subject: Seniority, Calloway Gaddis, T. N. O. Railroad, Houston, Tex.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: This will acknowledge receipt of your July 30 letter with attachments, in reference to the above subject matter, and in reply will advise that the matter was handled with the railway employee's department, and for your information I am quoting below their opinion of what should be done to correctly handle this request to a conclusion. Their opinion is, reading—

"It is our opinion, however, that you should be authorized to restore Machinist Helper Calloway Gaddis to his former seniority date of July 16, 1924, by each machinist helper that would then rank below him. Certainly, if the remaining eight helpers on the roster below July 16, 1924, have no objection to giving him the July 16, 1924, seniority, they should then authorize you, in writing, to do so, and until it is done we would prefer not to authorize any change."

The above opinion of the department is along the same lines I advise you on when we discussed this matter in Houston on July 13. It will be necessary that you get the commitment from the other helpers before we can afford to act in this case; for the reason that we don't want any action taken against us by such helpers after we make the request of the personnel department to restore Gaddis' seniority. Please act to get a signed statement from these eight helpers.

Fraternally yours,

W. O. HAMMOND, General Chairman.

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS,
EASTMAN LODGE NO. 1537,
Houston, Tex., February 28, 1947.

DEAR SIRS AND BROTHERS: Your shop committees' investigation of Calloway Gaddis and his appeal for restoration of seniority wish to report as follows:

1. Case history of Calloway Gaddis as stated in previous communication was found to be true.

2. Meeting held for purpose of interviewing all parties wishing to testify for or against action by this local in taking necessary steps toward restoration of seniority in this case by presenting further facts to substantiate present position were totally lacking except for the appearance of several Negro workers—C. B. Mitchell, I. V. Lewis, J. Gray, J. L. Givens—and one member of 1537, Brother Hartman, who works in the frog shop; all of these vouched for C. Gaddis' character.

3. Members of the organization were contacted throughout the shop individually and polled on this case and only one member committeed himself as being against restoring this seniority at this time because it is felt that C. Gaddis has not been punished enough.

4. Members of other crafts committees are of the opinion that this case is detrimental to colored organization throughout the shops and crafts and in some cases undermining morale of its colored members.

Your committee has from time to time discussed the merits and demerits of this case and its is with the best interest of the union in mind that it makes the following recommendation: That this local No. 1537 go on record as favoring the restoration of seniority to Calloway Gaddis, and that desire be conveyed to General Chairman W. O. Hammond and request that he act on this question with the management of the Texas & New Orleans on his next visit to Houston, Tex., to confer with said officials of said railroad.

THE GLASSINE PAPER CO.,
West Conshohocken, Pa., March 18, 1949.

Hon. JOHN LESINSKI,
Chairman, Education and Labor Committee,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LESINSKI: In your letter of March 16, 1949, you suggested that I submit my views on H. R. 2032 which is now being considered by the Committee on Education and Labor.

As a response to your letter I will state the following:

(1) That if the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 with amendments is to be enacted the amendments should include most of the Taft-Hartley provisions except where they are duplicated in the 1935 law.

(2) The non-Communist oath should be replaced by a section which would deny the services of the National Labor Relations Board to either an employer or a union whose officers could not take an affidavit to the effect that they "do not belong to any party or organization which advocates overthrowing the Government by force."

(3) Union shop and maintenance of membership provisions in contracts should be permitted without recourse to the machinery now set up by the National Labor Relations Board. Past experience with this restriction has clearly indicated that the overwhelming number of members of unions will vote for union security provisions. The procedure is time consuming for the Board and serves no useful purpose, and should, therefore, be eliminated.

(4) It should be permissible for management to negotiate a closed-shop agreement with a union provided that the union admits all qualified persons to membership. This restriction will keep a union from controlling a labor market and also will not deny the right of qualified persons to secure employment in their chosen field.

The great danger, as I see it, is that any new legislation in the labor-management field may be born with only the political considerations in sharp focus; and the moral and ethical concepts relegated to some inferior background position. Unless the new legislation is written with the moral and ethical concepts in sharp focus there will be no management-labor peace, but a constant struggle for advantage over one another. The new legislation must be fair and just to both management and labor if it is to accomplish any lasting benefit to labor-management relationship.

The labor-management problem is a moral one; consequently it requires a moral solution. Political considerations and expediency are practical solutions. Whenever a practical solution is obtain for a moral problem, it always involves a compromise with principle.

If I can be of any further assistance to you or the committee, don't hesitate to call on me.

Respectfully yours,

RAYMOND A. CURRAN, Jr., Director of Personnel.

ASSOCIATED EMPLOYERS OF INDIANA, INC.,
Indianapolis, Ind., March 25, 1949.

Hon. JOHN LESINSKI,
Chairman, Committee on Education and Labor,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

In re Taft-Hartley labor law.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LESINSKI: In your letter to us, of March 17, 1949, you stated that "the subcommittee requests that you file a written statement which will be placed in the record."

Accordingly we submit the following:

We are strongly opposed to the outright repeal of the Taft-Hartley labor law.

We are equally opposed to its emasculation to the point that it would be innocuous thereafter or become as unilateral and lopsided as was the old Wagner Act.

Employer-employee relations (labor relations), if controlled at all by law, must be established on the basis that neither one has an advantage over the other.

Furthermore, in our opinion, if our American economy is to succeed and prosper, labor relations law must also recognize and protect the rights of the general public.

It should be recognized by the Congress that organized labor does not represent a majority of the working men and women in America. These unorganized, nonunion workers have rights quite as sacred as are the rights of those who belong to a union, and no law should be enacted which would deprive them of such rights or compel them to join any organization as a condition precedent to the right to a job or to earn a living for themselves and their families.

The right to work is as important as the right not to work.

If men and women cannot be compelled to work, then by what reasoning should they be compelled to join something in order to work?

We hear a lot these days about human rights and there are those who believe that property rights are, and should always be, subordinate to human rights. Well, just what are human rights? Shall we only recognize, emphasize, and protect those human rights which are affirmative in character, or shall we, in all fairness and honesty, respect and protect those human rights which may be negative in character—the right not to do that which an individual may legitimately not want to do.

Man has an acquisitive nature. Throughout all history he has had an ambition to acquire something for himself, and we, the people, applaud the hard work, honesty, frugality, and persistence in men who practice these virtues in order to attain that end. Property is the goal of most men.

How then can we entirely divorce human rights from property rights when one is the corollary of the other?

To the extent that man's investment in property represents the product of his toil, his ingenuity, his imagination, and his wherewithal, whether it be his job or his factory, should not he not have equal protection of it?

It is our belief that the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947 contains certain elements necessary to make it a bilateral law, protecting equally certain rights of our citizens, whether they be union members, nonunion, employers, investors, or consumers.

To repeal this law and return to the Wagner Act would be a backward step indeed.

Americans like fair play, and in order to insure that the contestants should abide by the same rules, we must have such rules.

Specifically we believe in and urge the following:

(1) Freedom of speech be preserved and protected for the employees and their employer, with such restrictions or limitations as exist in the present law.

(2) The employer and the union must bargain collectively in good faith.

(3) The right of employees to self organization and to the selection of representatives of their own choosing for the purpose of collective bargaining should be preserved and protected.

(4) The right to join, or not to join, a labor union must be equally established and protected.

(5) The right of petition to the National Labor Relations Board must be equal as between employees and employers for whatever purpose it is granted.

(6) The non-Communist affidavit should be retained but made equally applicable to unions and employers.

(7) There should be equal responsibility and obligation upon the bargaining agent and the employer when an agreement has been reduced to writing and executed by them.

(8) The boycott should be made illegal, because it, more often than not, seriously affects the lives and fortunes of the innocent.

(9) The same comment with respect to jurisdictional strikes because we know that innocent people having no interest in the contest or dispute are jeopardized and suffer.

(10) Americans don't like monopolies, whether they be of business or labor. Therefore labor monopolies, which exist today, and which enable labor bosses to dominate the terms, prices, and conditions upon which free-born American citizens may work, where they work, for whom they work, and when they work should be made as illegal as business monopolies.

(11) Mass picketing and violence should be outlawed. The record cries to high heaven for the relief—yes, protection—of the innocent worker and the general public against such high-handed tyranny. Does it require 1,000 pickets to publicize a labor dispute at a plant employing 200 employees or less? The very obvious answer is "no."

(12) If a union can qualify, under the law, to petition the Board for a representation election, then it would certainly seem only just and fair that it be denied the right to picket in order to enforce recognition by the employer before certification by the Board.

(13) The injunction has never been popular with organized labor, because it has been the subject. Neither is imprisonment popular with the culprit. But, for the general good, experience proves that both are necessary when conditions warrant. There should be certain limitations or restrictions to the injunctive process, but these must not be enervating to or destructive of the relief sought and warranted under the circumstances. The injunction should be preserved.

(14) Union security, whether it be the union shop or maintenance of membership, should not be imposed upon American workers until and unless they have expressed a desire for it. Nothing radically wrong in the present provisions of the law in regard to this matter.

(15) The closed shop is un-American in concept and principle, and must have no place in employer-employee relations.

(16) Unfair-labor practices: We have no objection to the provisions in the present law and believe they should be retained. Certainly there should be no cancellation of those applicable to a union in the event those against an employer are to be retained.

Organized labor is big business and should be treated as such. There is nothing helpless about it, and certainly it needs no legal advantages over employers. They can negotiate as equals, unless the Congress grants special privileges to labor unions.

Congress should not overlook the importance of small business to the national economy. These businessmen are small fry to practically every union in this country, and out this way we know that unions can put these small-business concerns out of business.

If business monopolies are to be controlled against destroying small business, then why should not labor monopolies be controlled for the same reason? One is just as reprehensible as the other if our country is to remain free.

Organized labor should be made responsible and accountable to its members, to the general public, and to those with whom it contracts.

Very respectfully yours,

R. W. AKIN, Secretary.

AMERICAN TRUCKING ASSOCIATIONS, INC.,
Washington 6, D. C., March 22, 1949.

Hon. JOHN LESINSKI,
Chairman, Committee on Education and Labor,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: On behalf of American Trucking Associations, Inc., I have endeavored to secure an appointment for an appearance before your committee on House bill No. 2032. It is now evident that hearings will not be extended, and that I will not have an opportunity to appear, and I therefore request that this letter be made a part of the record in the committee's proceedings.

American Trucking Associations, Inc., is the national trade association of the trucking industry. No industry in the country is more vitally affected by the national labor policy and the national labor legislation than the trucking industry. Our labor is organized to a point where the teamsters union can, by a strike, close down motor transportation in any metropolitan area and shut off for-hire service in almost any section of the country.

Our industry, and the commerce of the country, were seriously damaged by the unfair practices in which organized labor indulged, without restraint, under the Wagner Act. I would like to direct your attention to a few specific cases:

In New York City, local 807, has regularly opened contract negotiations each year with an employer association. At the first sign of resistance to its demands, the union would break off negotiations with the employer group, force individual settlements on weak employers, and eventually impose its demands on all employers in the area without any semblance of real collective bargaining. Under the Labor-Management Relations Act, the employers had a remedy; when local 807 bypassed the employer group, an unfair-labor-practice charge alleging refusal to bargain was filed, and local 807 promptly returned to the conference table.

Secondary boycotts and jurisdictional strikes are among the more serious evils which beset the trucking industry. Our business has been used as its most effective organizing weapon by the A. F. of L. Employees of businesses which must have truck service to live have been organized by the simple expedient of having the teamsters union refuse to serve the enterprise. Secondary boycott may be justified under some circumstances, but the unions cannot be trusted with the power to use such a weapon without restraint. There are many examples of high-handed and arrogant abuse of this power. To cite one, a warehouse at Menands, N. Y., was boycotted by Teamster Union Local 294 in October 1947 simply because a business agent of the local union was refused permission to enter the premises.

The closed shop, banned by Labor-Management Relations Act but restored under H. R. 2032, would return to the unions another broad field for the abuse of power. An example of such abuse is found in Intermediate Report No. 1729 of the National Labor Relations Board, dated October 7, 1948. In that case, a New York employer was forced, by a 3-day strike, to discharge a driver when the union charged that his dues were in arrears. The intermediate report found that the driver had made a valid tender of his dues, that the union was not justified in its demand for discharge, and that the employer was not justified in complying with the union's demand. The helpless employer not only lost 3 days' revenue but was compelled to pay one-half of the driver's back wages to which the Board found him entitled.

I have cited only a few examples of abuse of union power out of hundreds in our files. Unchecked under the Wagner Act, these practices multiplied until the mild restraints of the Labor-Management Relations Act were imposed by popular demand.

We may sum up by quoting the fourth paragraph of section 1 of the Labor-Management Relations Act:

"Experience has further demonstrated that certain practices by some labor organizations, their officers, and members have the intent or the necessary effect of burdening or obstructing commerce by preventing the free flow of goods in such commerce through strikes and other forms of industrial unrest or through concerted activities which impair the interest of the public in the free flow of such commerce. The elimination of such practices is a necessary condition to the assurance of the rights herein guaranteed."

We respectfully submit that neither the facts nor the logic contained in this statement of policy can be seriously questioned, and that it should be continued in any revision of laws relating to labor-management relations. Further, if H. R. 2032 is enacted it should be amended to carry out the above statement of policy by (1) requiring unions as well as employers to bargain in good faith; (2) adequately restraining secondary boycotts and jurisdictional strikes; (3) banning the closed shop; (4) making unions liable for breach of contract; (5) giving employers the right to select their bargaining agents; and (6) providing an independent mediation service.

On behalf of the trucking industry, I urge that you give equal consideration to rights of employers and of labor.

Respectfully,

EDGAR S. IDOL, General Counsel.

Hon. JOHN LESINSKI,
Chairman Committee on Education and Labor,
House of Representatives, Congress of the United States,
Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: We are opposed to scuttling the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, because——

(1) It has in a measure again sought to protect the individual workman.

(2) It has placed labor leaders within the law and not above it as it was formerly the case under the Wagner Act, and which is again proposed.

(3) It has placed responsibility upon labor leaders, and as a consequence improved the leadership.

(4) It has minimized coercion and strong-arm tactics, and thereby placed labor relations on a more orderly basis.

(5) It has given individual workmen a greater voice in labor matters, thereby eliminating goon squad tactics.

(6) It has stabilized labor and industry relations in this community which had been plagued with irresponsible union leadership for a decade under the Wagner Act. There has been no major labor dispute or strike since this Act became effective.

(7) It has not affected union organization or function.

(8) It has not resulted in any drive to impair or destroy unions.

(9) It has, however, brought about a more mature attitude on the part of labor leaders because of the responsibility placed upon them.

(10) It has been a milestone in the development of sound labor management relationship under the law.

(11) It should not be impaired because to do so is a step backward.

(12) It should be refined, based upon study and experience and the custom and practice which has developed under it. This is the only sound development of the democratic process. Any other method is reactionary, and will result in the chaotic condition of the thirties, since it will be a signal to a favored class, the labor leader, that he is again above the law of the land.

Respectfully submitted,

MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION OF RACINE,

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 12, 1949.

HON. WAYNE MORSE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: Continuing our conversation of last Thursday in the Senate reception room concerning return of the Conciliation Service to the Department of Labor, where it historically belongs, the subject is so big and of such grave consequence to the continued existence of the Labor Department that I approach it with considerable trepidation. But please bear with me and I will do my best.

The Conciliation Service operated with great success in the Department of Labor from 1913 to 1946, when War Labor Board personnel took over the helm following expiration of the Smith-Connally Act. I believe you are familiar with some of the chaos and turmoil arising after the residue of the WLB took over. Had it not been for this unfortunate circumstance, or set of circumstances, I believe the Conciliation Service would have ridden out the storm occasioned by passage of the Taft-Hartley Act and remained safely at anchor in the Department of Labor, its birthplace.

In my opinion, the best that can be said for proponents of removal of the service from the Labor Department is that they swapped the devil for a witch, assuming (which I do not) that the Conciliation Service had to be tossed into the maelstrom of labor legislation prevailing at the time.

If you recall, I told you last Thursday that I thought the prestige of the Secretary of Labor behind a conciliator is of inestimable value in settling labor disputes. I found this to be true while serving as a commissioner of conciliation, especially during the war years of 1943, 1944, and 1945.

They won't build any monuments or write heroic songs about the part the Conciliation Service played in maintaining labor peace and keeping the wheels of industry turning during the war, but the conciliators did a magnificent job in this respect, often working night and day, Sundays and holidays, for weeks on end. They couldn't have been successful as they were if they had not been able to win the confidence of both management and labor, which they did almost uniformly. How could they have done this if management had been suspicious of their motives due to their connection with the Department of Labor?

Only rarely did I encounter hostility from this source. Almost without exception I was accepted for what I tried to be, an honest, sincere individual, troubleshooting strikes and strike threats, and withal seeking to create a better understanding between the boss and his employees, and vice versa.

It took generations of painstaking work to bring the Department of Labor into existence; mediation is indubitably a part of the warp and woof of the Department, its very lifeblood. At any rate, removal of the Conciliation Service severed a vital organ, leaving the victim in a badly crippled condition.

Boiled down, the act of 1913 creating the Labor Department provided for two essential functions, namely:

(1) Foster, promote, and develop the welfare of wage earners.

(2) Mediate labor disputes whenever in the judgment of the Secretary the interests of industrial peace so required.

Thus, to take away the Secretary's right to mediate industrial disputes destroys one of his principal functions and violates a fundamental concept of the framers of the act (in my opinion).

How else could the Secretary better promote the welfare of wage earners than by using the influence and prestige of his office to mediate their disputes? Bearing in mind always, Senator, that the principal definition of the word "mediate" is "to interpose as a mutual friend between parties."

This is voluntarily mediation, which operated successfully for 34 years, 1913 to 1947. The Taft-Hartley Act replaced this system with compulsory mediation, which is considered by many to be just as repugnant to industrial harmony as compulsory arbitration.

I regret very much to be at variance with such a splendid gentleman as Hon. Cyrus Sbing, whom I admire very much. He is a true conciliator from the heart out—all of his 5 feet 7½ inches.

Thanking you for your patience and kindness if you have read this far, and hoping that my thoughts expressed here may be of some assistance to you in reaching a decision on this all-important matter, I am

Most respectfully yours,

JAMES I. CROCKETT.

INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF ELECTRICAL WORKERS,
LOCAL NO. 1455, A. F. OF L.,
St. Louis 10, Mo., March 18, 1949.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES LABOR COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C.

Re repeal of Taft-Hartley Act.

GENTLEMEN: The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (AFL) Local 1455, representing approximately 1,200 employees in the States of Illinois, Missouri, and Iowa, ask for outright repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, reenactment of the Wagner Act without dilution, and, as a final step, consideration of the Wagner Act amendments.

We strongly oppose and ask that section 2 (12 (a), (b), and section 9 (b) of the Taft-Hartley Act dealing with so-called professoinal employees be deleted from any new labor legislation to be enacted by Congress.

I, for one, can speak freely in saying that the Taft-Hartley Act has not bettered labor-management relations despite what mangement says but has been a detriment to better relations.

In the case of the electric utility properties of the Union Electric Co. of Missouri, and Union Electric Power Co. (operating in the States of Illinois, Missouri, and Iowa) these sections have been abused and used as a subterfuge to destroy our local union made up of white-collar workers, who, above all, need a union.

An example of what has occurred under so-called professional employees follows:

In the year 1937 under the Employees' Mutual Benefit Associtaion which was classed as company dominated; accountants and engineers were included and even supervisors then.

The first certification of a union on the properties of the Union Electric Cos. (which was an independent union and classed as company dominated) was on order of the National Labor Relations Board, dated August 27, 1941, case No. R–2544, which included all office, clerical, and sales employees. Included in the group were engineer and accountant classifications.

On May 24, 1946, the National Labor Relations Board certified the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (AFL), case No. 14–R 1397, as representatives of all office, clerical, sales, professional, and technical employees. Again, the engineering and accounting classifications were included and agreed to as technical jobs.

Trouble started with a threatened work stoppage after the Taft-Hartley Act became law and upon the expiration of the current labor agreement, March 31, 1948, because the company refused to bargain with the union because the bargaining unit, the company claimed, included professional employees and, therefore, could not be included with nonprofessional employees. Certain individuals appeared before the regional office of the National Labor Relations Board claiming that they were professional under the meaning of the act. There has always been some question as to just who sent them to the National Labor Relations Board.

The union was willing to take the individuals who were already in the unit that the company had claimed professional and ask for an election on the basis that they vote for (1) inclusion in a unit of their own, (2) inclusion in the unit of office, clerical, sales, and technical employees, (3) no union at all. The company refused such an agreement but wanted to, and did, pack the unit with so-called professional and supervisory people for whom the union has never bargained in their history.

Mind you, the union was even in agreement to the above although we certainly felt that these people were not professional employees, but did it because we were being forced to do it under the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

In order not to disrupt the entire bargaining unit, the union was forced under the Taft-Hartley Act to set aside certain people (the company-packed unit) that the company claimed were professional employees. This resulted in a hearing before the regional office of the National Labor Relations Board in St. Louis, Mo., from May 25 through June 18, 1948, to determine the appropriate unit. This is known as NLRB case No. 14–RC–269. This hearing only resulted in the apparent wasting of the taxpayers' money since there had never arisen the question of the propriety of a so-called professional unit, and even to this day the National Labor Relations Board in Washington, D. C., has not rendered a decision as to the appropriate unit.

In order to appreciate more clearly the attempt on the part of the company to just automatically eliminate certain classifications as professional classifications, we refer you to NLRB case No. 14–RC–269. A brief example of such is the company representative who testified to the title of "assistant gas property engineer." He testified that he know all about this classification as well as gas-plant operations, but he did not know that the gas plant that he was supposed to be talking about, of which he did not know the location, had been retired and that the individual that he was vouching for in the matter of so-called professional duties was not performing the duties but actually on loan to another utility company. He did not know the type of gas the company distributed or that the company purchased gas from another utility company.

Another brief example is the company claim that students just out of college are professional under the meaning of the act because they were performing related work under supervision of a professional person to qualify them to become a professional employee as defined in paragraph "A", section 12 of the act. In the general accounting department of the company, 11 supervisors have no certificates or degrees in accounting; 2 have certificates only; 1 has a degree but is a supervisor of I. B. M. machines.

Student accountants are supposed to be training under professional people as claimed by the company. Of the 10 individuals (these include department heads and supervisors) who are to work in connection with the administering of the training program only 1 has a degree in accounting.

Of 75 managerial, supervisory and confidential employees who are noncontract, 45 possess no certificate or degree in accounting; 14 have certificates from correspondence or night school; 14 have degrees; 2 have diplomas, and yet students training under them are supposed to be professionals under the meaning of the act.

The company stipulated with the union that the title of "junior accountant" and "assistant accountant" were nonprofessional, only to do an about face and say that an employee who has a college degree and possessing the classifications of junior accountant or assistant accountant is professional.

A question which should be answered is why the union was required (other than through force) to go through a lengthy hearing to determine professional employees when there was no formal claim or complaint filed with the National Labor Relations Board by any employees or by the company. Not a single engineer in question appeared at the hearing to testify that they were professional under the meaning of the act. The regional office took the position that they could not certify a unit that included both professional employees and employees who are not professional but yet there are other utilities that are being bargained for as of today that include accounting and engineering classifications.

It is apparent that if the company is successful in the splitting of an already proven unit of office, clerical, sales, and technical employees, it will be just a matter of time when the company will contend for another group and this process continued until the local is abolished.

I have just briefly outlined conditions prevailing between the Union Electric Co. and the union under the Taft-Hartley Act and will be glad to answer any questions for enlightenment of the House Labor Committee.

Sincerely,

MATTHEW G. BUNYAN, Business Manager.

FLAT VENEER PRODUCTS ASSOCIATION,
Washington 5, D. C., March 24, 1949.

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: At a recent meeting of this association, the members discussed H. R. 2032 and voted unanimously to oppose its passage by the House. As general counsel of the association, I was instructed to communicate to you the fact of the association's opposition to the bill, and the principal objections which it has to specific provisions contained in the bill. It is hoped that consideration of the views of the association will be given during the course of your current study of the bill.

For your general information, the association is composed of manufacturers of more than 90 percent of all flat veneer products manufactured in the United States. They operate plants located in the States of Tennessee, Maine, Delaware, New York, Idaho, California, Ohio, Minnesota, Washington, Virginia, Colorado, Wisconsin, and Massachusetts.

General opposition: Members of the association unanimously oppose passage of H. R. 2032. Although they recognize that the Taft-Hartley Act could be revised to advantage in certain respects, they feel that such changes should be in the form of amendments to the act, rather than as a part of an outright repeal of the act and resurrection of the Wagner Act. The Taft-Hartley Act has benefited both employers and employees and the proposal to repeal it by means of H. R. 2032 and its companion measure in the Senate (S. 249) is not in accord with the real wishes of either group.

The principal opposition to the Taft-Hartley Act originally came, and still comes, from labor leaders who are more concerned with the collection of dues from union members, and with increasing their own personal power, than with the needs and desires of their members. Most union members, given an opportunity to understand the real meaning and effect of the Taft-Hartley Act, without being influenced or coerced by union leaders, would be wholeheartedly in favor of most of its provisions. It is the opinion of the association that a very large majority of union members would approve the Taft-Hartley Act, and oppose any repeal of it, if given an opportunity to express their views. Unfortunately, they do not have any real opportunity to express themselves. Their union spokesmen do all the talking, and frequently make no effort to ascertain the views of the members.

Opposition to specific changes effected by H. R. 2032—Closed and union shops: Prior to the Taft-Hartley Act closed and union shop agreements were used by union organizers as weapons to increase their membership and to maintain that membership once gained. It was common practice for a union, through strikes, boycotts, and other coercive means, to force an employer to sign closed or union shop contracts, despite the fact that the union did not represent more than a small percentage of the employees covered by the contracts. Employees were, by this means, forced to join a union, and accept it as their sole bargaining representative, in order to keep their jobs.

There is some slight justification for a union shop contract in cases where a large percentage of the employees belong to the union and desire a union shop. They are presently able to get such an agreement under the Taft-Hartley Act, when the union has been certified as the sole bargaining representative, and an election has been held to ascertain the wishes of the membership. However, there is no possible justification for permitting unions to use closed and union shop contracts as a means of organizing.

The association feels that no person should be required to join a union in order to earn a livelihood for himself and his family. Once he has obtained a job, he should not be forced to join a union in order to keep it.

No employer should be required to employ only such individuals as a union chooses to send to him. The success of any business is largely dependent upon the judgment of its executives and upon the proper exercise of that judgment in the selection of employees. If the employer is limited to union members, he is frequently unable to obtain the services of better qualified men who are not members of the union. The result is lowered plant efficiency, with consequent injury to other employees.

It should be pointed out that the principal benefits of closed and union shops accrue to union organizers and leaders and not to the union members. A duly recognized union under an open shop is just as effective as a bargaining representative for its members as is a similar union under a closed or union shop. It can do just as much for its members in the form of higher wages, better working conditions, and so forth.

The real features of closed and union shops are the organizing power, referred to above, and the power to force members to pay their dues and maintain their membership even though they are dissatisfied with the union as their representative. Such forms of contracts enable the union leaders to obtain and maintain their power.

Thus closed and union shop contracts spell security for union leaders, serfdom for union members, and inefficiency for employers.

Free speech: The Wagner Act provision on free speech, which is to be put back into effect by H. R. 2032, was so strictly construed by the NLRB and the courts that employers were afraid to even mention the word "union" in front of their employees for fear of being charged with engaging in unfair labor practices. Unions could make any charges they cared to about employers, and employers could not answer them. They had to sit back and watch while their employees were misled by false charges and representations of union leaders.

Employees should be permitted to hear both sides before being asked to make a decision as to whether to join a union. Neither the union or the employer should be permitted to threaten or coerce employees in any way in reaching such a decision. The present Taft-Hartley Act provision guarantees to employers the right to express their views, within such limitations, and guarantees to employees the opportunity to hear both sides and to reach an informed, independent decision.

Refusal to bargain: H. R. 2032 in effect says to the employer, "You must bargain in good faith with the union representing your employees. If you don't, you will be found guilty of unfair labor practices. However, the union does not have to bargain with you unless it wants to. If it refuses to do so, you are just out of luck."

Union leaders have branded the Taft-Hartley Act requirement that unions also bargain in good faith as "unnecessary." They claim that no union would refuse to bargain. If this claim is correct (and there is ample evidence to refute it), what is the objection to the requirement? Certainly it cannot hurt a union unless it does refuse to bargain in good faith.

Employer petitions for elections: Under the Taft-Hartley Act, in cases of disputes as to whether a particular union represented the majority of the employees in a bargaining unit, either party could petition for an election. H. R. 2032 eliminates the right of the employer to petition, but continues the right of the union. The employer is thus put completely at the mercy of opposing unions claiming to represent his employees.

Legal means for the settlement of all disputes should be provided, and either party to the dispute should be able to use such legal means. The principal objection raised by union leaders to the right of the employer to petition is the claim that it permits employers to catch a union before it is ready for an election. This objection is spurious on its face. The Taft-Hartley Act permits the employer to petition for an election only after he has received one or more claims for recognition. A union which represents a majority of the employees and makes a claim for recognition should be willing to establish such fact through an election. If it does not represent a majority, but is merely hoping to gain a majority through campaigning, it should not make a claim for recognition.

Moreover, the NLRB has complete authority to postpone the election until such time as it believes all unions involved have had an opportunity to prepare for the election.

Supervisory employees: Inclusion of supervisory employees in the definition of "employees" covered by the bill, forces employers to bargain with unions representing supervisory employees. A supervisory employee is a representative of management in double dealings with employees. If he is a member of a union representing other employees, he has a divided loyalty, which is detrimental both to the interests of the other employees and of the employer.

NLRB organization: Abolition of the office of general counsel and removal of Taft-Hartley Act restrictions on the NLRB will result in a return to the abuses prevalent prior to the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act. The Board would again act as prosecutor, jury, and judge, which combination of powers in one body is directly contrary to the American conception of checks and balances. The present procedure, under which the general counsel has independent and exclusive authority to issue complaints and bring charges, and the Board acts solely as judge, works fairly from the standpoints of both the employer and the union.

Conciliation Service: Reestablishment of the Mediation and Conciliation Service in the Department of Labor will destroy the effectiveness of such service. To be really effective, any mediation or conciliation service must be completely impartial, and both parties to a dispute must have implicit confidence in such impartiality. Employers have little confidence in the impartiality of the Department of Labor. Such Department was set up for the primary purpose of representing labor and is generally recognized as an "exponent and supporter of organized labor." A mediation and conciliation service which is subject to the jurisdiction of the Department of Labor naturally will be influenced by the aims and policies of such Department.

The present Service is completely independent of the Department of Labor and has gained the confidence of employers by its impartiality. Union opposition to the independent set-up merely reflects an unwillingness to submit controversies to any body which is not partisan to union interests.

Suits for violation of union contracts: Prior to the Taft-Hartley Act employers were bound by their contracts with unions and were subject to suits for violations. Unions were not. Unions were free to violate their contracts at will without fear of suits for damages brought by employers. This freedom enabled them to give employers many contractual assurances that they did not intend to fulfill, merely to get the employer to grant benefits desired by the unions.

Union opposition to the Taft-Hartley Act provision which authorizes employers to bring suits for violation of union contracts is a clear indication that unions do not expect to live up to their agreements. If they did, they would have no objection to the provision.

Conclusion: The association believes that union opposition to the Taft-Hartley Act generally, and to many of the specific provisions referred to above, indicates an unwillingness on the part of union leaders to accept any kind of restraint on their activities. They favor, and actively sponsor, every kind of restriction on employers and insist upon laws governing practically every move made by employers, but object to the slightest control over their activities.

Members of the association recognize that there have in the past been many abuses by employers and agree that reasonable regulations are needed to correct such abuses. However, labor unions have also been guilty of many unfair practices and have abused their rights. Instead of being willing now to accept reasonable regulation, they insist that they be permitted to correct their abuses by voluntary action. They want complete freedom for themselves and expect employers and the general public to trust them to properly exercise that freedom. Their actions in the past have not warranted any such trust.

The Taft-Hartley Act basically is a fair and reasonbale regulation of the conduct of both unions and employers. It safeguards each, as well as the general public, against abuses by either.

The association respectfully urges that you give careful consideration to the above facts and arguments before taking any action on the bill now pending before you.

Respectfully submitted.

FLAT VENEER PRODUCTS ASSOCIATION,
By RICHARD A. TILDEN, General Counsel.

STATEMENT BY LEE PRESSMAN, COUNSEL, RELATIVE TO EXPERIENCE OF THE MARINE ENGINEERS' BENEFICIAL ASSOCIATION UNDER THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

MARINE ENGINEERS EXCLUDED FROM TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

The Taft-Hartley Act contains a definition of the term "supervisor" and excludes such personnel from the term "employee" covered by the various provisions of the act. For this reason, no employer has an obligation to engage in collective bargaining with a union representing supervisors.

Licensed marine engineers have been organized in their own union, namely, the National Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association for a period in excess of 25 years. During such period, this union has enjoyed collective bargaining with the shipowners on the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific Coasts, and inland rivers and harbors.

Following the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act, the question arose as to whether the shipowners would continue their collective bargaining with the National Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association. Fortunately, for the peace of the industry, the decision was in the affirmative.

The curious contractions of the Taft-Hartley Act produced a situation that because the licensed engineers were supervisors and therefore outside of the Taft-Hartley Act, collective bargaining between the parties did not run into the difficulties regarding preference of employment as did in the case of the unlicensed personnel who are within the pale of the Taft-Hartley Act.

The committee of shipowners for the Atlantic and Gulf coast agreed in negotiations with the Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association, following the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act, that licensed marine engineers who comprise the membership of MEBA, fall within the definition of supervisor as set forth in section 2 of the Taft-Hartley Act.

This conclusion was confirmed by several regional directors of the Labor Board, who rejected unfair labor practice charges filed by individual engineers against employers or MEBA. Such rejection was based upon the fact that such engineers were supervisors under the law and, therefore, did not come within the Act.

NO CONTROVERSY OVER PREFERENTIAL EMPLOYMENT

During the spring of 1948 negotiations began between the shipowners on the Atlantic coast and the various seafaring unions and between the shipowners on the west coast and the other seafaring unions and longshoremen's union. In all of these negotiations, one of the burning issues was that pertaining to the union hiring hall.

The only negotiations which did not have this problem were those between the shipowners and the MEBA. The reason for the absence of this problem in this situation is that title I of the Taft-Hartley Act did not apply to the members of the MEBA.

The Fact Finding Board appointed by the President for the maritime industry for the Atlantic and west coasts, in their official report to the President, specifically stated that the problem of the hiring hall, which had brought a complete impasse between the parties, could be laid completely at the door of the Taft-Hartley law in that neither the employers nor the union wanted or expected any change in their standing practice of the union hiring hall.

Thus, whatever difficulty arose in the maritime industry because of this particular issue was due entirely to the Taft-Hartley law. In the case of the MEBA, where the provision did not apply, the issue did not even arise.

FACT FINDING BOARD AND ENGINEERS IN NATIONAL EMERGENCIES

(1) Negotiations between the shipowners on the Atlantic coast and the west coast (separate conferences) and the maritime unions began some time in March or April 1948. The contracts between the unions and the various employers expired on June 15, 1948.

The shipowners believed that in the event an impasse on June 15, the President of the United States would invoke the provisions of title II of the Taft-Hartley Act, setting up a fact-finding board and obtain an injunction and, therefore, there was practically no effective bargaining between the employers and the union. The meetings became a farce.

On June 15 the employers had not advanced a single proposal beyond the position they had taken at the first negotiating conference.

Thus, the very existence of title II negated completely the processes of collective bargaining between the employers and the maritime unions.

(2) The Conciliation Service had stepped in before the expiration of the contracts and found itself completely helpless and could perform no useful service. The employers were looking to the deal line when the President of the United States would invoke the provisions of title II of the Taft-Hartley law, and paid no attention to the efforts of the Conciliation Service to bring about a settlement. Thus, title II completely negated the efforts of the Conciliation Service.

(3) A few days before the date of the expiration of the contract, the President, as the employers had anticipated, appointed the Fact Finding Board of Inquiry to investigate the facts relating to the dispute.

(a) In spite of the fact that officials of the Labor Board and the employers had agreed that the licensed marine engineers were supervisors and therefore were not employees as defined by the law, and could not be held to be within title II any more than they could be held to be within title I, the President directed the fact-finding board to investigate the dispute between the MEBA and the shipowners. The MEBA never had any opportunity of presenting this issue before the President. When the board of inquiry opened its hearing for the marine engineers, the same issue was raised. But the board of inquiry held that it was bound by the President's direction and could not investigate this issue. Thus, marine engineers were brought within the confines of the board of inquiry, without any opportunity being given to the MEBA to challenge this point.

(b) The whole proceeding of the board of inquiry was a complete farce. All that the board obtained were statements from the respective parties as to the issues they had presented in collective bargaining as to which there was no agreement. Since there had been no collective bargaining, the statement of issues were practically the demands of the respective parties as presented on the first day of the negotiating conferences.

The board of inquiry, therefore, merely made a report to the President as to what the parties requested in their negotiating conferences—no more, no less. This information could have been given to the President by the Conciliation Service. The board of inquiry served no useful purpose other than during the course of this proceeding there was no collective bargaining between the parties.

(4) Immediately upon receipt of the board of inquiry's report, the President directed the Attorney General to proceed to the proper Federal district court to obtain injunctions preventing the unions from striking upon the expiration of their contracts.

(a) The most general statements were contained in the complaint of the Government and in the supporting affidavits to prove that a national emergency would develop in the event there was a strike. Such statements if held to support the issuance of an injunction could probably apply to almost every strike in any industry involving the workers of more than one large corporation, and in some cases even through confined to the employees of one corporation.

(b) The injunction issued as requested by the Government was sweeping in its terms, binding the workers to maintain the conditions which prevailed at the expiration of the contract.

STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS DURING INJUNCTION PERIOD

(1) The employers knew that the injunction was valid for approximately 80 days. Therefore, during almost this entire period there were no negotiations between the parties. The unions and their members were tied by the injunction and there was no incentive to the employers to consummate an agreement.

(2) As the time approached when the injunction would expire, the Labor Board, under the act, was obligated to hold a secret ballot among the employees covering the employers' last offer. In this connection, the MEBA pointed out to the Board that on the basis of the employers' agreement and the decisions of officials of the Board, licensed engineers did not come under title II of the law. Though representatives of the Board accepted this contention, nevertheless they held that they would go ahead and take the secret ballot of the engineers on the shipowners' last offer. In other words, the provisions of the law were flagrantly violated in this situation.

(3) Prior to the holding of the ballot before the expiration date of the injunction, for the first time the shipowners actually engaged in collective bargaining with the MEBA. When collective bargaining began, within 3 days an agreement was consummated.

CONCLUSION

(1) The entire process of fact-finding boards and injunctions only serve to negate the process of collective bargaining. Only the unfettered right to strike on the part of workers encourages collective bargaining and promotes the consummation of collective-bargaining agreements. The 80-day cooling-off period imposed under title II of the Taft-Hartley Act extends outstanding collective bargaining agreements that number of days—all to the benefit of employers who need not change the working conditions during such period.

(2) Licensed marine engineers though technically supervisors have, through the union, the National Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association, enjoyed collective bargaining for over three-quarters of a century. As such they are entitled to all the protection that other employees may receive through the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and the reenactment of the Wagner Act.

For this reason in any new legislation there must not be included any provision which excludes supervisors, so defined, as to include licensed marine engineers.

STATEMENT OF R. D. DOUGLAS, JR., ATTORNEY, OF GREENSBORO, N. C., REPRESENTING SEVERAL THOUSAND NONUNION EMPLOYEES IN TEXTILE, HOSIERY, AND STEEL INDUSTRIES IN GREENSBORO AND VICINITY

I have requested permission of the committee to appear as a representative of several groups of workers in Greensboro, N. C., who appear to be caught in the middle between management and the unions.

In the Senate hearings, their committee has heard management urge the retention of the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, and has heard the unions condemn the act as a slave bill. Apparently there was no testimony from the great group of Americans, the workers who are not union members. This group numbers uncounted thousands in the South and Southwest.

I am not a labor law expert, nor are the working men here with me. The problems of secondary boycotts are seldom found in our part of the country. So far as I know, we have never had a jurisdictional strike in North Carolina. But there are other and more fundamental problems which are before you under consideration, with which we are familiar and with which we are vitally concerned.

One of these problems concerns union coercion. Some books say that southerners have hot tempers, and others say we are easily led. I do not entirely agree, but I do know of many instances where a northern labor leader has come into a southern plant, gained a considerable following through legitimate persuasion, then proceeded to show his convert a few of the northern "tricks" of overturning automobiles, throwing stones through parlor windows, and threatening still further violence to workers slow to join the union.

Of course, there are local laws against such violence. But these mean little to some of the organizers.

An organizer for the United Steel Workers sat in my office in Greensboro the day before he called a strike at the Truitt plant and told me our laws meant nothing to him, that he'd been in better jails than Greensboro could offer. I had just told him that some of my clients wanted to go to work in spite of his picket line, and he had told me that anybody who tried to pass his line would "crawl through in his own blood, with his head split open." My comment about local laws prohibiting violence in picketing, brought forth his comment about the jails.

But whatever they think of local ordinances, the professional organizers do give some weight to Labor Board decisions, and they prefer not to be charged with unfair labor practices if they can help it.

And yet, can the members of this committee fail to see that once having had such coercion prohibited by law, a repeal of that law will be an open invitation to employ coercion at will? Even in the most violent coercion—of a sort that any reasonable man would call unlawful—the Labor Board and the courts would almost of necessity have to hold that since the Congress expressly and explicitly repealed the prohibition regarding union coercion, it was the intention of Congress to allow unlimited coercion.

There is another matter of great concern to the men I represent. It is the fact that the new bill under consideration takes away from the working man his right to vote to decertify a union which has not lived up to its promises and has proved to be a burden rather than a help.

I cannot imagine a more American, democratic practice than that which says that if a group of Americans vote a man or a union, or a party into power and control, those same voters shall have the right to vote them out of power. You men of the committee are elected by your friends at home. You were sent here because you had their confidence. And in all sincerity and respect, I ask each of you to think of the reaction of your constituents if you dared propose a law under which you would never have to stand for reelection, but might retain your office as long as you wished.

Yet that is just what the new bill provides. Once a union is voted into a plant the only way the very men who put it there can remove it is to persuade the company to violate the law and refuse to bargain with the union in order to force the Board to call an election.

Gentlemen of the committee, these two things I have mentioned, decertification and union coercion, slip into insignificance beside the real problem that the new bill brings to the millions of nonunion American workers, I refer, of course, to the closed shop.

I know that you have heard endless arguments for and against the closed shop and the union shop. There is little I can add, except to assure you most earnestly that the southern workers are vehemently opposed to a union membership requirement as a condition to keeping their jobs. Some of the most violently union men that I know, who fought my clients and me, tooth and nail in a decertification campaign at Proximity mill, have told me they do not want a closed shop. They say that the day may come when they grow dissatisfied with the union and want to get out.

There is widespread resentment in the South against such restrictions. I have heard many most picturesque outbursts that I cannot quote here. But I think their feelings are summed up in the words of Mr. Justice Brandeis, who said, "Why should the workers exchange the tyranny of the employer for the tyranny of the labor boss?" Mr. Brandeis said the union shop is un-American. Mr. Justice Frankfurter quoted him at length 2 months ago in the Whitaker case, pointing out that the unions should seek to hold their members by persuasion and by performances, rather than through legal coercion.

In North Carolina the farmers, the businessmen, the school teachers, as well as the workingmen, have opposed the closed shop. Two years ago our State legislature passed a right-to-work bill. It provided that no man can be deprived of his job because of union membership or the lack of such membership. The law was given overwhelming support by members of the legislature, and 2 months ago the Supreme Court of the United States said the law was constitutional. It was in this opinion that Justice Frankfurter substantiated his opinion of the closed shop by quoting private letters of Justice Brandeis never before made public, so far as I have heard. I think no one would contend that either of those two learned justices was or is an enemy of organized labor.

A union leader recently compared the nonunion worker who pays no union dues to the citizen who, having voted for the wrong candidate, refuses to pay taxes. There is no parallel in such an illustration; the taxpayer knows that even his candidate, having won, would have levied the same taxes.

We think a much better example would be that of a Democrat civil-service worker whose party had lost out in a municipal election, and who was thereupon told that from then on he must join the Republican Party and finance its campaign fund with dues if he wanted to keep his job.

Most of the North Carolina industrial workers came from the farms and small towns of the State. They have been reared in the belief that strong local government offers one of the greatest safeguards against all encroachments on the rights of the individual in our system of democratic government. Thus 2 years ago their views were expressed by the State legislature which outlawed the closed shop in North Carolina. If the workers had been dissatisfied they would have gone to the polls in the Democratic primary last May and voted for a new set of legislators who would have repealed the law at once. And in 1950, if they want the closed shop, they will go to the polls and vote for it.

The adoption of a blanket national rule which says that all industrial workers may find themselves in closed shops deprives the individual employee of his right to have a voice in his affairs.

We believe that the closed shop should be a local government issue, to be decided by individual States in conformity with the wishes of the majority of the people who go to the polls to vote. And the fact that industrial workers in the North are reconciled to the closed shop and union shop, does not give them the right to force such conditions upon the workers of North Carolina who are overwhelmingly against it.

The whole policy of the closed shop—which a great liberal justice has called un-American—is not a national policy. It is not like a State tariff which would seriously impede the flow of interstate commerce. Remember that even in the States which have outlawed the closed shop the union workers are given the same protection afforded the nonunion ones. They cannot be discriminated against because of their union activities.

If the working people of one State believe that no man should lose his job or be denied another because of his union membership or lack of it, then that is a matter of State policy to be decided; certainly it can hurt no one in the rest of the United States unless it be the union professional leaders who have come to rely on what Justice Frankfurter calls the force of the law rather than legitimate persuasion and performance to sell their union memberships.

The great masses of southern industrial workers inherently believe that they have the right to decide upon the issues that affect their liberties by the free exercise of the ballot in a secret voting booth. They believe that the closed shop very definitely deprives them of their liberties and they insist that this should be a matter for State legislation.

STATEMENT OF GARFIELD HEPLER, MACHINE-SHOP EMPLOYEE AT PROXIMITY COTTON MILL, GREENSBORO, N. C.

I want to tell this committee why I think the right of us workers to call for a decertification election ought to be kept in the law. About 8 months ago I filed a petition for a decertification election at Proximity, so I know a little bit first hand about this part of the law.

Proximity mill has about 1,300 workers, making cotton cloth. I grew up in the mill village and never have worked anywhere else. But I was in the Army when the textile-workers union got voted in at our mill, and just about the time they won the election I was getting some machine-gun bullets picked out of me that I got when the Third Army crossed the Rhine.

When I got back home and went back to work there was an awful lot of trouble in our mill. The workers were about half for the union and half against it. It got pretty rough in our village, with neighbors not talking to each other, and even church congregations splitting up over the union.

About a year ago a bunch of us heard about our having the right to vote the union out. We got us a lawyer and filed for a new election. We got laughed at by the union folks. Their organizers filed charges that the company put us up to it, and they said we'd never get an election. We told them democracy ought to work both ways; that when they wanted to vote the union in they got an election real quick; but now, they all of a sudden didn't believe in voting anymore.

But we got our election. We lost it by a pretty close margin. But somehow there wasn't any hard feelings. Of course, we had a lot of rough talk just before the election, but after it was over, it seemed like everything got better settled. Maybe we and the union folks each worked out some of our bitterness in the election campaign. Whatever it was things are a whole lot better now. The union still has just about half of the employees, and I don't think they picked up any new members by winning.

But we do know that the shop committee is a whole lot friendlier these days, and even the union members I work with say that the union is trying harder to do things for the members. I reckon our election sort of jolted them out of feeling too safe about everything.

We're not figuring on asking for another election anytime real soon. If things go along like they are now, we're not going to make any trouble for anybody. But we know that anytime we want to we can make democracy work again. It's just like voting for a man for office; it's good to know that if you don't think he's making good, you can vote him out next time.

STATEMENT OF JAMES S. ALBERT, HOSIERY WORKER AT MOCK-JUDSON-VOEHRINGER HOSIERY PLANT IN GREENSBORO, N. C.

Like thousands of other workers in southern plants where I have worked, we feel that the right to join a union or not to join a union is something that ought to be left up to us.

A few years ago at the hosiery plant where I work we had a union for our bargaining agent. The union was not strong enough to force our employer into a closed-shop agreement and hundreds of us never joined the union. It was not that we wanted a "free ride" like the organizers said; it was just that we did not believe in the union and we honestly felt that we would be better off without it.

However, if the union had been a little stronger it might have forced a closed shop and hundreds of us would have had to join an organization that we bitterly disliked and distrusted and would have had to pay our money to keep the union in power or lose our jobs. To me, this is about as un-American as anything I know. In American democracy, a minority may not like what the majority is doing, but at least they don't have to join what they dislike and pay for its upkeep.

We feel safer now with the North Carolina law against the closed shop and the union shop. We know that this law represents the wishes of most of the industrial workers in this State. If the sentiment of the workers ever changes, we can change the law. But we don't think that the Federal Government has any right to take away our protection and deprive us of our liberties just because some northern workers want a closed shop.

STATEMENT BY HYMIE POKRAS, REPRESENTATIVE OF NEWSBOYS AND CARRIERS DIVISION, INTERNATIONAL PRINTING PRESSMEN AND ASSISTANTS' UNION OF NORTH AMERICA, A. F. OF L.

Newsboys and newscarriers are entitled to the protection of labor laws.

Newspapers are distributed in various ways throughout the United States. Among those ways are newsstands, newsboys (distribution on the streets), and carriers (delivery to subscribers' homes). All of these persons work as an integrated distributing force, or labor force, for the publishers in distributing news to the public.

If you approach the question of whether the people engaged in this work are employees of the publishers in one of two ways, it is solved in one of two ways.

If you approach it in terms of common-law rule surviving from the days of handicraft economy, that is one thing; if you approach it the way it should be approached, as the problem of the legal limits of group activities in a modern industrial society, you will reach the solution required in this case, that these people are employees of the publishers and entitled to bargain collectively, regardless of lawyers' fine-spun legal distinctions as to carrying them or not carrying them on the pay roll.

The question of the status of newsboys and carriers and whether they are or are not entitled to the protection of the labor laws must be viewed as to whether or not they are subject to the evils the labor laws intend to eliminate and if collective bargaining is appropriate to that end.

Newspaper publishers are not manufacturers. They purport to render a service to the public. Newspaper publishers pay taxes (or do not pay them) precisely on that theory. The-sale-of-an-ordinary-commodity analogy is mere camouflage.

Publishers everywhere in the country, always, feel it necessary to term newsboys and carriers who make single copy serves of their papers independent merchants. The adjective is significant. A real merchant is by definition independent; these merchants, so christened by the publishers, always seem to need the support of the extra word, even on paper, so that, by force of the word alone, color may be lent to the attempt to belie the industrial facts as to status. Independent merchants, as for example a grocer, do not stand in service relationship to the large number of manufacturers and jobbers from whom they buy their groceries and other ordinary commodities for use or consumption. They operate mercantile establishments simply devoted to the purchase of a unit at one price and selling it at another. They buy a tangible commodity and receive title to it. They may open or close as they see fit, stock the merchandise on their shelves as they see fit, run special sales and push any item they care to in order to compete with other merchants throughout their respective communities.

Newsboys and carriers, on the other hand, do not handle a tangible commodity, nor do they receive title to the papers they pay for. They perform a service for the publisher by serving the news to the public. The publisher sets the price to the public and the newsboys and carriers retain part of the purchase price as their earnings. This is also established by the publisher.

Despite the fact that newspaper publishers claim that newsboys and carriers are independent merchants, whenever they are asked to bargain collectively with them, publishers themselves have proven, beyond any question of doubt, the falsity of their claims. As a matter of fact, their own words have convinced, not only us but the courts that they are not manufacturers and that it is impossible for a newsboy or carrier to be an independent merchant.

The following is an example:

In the Circuit Court of Cook County, State of Illinois, County of Cook, ss. Calumet Publishing Company et al., Chicago Tribune et al., intervening plaintiff, plaintiff v. George B. McKibbin, as director of finance; Warren Wright, as State treasurer; and George F. Barrett, as attorney general, all of the State of Illinois, defendants. No. 41–C–3507. The Interstate Company et al. v. George B. McKibbin. No. 41–C–5874.

DECISION OF THE COURT

The COURT. I shall discuss first the intervening petition of the newspapers. The point here presented is simple and calls only for the determination of the character of the business of a newspaper and its distributors with a view to ascertaining if they come within the definition of the Retailer's Occupational Tax Act as taxable occupations.

It is the position of the plaintiffs (publishers) that the publishers and distributors of newspapers render service to the public, and that the sale of the newspaper for some trifling consideration is simply incidental to the business of disseminating news and information. It is also claimed that such sales are not sales of tangible personal property within the meaning of the act; that what is in fact sold, if there is a sale, is not the paper and ink, but intelligence, information, and that these are intangibles.

The position of the defendant is that since the paper that is sold is something that can be perceived by the citizens—may be seen, felt, and has body—it is tangible property, and therefore the sale of it comes within the meaning of the act.

It is hard to escape the conclusion that the publishing and selling of newspapers is primarily a service occupation; that the thing that is being sold is the gathered-up intangible material for the enlightenment or entertainment of those who purchase the newspaper and that the paper upon which the material is printed is simply the vehicle or the instrument by which the information is passed on from the publisher who gathered it to the person who seeks it.

A newspaper is a sheet of paper upon which is imprinted in intelligent form the news of the day, the utterances and offers of the advertisers, the drawings of cartoonists, the reproduction of photographs, the interpretation by way of editorial comment of the problems of the day. If some medium other than paper were to be found for the communication of that information to the readers, they would accept it and probably pay the same price for it. It is almost fantastic to argue that the reader purchases his paper simply because he can use it for wrapping purposes. The purchaser is not intended in the nature of the medium used for the conveyance of the information. What he seeks is the news or the advertisements, or whatever else of interest to him is impressed upon the paper as a visual representation of an idea or a subject matter. The paper appearing on the stand at 10 o'clock in the morning will be worthless as a commodity at 11 o'clock if at that hour another edition were to appear having less paper and less ink but containing later news. After the paper is purchased and read, it is, in the terms of one of the cases cited, consigned to oblivion, and the purchaser is ready to buy another paper containing later news.

The public is anxious for information. It is interested in foreign news, domestic news; it is anxious to see an interpretation of the complicated forces which operate about us. It is anxious to ascertain where it can purchase required articles at the most reasonable prices and from the most reliable merchant. It is constantly seeking intelligence upon a variety of matters, intelligence upon the behavior of public officials, upon the action of its government—and the necessity has arisen, not suddenly but developed through the ages, for the maintenance of an institution devoted to the gathering of all that information and of presenting it to those who are interested, in an intelligent form, and in the most understandable language. That institution has so progressed that the information is available to everyone who has ability to read or to hear the paper read and at a price relatively insignificant when compared with the cost of gathering that information, and preparing it for distribution.

This institution is able to survive, not by what it profits from the sales price of the newspaper, but because by reaching a large portion of the public, it has become a valuable vehicle for the distribution of information, and those who desire or stand in need of appealing to the public use the newspapers as an advertising medium and pay for the space used.

One can become very eloquent in attempting to describe the uses to which newspapers are put in this country. They render service of such paramount value to each community that it is not at all flattering to the public to classify this great and indispensable institution as a retail business engaged in selling tangible personal property for use and consumption. The newspapers not only educate the public or contemporary events by bringing reports of the happenings throughout the world upon the table of each reader, who may assimilate the information while having his breakfast, but it is the mirror which reflects public opinion, the universal strivings of mankind, conflicts between nations and within each nation or community. It does even more than reflect those opinions. By the selection of the news to be emphasized, by editorial comments, and by interpretations by its columnists it seeks to and often succeeds in influencing and shaping public opinion.

It is the community's watchful eye on the conduct of its officers; it evaluates their work, criticizes and exposes their shortcomings. In short, it is performing a variety of functions without which no democracy can survive—at any rate survive with any degree of intellectual participation in the affairs of government by the general citizenship.

To say that an institution performing such functions is nevertheless simply engaged in the business of selling tangible personal property at retail involves the deliberate disregard of the invaluable services the rendering of which is the primary purpose of those who are engaged in that business and which alone gives it life and guarantees its survival.

As a matter of fact, to say that the newspaper is a business which might be included under any such a general definition as is contained in the Retailer's Occupational Act is to ignore the history of nearly 400 years replete with struggles, and calculated to take the newspaper business out of the class of ordinary manufacturing or mercantile enterprises. It would mean that we ignore the fact that by our constitutions and laws we have set aside the publication of newspapers as a unique and distinct enterprise, with special guarantees of freedom which we consider of the essence of democratic living.

It is not a manufacturing enterprise devoted to profit making even though it may be a very profitable enterprise; it is not a mercantile establishment simply devoted to the purchase of a unit at one price and selling it at another. It is, as I have already indicated, an institution, unique, in a class by itself, established for the purpose of rendering those public services which I have already briefly described. In the days of illiteracy the printing of one copy, exposed either on the wall of some public place for those men who could read to peruse it, could and did serve the full purpose of disseminating news; but with the advance of literacy amongst the millions, they have become anxious to know what is happening. To meet the demand for knowledge, the incredible machinery has been developed which reproduces millions of copies of the record of the gathered news which is conveniently distributed amongst all who desire to peruse it at a cost not much greater than the mere cost of distribution.

If the legislature intended that such an enterprise be taxed, it would have specifically provided for it in the act. I would not be very complimentary to the legislature if I concluded that in passing the act as it did it did so either in ignorance of the nature and distinct character of the newspaper business, or, by deliberately ignoring the nature of it, intended by the mere use of the general term, "engaged in the retail business," or similar words to include this enterprise. It must be kept in mind that it is not a sales tax with which we are dealing. It is an occupation tax, and the statute is of the type that must be strictly construed so far as inclusion of enterprises is concerned. Even if the rule of strict construction were not to be applied—taking cognizance of the character of the enterprise here involved, the facts of which are admitted as pleaded in the complaint by the motion to strike—the court would still feel that under a liberal construction the words of the statute are not broad enough to include newspapers within its orbit.

There is yet an additional but more technical reason why I am forced to the conclusion that the enterprise here in question does not come within the definition of a retail merchant as contained in the act. You will recall that the definition is that the tax is assessed against all persons engaged in the business of selling tangible personal property for use of consumption and not for resale, and, as I have indicated in cases previously decided here, this statute is unique in this respect—it does not assess a tax upon the business or occupation of selling commodities; it is limited to those who are engaged in the occupation of selling commodities for specific purposes, namely, use or consumption.

Before a court can say that a prospective taxpayer comes within the act, it must in each case, in fact, in each sale, ascertain the purpose of the sale. In other words, it must go beyond the person taxed and inquire as to the use to which the purchaser of the commodity puts it—a rather anomalous situation, but we have to deal with it, and so in each case the question is always present, "Was this sale made for use or consumption?"

Now, of course, no one will argue for a moment that a newspaper is consumed by the reader. When he is through reading it, it remains unchanged; not a particle of it is lost; and "consumption," within the meaning of the act, contemplates an actual destruction of the thing. It has to disappear or, at least, vitally change its original form. It is even questionable whether there is a consumption if the commodity was used so that its original character is entirely destroyed, but the elements of which it is made up remain incorporated in some other commodity; but certainly where no particle of the commodity in question is changed or lost and the whole would be useful to another person for the very purpose to which it was originally adapted, no one can contend that there was a consumption or that the paper was purchased for consumption. Now, then, was there a use of the paper by the reader within the meaning of the act? Our courts have defined the word "use" as meaning a long-continued possession and employment of the thing to the purpose to which it was originally adapted, and not merely a temporary or casual use of it. Could the mere reading of a newspaper possibly come within that definition?

DEFENDANT COUNSEL. I think so.

The COURT. Long-continued possession and employment and not a mere temporary or casual use? I cannot possibly see how it could come within the definition.

The answer to it all is that it is not purchased for use or consumption. It is purchased simply for the purpose of gathering from it by the visual and auditory senses the intelligence contained therein. So far as the paper itself is concerned, that which the defendant claims is tangible, it is not purchased for use at all. That paper without the impressions which convey intelligence or ideas, none would pay anything for the paper. The nearest one can come to contending that a purchaser of a newspaper buys it for use is that he intends using it as wrapping paper. The Attorney General so argued. But this is rather too fantastic to require further discussion. Moreover, it may seriously be questioned whether the transaction called in common parlance the sale of a newspaper is a sale in the legal sense. An essential element in legal sales is the transfer title in the commodity sold without a residuum of control of its use remaining in the seller. Can the purchaser of the news make unrestricted use of it? Of course not. The Associated Press and other news-gathering agencies would go out of business if every purchaser of a newspaper could reprint its contents and distribute it. No title passes to the printed material which alone constitutes the consideration for the payment of the purchase price.

Now, what I have said about newspapers in the main applies to magazines. There is some difference, of course. Nevertheless, the publishing and distributing of magazines is as much a functional activity as is the sale of the newspapers. They contain stories, that is true; but that does not change their character. What is sold is the story. The purchaser may not use it as he desires; he may not reproduce it; he has brought only the intelligence of the story for his own enlightenment or entertainment.

Moreover, there are magazines which publish no stories at all, and which perform the mere function of analyzing the news, or giving information to the public on scientific discoveries or discussions, or descriptions of artistic creative activity. Magazines generally come within the same distinguishable enterprise which we in a democracy prize so highly, whose freedom is guaranteed by our constitutions and continuously safeguarded by our laws.

A different situation is presented by the sale of books, of course. Books are purchased for use. We put them on our shelves, we keep them for reference, and in fact for the decoration of our homes. The sale of books may come within the term "use" as contemplated by the statutes. Occasionally a magazine may come within that term, but on the facts alleged in the complaint which are admitted and the court's general knowledge of the character of those publications (of which we take judicial notice), I must hold in this case that the distribution of magazines does not constitute a sale at retail within the meaning of the act.

The motion to dismiss accordingly will be overruled as to each complaint.

DEFENDANT COUNSEL. And the intervening complaint. There are two classes, sales of publishers and also sales of distributors. So far as the rules applying to both of those——

The COURT. I have indicated that in the distribution lies the great value of the service rendered to the public. A newspaper may be printed and remain on the publisher's desk and its value could be zero to the public. It does not make any difference whether it is distributed by the publisher himself or by someone who retains part of the purchase money as his earnings for doing so, the sale, if it is a sale at all within the meaning of the act, is not of tangible personal property, nor for use or consumption, and therefore the reasoning of the court applies to the newspaper boy and distributor equally as it does to the publisher who might himself distribute it.

The practice of self-organization and collective bargaining to resolve labor disputes has been established and highly developed between newsboys, carriers, and the publishers for more than 60 years.

It was only since many newsboy and carrier groups become affiliated with the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union of North America that interruptions in collective bargaining began. This was not because the underlying economic facts had changed or because these workers no longer stood in a service relationship to the publishers, or because the collective bargaining process was thereafter deemed inappropriate to resolve disputes between the publishers on the one hand and newsboys or carriers on the other, but because of the decision and order of the Labor Board in the Hearst cases, and of the special interest shown by the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union of North America in guaranteeing to corner men and carriers the protection of the National Labor Relations Act.

The records abound with instances of the subject matter of the bargaining over a period of decades and as to which there has either been bargaining and agreements reached between publishers and newsboys or carriers, or which are appropriatet subjects for bargaining. The picture presented is clearly within the pattern of basic service relationships inherent in industrial-union disputes, traditionally adjusted by the industrial-union technique. Among these matters are:

Increased earning for service rendered in distributing newspapers.

Pay for extra service in carrying heavy papers, necessitating extra trips and longer hours.

Pay to carriers for verifying new serves.

Credit for losses and establishing of fair method of compensating newsboys or carriers for such losses.

Pay for serving bad accounts assigned to carriers by publishers in addition to credit merely for the money due the publishers.

Credit for shortages in papers.

Machinery for arbitration.

Job security and seniority rights (no cut-off, complete or partial, for trivial reasons).

Protection of earnings by publishers eliminating bootjackers from routes and corners.

Fixing of geographical areas of routes and corners, and bilateral settlement of such disputes.

Protection of carriers against loss on new serves supplied by publishers.

Protection of newsboys on returns.

Transportation allowances.

Cash differential to night corner men.

Amount of commissions for soliciting subscriptions on (a) straight serves, (b) premium serves, (c) insurance serves, (d) magazine serves, (e) vacation or mail subscriptions.

Amount of commissions on collection for the publishers on (a) insurance serves, (b) premium serves, (c) magazine serves.

Elimination of, or payment for, "stuffing" of papers by carriers or newsboys.

Appropriate payment for extra service by carriers in delivering circulars or posters on routes.

Permission to make service or delivery charges to long-distance subscribers to companies' newspapers.

Elimination or reduction of deposits, with responsibility of union for payment of money due publishers from newsboys or carriers.

Under these circumstances it is difficult to see how the matters for discussion could fairly or practically be settled between newspaper publishers and newsboys of carriers, other than through collective-bargaining process.

Newsboys and carriers work under varying terms and conditions. These venders, misnamed boys, are generally mature men, dependent upon the proceeds of their serves for their sustenance, and frequently supporters of families. Working thus as news vendors on a regular basis, often for a number of years, they form a stable group with relatively little turn-over.

Over-all circulation and distribution of papers are under the general supervision of circulation managers. Most cities are divided into geographic districts under direct and close supervision of district managers or street bosses. His function, in the mechanics of distribution, is to supply the newsboys in his district with papers, and in the case of carriers, adjust complaints of subscribers, increase or decrease the number of serves, and advise them as to the performance of their duties.

Newsboy and carrier compensation consists in the difference between the prices at which they serve the papers and the prices they pay for them. Both of these prices are fixed by the publisher.

Not only are the earnings per paper thus effectively fixed by the publisher, but substantial control of newsboys' and carriers' total take-home can be effected through their ability to designate their serve areas and their power to determine the number of papers allocated to each. While, as a practical matter, this power is not exercised fully, the newsboys' and carriers' right to decide how many papers they will take is also not absolute. Very often the number of papers they must take is determined unilaterally by the publisher's district men.

In addition to effectively fixing the compensation the publishers, through their circulation departments, in a variety of ways prescribe, if not the minutiae of daily activities of these workers, at least the broad terms and conditions of work. This is accomplished largely through the supervisory efforts of the publisher's district men or street bosses, who serve as the nexus between the publishers and the newsboys and carriers.

Hours of work on the spots are determined not simply by the impersonal pressures of the market, but to a real extent by explicit instructions from the district managers. Adherence to the prescribed hours is observed closely by the district managers or other supervisory agents of the publishers. Sanctions, varying in severity from reprimand to "cut-off" (dismissal) are visited on the tardy and the delinquent. By similar supervisory controls minimum standards of diligence and good conduct while at work are sought to be enforced. However wide may be the latitude for individual initiative beyond those standards, district managers' instructions in what the publishers apparently regard as helpful sales technique are expected to be followed. Such varied items as the manner of displaying the paper, of emphasizing current features and headlines, and of placing advertising placards, or the advantages of soliciting customers at homes or in the traffic lanes are among the subject of this instruction. Moreover, newsboys and carriers are furnished with sales equipment, such as racks, boxes, and change aprons, and advertising placards by the publishers. In this pattern of employment the carriers and the newsboys are an integral part of the publishers' distribution system and circulation organization. And the record discloses that the newsboys and carriers feel they are employees of the papers and their supervisory employees.

The principal question is whether the newsboys and carriers are "employees." Because Congress did not explicitly define the term, the publishers say its meaning must be determined by reference to common-law standards. In their view "common-law standards" are those the courts have applied in distinguishing between "employees" and "independent contractors" when working out various problems unrelated to the National Labor Relations Act's purposes and provisions.

The argument assumes that there is some simple, uniform, and easily applicable test which the courts have used, in dealing with such problems, to determine whether persons doing work for others fall in one class or the other. Unfortunately this is not true. Only by a long and tortuous history was the simple formulation worked out which has been stated most frequently as "the test" for deciding whether one who hires another is responsible in tort for his wrongdoing. But this formula has been by no means exclusively controlling in the solution of other problems. And its simplicity has been illusory because it is more largely simplicity of formulation than of application. Few problems in the law have given greater variety of application and conflict in results than the cases arising in the borderland between what is clearly an employer-employee relationship and what is clearly one of independent, entrepreneurial dealing. This is true within the limited field of determining vicarious liability in tort. It becomes more so when the field is expanded to include all of the possible applications of the distinction.

It is hardly necessary to stress particular instances of these variations or to emphasize that they have arisen principally, first, in the struggle of the courts to work out common-law liabilities where the legislature has given no guides for judgment, more recently also under statutes which have posed the same problem for solution in the light of the enactment's particular terms and purposes. It is enough to point out that, with reference to an identical problem, results may be contrary over a very considerable region of doubt in applying the distinction, depending upon the State or jurisdiction where the determination is made, and that within a single jurisdiction a person who for instance, is held to be an "independent contractor" for the purpose of imposing vicarious liability in tort may be an "employee" for the purposes of particular legislation, such as unemployment compensation. The assumed simplicity and uniformity, resulting from application of "common-law standards," does not exist.

Mere reference to these possible variations as characterizing the application of the National Labor Relations Act in the treatment of persons identically situated in the facts surrounding their employment and in the influences tending to disrupt it, would be enough to require pause before accepting a thesis which would introduce them into its administration. This would be true, even if the statute itself indicates less clearly than it should the intent they should not apply.

Two possible consequences could follow. One would be to refer the decision of who are employees to local State law. The alternative would be to make it turn on a sort of pervading general essence distilled from State law. Congress obviously does not intend the former result. It would introduce variations into the statute's operation as wide as the differences the 48 States and other local jurisdictions make in applying the distinction for wholly different purposes. Persons who might be "employees" in one State would be "independent contractors" in another. They would be within or without the statute's protection depending not on whether their situation falls factually within the ambit Congress has in mind, but upon the accidents of the location of their work and the attitude of the particular local jurisdiction in casting doubtful cases one way or the other. Persons working across State lines might fall in one class or the other, possibly both, depending on whether the Board and the courts would be required to give effect to the law of one State or of the adjoining one, or to that of each in relation to the portion of the work done within its borders.

Both the terms and the purposes of the statute, as well as the legislative history, show that Congress has in mind no such patchwork plan for securing freedom of employee's organization and of collective bargaining. The National Labor Relations Act is Federal legislation, administered by a national agency, intended to solve a national problem on a national scale. It is an act, therefore, in reference to which it is not only proper, but necessary for us to assume, "in the absence of a plain indication to the contrary, that Congress * * * is not making the application of the Federal act dependent on State law." Nothing in the statute's background, history, terms, or purposes should indicate its scope is to be limited by such varying local conceptions, either statutory or judicial, or that it is to be administered in accordance with whatever different standards the respective States may see fit to adopt for the disposition of unrelated, local problems. Consequently, no far as the meaning of "employee" in this statute is concerned, "the Federal law must prevail no matter what name is given to the interest or right by State law."

The term "employee" should include such workers as newsboys and carriers and must be answered primarily from the history, terms, and purposes of the legislation. The word "should not be treated by Congress as a word of art having a definite meaning * * *." Rather "it should take color from its surroundings * * * (in) the statute where it appears," and derives meaning from the context of that statute, which "must be read in the light of the mischief to be corrected and the end to be attained."

Congress, on the one hand, should not think solely of the immediate technical relation of employer and employee. It should have in mind at least some other persons than those standing in the proximate legal relation of employee to the particular employer involved in the labor dispute. It cannot be taken, however, that the purpose is to include all other persons who may perform service for another or is to ignore entirely legal classifications made for other purposes. Congress should have in mind a wider field than the narrow technical legal relation of "master and servant," as the common law had worked this out in all its variations, and at the same time a narrower one than the entire area of rendering service to others. The question comes down therefore to how much should be included of the intermediate region between what is clearly and unequivocally "employment," by any appropriate test, and what is as clearly entrepreneurial enterprise and not employment.

It will not do, for deciding this question as one of uniform national application, to import wholesale the traditional common-law conceptions or some distilled essence of their local variations as exclusively controlling limitations upon the scope of the statute's effectiveness. To do this would be merely to select some of the local, hairline variations for Nation-wide application and thus to reject others for coverage under the act. That result hardly would be consistent with the statute's broad terms and purposes.

Congress should not seek to solve the nationally harassing problems with which the statute deals by solutions only partially effective. It rather should seek to find a broad solution, one that would bring industrial peace by substituting, so far as its power could reach, the rights of workers to self-organization and collective bargaining for the industrial strife which prevails where these rights are not effectively established. Yet only partial solutions would be provided if large segments of workers about whose technical legal position such local differences exist should be wholly excluded from coverage by reason of such differences. Yet that result could not be avoided, if choice must be made among them and controlled by them in deciding who are "employees" within the act's meaning. Enmeshed in such distinctions, the administration of the statute soon might become encumbered by the same sort of technical legal refinement as has characterized the long evolution of the employee-independent contractor dichotomy in the courts for other purposes. The consequences would be ultimately to defeat, in part at least, the achievement of the statute's objectives. Congress no more intends to import this mass of technicality as a controlling "standard" for uniform national application than to refer decision of the question outright to the local law.

The act, as its first section should state, should be designed to avert the "substantial obstructions to the flow of commerce" which result from "strikes and other forms of industrial strife or unrest" by eliminating the causes of that unrest. It is premised on explicit findings that strikes and industrial strife themselves result in large measure from the refusal of employers to bargain collectively and the inability of individual workers to bargain successfully for improvements in their "wages, hours, or other working conditions" with employers who are "organized in the corporate or other forms of ownership association." Hence the avowed and interrelated purposes of the act are to encourage collective bargaining and to remedy the individual worker's inequality of bargaining power by "protecting the exercise * * * of full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choosing, for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment or other mutual aid or protection."

The mischief at which the act is aimed and the remedies it offers should not be confined exclusively to "employees" within the traditional legal distinctions separating them from "independent contractors." Myriad forms of service relationship, with infinite and subtle variations in the terms of employment, blanket the Nation's economy. Some are within this act, others beyond its coverage. Large numbers will fall clearly on one side or on the other, whatever test may be applied. But intermediate there will be many, the incidents of whose employment partake in part of the one group, in part of the other, in varying proportions of weight. And consequently the legal pendulum, for purposes of applying the statute, may swing one way or the other, depending upon the weight of this balance and its relation to the special purpose at hand.

Unless the common-law tests are to be imported and made exclusively controlling, without regard to the statute's purposes, it cannot be irrelevant that the particular workers in these cases are subject, as a matter of economic fact, to the evils the statute is designed to eradicate and that the remedies it affords are appropriate for preventing them or curing their harmful effects in the special situation. Interruption of commerce through strikes and unrest may stem as well from labor disputes between some who, for other purposes, are technically "independent contractors" and their employers as from disputes between persons who, for those purposes, are "employees" and their employers. Inequality of bargaining power in controversies over wages, hours, and working conditions may as well characterize the status of the one group, as of the other. The former, when acting alone, may be as "helpless in dealing with an employer," as "dependent * * * on his daily wage" and as "unable to leave the employ and to resist arbitrary and unfair treatment" as the latter. For each, "union * * * (may be) essential to give * * * opportunity to deal on equality with their employer." And for each, collective bargaining may be appropriate and effective for the "friendly adjustment of industrial disputes arising out of differences as to wages, hours, or other working conditions." In short, when the particular situation of employment combines these characteristics, so that the economic facts of the relation make it more nearly one of employment than of independent business enterprise with respect to the ends sought to be accomplished by the legislation, those characteristics may outweigh technical legal classification for purposes unrelated to the statute's objectives and bring the relation within its protections.

To eliminate the causes of labor disputes and industrial strife, Congress should create a balance of forces in certain types of economic relationships. These do not embrace simply employment associations in which controversies could be limited to disputes over proper "physical conduct in the performance of the service." On the contrary, Congress should realize those economic relationships cannot be fitted neatly into the containers designated "employee" and "employer" which an earlier law had shaped for different purposes. Its reports on the bill should disclose clearly the understanding that "employers and employees not in proximate relationship may be drawn into common controversies by economic forces," and that the very disputes sought to be avoided might involve "employees (who) are at times brought into an economic relationship with employers who are not their employers." In this light, the broad language of the act's definitions, which in terms reject conventional limitations on such conceptions as "employee," "employer," and "labor dispute," should leave no doubt that its applicability is to be determined broadly, in doubtful situations, by underlying economic facts rather than technically and exclusively by previously established legal classifications. Carriers and newsboys work continuously and regularly, rely upon their earnings for the support of themselves and their families, and have their total wages influenced in large measure by the publishers who dictate their buying and selling prices, fix their markets, and control their supply of papers. Their hours of work and their efforts on the job are supervised and to some extent prescribed by the publishers or their agents. Much of their sales equipment and advertising materials is furnished by the publishers with the intention that it be used for the publisher's benefit. Stating that "the primary consideration in the determination of the applicability of he stautory definition is whether effectuation of the declared policy and purposes of the act comprehend securing to the individual the rights guaranteed and protection afforded by the act."

The common-law tests are irrelevant because when newsboys and carriers services are examined in the light of the purposes of the labor laws, newsboys and carriers are entitled to, and should be under, the protection of those laws.

Newsboys and carriers do not and cannot combine to hurt anyone. Their purpose in organizing their union is only to gain a little better terms for their services. They do not and cannot monopolize anything except the services they perform for the publishers, for they have nothing else to sell. All unions do exactly the same, seek better terms for the services their members perform for their employers. Without such concerted organization and action, they would be helpless and at the mercy of their employers, just exactly as newsboys and carriers are absolutely helpless and at the mercy of the publishers, especially now since the Taft-Hartley Act deliberately legislated these workers out of contractural relationships that have existed for over 60 years.

STATEMENT BY BENJAMIN C. MARSH, SECRETARY, PEOPLE'S LOBBY, INC., WASHINGTON, D. C.

The conception that labor-management relations are confined to which has priority to grab for the consumer's dollar, belongs to the unlamented horse and buggy days.

When the Wagner labor law was enacted, both membership and power of labor unions were relatively small.

The monograph, Collective Bargaining, published in January 1949 by the Public Affairs Institute of Washington, states:

"Over 14,000,000 wage earners belong to unions at the present time in the United States. While this is a smaller proportion of our labor force than organized labor represents in England and Sweden, numerically it constitutes the largest free trade-union membership in world history.

"Other statistics provide a measure of the extent to which this organization of labor has spread throughout the country.

"There are approximately 197 national and international unions with an estimated 60,000 to 70,000 locals. In addition, there are 795 city centrals and 50 State federations of labor maintained by the AFL, as well as 243 city, county, and district councils maintained by the CIO.

"Over two-thirds of the workers employed in manufacturing are covered by collective contracts."

The annual income of labor unions from dues and assessments is estimated at about $500,000,000, of which only a small part is paid in death and sickness benefits.

Since the Wagner labor law was enacted, not only has there been this enormous increase in the number and power of organized labor, but Government has accepted responsibility for maintaining the well-being of all citizens—although it has not yet met that responsibility—from the womb to the tomb.

Among the implications of that acceptance, is the necessity for a new concept of the role of Government—representing all Americans—with respect to the division of the fruits of production, that is income, between owners, workers, consumers and Government, as tax-collector.

Forty years or even 25 years ago, it would not have seemed conceivable that America would have even the present coverage for unemployment benefits, guarantee parity prices for about two-thirds of the value of farm production, would seek billions from the Federal Treasury, to provide help for small business, sometimes as efficient and nearly always as aquisitive as big business, and guarantee big business against commercial losses on foreign transaction, and encourage big business to profiteer, by ending price controls and rationing, and by fostering delayed payments and installment buying, by liberal credit for consumers.

Two facts in the current economic scene are of great importance: (1) We now have a form of controlled capitalism, the controls being for the benefit of capitalists, not of consumers, domestic or foreign; (2) because existing controls of capitalism are for capitalists, not consumers, our economy today is in its most parlous state since the crash of 1929, and only the $15,000,000,000 armament program of the cold war, keeps our economy from a tail spin, while, of course, the longer these cold war expenditures continue, the more probably a hot war.

Under these conditions, American labor's historic role of trying to get a larger cut of the capitalist swag as wages, as its major objective, is clearly out of the window.

A marked exception to this policy, is that of the United Automobile Workers of America to adjust wage rates to the cost of living index.

Government cannot pay unemployment benefits for any length of time or to any large number of people, without controlling location of factories, mines, distributive centers, and so forth, and having something to say about wage rates and where people shall work.

The lush luxury millions of wage earners had during the recent war, due to a judicious distribution of fool's gold, cannot be taken as a permanent status.

No nation in the world is going to rescue America from an economic pit, if we fall into one.

United States News and World Report Newsgram, February 18, 1949 says:

"Farming by 1950, will become a tightly regulated industry; Government by that time, will be up to its neck in ownership of commodities, if weather is normal this year, and will have to do something to control production."

It is equally obvious that by 1950, Government, now flirting with disaster by its cold-war armament program, will have to direct all industrial production to turn this country now rushing to war, to an economy of abundance, for peace.

On March 1 this year by a vote of 10 out of 14 members, the congressional joint committee on the President's Economic Report stated:

"The Government, which is the only instrumentality that can balance the needs of agriculture, industry, and labor, cannot afford to be without a plan.

"Industry plans for the years ahead, and counts among its executives some of the most efficient planners we have. Labor and agriculture likewise plan for the future, but none of these plans has any assurance of successful accomplishment unless they are geared one with another and it is only the Government, as the representatives of all groups, all classes, all callings, that can provide the framework within which each separate group and class and calling can operate.

"Curiously enough, it is only in the economic field that the objection to planning is raised."

Two members of the committee, Senator Ralph E. Flanders, of Vermont, and Representative Christian A. Herter, of Massachusetts, said "we find much on the report with which we can agree," but asked that voluntary allocations of scarce materials be tried longer, and that reduction of expenditures, instead of tax increases "should be more strongly recommended."

Senator Taft, of Ohio, and Congressman Rich, of Pennsylvania, opposed the report.

Of course, real planning involves much public ownership.

Organized labor will have to stop making a whipping boy of the Communists, its top leadership will have to stop trying to get the same salaries and expense accounts as the captains of industry they denounce, and come to an agreement to increase production, and work vigorously to reduce cost of production and all living costs.

To date, organized labor has exerted its political power chiefly to get more economic power, so that by increasing their money income members of labor unions could buy temporary immunity from results of policies, which most labor, supported, or condoned.

The Taft-Hartley law should be amended, and the right of labor papers to oppose or endorse political candidates restored.

The requirement about the Communist affidavit should be repealed unless Catholics also have to report that fact.

It is an open question whether a union should be permitted to get the same wage rate throughout the Nation, because costs of living vary so much.

State and local governments have responsibility for high living costs, as well as the Federal Government, while with the large number of local and State labor organizations, cited earlier, labor should be able to get taxes on buildings transferred to land values, and end profiteering building codes to reduce costs of homes, and rents, and also foster municipal and cooperative markets to help bring down food costs.

A uniform wage rate for a single person, and for a wage earner with several small children to support, seems inequitable.

Competing or duplicating pension systems are both expensive and confusing, and since the Government must assume final responsibility, company plans should not be permitted, as a substitute.

Labor should be compelled to make its accounts public, as many unions do, even if it doesn't have to report expenditures over $10 quarterly, to Congress, as lobbyists have to do.

The Bureau of the Census estimates that in 1950 there will be 11,298,000 persons 65 years and over in continental United States; in 1955, 12,911,000; and in 1960, 14,644,000.

The Federal Security Agency reports that in October 1948 there were 2,469,000 recipients of old-age assistance and forecasts the average case load for the next fiscal year as about 2,550,000 recipients. Of course a large proportion of the aged and of the indigent aged have not been members of organized labor but are as fully entitled to the concern and protection of Government.

Organized labor has its rights but also its responsibilities. It cannot win, or retain, the support of the American people unless it adopts a program for the common good instead of so largely concerning itself with obtaining special opportunities for dues-paying members.

Most Americans need to think of themselves more as citizens not as members of organizations to foster raids on the Federal Treasury or to obtain some special privilege through Government action.

Statement by Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, United States Section, on Labor-Management Relations Legislation

The Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, United States section, believes that a strong and responsible labor movement is necessary in a democracy. The men and women who depend for their livelihood on wages paid to them by an employer must have the right to form their own organizations and to bargain with their employer through representatives of their own choosing. Economic pressure from those who have control over jobs and therefore over people's livelihood must not be allowed to interfere with these basic rights. We also believe that the interest of the general public must be protected in grave industrial disputes.

The following are among the provisions of the present labor law which we disapprove:

(1) Its ban of the closed shop and its restrictions in regard to other union security clauses.

(2) Its featherbedding ban, which threatens guaranteed minimums and the like.

(3) Its absolute ban of jurisdictional strikes and secondary boycotts.

(4) Its provision for mandatory injunctions for an extensive list of newly specified unfair labor practices.

(5) Its ban on political contributions of unions.

(6) Its requirement that union officers file non-Communist affidavits.

(7) Its method of handling national emergency strikes by an 80-day injunction.

We recognize that in the complex and dynamic modern industrial world issues on which labor and management disagree will be recurrent. We conceive such issues to be the field of collective bargaining. We are not unconcerned with the public welfare which is almost always affected adversely when strikes occur. Nevertheless, we hold that the touchstone of labor legislation should be not whether it prevents strikes—an impossible goal in a free society—but whether it protects collective bargaining from obstructions, and at the same time strengthens the instruments of mediation and conciliation. We champion individual freedom, but believe that the best guaranty of such freedom to the industrial worker is the security of his union. The preservation of this freedom, by this means is, in our view, the first public service.

We further hold that our political freedoms are a precious heritage which should be guarded and preserved. We believe that attempts to suppress minority views are futile, dangerous, as well as unconstitutional. We deplore, therefore, the restraint of political rights under the Taft-Hartley Act, and particularly the provision that the right to bargain depends on foreswearing a particular political doctrine

H. R. 2032 has the support of organized labor and is not incompatible with the interests of fair-minded employers. We believe it is a more equitable approach to the isues in the field of labor-management relations than the present law. We believe that H. R. 2032 would safeguard collective bargaining and at the same time provide adequate safeguarding of the public interest. We therefore urge the passage of this legislation.

STATEMENT OF C. C. DICKINSON, CHAIRMAN, COMMITTEE ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS, WEST VIRGINIA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, RELATIVE TO AMENDMENT OF THE LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT

Under date of March 4, 1949, we telegraphed Chairman Lesinski, requesting an opportunity to be heard on the question of repeal of the Taft-Hartley Labor Relations Act and in relation also to amendment generally of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947.

Under date of March 14, Chairman Lesinski replied, describing the difficulties being experienced by the subcommittee in its efforts to hear all those desiring to appear and suggesting that instead of appearing, the West Virginia Chamber of Commerce file a statement which would be placed in the printed record. Not wishing to burden the record, our proposed statement has been very much condensed and is as follows:

(1) The closed shop should remain outlawed. If any form of union shop is permitted, employees should be protected against arbitrary control by unions.

(2) Bona fide supervisory employees should as now, be entirely excluded from the collective bargaining field, the reasons for such exclusion being clear to all students of the problem. Management must be free to manage according to its best judgment.

(3) The public should be protected against concerted activities that have for their purpose violence, secondary boycotts, or any other activity that endangers the public health, safety or welfare.

(4) In rewriting the labor-management law, consideration should be given to the imposition of restraints upon the monopolistic practices of unions, conspicuously illustrated by current procedures of the United Mine Workers of America. Such practices can only be restrained by making labor unions and their leaders subject to the same antitrust laws which govern business and individuals engaged in business. It would seem to be self-evident that powerful labor organizations should have equality with other organizations and citizens under such laws, such equality to include equal responsibilities as well as equal rights.

We regret that the busy schedule of your subcommittee has prevented Chairman Lesinski from granting our request for a personal appearance, and thank you for such consideration as you may give the above statement.

Statement by New York Board of Mediation Relative to New Federal Labor Law

NOTICE TO STATE AGENCIES OF EXISTENCE OF DISPUTE

Section 8 (d) of National Labor Relations Act, as amended by the Taft-Hartley law, provides that no party shall terminate or modify a contract unless it serves a 60-day notice on the other party and, among other requirements, "notifies the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service within 30 days after such notice of the existence of a dispute, and simultaneously therewith notifies any State or Territorial agency established to mediate and conciliate disputes within the State or Territory where the dispute occurred, provided no agreement has been reached by that time. * * *

Section 108 of the administration bill provides for notification of contract termination or modification to the United States Conciliation Service. However, no provision is made for notification to an active State mediation agency.

We urge that if notice of a contract termination or modification to a Federal conciliation agency is required by the new legsiation, then simultaneous notice to an active state mediation agency should also be required for the following reasons:

(a) State mediation agencies are performing an important and essential part of the dispute settlement work in many of the largest industrial States:

In 1947 State mediation agencies handled 9,025 mediation cases whereas the Federal Service handled 11,338. With respect to arbitration cases, the State agencies handled 1,939, the Federal Service only 686. State agencies intervened in 1,184 strikes and the Federal Service in 2,113.

(b) The notices to States have enabled these agencies to increase their ability to handle and settle disputes within their jurisdiction.

The case load of the New York State Board increased during the last 3 years as follows: 1946, 643; 1947, 1,181; 1948, 1,522. In addition, the New York State Board handled 1,500 arbitration cases in 1948.

(c) Mediation is a voluntary, not a law-enforcing, process. The jurisdiction of State agencies, meaning the area in which their voluntary services are offered, involves a substantial number of businesses which are engaged in interstate commerce. State agencies, through continued receipt of dispute notices, can continue to offer their services to employers and unions well before the termination date has been reached.

We suggest that if the notice requirement of the administration bill is retained, it be amended to read:

"It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer or a labor organization to terminate or modify a collective-bargaining contract covering employees in an industry affecting commerce, unless the party desiring such termination or modification notifies the United States Conciliation Service, and simultaneously notifies any active State or Territorial agency established to mediate and conciliate disputes within the State or Territory where that dispute occurred, of the proposed termination or modification 30 days prior to the expiration date of the contract, or 30 days prior to the time it is proposed to make such termination or modification.

DEFINING AREA WITHIN WHICH FEDERAL SERVICE SHOULD NOT OFFER FACILITIES

The Taft-Hartley law (sec. 203 (b)) provides: "The Director and the Service are directed to avoid attempting to mediate disputes which would have only a minor effect on interstate commerce if State or other conciliation services are available to the parties."

The administration bill (sec. 202 (a)) carries no such stipulation, but simply states: "The Director is authorized to establish suitable procedures for cooperation with State and local mediation agencies and to enter into agreements with such State and local mediation agencies relating to the mediation of labor disputes whose effects are predominately local in character."

We urge that this section of the administration bill be amended to read:

"The Director is authorized to establish suitable procedures for cooperation with State and local mediation agencies and to enter into agreements with such State and local mediation agencies. The Director shall avoid attempting to mediate disputes which would have only a minor effect on interstate commerce if State or other conciliation services are available to the parties."

We believe this amendment should be adopted in the interest of preserving cooperative arrangements and agreements which have already been established between the State and Federal services and which are working satisfactorily to both agencies and to the parties concerned.

For instance, the Director of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service has stated in his first annual report:

"As this report is written both agencies are well pleased with its operations. The New York agreement represents a great stride forward in State-Federal relations, and the Service will earnestly strive to achieve, in those few States where equally satisfactory cooperative agreements have not yet been worked out, the same relations of mutual confidence, respect, and cooperation which exist in New York."

A Brief in Support of Certain Provisions Essential to a Sound Labor Law, by Benjamin Werne, Adjunct Professor of Industrial Relations, Graduate School of Business Administration, New York University; Member of the New York Bar

The purpose of this brief is to urge the continuance of certain provisions of the present national labor law because they define the responsibilities of unions as well as of management, equalize those responsibilities, and provide for adequate Government authority to protect the national health and safety from labor disputes which threaten them.

If unions are capable of abuse, as the record shows they are, appropriate measures should be available to remedy the abuses. Unions have achieved their present power through the aid of the Wagner Act. Their exercise of that power should be subject to law when it exceeds or threatens to exceed permissible limits.

The purpose of this brief is, also, to attempt to bring into focus situations which, in much of the present discussion of labor policy, are veiled in vagueness and uncertainty.

Typical of this vagueness are the assertions made regarding the President's power to act in the case of strikes which affect the national welfare. That "no President would permit the economy of the country to come to its knees" is an assertion without substance. It does not establish the right of the President to deal effectively with a situation under the Federal Constitution and statutes. It is at best a hope and at worst an evasion. And as such, it gives a false sense of security against the menace of labor disputes of such scope as to threaten the Nation.

This brief is intended to prove that the limited experience with the present law demonstrates the soundness of certain of its provisions, and to answer those who have characterized this legislation as a slave-labor law.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

1. Unions and their agents should be responsible for their unfair labor practices.—The Wagner Act recognized only unfair labor practices by management.

The present law holds also unions and their agents responsible for their unfair labor practices.

The President's bill eliminates this responsibility of labor unions and reverts to the Wagner Act except as to strikes and secondary boycotts in jurisdictional disputes, or to compel disregard of a Board certification, of an order to bargain, or of a recognized union.

Provisions of the present National Labor Relations Act, making unions responsive for unfair labor practices, have been denounced as a "slave labor" law.

However, the record shows that as a result of the impact of court decisions and public opinion, techniques for checking abuses committed in the course of labor disputes were developed under the Wagner Act.

Strikers who were discharged claimed before the Labor Board that their employers thereby violated the Wagner Act and that they should be reinstated to their jobs. If the Board found that the strikers had committed any of a variety of wrongful actions, they lost their claims to reinstatement.

No cry of labor enslavement was raised. No charge was made that the rights of self-organization or collective bargaining were being destroyed.

Many of these cases reasonably suggest that the unions, too, were responsible for the wrongful conduct of the strikers. The unions, however, were shielded from responsibility because, under the Wagner Act, the Board could proceed only against employers for their unfair labor practices.

This method to deter wrongful contract is plainly insufficient. The wrongdoing strikers escaped responsibility if they did not file unfair labor practice charges against their employer. Even if they did file such charges, no remedy was available to assure that the wrongful acts would not recur. And, in no event, could unions be held responsible even if they instigated or participated in the wrongful conduct because unfair labor practice charges could not be filed against them.

The present law places responsibility where it justly should rest—upon the unions themselves.

The responsibility of unions for unfair labor practices established under present law imposes no enslaving burdens. It levies no fines, penalties, or forfeitures. Its purpose is to provide for relief from unfair practices and prevent their recurrence rather than to penalize the offenders.

These provisions do not in any sense make for labor slavery.

2. The tyranny of the closed shop should not be revived.—Under the Wagner Act the closed shop was encouraged and the right to remain unaffiliated with a union was discouraged.

The present law, in barring the closed shop, recognizes and sanctions the right of any employee to join a union, and equally recognizes his right not to be coerced into union affiliation except in the event of a duly certified union shop.

The President's bill eliminates the ban on the closed shop and has the effect of restoring it and all the evils which must follow upon such restrictions against the right to work.

The present statute outlaws the closed shop. The union shop is permissible if the requirements of the statute are satisfied. When the union shop is authorized, employees may not be subject to discriminatory treatment by union organizers in obtaining union membership. They are entitled to membership upon payment of the regular initiation fees and dues. Excessive fees are barred. Discharges under a union shop clause can occur only for nonpayment of initiation fees and periodic dues.

The unions claim that an unregulated closed shop is essential to their existence. Union leaders fail to cite a single instance of the death of a labor organization because of the present ban against the closed shop.

Unions have achieved growth more by reason of the effective exercise of their function and authority as collective-bargaining representatives which has been enforced and broadened by law, rather than by reason of the monopoly of the closed shop.

As firm a supporter of labor as the late Mr. Justice Brandeis regarded the closed shop as "the exchange of the tyranny of the employer for the tyranny of the employees."

A return to absolute union control over hiring is unwarranted particularly at a time of growing union political activity. Being able to attain assurance of financial payments by all employees in the bargaining unit in support of its functions through the present union-shop provision, the union should depend on its effectiveness as collective bargaining representative rather than on its economic power over the employees. The closed shop has been used to interfere with political freedom, to aid racial discrimination, to suppress fair criticism, to punish for testifying and taking court action against the union and to penalize employees for activities on behalf of a rival union prior to the effective date of the closed shop and for activity on behalf of a rival union upon the expiration of a contract. This does constitute labor slavery.

3. Secondary boycotts and jurisdictional strikes should be restrained.—The Wagner Act afforded no relief from these weapons employed by some unions to compel compliance with their wishes.

The present law bans such coercive practices.

The President's bill forbids secondary boycotts only in the case of jurisdictional strikes, or in defiance of a Labor Board certification or a validly existing contract without provision for injunction.

The present law makes secondary boycotts and jurisdictional strikes unfair labor practices. The Labor Board has the right to obtain Federal court injunction against such conduct pending a final determination of the case by the Labor Board.

Secondary boycotts have caused serious economic injury to the public welfare and persons having no interest in the dispute. Small business particularly has been a victim of such conduct because of its inability to cope with powerful unions.

Speedy and effective Government intervention through the Labor Board's application to the Federal courts for an injunction is essential to limit economic loss and prevent the spread of industrial warfare. While the statute creates a private right to recover money damages against the offending union, the loss in most instances is irreparable. Because injunctive relief cannot be invoked by private parties themselves, the remedy is not subject to abuse. The remedy of injunction under the present law is available only to the government.

The unions claim that the curb on secondary boycotts marks a return to Government by injunction.

What does the record of 18 months of such restriction actually show?

In the first 6 months of operation of the law, the Board filed nine petitions in Federal courts to enjoin secondary boycotts. For the 18-month period, approximately 18 such applications were made and in 4 of these cases, injunctions were denied.

Actually, the ban against secondary boycott is of limited effect on the union's right to engage in industrial warfare. Direct strikes against the immediate employer for recognition or economic reasons are not affected. To constitute a violation of existing law, the union must strike against the secondary employer or induce his employees to cease work. If the primary employer subcontracts his work to the latter, a strike against the subcontractor is not prohibited by the statute and both employers are regarded as allies in the principal dispute, and therefore legitimately subject to boycott.

The jurisdictional strike over assignment of work and the strike or boycott to force a disregard of the Labor Board's certificate of a bargaining representative cannot be justified. The President's labor Bill would ban such union action. An employer who yields to the union's pressure and defies a Board certification violates the law. Yet, compliance with the Labor Board's certification may be fatal to his business because of the economic pressure directed by a rival union.

There is no element of slave labor in prohibiting such union conduct.

4. Unions, as well as management, should be obligated to bargain collectively in good faith.—The Wagner Act made it mandatory that management bargain in good faith. Management refusal to do so resulted in a cease-and-desist order.

The present law also imposes the same obligation on unions—no more, no less.

The President's bill, by eliminating this requirement, reverts to the one-sidedness of the Wagner Act.

Collective bargaining contemplates that both parties shall meet and negotiate to the end that a meeting of minds shall be achieved. If either management or labor goes to the bargaining table with a mind "hermetically" sealed against agreement, no agreement can be reached.

If a union may submit demands on a "take it or leave it" basis, backed by a threat of strike action, the basic objective of the law is defied; since the law was designed to encourage collective bargaining as a substitute for strike action.

Once the labor agreement is entered into, the law today relieves the parties of the obligation to discuss modification during the contract term unless the agreement provides for such reconsideration. Both parties are thereby equally bound during the life of the agreement. In this manner stability in industrial relations, wages, hours, and terms of employment is secured. Manifestly, the parties are at liberty to modify their agreement by mutual consent.

The law further encourages recourse to the peaceful procedure of collective bargaining before either side may turn to industrial warfare. It provides 60 days' notice of intention to modify or terminate an expiring contract, and requires the parties to meet and negotiate for a new agreement during that time without strike or lock-out.

This is not a condition of slave labor.

5. Management should retain the right to speak freely.—Under the Wagner Act, while management nominally enjoyed its constitutional prerogative of free speech, the hazard of talking was exceedingly great. As a result, management was substantially silenced.

The present law protects the right of management and union to speak freely so long as there is no threat of reprisal or force and no promise of benefit.

The President's bill eliminates this protection.

There is no question that employees and unions enjoy the right to speak freely—a right guaranteed by the Wagner Act and a constitutional right of all Americans, mandatory under the Bill of Rights. The same right is now recognized for management, not by virtue of a Labor Board ruling or a court decision but by the express language of the statute.

The law must not be altered to permit the impairment of this right. If unions are to continue, as well they should, with the right to speak freely, it is imperative that any fair labor law must grant the same right to management.

Even labor spokesmen have conceded that adequate protection of management's right of free speech is essential. Judge Padway, one of the foremost lawyers representing labor, pointed out in the official organ of the American Federation of Labor that if labor unions and their members desire to retain the full benefits of freedom of speech, the same privileges must in nowise be denied management.

The Supreme Court has recognized that the right of free speech should be exercised by management with respect to union organization.

While it is true that during the latter days of the Wagner Act the Labor Board broadened the scope of employers' right to speak to employees on labor matters, it repeatedly restricted this constitutional right whenever in its judgment it saw fit so to do. The specific assurance granted management in the existing law should be retained. It should be made crystal clear that no administrative denial of a fundamental privilege will be permitted so long as the privilege is not abused.

This is not a condition of slave labor.

6. The ranks of management should not be divided by compelling bargaining with supervisory employees.—The Wagner Act compelled management to bargain collectively with supervisors.

The present law, recognizing supervisors as part of management, does not obligate management to bargain collectively with them unless it wishes to do so.

The President's bill would restore supervisors' right to compel collective bargaining.

Foremen and other supervisory employees are the "arms and legs" of management and its direct contact with employees in the execution of labor policies and the administration of the labor contract. They must be consulted in order to prepare properly for collective-bargaining negotiations with the union. Complete loyalty to management is an essential ingredient of their jobs.

Management is responsible for the illegal antiunion conduct of supervisors. Even when they have violated instructions not to engage in such conduct, management has been held liable. This responsibility has been imposed on management when employees may reasonably conclude that the conduct of its supervisors represents the attitude of management.

Mandatory collective bargaining with supervisory employees disturbs the traditional balance of power in the bargaining process. Experience under the Wagner Act shows that, just as soon as supervisory employees were granted bargaining rights, unions representing rank-and-file employees organized the supervisors in affiliated unions. Thus, the unions representing the rank-and-file employees were in a position to exert pressure upon management's representative and place in jeopardy the trust and loyalty which constitute an integral part of the supervisory job.

The self-interest of supervisory employees, who attain a place in management on the basis of complete loyalty, must be subordinated to the paramount interest of establishing confidence and fair play in the collective-bargaining process between management and unions representing the rank-and-file employees.

7. Management should retain the right to petition for elections; employees should retain the right to terminate a union's authority.—The Wagner Act made no such provisions. The Labor Board permitted employer petitions only when two or more unions claiming to represent the same employees demanded bargaining rights of the employer. The Board refused to entertain petitions by employees to revoke the authority of a bargaining representative.

The present law authorizes an employer to file a petition for election, and employees may petition for revocation of authority of an existing bargaining representative.

The President's bill reverts to the situation under the Wagner Act.

The present law permits an employer to file a petition for certification of bargaining representative when he has been presented with a claim for recognition by a union. Union representatives claim that an unscrupulous employer can, by this provision, compel an election before the union is ready for it.

This claim overlooks the fact that an employer cannot file a petition until the union has served him with a demand for bargaining rights. By withholding the demand until it is ready for an election, the union avoids the danger of a premature election.

The existing statute also provides for the decertification of a recognized or certified union upon the petition of employees. This procedure, whereby employees may definitely terminate the authority of the bargaining representative, is said to be in conflict with the policy of encouraging collective bargaining. The essence of free collective bargaining, however, is freedom of choice to designate bargaining representatives on the part of employees.

Under the Wagner Act, the employees had no means for terminating the authority of a bargaining representative unless a petition for certification was filed by another union. The Labor Board ruled that it had no power to entertain decertification petitions and could not conduct an election for that purpose. As a result employees, who desired to terminate their bargaining representative, were without relief unless they had selected another union to act in their behalf. This "slave" labor provision was cured by the present law.

If the employees failed to designate a new bargaining representative and the labor contract was renewed pursuant to its provision or by agreement, they were saddled with the rejected representative for the period of the new contract because that contract prevented a newly designated representative from being certified by the Board. In effect, then, an unwanted union remained as bargaining representative and the employee's freedom of choice was ignored. Emancipation of slave labor was here accomplished under the present law.

8. Unions, as well as management, should be liable for breach of contract.—The Wagner Act made no provision for liability in the case of a breach of contract by a union.

Under the present law, unions which have entered into labor contracts may be sued for breach thereof. The union membership, however, is shielded from any personal liability for damages for breach of the contract.

The President's bill, by its repeal of the present law, reverts to a one-sided standard.

The present law provides that a union may be sued as an entity for its violations of a labor contract. This provision recognizes the unreality of the laws of many States, which make it difficult effectively to sue or to recover a judgment against a labor union because most of the unions are unincorporated associations and not subject to suit at common law.

The existing law, taking cognizance of court decisions that collective bargaining, even under the Wagner Act, is not a unilateral undertaking binding only upon the employer, makes contracts binding upon both parties by giving them equal access to remedies for a breach by the other party.

The Labor Board has visited responsibility upon employees, who strike in violation of a no-strike clause, by denying them the right to reinstatement if the employer discharges them. The present law permits the union to be held responsible if it caused the violation of the contract.

9. The President should have power to invoke restraints on strikes involving national welfare.—The Wagner Act made no provision with respect to strikes affecting the national health and safety.

The present law recognizes the right of Government to intervene when strikes threaten the national health or safety. The President has the power to convene a fact-finding board and the courts by injunction may delay for 80 days a strike constituting a national emergency, upon application of the Attorney General, acting at the direction of the President. The 80-day injunction period is utilized to permit further study by the fact-finding board, publication of its report and holding of an election by the Labor Board among the employees as to whether they wish to accept the employer's last offer of settlement.

The President's bill provides only for the appointment of an "emergency board" and the publication of its findings and recommendations. No provision is made for the Government's right to obtain an injunction.

That some remedies must be available to protect the Nation from the danger of strikes affecting national health and safety is acknowledged even by the proponents of the President's bill.

There were no such provisions in the Wagner Act; there are no effective ones in the President's bill. The present law, on the other hand, specifically recognizes the Government's right to intervene in strikes of such broad effect and grave implications, and provides specific means for dealing with them. These means might be improved upon; they should not be eliminated.

In lieu of specifically granting the President power to invoke restraints, through the Attorney General, the President's bill would leave such restraints to some vague undefined implicit authority. To some, the power is apparently a constitutional grant (grant not defined or described); to some it is the power of public opinion; to some a metaphysical assumption that the President "could not" fail to find a means to halt such a strike.

In view of the strict limitations imposed upon the granting of injunctions in labor disputes by the Norris-La Guardia Act which would probably bar an injunction, unless an employer-employee relationship existed between the Government and the strikers, such uncertain and evasive authority should not be relied upon. The specific provisions of the present law should be retained.

10. Welfare funds should be trust funds, jointly administered by management and union representatives.—The Wagner Act did not provide any standards of conduct with respect to such welfare funds.

The present law requires that payments by employers to union representatives for insurance, pensions, and other specified employee benefits should be held as trust funds and be jointly administered by union and management representatives, subject to resolution of any deadlock by a neutral third party designated by them or by the Federal court.

The President's bill is silent on the subject, discards all safeguards for the proper use of the funds, and leaves the parties to industrial warfare if they cannot agree.

Accumulation of large amounts of money in union welfare funds, and the prospect of establishment of more such funds as a result of the widening of the area of mandatory collective bargaining to include employee insurance and pensions, create increasingly tempting possibilities of abuse of such funds.

To protect the intended beneficiaries of welfare funds, and to assure that administration of the accumulations shall not be perverted to seize and maintain union control over employees or to stifle democratic processes within unions, the present law requires that welfare funds (1) shall be trust funds, (2) shall be administered jointly by management and union representatives.

11. Benefits of the act should be denied to Communist-dominated unions.—The Wagner Act contained no provision directed at the elimination of Communist control of labor unions.

Under present law unions cannot file a petition for certification as collective-bargaining representatives, and cannot file unfair-labor-practice charges, unless the officials of the local union and its international affiliates have filed affidavits that they are not Communists.

The President's bill, by omitting any reference to communism, invites the return of Communists to dominant positions in national and local unions.

The present requirement of the non-Communist affidavit, while a move in the proper direction, is still markedly inadequate. The attitude of the Labor Board, in treating the filed affidavit as conclusive, permits evasion by the changing of the titles of Communist officers. Since the objectives of the regulation are beyond criticism, the requirements for compliance should be strengthened. Communist-dominated labor organizations should not be entitled to the benefit of the full force of Government aid.

ARGUMENT

1. Unions and their agents should be responsible for their unfair labor practices.—The present National Labor Relations Act defines certain unfair labor practices by unions and their agents and holds them responsible for the elimination of such conduct.[1] The unions are now responsible for violation of the labor contract and for damages caused by certain of their strikes and secondary boycotts.[2] A standard of conduct with respect to payments received by union officials from employers for the benefit of employees is established.[3]

These provisions have been denounced by union officials as destructive of the right of employees to self-organization, to join unions and to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing.[4]

[2] Labor-Management Relations Act, secs. 301, 303.
[3] Labor-Management Relations Act, sec. 302.
[4] The President's new labor bill rejects these views in these respects: Secondary boycotts and strikes to compel employer disregard of a Board certification or a valid existing labor contract and over assignment of work (jurisdictional disputes) are unfair labor practices by unions.

The record shows, however, that a system of checks and balances on abuses by unions has not been destructive of industrial democracy. By reason of the pressure of court decisions and public opinion, an indirect and uncertain method for discouraging some union excesses was developed under the Wagner Act.

Long before the enactment of the present law, employees who sought the benefits of the Wagner Act themselves or through their unions by filing unfair labor practice charges against employers, were denied relief because they engaged in certain illegal conduct during the course of a labor dispute. Thus, sitdown strikers were subject to discharge and not entitled to reinstatement.[5] Strikers whose conduct amounted to violation of the laws against mutiny on board ship were not returned to their jobs.[6] Strikers who engaged in violence or threats thereof against persons and property were also held subject to discharge.[7] Employees who struck to compel an employer to violate the National Wage Stabilization Laws were denied reinstatement.[8] The reinstatement remedy was also withheld from employees who violated the no-strike provisions of the labor contract.[9] Employees who engaged in a strike to compel an employer to disregard the Board's certification of a union as bargaining representative were denied the protection of the Wagner Act and not reinstated.[10]

In some cases, denial of the benefits of the Wagner Act could be more directly applied to a wrongdoing union. Fraud and violence in obtaining membership could vitiate the union's majority status so that it could not obtain an order compelling an employer to bargain collectively with it.[11] Nationally affiliated unions that received from an employer, illegal aid and assistance in organizing, were denied the right to represent the employees unless and until they were certified by the Board.[12] Any labor contract obtained by such illegally assisted unions was declared void. Unions that received the assistance of supervisors in organizing employees could not petition for an election, and if successful at an election it was set aside, nor could they obtain an order of the Board compelling an employer to bargain collectively with them.[13]

Did these restraints enslave labor? Did they impair the right of employees to self-organization, to join unions and to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing?

If unions are capable of engaging in abuses, as experience shows they are, that fact should be faced forthrightly and appropriate remedies for such conduct should be available. The inadequacy of a system of correcting wrongful conduct by merely withholding remedies under the law is plain. It does not provide against recurrence of the abuse or permit the application of appropriate measure to remedy the wrong. Furthermore, the question can be raised only if the wrongdoers—the union employees or the union—file charges of unfair labor practices against the employer.

Many of the decisions withholding the benefits of the Wagner Act from wrongdoing union employees, reasonably suggest that the unions involved were in a measure equally responsible for the wrongful conduct. The suggestion is also apparent in cases where the wrongdoer was found to be the employer. For example, where the union causes an employer to discharge employees under a closed-shop contract because of their activity on behalf of a rival labor organization prior to the effective date of the closed shop contract, it participates in conduct which constitutes the unfair labor practices on the part of the employer.[14]

Another situation of joint wrongdoing occurs where an employer and a union, not representing a majority of the employees, collusively enter into a closed-shop contract, and the employer, upon request of the union, discharges employees because of their failure or refusal to join that union.[15] Both union an employer participate in conduct which constitutes coercion of employees in the free choice of bargaining representative, and in discriminatory discharge.

Yet, in all these cases, the Wagner Act shielded the wrongdoing union from responsibility and prevented an investigation of the facts to determine whether the union involved was in any way responsible because under that law unfair labor practice charges could be filed, and the Board could proceed, against employers only.

By defining the conduct of unions which constitutes unfair labor practices and providing for appropriate remedies to deter them, the existing law permits responsibility for the abuses to be placed where the facts of each case show that it should justly rest.

The point is aptly illustrated by the recent decision of the Labor Board in the Sunset Line & Twine Company case.[16] There, strikers threatened nonstrikers with bodily harm; a greatly outnumbered group of nonstrikers were trailed for a considerable distance away from the plant by an inimical superior force of strikers thereby clearly conveying a threat of a bodily injury; the strikers barred ingress to the plant and threatened those who attempted to enter with physical violence. Under the Wagner Act the question of discouraging such conduct might arise in this fashion: The strikers or their union would first have to file charges with the Labor Board against the employer claiming that he discriminated against them because of their union activity. If such discrimination was found to have occurred, the Board would then consider whether the illegal conduct of the strikers constituted violence of an aggravated character [17] so as to require denying the strikers reinstatement or other relief appropriate to remedy discrimination by an employer. The question of union participation in the unlawful conduct of the strikers would not be considered at all, and in no event could responsibility be placed upon the union. Only the strikers could be required to bear the consequences of their illegal conduct by withholding from them the remedies of the statute. However, under the present law, the Labor Board can examine into the question of union responsibility for the illegal conduct because unfair labor practice charges can be filed against the union. In the case cited, the Labor Board found that the union's business agent planned and directed the strike (which was lawful) but instigated and participated in the illegal conduct of the strikers. Thus, responsibility was placed upon the union and its agent and an appropriate order issued against them.

In another recent case, the Labor Board also examined a union's responsibility for illegal conduct of strikers and there found that the union was not responsible for such activities of the strikers.[18]

The unfair-labor practices by unions and their agents are defined in section 8 (b) of the present act. The use of restraint and coercion by unions to compel employees to join their ranks and activities is proscribed. This restriction was enacted to eliminate "physical violence and intimidation by unions or their representatives as well as the use by unions of threats of economic action against specific individuals in an effort to compel them to join." [19] The Labor Board has held that this restriction on coercive union conduct does not by itself limit the right of unions to strike. The Board said,[20]

"Congress primarily intended to proscribe coercive conduct which sometimes accompanies a strike, but not the strike itself. * * * Congress sought to fix the rules of the game, to insure that strikes and other organizing activities of employees were conducted peaceably by persuasion and propaganda and not by physical force or threats of force, or of economic reprisal."

The remedy applicable for the unfair-labor practice of restraint and coercion by unions is to order the offenders to cease and desist from restraining and coercing the employees in the exercise of their right to refrain from union

[15] See Louis F. Cassoff (43 N. L. R. B. 1193, enforced 139 F. (2d) 397). In the case cited, the contract also provided for a compulsory check-off of dues in favor of the contracting union that received the benefit of the illegal assistance. The employer is ordered, in such a situation, not only to pay back pay to the discharged employees but also to reimburse all the employees for dues checked off on behalf of the union.

activities and, affirmatively, to post notices of compliance.[21] For an illegal refusal to bargain collectively with an employer, for causing an employer to discriminate against employees, for secondary boycott and jurisdictional strikes, for imposing excessive fees as a condition precedent to union membership when there is a valid union-shop agreement in effect, and for featherbedding, unions are subject to appropriate cease-and-desist orders which may direct that they refrain from such illegal conduct and prescribe affirmative action to be taken by them in order to effectuate the policies of the act.[22] Such affirmative action may require the union, in appropriate cases, to bargain collectively with an employer, to pay back pay to employees who have suffered loss of pay on account of discriminatory discharges caused by the union, or to reimburse an employer to the extent that he had been compelled to pay for featherbedding, and to post notices of compliance.[23]

These remedies, to be applied in case of union unfair-labor practices, follow the pattern of remedies applicable to employers for unfair-labor practices committed in violation of section 8 (a) of the amended act. Such remedies when applied to employers have been held reasonable.

In Republic Steel Corp. v. NLRB,[24] the Supreme Court said—

"We think that affirmative action to 'effectuate the policies of this act' is action to achieve the remedial objectives which the act sets forth. Thus the employer may be required not only to end his unfair labor practices; he may also be directed affirmatively to recognize an organization which is found to be the duly chosen bargaining representatives of his employees; he may be ordered to cease particular methods of interference, intimidation, or coercion, to stop recognizing and to disestablish a particular labor organization which he dominates or supports, to restore and make whole employees who have been discharged in violation of the act, to give appropriate notice of his compliance with the Board's order, and otherwise to take such action as will assure to his employees the rights which the statute undertakes to safeguard. These are all remedial measures." [Italics added.]

By the same token, they are, manifestly, equally remedial and reasonable when applied to unfair labor practices by unions.

Furthermore, the unions, like employers, have an additional safeguard against the imposition of unreasonable restraints because they have been found guilty of an unfair labor practice. The order issued against them must be restricted to the violation found by the Labor Board to have been committeed; general cease and desist orders are invalid. For example, if a union is found guilty of an illegal refusal to bargain collectively with an employer, it cannot be ordered to stop restraining and coercing employees in the exercise of their right to refrain from union activity unless there is proof of danger that it will engage in such conduct or that the illegal refusal to bargain is related to restraint and coercion of the employees. The Supreme Court established this principle under the Wagner Act when it said :[25]

[22] Amended act, sec. 10 (c).

[23] Requiring an employer to pay back pay on account of a discriminatory discharge has been sustained as reasonable. In Social Security Board v. Nierotko (327 U. S. 364, 365), the court said, "'Back pay' is not a fine or penalty imposed on the employer by the Board." It follows that requiring unions to pay back pay when they have caused a discriminatory discharge is also reasonable.

[24] 311 U. S. 7, 12.

"We hold only that the National Labor Relations Act does not give the Board an authority, which courts cannot rightly exercise, to enjoin violations of all the provisions of the statute merely because the violation of one has been found. To justify an order restraining other violations it must appear that they bear some resemblance to that which the employer has committed or that danger of their commission in the future is to be anticipated from the course of his conduct in the past."

The amended act empowers the Labor Board to issue orders against unions requiring them to cease and desist from the specified unfair labor practices and to take affirmative action to remedy such conduct, and to secure enforcement of such orders by the United States Court of Appeals.[26] Such a grant of authority does not authorize the Board to impose penalties upon unions for the purpose of compelling them to stop unfair labor practices.[27] The Supreme Court has said that "The power to command affirmative action is remedial, not punitive."[28] Thus, it is abundantly clear that the administrators of the present law cannot impose fines, penalties, or forfeitures on unions because they have engaged in unfair labor practices.

For all of the foregoing reasons, the charge that the existing act is a "slave labor law," because unions are made responsible for the specific unfair labor practices, is completely unfounded. The provisions subjecting them to remedial sanctions for abuses defined as unfair labor practices should be continued in full force.

2. The tyranny of the closed shop should not be revived.—The closed shop is outlawed by the present statute.[29] A union shop is permissible if the requirements of the act are satisfied.[30] If the union shop is authorized and that type of agreement executed by the employer and the union, the employees who are not members of the union must become members of the union 30 days after the effective date of the agreement or forfeit their jobs. But they cannot lose their jobs because of failure to join the union, if union membership was not made available to them on the same terms and conditions generally applicable to members. They cannot be subject to discriminatory treatment in order to become union members. Nor can they be required to pay excessive fees as a condition for acquiring union membership.[31] Employees can be deprived of their jobs under the union shop only for nonpayment of union initiation fees and periodic dues.[32] Disagreement with the views or position of the union or its officials on any subject cannot result in the loss of their jobs.

The unions claim that these regulations cripple them and threaten their existence. They assert that an unregulated and unrestricted closed shop is necessary if unions are to survive at all.

The record amply demonstrates that these claims are erroneous.

Union leaders fail to cite a single instance where the present ban against the closed shop has been fatal to a labor union.

The growth of unions during the past 50 years has been notable. Mr. Justice Frankfurter in a concurring opinion sustaining the constitutionality of State bans against the closed shop[33] pointed out :

"In the past 50 years the total number employed, counting salaried workers and the self-employed but not farmer or farm laborers, has not quite trebled, while total union membership has increased more than 33 times; at the time of the open-shop drive following the First World War, the ratio of organized to unorganized nonagricultural workers was about 1 to 9, and now it is almost 1 to 3."[34]

During the last war, unions thrived upon maintenance-of-union-membership clauses and other forms of union security provisions less monopolistic than the closed shop. Union growth has been achieved, rather, through laws which protected and supported the union's principal function, namely, to act as bargaining representative of employees, and widened the scope of activity in that capacity.

Under the present law, as under the Wagner Act, that authority of the union cannot be undermined by an employer or dissident groups of employees. It has exclusive power and authority to bargain collectively with the employer with respect to wages, hours, and terms and conditions of employment, and recognition of its rights in that regard is mandatory. Individual employment contracts between employer and employees must give way to this bargaining authority of the union.[35] The employer is powerless to alter conditions of employment without its consent.[36] Nor can he undercut its authority as bargaining representative.[37] An employer cannot yield to the voluntary requests of employees to ignore their bargaining representative and agree with them on wages.[38]

Even the rights of the employees to affect the status of the union as bargaining representative is limited. Once they granted such authority at a Labor Board election, the employees under the Wagner Act could not revoke it for a reasonable period (normally 1 year) from the date of the Board's certification of the union.[39] Under the present law no election can be conducted during the 12-month period following the last valid election conducted by the Board.[40] Employees cannot secure adjustment of their grievance in a manner inconsistent with the existing labor contract and the union is entitled to an opportunity to be present when individual grievances are adjusted.[41] Employees cannot obtain a "free ride" by refusing to pay toward the union's financial obligations, because if a valid union-shop agreement is entered into by the employer and the union, they are subject to discharge for nonpayment of initiation fees and regular dues.

In addition to these bulwarks of its authority, the field for the exercise of union power as bargaining representative has recently been held to include merit increases, insurance benefits, and pensions and retirement plans.[42]

As stanch a friend of labor as Mr. Justice Brandeis vigorously championed "the objections—legal, economic, and social—against the closed shop" and regarded it as "the exchange of the tyranny of the employer for the tyranny of the employees."[43]

[43] Concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Frankfurter, AFL v. Sash & Door Co. (93 L. Ed. 209).

A union's strength and growth should depend on its ability to persuade allegiance on the basis of effective performance of its primary function as bargaining representative rather than on power to compel obedience by reason of economic monopoly over jobs. A return to absolute union control over hiring is not warranted by the record, particularly at a time of vigorous union political activity. Though professedly used for democratic purposes, there is substantial evidence that the concentrated power of the closed shop has been arbitrarily employed. The record shows that such power has been used:

(1) To interfere with political freedom.[44]

(2) To aid racial discrimination.[45]

(3) To suppress fair criticism.[46]

(4) To punish for attacking an allegedly unlawful contract.[47]

(5) To punish for testifying against the union.[48]

(6) To punish for activites on behalf of another union prior to the effective date of the closed shop.[49]

(7) To punish for activity on behalf of a rival at the expiration of the closed-shop contract.[50]

(8) To fraudulently deprive employees of their jobs.[51]

Theoretically, the victim of arbitrary use of the closed shop may have recourse to the courts to test the validity of his expulsion from the union and the loss of his job. Practically, and in most instances, he is reluctant to press the issue in court and lacks the financial resources to do so. He may have difficulty enough finding a job if he is in an industry or community highly organized by the same union or its affiliates.

3. Secondary boycotts and jurisdictional strikes should be restrained.

Under the present act, secondary boycotts and jurisdictional strikes by unions are unfair labor practices.[52] If charges of such conduct are filed and reasonably believed to be well founded, the Labor Board is empowered to obtain a Federal court injunction against such activities pending the Board's final determination of the case.[53] Persons injured by such conduct have the right to sue the union in court for damages suffered thereby.[54]

These provisions have been criticized by unions as outlawing traditional union methods for organizing and improving wages and working conditions of employees, and as restoring "Government by injunction."

The criticism based on traditional union practices cannot be justified. Tradition has not been sufficient to thwart warranted regulation. Thus, organizing from the top down was traditional with some unions. The technique consisted of first securing a closed-shop contract from the employer and requiring the employees to join or lose their jobs. The practice was defended on the basis of the employee's self-interest in the betterment of wages and conditions and the maintenance of union standards. Nevertheless, it was outlawed by the Wagner Act.

The right of Government to confine the area of industrial warfare by eliminating secondary boycotts is beyond question. The union's right of free speech is not thereby denied.[55] One court has summarized the authority of Government as follows.[56]

"The constitutional right of free speech and free press postulates the authority of Congress to enact legislation reasonably adapted to the protection of interstate commerce against harmful encroachments arising out of secondary boycotts."

The present statute limits the exercise of union economic pressure but leaves open to the unions all other methods of communication concerning the dispute except secondary strikes and secondary picketing. The Supreme Court [57] upon sustaining an injunction against secondary picketing said:

"Restriction of picketing to the area of the industry within which a labor dispute arises leaves open to the disputants other traditional modes of communication."

Secondary boycotts in the hands of large unions and allied union groups have caused serious economic injury to persons not interested in the dispute. Small business and the public have been the principal victims of such activity.

A recent case demonstrates the need for protection.[58] Local 74, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners Union was engaged in a labor dispute with Watson's Specialty Store, a substantial chain store business engaged in the sale and installation of wall and floor coverings. One Stanley purchased an old house and engaged a contractor to renovate it. The contractor employed union carpenters. It became necessary to obtain wall and floor coverings for the house. However, the only place where suitable materials could be found was Watson's Specialty Store, which insisted on installing the coverings it sold. Thereupon, Watson's sent its employees to do that work. The union then ordered the contractor's employees off the job and Stanley's partially renovated house remained unfinished. Before enactment of the present law this situation would have continued until Watson's and the union settled the dispute, in which neither Stanley nor his contractor had or were permitted an interest. However, the situation was remedied under the present statute by the filing of charges of unfair labor practices against the union. The Labor Board found the secondary boycott affecting Stanley's house illegal and ordered the union to cease and desist therefrom.

Speedy and effective Government intervention through the Labor Board's application to the Federal courts for a temporary injunction, pending decision of the case, on the basis of the Board's reasonable belief that a proscribed secondary boycott is being waged, is essential to limit the spread of industrial warfare and the economic injury—to innocent parties and to the national economy—resulting therefrom. Such widespread effect of the secondary boycott was pointed out by the United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit: [59]

"And the general practice of establishing and maintaining secondary boycotts of that kind multiplied or extended throughout the country would necessarily effect a reduction in the flow in interstate commerce of both raw materials and manufactured commodities."

Because only the Government through the Labor Board can invoke the injunctive remedy, the possibilities of abuse are substantially minimized. The statutory right of a private party to sue for damges caused by secondary boycott does not include injunctive relief.[60] The remedy in damages is inadequate in most instances because the loss is usually substantial and irreparable.

The claim that "government by injunction" has been restored is unwarranted. In the first 6 months of operation of the law, the Labor Board filed nine petitions in Federal courts to enjoin secondary boycotts. For the 18-month period of operation, approximately 18 such applications were made of which four were denied.[61]

The statutory ban on secondary boycotts is of limited effect. It does not affect strikes against the primary employer for recognition or economic reasons. The unions are also free to exert pressure against secondary employers provided such conduct does not constitute a strike against such employer or inducing or encouraging his employees to cease work. Persuasion addressed to the secondary employer or his supervisors or customers is not barred. And an employer who undertakes to act as subcontractor for the primary employer during the strike against the latter may also be subjected to the full pressure of the union's strike and economic strength.[62]

[62] Douds v. Metropolitan Federation of Architects (75 F. Supp. 672).

Jurisdictional strikes over assignment of work and the strike or boycott to compel disregard of the Labor Board certification of bargaining representative cannot be justified. In the latter case, an employer who yields to the union's pressure and defies the Board's certification violates the law. Yet, compliance with the Board's certification may be fatal to his business by reason of the economic pressure of the rival union.

In such a situation, prompt Government intervention is required to compel recognition of the Board's certification and to forestall substantial injury to the business caught between rival unions. The striking union undermines the employee's free choice of bargaining representative, evidenced by the certification, as well as the collective bargaining process.[63]

4. Unions, as well as management, should be obligated to bargain collectively in good faith.—The present act obligates the union as well as the employer to engage in collective bargaining in good faith when it has been designated as bargaining representative by a majority of the employees. Violation of that obligation by the union is an unfair labor practice. The mutual aspects of the procedure of collective bargaining are expressed in the portion of the statute which provides:[64]

"For the purposes of this section, to bargain collectively is the performance of the mutual obligation of the employer and the representatives of the employees to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, or the negotiation of an agreement, or any question arising thereunder, and the execution of a written contract incorporating any agreement reached if requested by either party, but such obligation does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession. * * *"

Court decisions under the Wagner Act pointed out that collective bargaining required that labor and management deal with each other in good faith and that a mind "hermetically" sealed on either side of the bargaining table against agreement foreclosed the possibility that an agreement could be reached.

Thus, in Globe Cotton Mills v. NLRB,[65] the court said:

"We believe there is a duty on both sides, though difficult of legal enforcement, to enter into discussion with an open and fair mind, and sincere purpose to find a basis of agreement touching wages, and hours and conditions of labor, and if found, to embody it in a contract as specific as possible which shall stand as a mutual guaranty of conduct and as a guide for the adjustment of grievances."

In NLRB v. The Boss Manufacturing Co.,[66] the court said:

"Collective bargaining, as contemplated by the act, is a procedure looking toward the making of a collective agreement between the employer and the accredited representative of his employees concerning wages, hours, and other conditions of employment. Collective bargaining requires that the parties involved deal with each other with an open and fair mind and sincerely endeavor to overcome obstacles or difficulties between the employer and the employees to the end that employment relations may be stabilized and obstruction to the free flow of commerce prevented."

These pronouncements of the courts plainly establish that genuine collective bargaining is a two-way street requiring give and take on both sides of the conference table. This standard of conduct is embodied in the requirement of the present statute that both sides—

(1) Meet and confer in good faith;

(2) Execute a written contract upon the request of either party if agreement is reached.

A union that submits demands on a "take it or leave it" basis, bolstered with a threat of a strike in event of failure to comply with its demands, defines the purposes of the act because "the act was designed to encourage collective bargaining as a substitute for strike action."[67]

The right to function as collective-bargaining representative carries with it a corresponding duty to perform that function genuinely and in good faith. Unions that fail in this respect disrupt the collective bargaining procedure and foster unrest and industrial strife. Such conduct flies in the face of the many decisions which enforce the exclusive power and authority of the bargaining representative and, in effect, violates the duty of fair representation owed to the employees in the bargaining unit.[68]

The Wagner Act imposed no duty on the union to bargain in good faith. Its refusal to bargain in good faith removed "the possibility of negotiations."[69] Since the union could not be ordered to cease and desist from such conduct and to bargain collectively, the situation created by the union was left unremedied and fraught with the danger of industrial strife substantially undermining interstate commerce. The purposes of the act were thereby defeated.

The present statute fixes the union's duty to perform its bargaining function in good faith as in the case of employers. The union's refusal to bargain collectively is also an unfair labor practice subject to remedial order of the Labor Board.[70] Enforcement of performance of that obligation on the part of unions presents no insurmountable difficulties. The standard of conduct in this regard has already been charted by the many decisions with respect to employers.

The Labor Board has said with respect to section 8 (d) of the present statute:[71]

"The legislative history of these provisions clearly indicates that it was the purpose of Congress to impose upon labor organizations the same duty to bargain in good faith which had been imposed upon employers in section 8 (5) of the Wagner Act, and continued in section 8 (a) (5) of the amended act. Moreover, the standards and tests set forth in section 8 (d), applicable to both employers and unions, closely paraphrase those established in decisions of the Board and the courts in recent years. Such decisions, although they dealt primarily with employers' responsibility to bargain collectively under the Wagner Act, are nevertheless significant guideposts in determining the collective-bargaining obligations of unions under section 8 (b) (3)."

The presently effective definition of collective bargaining stabilizes labor relations in two other respects:

(1) The parties to a contract are obligated to bargain collectively with respect to "questions arising thereunder."

(2) During the contract period, neither party is obligated to discuss modifications of its terms unless the contract provides for reopening thereof.

The powers of the union as bargaining representative have been compared to "those possessed by a legislative body to create and restrict the rights of those whom it represents."[72] The agreement negotiated with the employer by the bargaining representative establishes the rules and standards which shall govern the employees, employer, and union during the contract term. The Supreme Court has said in this regard:[73]

"The negotiations between union and management result in what often has been called a trade agreement, rather than in a contract of employment. Without pushing the analogy too far, the agreement may be likened to the tariffs established by a carrier, to standard provisions prescribed by supervising authorities for insurance policies, or to utility schedules of rates and rules for service, which do not of themselves establish any relationships but which do govern the terms of the shipper or insurer or customer relationship whenever and with whomever it may be established."

The trade agreement, therefore, is in effect a charter of labor relations, fixing wages, hours, and terms of employment, and providing and guiding, through its grievance and arbitration procedures, the course that collective bargaining should pursue.[74] Such a charter must be given some fair degree of permanence, and in point of time that period should be fixed by the parties themselves as stated in the terms and provisions of the charter.

When that charter is about to expire pursuant to its terms, proposals for modifications and changes are appropriate. The emphasis should be on conferences and negotiations in good faith rather than on industrial strife. The present provisions for a 60-day notice of intention to terminate or modify an expiring labor contract, during which time the parties must meet and negotiate without strike or lock-out, has such an effect.[75] tion on this right is that, in so speaking, management must not make threats of reprisal or force or promises of benefit.[76]

The privileges of the first amendment have been enjoyed by employees and unions, and their right to speak freely on labor organization was guaranteed in the Wagner Act and continued in the present act. Management obtained the same right, not by virtue of Labor Board ruling or court decision, but by express provision in the statute.

That protection must not be withdrawn or weakened. If unions are to continue, as well they should, with the right to speak freely, it is imperative that any fair labor law grant the same right to management. One of the foremost lawyers representing labor wrote in the official organ of the American Federation of Labor that, "if freedom of speech is to survive for trade-unions and their members, it must not be denied, directly or indirectly, to employers." [77]

Denial of the basic right of free speech to either labor or management vitiates the constitutional right which extends to all persons.[78] The right of employees to self-organization is meaningless without freedom of speech. "Of that freedom, one may say that it is the matrix, the indispensable condition, of nearly every other form of freedom." [79]

The discussion of labor disputes and the benefits and burdens of joining a union fall within the ambit of the free-speech privilege. In Hague v. Committee for Industrial Organization,[80] the Supreme Court held that freedom to disseminate information concerning the National Labor Relations Act, and to assemble peaceably for discussion of the advantages and disadvantages of union organizaiton, was a constitutional privilege which could not be abridged by the States.

In Thornhill v. Alabama,[81] the Court said,

"In the circumstances of our times, the dissemination of information concerning the facts of a labor dispute must be regarded as within the area of free discussion that is guaranteed by the Constitution."

The privilege is so vital and an integral part of our form of government that it is not necessarily lost because of inaccuracy of views expressed, vilification, exaggeration or even false statements and misconduct or hostility of the speaker.[82]

It is not limited to ineffective speech or a mere description of facts, but includes the right that speech shall be effective and persuasive so long as the appeal is to reason. The free-speech privilege, together with all these incidents of speech, extends to employers, as well as unions, in the discussion of union organization.

In Thomas v. Collins,[83] the Supreme Court said:

"The first amendment is a charter for government, not for an institution of learning. 'Free trade in ideas' means free trade in the opportunity to persuade to action, not merely to describe facts. Cf. Abrams v. United States (250 U. S. 616, 624), and Gitlow v. New York (268 U. S. 652, 672, dissenting opinions of Mr. Justice Holmes). Indeed the whole history of the problems shows that it is to the end of preventing action that repression is primarily directed and to preserving the right to urge it that the protections are given.

"Accordingly, decision here has recognized that employers' attempts to persuade to action with respect to joining or not joining unions are within the first amendment's guaranty. Labor Board v. Virginia Electric & Power Co. (314 U. S. 469). Decisions of other courts have done likewise. When to this persuasion other things are added which bring about coercion, or give it that character, the limit of the right has been passed. Cf. Labor Board v. Virginia Electric & Power Co., supra. But short of that limit the employer's freedom cannot be impaired. The Constitution protects no less the employees' converse right. Of course espousal of the cause of labor is entitled to no higher constitutional protection than the espousal of any other lawful cause. It is entitled to the same protection." [84]

[84] Mr. Justice Jackson stated in a concurring opinion that he would stop or punish employer's speech "only rarely and when" it was "inseparable" from discriminatory discharges or intimidation.

The history of management's privilege of free speech before the Labor Board establishes the need for legislation which will protect that privilege and serve as a guide for the accommodation of the purposes of act to the requirements of the first amendment. The Board "has not been commissioned to effectuate the policies of the Labor Relations Act so single-mindedly that it may wholly ignore"[85] the Bill of Rights. With "excessive emphasis upon its immediate task," the Board denied management the free-speech privilege.

Under the Wagner Act, the Labor Board first forbade free discussion of the subject of union organization between employer and employee, the persons primarily interested and concerned during a union's organizational drive. "Almost any expression" of opinion by an employer not strictly neutral was ruled illegal although honestly believed. The Labor Board took the extreme position that[86]

"* * * in the normal relationship between employer and employee, almost any expression of opinion by an employer indicating to those who depend on his continued good will for their livelihood an unequivocal disapproval of their forming or joining a labor organization characteristically carries home to employees an implied threat of unlawful discrimination for noncompliance with the employer's desires."

An employer who advised his employees that union organizers urging them to join their organization were Communists or racketeers was held guilty of coercion and the possibility that the accusations might be correct was not considered.[87]

Some courts were prepared to give finality to the Board's rulings on the free speech issue as the finding of experts, particularly versed in the subject matter.[88]

However, the force of court decisions compelled the Board to revise its position and give more than lip service to the free-speech privilege when applied to management.[89] The Board then ruled the employer's speech was illegal if it was coercive on its face or made coercive by surrounding circumstances which showed that it was part of a pattern of coercive conduct.[90] The latter concept became known as the "totality of conduct" doctrine.

The application of this doctrine in particular cases again resulted in the unwarranted restriction of the free speech privilege. The Board found illegal employer speech not invalid standing alone, if the employer was guilty of unfair labor practices without regard to whether or not there was any relationship between the speech and the violative conduct. Speech was condemned even though it bore no relationship to, and was severable from the unfair labor practices found to have been committed.[91]

In viewing the surrounding circumstances of employer's speech, the Labor Board has failed to consider that an employer was entitled to defend himself before his employees against vituperative and defamatory attacks upon the character and reputation of the management engaged in by a union seeking to organize the employees. In one case, some of the defamatory remarks addressed by the union to the employees described the employer's principal executive as "a person devoid of all principles," "surrounding himself with the 'little Hitlers

Those decisions might be interpreted as holding that any address or other communication from an employer made directly to his employees may have, and ordinarily will have, a double aspect; on the one hand, it is an expression of his own beliefs and an attempt to persuade his employees to accept them; on the other, it is an indication of his feelings which his hearers may believe will take a form inimical to those of them whom he does not succeed in convincing. Insofar as it is the first, the Constitution protects him; insofar as it is the second, it does not. The Board, being composed of those especially versed in the subject matter, must decide how far the second aspect predominates, and if they conclude that it will seriously coerce the employees' freedom of choice, they may forbid it."

of America'," "labor's greatest enemy" and "fascist minded individual." The union's literature issued to the employees charged that the employer "has been despoiling the children of the northeast district for years," and said that the employer was "unpatriotic and un-American" and "had always used misguided employees for its foul purposes." The Board found illegal a speech made by an executive of the employer to the employees in an attempt to answer such accusations, although that speech repeatedly pointed out to the employees that the employer did not in any way desire to interfere with their right to join the union.[92]

Shortly before the amendment of the act, the Labor Board again relegated the first amendment to secondary importance by establishing the "captive audience" doctrine. Non-coercive speech of an employer was held illegal because it was addressed to the employees assembled in the plant on the employer's time.[93] The Board has held since that this doctrine was overruled by section 8 (c) of the present act.[94]

We agree that when coercion appears, the limits of free speech are exceeded. The paramount importance of the issue requires that the line should be drawn by Congress for the guidance of the administrators of the act. Comforts that unions may have obtained from the Labor Board's prior unwarranted restrictions of the free speech privilege of employers are illusory because of the greater threat to their constitutional rights which they, too, must enjoy.

6. The ranks of management should not be divided by compelling bargaining with supervisory employees.—The existing act does not compel management to bargain collectively with its supervisory employees. Unions seek to return to the interpretation of the Wagner Act which imposed such a requirement.

The record shows that compulsory recognition of unions of supervisory personnel for the purposes of collective bargaining undermines management's ability to bargain collectively and casts doubt upon the fairness of the bargaining procedure, in which rank-and-file employees and management have the greatest stake.

Supervisors are the "arms and legs" of management. They are management at the point of contact with the employees. In addition to responsibility for production and safety in their departments, they effectuate management's labor policies and are in position to observe and report their effect and the need for change or improvement. They handle grievances in the first instance and can locate the causes for complaints as well as suggest the remedies. To the rank and file employees they are management and their conduct can establish employee opinion of management. Even under the Wagner Act, management was held liable for conduct of supervisors which the employees might reasonably believe represented the attitude of management, even though such conduct was contrary to instructions.[95]

Supervisory employees directly influence management's position at the bargaining table on many phases of the proposed contract. They must be consulted by management in order to adequately prepare for negotiations, and their advice plays a necessary part in the formulation of management requirements in the contract and its attitude with respect to union demands.

All of these functions of supervisory employees continue although they may be limited or directed by the provisions of the collective agreement. The supervisors' essential function in the line of management remains intact even though their authority is limited to making effective recommendations or is broad enough to include power to hire and fire. Undivided loyalty to management is an essential ingredient of the supervisory job and upon it rests the entire structure of the management's ability to operate and manage the business. Subjecting the base to conflicting interests threatens the whole structure.

Such a result was achieved under the Wagner Act. The Labor Board ruled that general foremen, foremen, and assistant foremen, with supervisory authority in mass production industries, were entitled to compel collective bargaining with them on the part of the employer.[96] The Board conceded that by its ruling foremen were made subject to interests which would conflict with the requirements of the job, when it pointed out that,[97]

"In an absolute sense, of course, the association (Foreman's Association of America) is not independent of the CIO, or any labor organization. Both are labor organizations and both are organized for basically similar purposes—the improvement of the wages, hours, and working conditions of their membership through collective bargaining. Both have common problems and therefore a common 'bond of sympathy.' For these reasons it is to be expected that they will express moral sympathy for the organizational efforts of one another and will, on occasion, even refuse to cross the picket line established by the other during a strike." [Italics added.]

Such a conflict of interest in itself is sufficient to justify removing management's representatives from the possibility of breach of duty, by excluding them from the field of collective bargaining. It has been commonly recognized that strikes by foremen cannot succeed without the active aid of rank and file unions because such strikers can be readily replaced by promotions from the ranks. Supervisory unions cannot succeed, therefore, without agreements for mutual assistance and support with unions representing rank and file employees.

These realities of normal industrial operations were disregarded by the Labor Board and it sanctioned the organization of supervisory employees by a union affiliated with a rank and file union. It authorized the union which represented the rank and file employees of an employer to organize their supervisors through an affiliate[98] and held that the employer's refusal to bargain collectively with that union, acting on behalf of its supervisory employees, was an unfair labor practice.[99]

Thereby, the field was opened for rank and file unions operating through affiliates to obtain the allegiance of management's representatives. Whether or not the opportunity was used, it presented a real threat to management's ability to manage its operations and to function efficiently. It threatened the entire collective bargaining procedure by permitting the undercutting of management in negotiations.

Placing the managerial representatives in a position where they are fellow union members of rank and file employees under their supervision subjects them to the same rules of union conduct and allegiance, and creates a direct conflict with the primary duty of the supervisory employees to management.

The labor-relations field warrants no different standards of conduct for the representatives of management and of labor than other fields of endeavor, in so far as their allegiance is concerned. The rule that an agent, without the consent of his principal, should not be placed in a position to do less than the best for his principal is applicable. Management is entitled to the undivided allegiance of its representatives, through whom it must operate its business and deal with the employees on a day-to-day basis in the plant and at the bargaining table, whether there be industrial peace or strife. The self-interest of supervisory employees who attain a place in management, on the basis of complete loyalty and undivided performance of duty, must be subordinated to the paramount interest of confidence and fairness in the collective bargaining process. Impairment of management's established method of operating through representatives owing responsibility solely to it can cause irreparable damage to our industrial system.

7. Management should retain the right to petition for election; employees should retain the right to terminate a union's authority.—The present law authorizes an employer to file with the Board a petition for determination of bargaining representative of his employees when he has been presented with a claim for recognition as bargaining representative by a labor organization.[1] Thereby, the Labor Board's processes are invoked for the purpose of determining by a secret ballot whether the employees involved desire to be represented by the union asserting the claim.

No such provision was made in the Wagner Act, and the Board did not permit an employer to file a petition for an election unless he had been served with demands for recognition by two or more unions claiming to represent the same employees.

The Labor Board has held that an employer has the right in good faith to question the union's claim of majority status and to insist that it be resolved by a Board-conducted election. In the Arteraft Hosiery Company case,[2] the Board said:

"We have held, and still hold, that an employer may in good faith insist on a Board election as proof of the union's majority but that an employer unlawfully refuses to bargain if its insistence on such an election is motivated, not by any bona fide doubt as to the union's majority, but rather by a rejection of the collective-bargaining principle or by a desire to gain time within which to undermine the union."

A necessary corollary to that right of the employer to insist upon an election is the right of the employer to invoke the processes whereby the election will be conducted. Insistence upon an election merely raises the issue of the union's majority status. The filing of the petition paves the way for peaceable resolution of the question.

Union representatives claim that an unscrupulous employer, with the right to file a petition therefore, can compel an election before the union is ready for it and thereby forestall successful organization of his employees. The claim overlooks the provision of the statute which bars that right to petition until the employer has been served by a union with a demand for bargaining rights. By withholding its demand for recognition until it is ready for an election, the union avoids the danger of a premature election. The possibility that an unscrupulous employer may instigate a group of employees to demand recognition so that he can file a petition, can be minimized by the Board's application of its administrative rule requiring a union seeking recognition before it to show prima facie that it represents 30 percent of the employees.[3]

The right of the employer to petition for an election is seen, therefore, to serve a useful purpose, to do no harm to any party. It should be retained.

The present act permits employees to revoke the authority of a bargaining representative that has been certified by the Board or is being currently recognized by their employer.[4] The filing of a petition for such revocation authorizes the Board to conduct an election for the purpose of determining whether the union still represents a majority of the employees and has the right to continue to act as bargaining representative.

Under the Wagner Act, employees had no right to obtain an election for the purpose of terminating the authority of their bargaining representative. The Labor Board interpreted the law so as to preclude the filing of such petitions. On dismissing a petition for investigation and certification of representatives filed by a group of employees who alleged therein:

"The undersigned hereby alleges that a question has arisen concerning the representation of employees in the above bargaining unit, in that: Majority of employees contend that CIO no longer represents them and is not their bargaining agent," the Board said:[5]

"It has been our general practice, based upon consideration of policy, not to require the only union involved to participate in an election against its desires. Therefore, as a general rule, we do not entertain petitions for investigation and certification of representatives except in cases where it appears that the alleged question of representation is related directly to the right or claim of the petitioner to be recognized as a collective-bargaining representative. Here there is no such claim, since by their own admission it is petitioners' present purpose not to act as bargaining representative."

Thus, the employees in the bargaining unit were barred from an election for the purpose of testing the right of the recognized union to continue to represent them as bargaining representative. Nor could the employees obtain peaceable resolution of the question they raised in any other way, if the recognized union had been certified by the Board on the basis of an election. The Labor Board ruled that, having expressed their desires by secret ballot in an election conducted by the Board, no other method could be regarded as of sufficient value to show repudiation of their selection. The Board stated:[6]

"Such elections, held under the auspices of the Board, in accordance with express statutory provisions, have been uniformly found to furnish the best evidence of employees' desires concerning representation for collective bargaining. When employees have expressed their considered opinions by a method which leaves no room for doubt as to their true desires, repudiation of their selection can be established only through the medium of an equally probative technique."

The effect of these principles was to deny to the employees the freedom of choice of bargaining representative guaranteed by the act. The employees were saddled with a bargaining representative they did not desire unless they secured another union to act for them, in which event the new union could file a petition with the Board and obtain an election. If they did not make such selection, the union discredited as bargaining representative could permit an existing contract to be automatically renewed pursuant to its terms or compel the employer to negotiate a new agreement. The renewed agreement or a new agreement barred the employees from designating a new union as bargaining agent for the duration of the term of any such contract.[7]

The decertification procedure in no measure undermines the stability of a Board certification or a contract entered into by the certified union. The present statute permits only one election during the twelve-month period succeeding the last valid election.[8] A contract entered into by the certified representative bars any election during a reasonable term (now regarded as two years). The decertification procedure tends to reduce raiding and jurisdictional disputes. It gives full recognition to the freedom of choice of bargaining representative by the employees. It should, therefore, be retained.

8. Unions, as well as management, should be liable for breach of contract.—Under the present law, a union may be sued as an entity for violations of the labor contract.[9] Provision is made to protect the union members against liability for money damages assessed by a court against a union for its breach of the contract.

These provisions impose upon unions the same responsibility as upon management for breach of a labor contract.

Consideration of the Wagner Act and the present act clearly establishes that the bargaining duty imposed thereunder was for the purpose of achieving a collective-bargaining agreement binding on both parties. In Consolidated Edison Co. of New York v. NLRB[10] the Supreme Court said:

"The act contemplates the making of contracts with labor organizations. That is the manifest objective in providing for collective bargaining."

The signing of the labor contract is the final step in the collective-bargaining process. The importance of the agreement is beyond question. In Timken Roller Bearing Co. v. NLRB[11] the Court said:

"Indeed, so important is an agreement to the bargaining process that when it is reached the act requires a permanent memorial of its terms to avoid frustrating the bargaining process. An authentic record of its terms must be provided which could be exhibited to employees as evidence of the good faith of the employer, and so avoid fruitful sources of dissatisfaction and disagreement."

An agreement of such importance, status and effect should be observed and effectively bind both parties. The remedies available for nonperformance by the parties should be open to both of them to the same extent, if, in their judgment, they desire such remedy. Nor should any such remedy be made illusory by resort to technicalities based on the theory that unions cannot be sued at common law. In Timken Roller Bearing Co. v. NLRB,[12] the Court said,

"This repeated asservation of the importance of a written and signed agreement as the culminating step in the bargaining process so as to avoid industrial strife, does not contemplate and can by no process of reasoning be conceived as a unilateral undertaking by the employer binding upon him but devoid of controls on the bargaining agent or those for whom it speaks. Certainly, it is not without its disciplines over both of the parties to it, within the reasonable scope of its terms and conditions."

The laws of many States made it difficult to sue effectively or recover a judgment against a labor union because most of the labor unions were unincorporated associations and for that reason were not subject to suit at common law. Such technicalities shielded unions from responsibility for breach of the labor contract. The present law discards these worn-out concepts and establishes unions as legal entities with full duty to perform agreements. The Labor Board pointed out:[13]

"The common-law concept of an unincorporated labor organization as a group of individuals having no separate entity apart from its members has been discarded—to the extent that it was not already outmoded in modern jurisprudence—by the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947. It is clear that the act treats labor organizations for all practical purposes as judicial entities."

According to the Labor Board, the breach of a labor agreement by a union does not constitute an unfair labor practice on the part of the union under the present act. The Board said.[14]

"From this, we also conclude that Congress did not intend to make a strike in breach of a contract an unfair labor practice per se."

The Board has recognized that breach of the labor agreement by unions occurs and must be deterred. For the purpose of fostering reliance upon the contract rather than resort to noncompliance therewith, the Board has visited responsibility upon employees who engage in a strike in violation of the no-strike clause of a contract[15] and has sanctioned such discharges even where the strike was caused by the employer's unfair labor practices.[16]. The present statute, by providing that the union may be held liable for breach of the labor contract, permits responsibility to be placed where it should rest if it caused the violation of the contract.

The provision poses no threat to union existence. It is common knowledge that many of the unions have avoided this responsibility in damages before law courts by so negotiating various forms of protective clauses, such as the "able and willing to work" provision of the United Mine Workers, as to gain complete immunity from lawsuit provisions, limitation of liability in damages, and provsions subjecting liability for breach of contract to arbitration. If the grievance and arbitration provisions of the contract are broad enough to cover any controversy and dispute, no special provision against lawsuits would seem necessary, according to a recent court decision.[17]

9. The President should have power to invoke restraints on strikes involving national welfare.—The President's labor bill erases the clear authority of Government provided in section 208 of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, to secure a national emergency injunction in Nation-wide strike situations which endanger the national welfare. The Attorney General of the United States is of the opinion that such authority is inherent in the President without statutory guaranty.

His viewpoint has evoked strong criticism from reliable constitutional experts, including some representing labor unions. It is contended that nothing in the Federal Constitution can logically be so broadly read as to grant such implicit power to the President. The well-established concept that the Federal Government is one of limited powers, fixed in the Constitution and statutes, is also relied on.

One point is clear. Any attempt by the President to exercise an alleged inherent authority to secure an injunction in a national emergency created by a labor dispute would result in a vigorously contested legal battle with the legal record overwhelmingly weighted against the existence or use of any such implied power.

The opinions of the Supreme Court Justices in the celebrated Lewis case[18] indicate that the Norris-LaGuardia Anti-Injunction Act would apply to any attempted exercise of the claimed inherent power of Government to an injunction in labor disputes except if there existed an employer-employee relationship between the Government and the strikers within the meaning of that decision.[19] The opinion of the Court states, with respect to the applicability of the Norris-LaGuardia Act to the Government's application for an injunction.[20]

"If we were to stop here, there would be little difficulty in accepting the decision of the District Court upon the scope of the act. And the cases in this Court express consistent views concerning the types of situations to which the act applies. They have gone no further than to follow the congressional desires by regarding as beyond the jurisdiction of the district courts the issuance of injunctions sought by the United States and directed to persons who are not employees of the United States. None of these cases dealt with the employer-employee relationship now before us." [Italics added.]

Mr. Justice Black and Mr. Justice Douglas, concurring in part and dissenting in part, said:[21]

S. 564); United States v. Hayes (unreported, D. Ind. 1919); United States v. Railway Employees Dept. A. F. L. (283 F. 479, 286 F. 228, 290 F. 978) was limited by the Norris-LaGuardia Act.

[21] 330 U. S. 258, 329.

"For anything less than full and complete Government operation for its own account would make this proceeding the equivalent of the Government's seeking an injunction for the benefit of private employers. We think the Norris-LaGuardia Act prohibits that."

Mr. Justice Murphy in his dissenting opinion pointed out that :[22]

"The Government concededly could not obtain an injunction in a private labor dispute where there has been no seizure of private properties, no matter how great the public interest in the dispute might be." [Italics added.]

Thus, if there exists any inherent emergency, Government authority to secure an injunction in a Nation-wide labor dispute it is conditioned upon (1) the existence of the power to seize the property involved, and (2) the "full and complete" exercise of that power so as to create an employer-employee relationship between the Government and the strikers.[23] If the Government's right of seizure of the property does not exist[24] or has not been sufficiently exercised, the Government must meet the requirements of the Norris-LaGuardia Act in order to obtain an injunction.

Under such circumstances, it is at least doubtful that the Government could satisfy the requirements of that act. One of the findings required to be made under that act as a condition precedent to the issuance of an injunction is that "the public officers charged with the duty to protect complainant's property are unable or unwilling to furnish adequate protection.[25] Manifestly ,the Government as claimant could not support a finding that its property was involved in the dispute in the absence of Government seizure thereof. Nor could the Government confess to an inability or unwillingness to protect the private property involved in a national emergency. Furthermore, the danger to property could not be alleged until it was threatened by the strikers with the result that a peaceable strike would eliminate any possibility of a Government injunction despite the threat to the national welfare.

In view of these obstacles to the use of an emergency Government injunction in the national interest, common sense, logic, and past experience would seem to dictate that such power and the exercise thereof be clearly defined, safeguarded, and limited by the statute. The history of Nation-wide strikes of the past few years shows that the national welfare requires that there be no impairment of the power to secure an injunction for use in labor disputes under the appropriate emergency circumstances.

10. Welfare funds should be trust funds, jointly administered by management and union representatives.—The present law regulates payments by employers to unions for insurance, pensions, and other specified benefits for employees and their families. These measures establish two principal requirements, namely, that these payments constitute trust funds to be used solely and exclusively for the benefit of the employees, and that there shall be joint administration of such funds by union and employer representatives, with a neutral person designated by them to resolve any deadlock.

These provisions of the law have been criticized by unions as injecting employers into an area in which they have no rightful interest and as hamstringing the use of welfare funds.

These contentions are belied by the facts.

Many companies voluntarily established pension funds and administered them in the employees' interest. Management for a long time believed that to do so was exclusively its function. The widening of the area of mandatory collective bargaining to include employee insurance and pension funds[26] has not diminished management's interest in the welfare of its employees and in the proper disposition of funds earmarked for their benefit.

Insurance and welfare funds accumulate rapidly. In many industries, payments are made to a single fund on a multiemployer basis. Since these funds represent large accumulations of money held by unions for the benefit of employees, Government supervision in the public interest is not only justified but essential. Insurance companies are under governmental supervision and regulation.

Arbitrary control and right of dispensation of such large funds by unions create real possibilities of abuse. Such unregulated power over huge funds can be utilized by union representatives as a means of control over employees.

It may also be utilized to stifle the democratic process within labor organizations. It tempts the dishonest and opens the way for racketeering practices.

It cannot be denied that welfare funds for the benefit of employees should be, and constitute, trust funds. To achieve the benefits for which welfare funds have been established, their use must be limited to the objectives for which they have been created.

The wisdom of a joint administration is apparent from the nature of the trust. Excepting the form of administration of the funds from the area of collective bargaining by providing for joint supervision establishes a fair balance in the interest of the contracting parties and the employees.

Joint administration is not novel. In fact, many funds were already thus being administered before the existing provisions were added to the law. A study by the Bureau of Labor Statistics [27] states:

"A little more than a third of the employees covered by health benefit programs included in this report are under plans which are jointly administered by the union and the employer. Another third are covered by programs for which insurance companies assume the major administrative responsibility; and somewhat less than a third are under those administered by a union."

The administration of the funds, except to the extent fixed by statute and contract, remains a subject for collective bargaining between management and union representatives.

11. Benefits of the act should be denied to Communist-dominated unions.—The present law deprives unions of recourse to benefits of the act unless their officers and the officers of their international unions file affidavits of non-Communist affiliation and belief.[28]

There cannot be much dispute that the national interest requires the elimination of dominating Communist influence in labor unions. Many of the labor leaders who have criticized the affidavit requirement have fought the influence of Communists in their organizations for many years.

The constitutionality of the non-Communist affidavit requirement has already been sustained by several of the courts.[29]

Actually, the affidavit has been but a short step toward eliminating the influence of Communists in labor organizations. The Labor Board has held the sworn statement upon its form of affidavit is conclusive on the question of compliance with the regulation. The Board has refused to accept evidence at hearings that union officers are Communists despite the affidavit.[30]

The pride of certain union officials, who have regarded the present regulation as an affront to union dignity, should give way to the compelling public purpose which the enactment achieves in a small measure. If the price to be paid for retaining the regulation is to balance the books by applying the same regulation to employers who would seek recourse to the act, that requirement should be enacted.

The force of Government should not be available to labor organizations that are dominated or controlled by Communists. If anything, the regulations should be made more effective, so that evasion cannot be achieved by merely changing the structure of the officialdom of these unions that are subject to substantial Communist influence.

CONCLUSION

The provisions of the present law, discussed above, impart to unions a need for responsibility which some have in the past ignored or denied. In the interest of achieving a sound labor policy based on the fostering and encouraging of mutual understanding and regard, and of promoting genuine collective bargaining by both parties, one must consider these provisions as mandatory in any legislation so essential to the welfare of our economy as our basic labor law.

reenact, without amendments, the Wagner Labor Relations Act, and to continue in full force and effect the Norris-LaGuardia Anti-Injunction Act.

That is the plain mandate of the voters as expressed on election day. That is the clear duty of the Eighty-first Congress.

During the period since its enactment, the Taft-Hartley law has been demonstrated to be an instrument of suppression of labor, domination by employers, and nullification of civil rights. The record shows that—

(1) The Taft-Hartley law has seriously impaired the collective-bargaining process.

(2) It has led employers to circumvent long-established grievance machinery used in the effective disposition of day-to-day problems in shops.

(3) It has resulted in the filing of damage suits by employers against unions totaling several million dollars.

(4) It has equipped employers with weapons to intimidate and harass unions by filing employer petitions for elections and for decertifications.

(5) It has revived company unions.

(6) It has stigmatized peaceful picketing as unlawful restraint and coercion.

(7) It has outlawed, as illegal boycotts, the legitimate activities of unions in support of the demands of their fellow trade-unionists.

(8) It has restored government by injunction which was held in check for 15 years by the Norris-LaGuardia Act.

(9) It has aided and encouraged interunion raiding to divide labor.

(10) It has led to the issuance of injunctions against free speech and free press in labor disputes and the handing down of criminal indictments against labor leaders for the publication of political opinions.

No protracted legislative deliberations are required to meet the situation. All that is required is the sincere desire by this committee and by Congress to respect the wishes of the people instead of seeking to go through the motions of repealing the Taft-Hartley law and producing a new version of that law under a different name. No one will be fooled by any such maneuver.

May I respectfully point out to this committee that a bill which effectively repeals the Taft-Hartley law outright and restores, without amendments, the Wagner Labor Relations Act has already been introduced in the Eighty-first Congress. That bill is H. R. 259, by Congressman Vito Marcantonio. The Marcantonio bill is simple, direct, unequivocal. It contains only a few paragraphs because only a few paragraphs are needed to do the job.

The American Labor Party respectfully submits that inadequate time has been granted to advocates of effective repeal of the Taft-Hartley law while employers and antilabor forces have been permitted to appear and testify. The issue before this committee is of direct concern to every American family. The people have the right to be heard fully and timely on this legislation.

In conclusion, let me again renew the request that the only bill that will meet the mandate of the voters is repeal the Taft-Hartley law outright and restore, without amendments, the Wagner Labor Relations Act.

STATEMENT OF GENERAL MOTORS' POSITION ON UNIONIZATION OF FOREMEN, SUBMITTED TO SENATE COMMITTE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE BY H. W. ANDERSON, VICE PRESIDENT, GENERAL MOTORS, FEBRUARY 15, 1949

The Senate Labor Committee is presently conducting hearings in connection with proposed legislation which, if adopted in its present form, would represent a distinct and unwarranted backward step in the field of labor-management relations. This legislation would, among other things, either amend or repeal the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, so as to permit labor organizations, under sanction of the Federal Government, to represent one segment of management—the foremen—for the purposes of collective bargaining.

General Motors is unalterably opposed to any new legislation, or a change in existing labor laws, which would bring about this result.

General Motors' convictions with respect to the position which the foreman now holds, and should continue to hold, as a part of management, free of the influences of any outside interests, are of long standing. Through public announcements and by appearances of its executive officers before numerous congressional committees during the past several years, General Motors has had the opportunity to go on record concerning the prominent and essential role which the General Motors foreman plays as a part of management.

GENERAL MOTORS' POSITION ON THE RECORD

When the issue of foreman unionization first arose in March 1943 we made our position clear to the Congress by message to, and testimony before, the House Committee on Military Affairs. At that time we pointed out that management has inescapable responsibilities which cannot be shared with others.

Such responsibilities, we said, are generally recognized and accepted and all of our collective-bargaining agreements contain provisions recognizing management's responsibilities for the conduct of the business.

With regard to the foreman's function as a part of management, we said:

"These responsibilities of management as they apply to employees and the work in the shop are carried out in the first instance by the foremen. The foremen in industrial plants and equivalent supervision in other activities have been traditionally recognized by employees, labor unions, Government, and management as a part of management. Many employers have foremen's manuals describing the duties of a foreman. Where such manuals do not exist, the duties of foremen are in general understood and accepted due to past practice or general practice in industry.

"While the meaning of the term 'foreman' is well understood in the plants of the General Motors Corp. and in the plants of other automobile manufacturers, there is quite likely some variation in the meaning of the term and the duties of first-line supervision as understood in other industries. Generally speaking, however, the foreman or the first-line supervision, by whatever name he may be called, means 'boss'—the man who gives an employee instructions—the man who can discipline, discharge, or recommend for discharge an employee under his supervision—the man who, as an executive of the supervisory group, is empowered to enforce, execute, and assist in the determination of the detailed policies of the business, particularly as they apply to the handling of employees under his supervision."

We also stated that in our judgment, foremen could not function in a position of dual allegiance:

"It is fundamental that a man cannot serve two masters. As a practical matter, if there were foremen's unions, a foreman would be continually faced with the problem of whether a particular decision or action would be serving the objectives of the union or serving the objectives of the management. To quote from an authority some 2,000 years old and generally accepted, 'No man can serve two masters, for either he will hate the one and love the other, or else he will hold to the one and despise the other.'

"A foreman could not function in such a position of dual allegiance—either he would be loyal to the union and be obligated to carry out its dictates, or he would remain a part of management and carry out management policies. Any attempt on the part of any foreman to 'ride both horses' would add to his own confusion and render him ineffective."

We predicted that foremen's unions might take any of three forms:

(1) So-called independent unions;

(2) Affiliates of the same international union which represents the workmen in the plant; or

(3) Affiliates of one of the other international unions not representing the workmen in the plant; and the situation would be intolerable, for the problem of dual allegiance would exist in all three cases because—

"If the foremen's union is affiliated with the international union which represents the workers in the plant, the foremen could not be continued in their present duties. They could no longer possibly have any executive control over the men or any position in handling their grievances, nor could they be authorized to carry out the very important personnel functions which are a responsibility of management and which are now a part of their duties.

"If the foremen's union is affiliated with one of the international unions not representing the workers in the plant, there would be the added problem of the conflicting policies and ambitions of the two rival international unions."

We said then, and we are sure that subsequent events proved, that in any of these situations there would be serious turmoil and confusion in the plants; there would be endless talk and debate; policies of management would not be carried out; accurate reports of the problems and difficulties in production could not be obtained; the effectiveness of first-line supervision would be lost; production would bog down; and our important national asset of mass production would deteriorate into mob production.

APPEARANCES BEFORE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

In February 1944 we again made our position clear in a letter to the National Labor Relations Board which at that time was deliberating as to whether foremen were "employees" under the act and thus entitled to the benefits of the act.

At that time we traced our long-established training program and foremen saying:

"In General Motors, for many years, we have had a policy of establishing a very clear line between the foremen on one hand and employees who have no supervisory duties on the other. In the early 1920's General Motors developed an executive training program, the purpose of which was to educate, train, and develop foremen in their management responsibilities. The program consisted of a complete training manual, subsequently copyrighted in 1927. This program was carried out in all plants of the corporation.

"The following is quoted from this program:

"'Representative of Management to Men

"'Just as the general manager is the highest authority in the enterprise, so the foreman is the highest authority in his department. He has been invested with the authority of management. The men in the shops look to him as the representative of management. They get their instructions from him; he carries out the company's plans and policies. The workmen also get their opinion of the company from the treatment that they receive from their own foreman.'"

In the course of the development of the management-employee relationship through the years, this program has been expanded to meet the new conditions as they arise from time to time.

We pointed out the the NLRB that our foremen have definite managerial functions and responsibilities and are clearly recognized as a part of management:

"In General Motors, foremen are the managers of the departments in which the employees perform work under their supervision. They direct the workmen through making work assignments. They reassign employees as the need arises. They initiate merit wage increases and promotion of employees. They are responsible for the efficiency of the employees under their direction. In the course of these managerial duties they are charged with the responsibility for maintaining discipline among the employees under their direction. They are empowered to take appropriate disciplinary action in the event of a violation of shop rules and union agreements and other improper conduct by employees. Under all of our union agreements, they are the first point of management contact. In a large majority of cases they make the first management decision on grievances. It is only cases involving issues beyond the jurisdiction of an individual foreman that the foreman is unable to make a decision.

"The functions of the foreman in the General Motors plants as the direct representative of management in dealing with representatives of workmen's unions was clearly recognized by the first umpire established under the 1940 agreement with the UAW-CIO, in case A–2 decided October 28, 1940."

Again in February 1945, in a statement made before the National Labor Relations Board, we pointed out that it is impossible for a foreman to be in a dual position as an "employee" and an "employer":

"When a workman accepts promotion to a foreman, he is recognized as a part of management, not only by his employer and himself but also by the workers under his supervision. In effect, then, when he accepts his appointment as a foreman, his status as a worker gives way to his responsibility as a part of the management. Due to the authority and responsibilities vested in the foreman by General Motors and the position this places him in as an employer under the National Labor Relations Act, it is impossible for the foreman to be in the dual position of an 'employee' and an 'employer.' Since the corporation is held responsible for the foreman's conduct, it follows that the corporation not only has the right but the duty when, in its judgment, the foreman is not properly fulfilling his managerial responsibilities to sever that relationship by withdrawing the managerial authority that has been delegated to him."

APPEARANCE BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE IN 1947

In February 1947 we urged the Congress to enact legislation to clear up the contradictory and self-defeating technical interpretations of the National Labor Relations Act which placed certain management employees in a dual capacity. At that time we said:

"After much controversy and litigation the National Labor Relations Board and the courts have placed certain management employees in a dual capacity, expecting them to function both as agents of management and as unionized employees. The National Labor Relations Act under this technical interpretation is contradictory and self-defeating and must be changed by Congress. Management can function only through individuals, and individuals who have collective-bargaining responsibilities or positions of management trust cannot properly fulfill their duties if at the same time they are subject to union control. As a practical matter, to make collective-bargaining work, the status of such management employees must be clearly defined by placing them on the management side of the bargaining table."

THE FOREMAN AS MANAGEMENT IN COLLECTIVE BARGAINING AND CONTRACT ADMINISTRATION

General Motors deals with 18 different international unions representing approximately 275,000 workmen in more than 200 separate bargaining units. We have currently in effect approximately 100 separate master collective-bargaining agreements governing our relationship with the various unions. In addition there are literally hundreds of local agreements which are supplemental to these master agreements.

Under all our collective-bargaining agreements with the workmen's unions, the foremen make the first management disposition of all grievances of the workmen. These collective-bargaining agreements specifically require such management action by the foreman. Consider, for example, the current agreement between General Motors and the UAW-CIO covering production and maintenance employees in approximately 100 plants.[1] This agreement provides as follows:

"Any employee having a grievance, or one designated member of a group having a grievance, should first take the grievance up with the foreman, who will attempt to adjust it."

In a large percentage of all cases, the foreman's written disposition is the only management disposition.

In 1947, the latest year for which complete corporation-wide figures are available, there were a total of 28,319 grievances reduced to writing in behalf of the approximately 225,000 workers of General Motors represented by the UAW-CIO. Of this total, 12,697, or 44.8 percent, were settled satisfactorily by foremen acting as management. A study made of 26 plants in 1 large division of General Motors employing 48,000 represented workers developed that in 1948 a total of 6,445 grievances were filed. Of these 3,753, or 58.2 percent, were settled by foreman action alone. The above figures are related to grievances reduced to writing and, therefore, do not take into consideration the many thousands of additional grievances and problems which are settled by the foremen before they reach the formal grievance procedure.

Under General Motors agreements with the various unions, we provide for an impartial umpire to act as the terminal point in the grievance procedure and to make decisions in dispute cases which are final and binding on both parties. The umpire system of resolving grievance disputes was pioneered in the automobile industry by General Motors and the UAW-CIO in 1940. In 1940 and 1941, Dr. George W. Taylor acted as the permanent Impartial umpire under our agreement with the UAW-CIO. In one of the cases presented to him, Dr. Taylor ruled that the foreman is management in the collective-bargaining relationship. In that decision[2] Dr. Taylor said:

"Under this agreement (GM-UAW national agreement of June 24, 1940) both parties are accorded rights and they assume obligations. In the performance of its vital function, management necessarily delegates certain duties to the foremen. Such duties must be carried out without infringing upon any of the agreement rights of employees or of the union. What if the foreman improperly performs his duties and does infringe upon such union rights? Since he acted for the corporation, his violation of the agreement is a violation by the corporation and any claims of redress must be made against the corporation and not against the individual foreman." [Italics supplied]

The employee-grievance forms which are used for the filing of formal grievances under our labor agreements provide a space for the foreman to give his written disposition.[3] These written dispositions by foremen are the basis of final settlement of a large percentage of all written grievances. They are binding commitments of General Motors made by the foreman. These commitments are subject to interpretation and enforcement by the impartial umpires. For example, take a case which arose under our agreement with the UAW-CIO. The sole issue in the case was the interpretation of a written disposition to a grievance given by a foreman. The case was appealed to Mr. Ralph T. Seward who was serving as impartial umpire under the GM-UAW-CIO agreement at that time. He interpreted the disposition of the foreman and umpire's decision[4] was final and binding upon General Motors. In this decision, the umpire expressly recognized that the foreman's disposition was the sole basis for the ruling. In other words, the umpire recognized the authority of the foreman to grant a concession which was not otherwise provided for in the labor agreement.

This example clearly illustrates the chaotic condition which could result from having a foreman function as management in collective bargaining and at the same time be a member of a union and subject to union control.

Our agreement with the UAW[5] provides numerous references to the foreman as the representative of management—in most instances the sole management representative—in the administration of the collective-bargaining agreement. Examples of these follow:

(1) Committeemen desiring to leave their work to investigate grievances of workers may do so only "after reporting to their respective foreman" (par. 15).

(2) Such committeeman must first "present a written grievance to his foreman" (ibid).

(3) The committeeman must notify the foreman in the department in which he is investigating the grievance, if the department is one other than that in which the committeeman regularly works (par. 20).

(4) Committeemen shall report to their foreman immediately after lunch (par. 18).

(5) Committeemen are restricted as to the amount of time for which General Motors pays them while handling grievances (par. 19) and it is the foreman's responsibility to keep track of the time used.

(6) Promotions of workmen to higher rated jobs and transfer of workmen between equally rated jobs is the responsibility of the foreman (par. 63).

(7) Workmen may make application for transfers to fill vacancies and such applications may be filed with the foreman (par. 63B).

(8) In instances where workmen protest the production standards established by management, the complaint is first taken up with the foremen. Throughout the procedure established in the agreement for handling dispute cases involving production standards, the foreman is management's representative (par. 79).

(9) The granting of certain leaves of absence is also the responsibilty of the foreman and workmen must, under the agreement, make application to him and receive his approval for such leaves of absence (pars. 103 and 104).

(10) Specific provision[6] is made prohibiting foremen from performing any work performed by represented workmen except in emergencies, in training workmen or in ironing out production difficulties (par. 145).

There are other instances of foreman responsibility for administration of provisions of our collective-bargaining agreements where the foreman is not specifically referred to in the agreements. For example, in the GM–UAW agreement provision is made for hiring certain workmen at 10 cents per hour below the rate of the job classification with automatic progression to the job rate.[6] Workmen who meet the standard requirements for an average employee may receive such increases sooner. The determination of whether the workman will receive increases earlier than the automatic provisions require, however, is made solely by the foreman. In this connection too, the determination of whether the new hire will make a satisfactory workman rests with the foreman.

In any successful group activity there must be discipline; there must be respect for the rights of others; and there must be obedience to proper authority. Discipline is closely related to efficiency, for without discipline efficiency is impossible.

[6] See par. 99 of the GM-UAW agreement, copy of which is attached hereto as exhibit A.

The maintenance of discipline is an exclusive management responsibility and so recognized expressly in all our agreements with the unions. It is a responsibility which cannot be shared with others. In General Motors the primary responsibility for maintaining discipline rests with the foreman. In nearly all cases of disciplinary action, ranging from reprimand to discharge, the foreman takes the action.

The foremen in General Motors perform a vital role in connection with the formulation of the contractual provisions to be agreed upon with the unions representing the workmen.

Foremen constitute that segment of management having closest contact with workmen and union representatives in the shop. Among all the members of management, therefore, they are in the best position to know how collective-bargaining-agreement provisions actually work out in day-to-day application in the shop.

Whenever union contract negotiations are pending, the entire management organization in General Motors is consulted. For example, by means of questionnaires and conferences the General Motors foreman who is management's qualified and experienced front line representative in the shop and on the production line is asked to express his individual views and judgment concerning the additions, modifications, or other changes if any, which should be made in the existing collective-bargaining agreements in General Motors.

It is clear that this essential source of constructive judgment necessary to the formulation and maintenance of sound contractual provisions, would be destroyed if the foreman owed allegiance to some union as well as to management.

THE FOREMAN'S MANAGEMENT RESPONSIBILITIES IN AREAS OTHER THAN COLLECTIVE BARGAINING AND CONTRACT ADMINISTRATION

Emphasis has been placed upon the foreman's responsibility and authority in handling relationships under union agreements. This aspect of the foreman's job is covered in considerable detail because of its interrelationship with the broader subject of labor-management relations now under consideration by Congress. But such emphasis is not meant to minimize the importance of the foreman's direct responsibility and authority for production and for relationships with employees in areas not specifically covered by the union agreement.

The foreman in a production department, for example, has management responsibility for proper quality and quantity of product. In the performance of this responsibility he must see that schedules are met, he requisitions the tools and materials necessary for production, he sees that tools and equipment are maintained in working order, he determines the causes of scrap and takes corrective measures, he watches the flow of parts coming from other departments. He participates in the discussion of policies affecting his department. He makes suggestions for improvement in lay-outs, processes, procedures, and practices.

His typical responsibilities relating to personnel, include responsibility for final selection of employees hired to fill requisitions which the foreman has initiated, responsibility for training employees on their respective jobs, responsibility for the safety of employees, responsibility for making job assignments, and responsibility for counseling with individual employees in the handling of personal problems.

General Motors foremen have been thoroughly trained in the performance of these responsibilities, the necessary authority has been delegated to them, and they are backed up by higher management in the performance of their duties. They are assisted, also, by service departments, working in specialized areas.

Every effort has been made to avoid any situation which would undermine the foreman's authority in carrying out his responsibility.

In General Motors, foremen are salaried employees and they had this status years before there was any discussion of foreman unionization.

Furthermore, it is General Motors' policy that the foreman's salary must be established on a basis equivalent to at least 125 percent of the average rate of the five highest-paid workmen under his supervision. When it is necessary to schedule a workweek which involves overtime for the workmen in a department it is the practice to pay the foreman an extended workweek premium, which maintains this differential in pay.

Other policies are in effect in General Motors applicable to such matters as vacations, group insurance, and pension and retirement plans. There are also policies and practices which give special recognition and status to the foreman as a member of management.

General Motors foremen are not regarded as "production pushers" or "straw bosses." They are not in a "no-man's land" between management and the workmen. In General Motors foremen are management.

Indeed, any steps which might now be taken by Congress to sanction the unionization of foremen in American industry would permit severance of this group from its present position and status as management and would set it apart in this very middle ground position between management and the workman. It would place the foreman in a position where he could not exercise management responsibility and authority and where he would be greatly reduced in status and effectiveness.

FOREMAN ISSUE IMPORTANT FROM PUBLIC STANDPOINT

That the fundamental principles outlined in these earlier statements continue to apply has been made clear by labor-management relations experience during and since the war. The record of General Motors in war production—14 times better than that of the rest of the industry in terms of man-hours lost due to stoppages—was due in no small degree to the foreman, who was in fact management on the production line.

Indeed, we are convinced that unless the foreman had been firmly established in his key place in management it would not have been possible for General Motors to turn out the large volume of war materials produced by our factories. This production achievement was officially recognized. Our plants received a total of 65 Army-Navy E awards for excellence and 146 stars representing extensions of these honors.

A number of individual members of the General Motors management organization were awarded certificates of merit by the President of the United States for their contributions to the war production effort.

Following the war period the position of the foreman as a member of General Motors management stood the test of the reconversion period. It stood the test, still more recently, of building up in the face of material shortages and strikes in supplier plants of peacetime production to its present record levels.

Based on our experience we do not believe there are any problems faced by the foreman which cannot be solved through the adoption of sound policies, procedures, and practices applicable to the management group of the company. Not only has this been proved true in General Motors, but there has been mounting evidence of it throughout American industry. Unionization of foremen would jeopardize their status. Moreover, it can easily be imagined how the opportunity of workmen to advance to management jobs would be limited. With foremen organized management's hands would not be free to promote workmen merely on the basis of ability and initiative.

A STEP TOWARD SOUND RELATIONS

Early last year General Motors negotiated new contracts with major unions representing its employees. These contracts were negotiated peacefully. For the first time the periods of the contracts were fixed for 2 years instead of being restricted to 1 year. These agreements were widely commented upon at the time as representing a major forward step toward sound management-labor relations. That they are just that has been demonstrated since. Relations with and among the people in General Motors plants are good. We have had fewer stoppages arising from disputes than at any time since we have had relations with labor unions. This means that within the limits of available materials we have been able to turn out the maximum quantity of badly needed goods. It means that our people have not had to lose time and pay. Within the last year many other important negotiations throughout American industry have been carried to peaceful conclusions. This is in wholesome contrast to the economic waste of the wave of strikes and stoppages in the immediate postwar period.

FOREMEN ARE FIRST-LINE MANAGEMENT

But an agreement between employer and a union, however well conceived and intentioned, is a dead letter unless it is properly administered. The agreement must be made to function, day by day, on the job, in the way it was intended by the parties. It can be made to function only by people—by the workmen and their representatives on the one hand and by management on the other. Management on the job is the foreman, as we have made clear. Regiment the foreman, tie his hands by subjecting him to union discipline, and life and meaning go out of any labor-management agreement, however constructive.

General Motors has concrete evidence that employees themselves are keenly aware of this. In a contest late in 1947 we received letters from 175,000 employees telling us what they liked (and did not like) about their jobs. The one thing that stood out above everything else was that these employees liked their jobs because of "good supervision."

FOREMAN UNIONIZATION CONTRARY TO PUBLIC INTEREST

In view of all of these facts, it is difficult to see whose interests would be served by reversing present policy on unionization of foremen. Certainly the interests of workmen would not be served. Past experience with foreman unionization in a number of instances outside General Motors demonstrates that. General Motors' experience in more than 100 plants is evidence that there are no problems faced by the foreman which require unionization. Thus the interests of foremen themselves would not be served. The interests of rank-and-file union members—and of unionism itself—would not be served. For it must be the objective of unions as it is the objective of management to work toward sound and practical relationships. Unionization of foremen would put a major block in the path toward that objective.

Finally, and most important, unionization of foremen would be against the public interest. Experience in the auto industry during the war was quite conclusive on this point. Plants with unionized foremen suffered more than others from stoppages and slow-downs arising from troubled relations on the job. In consequence, efficiency of production was impaired. Broad encouragement throughout industry of foreman unionization would mean disturbance on a mass scale of good employee-employer relations that now exist in most of industry. This could only mean loss of production efficiency on a mass scale, with poorer quality and high prices. The consumer would pay the final penalty.

FOREMAN'S MANAGEMENT STATUS WIDELY RECOGNIZED

During the period which has elapsed since our earlier testimony we feel there has been an increase in the stature of the foreman as a member of management in American industry. We believe the recognition of his status as contained in the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 has spurred this desirable development. But unionization of foremen would destroy it. This is true no matter how foremen might be organized—whether into so-called independent unions or as affiliates of an international union representing the workmen in the plant, or as affiliates of some other international union. In any case there would be the problem of dual allegiance, of attempting to serve two masters. The foreman would be neither fish nor fowl, not wholly management and not wholly labor. He would be in an untenable "middle." The consequences are easy to foresee. Endless talk and debate, turmoil, and confusion would interfere with the orderly exercise of the management function. That is an impossible situation in a plant.

It is felt that the great majority of foremen prefer, and will continue to prefer, their status as members of management. But if encouragement were now given to foreman unionization through national policy, pressure undoubtedly would be brought to bear upon foremen to join labor unions. Such pressure would come from more than one direction. It would come, of course, from whatever union might be attempting to organize foremen in a plant. But it would come also from leaders of the workmen's union in the plant, even if that union itself were not attempting to organize foremen. Pressure would be brought to bear upon the foreman even by those of his own workmen who are active union members. The net effect would be unionization by force of an important segment of management.

It is the proper concern and the policy of Congress to encourage sound and constructive labor-management relations. As pointed out, General Motors' current agreements with major unions are in line with this policy and have proved to be an important and practical step in the direction of good relations in industry. We believe these agreements as well as our position on the unionization of foremen are in line also with one of our very important operating principles, which is:

WHAT IS GOOD FOR AMERICA IS GOOD FOR GENERAL MOTORS

For the reasons already stated, General Motors reaffirms its opposition to any steps Congress might take that would make it compulsory for a company to engage in collective bargaining with members of its management.

This statement has been directed particularly to an explanation of the possible effects upon the status of the foreman in General Motors and Industry, should the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947 be changed as proposed. However, General Motors' position concerning other features of the proposed legislation, to the extent that they were commented upon by C. E. Wilson, president of General Motors, in his testimony before the United States Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare on February 5, 1947, remains the same.

STATEMENT OF GEORGE C. PHILLIPS, FOREMAN, CHRYSLER CORP., DETROIT, MICH.

Mr. Chairman, my name is George C. Phillips. I am a foreman in the Dodge Division of Chrysler Corp., located in the Detroit metropolitan area, and am first vice president of the Foremen's Association of America.

I left my work in the shop last Friday in order to appear here on behalf of organized foremen, and hope to be able to return to the plant on Tuesday. I have worked in factories since I was 12 years old, and have been with my present employer since 1924 and have been a supervisor since 1933.

Foremen at Dodge Main do not hire their own help—the help is brought in by the employment department. The rate of pay the new employee will receive is determined by the classification in which he is hired. The number of employees assigned to a group is determined by the amount of money allowed by the time-study department for the production or assembly of a given number of pieces. The equipment to be used in manufacturing or assembling the product is determined by plant engineering. The tools to be used are specified by the master mechanics division, and the number of units to be made or built is scheduled by the planning department. Quality standards are controlled by the inspection department. The final interpretation of the contract between employer and employees, other than supervisors, is the function of the labor-relations department.

It will readily be seen from the foregoing that the foreman in carrying out his numerous responsibilities is compelled to meet many conditions which he had little, if any, part in setting up. He may not hire the men and women needed, but he is responsible for their training and behavior. He may after a reasonable trial recommend that they are unsuited for the type of work in his group or department. He does not have any part in setting up schedules, but he must meet them. He does not set the wages of the worker or the price allowed for making or assembling the product, but he is responsible for reconciling the two factors in terms of efficiency.

In other words, though wages and salaries are fixed quantities, the mass-production foreman is practically operating on a piecework basis.

The foreman must endeavor at all times to keep his people satisfied under, or should I say despite, conditions which he had no hand in setting up. He must report equipment failures and tool wear, check his working area for steam or water leaks, keep absentee records of his people, keep a daily absentee chart, make a daily efficiency report and a weekly absentee report. He may discipline his people in a manner prescribed by others, usually the labor-relations department.

Though the foreman does not control quality standards, he must maintain them. As an agent of management, the foreman fulfills his many responsibilities and through cooperation with other foremen usually meets most, if not all, of the varied requirements of management. In a large mass-production plant, cooperation is essential to the success of the undertaking, and it is my experience that, since Dodge foremen have been organized, cooperation has increased greatly and benefited both foremen and management.

Much has been made of what is done for foremen by management. Allow me to make a comparison: the rank and file workers have access to group insurance and hospitalization at their own expense; they have six paid holidays a year; if they work on a holiday, they receive an additional day's pay; they receive 2 weeks' pay in lieu of vacation and may take a vacation if they so desire; they do not receive sick pay and are replaced during their absence, and they have no retirement plan.

Foremen have access to group insurance and hospitalization at their own expense; they have six paid holidays a year; if they work on a holiday, they do not receive any additional pay; they receive a limited sick pay and are not replaced during their absence. Thus, after the limited sick pay expires, the company is saving their salary. Foremen receive 2 weeks' vacation with pay; they are not replaced while absent. Their task is covered in some fashion by other foremen.

Rank-and-file workers receive time and one-half for all overtime, double time for Sunday. Foremen are not paid for overtime except Saturday, for which day they receive the equivalent to 30 percent of a week's salary—roughly, time and one-half. Foremen do not receive any pay for working Sunday, but are told they may take a day off later on.

Foremen do have a retirement plan to which they subscribe a small amount of the cost. The amount each foreman may receive in retirement varies. In my particular case, if I live to the retirement age of 65 years, I will have been with the corporation 37 years and expect to receive $10 per month.

Much has been said about the prestige and dignity of the foreman's position. These qualities are not conferred by the position; they are inherent in the person and are at times impaired by some unfortunate act of management such as occurred in 1948, when the rank and file were out on strike and foremen were put to work emptying trash from wagons and shoveling it into the incinerator. Incidents of this nature do not help the foreman to command the needed respect of the people who work under him. Under the Taft-Hartley law, foremen have the right to organize, but are denied protection of that right under the law when they attempt to exercise it. I am convinced that foremen must have protection under the law in their efforts to organize in order to take them from under the dark shadow of economic insecurity which ever hangs over them as they go about their daily tasks, knowing deep down in their hearts that, should their very livelihood be threatened by the action of management, there is no available grievance machinery through which they can seek relief, nor is there any proper court to which they may appeal for redress against any improper action of management. I will conclude by saying that, during my 16 years as supervisor, I have never had reason to believe that I am a part of management. I am an agent thereof. I am convinced that foremen, if given protection under the law for their right to organize in a bona fide foremen's union and bargain collectively with their employers on matters relative to their own well-being, will prove to employers that organized foremen are a boon to industry, and will not create the chaos so fearfully predicted by the manufacturers representatives.

Statement of Donald Kirkpatrick, General Counsel, American Farm Bureau Federation, Concerning Labor-Management Relations Legislation

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my name is Donald Kirkpatrick. I am the general counsel of the American Farm Bureau Federation. I appear in reference to H. R. 2032, which proposes to repeal the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 and reenact the Wagner Labor Act of 1935. I speak here today on behalf of the American Farm Bureau Federation, a national general farm organization. Its organizational structure consists of State farm bureaus at the State level; county farm bureaus at the county level, and over 1,325,000 farm families at the farm level. The representative policy-making group at the national level is the voting delegate body, which in 1948 was composed of 139 farmers, speaking for farmers in all sections of continental United States and Puerto Rico.

At the recent annual meeting of voting delegates and members, held in Atlantic City during December of 1948, policy resolutions were initially formulated, after days of consideration, by a resolutions committee consisting of 33 persons from the several States within the four great agricultural regions of the country. The committee consisted of the following persons:

R. E. Short of Arkansas, chairman.

Midwestern States: Charles B. Shuman of Illinois, Hassil E. Schenck of Indiana, H. E. Slusher of Missouri, Frank W. White of Minnesota, H. A. Praeger of Kansas, E. Howard Hill of Iowa, Perry L. Green of Ohio, C. E. Buskirk of Michigan, W. A. Plath of North Dakota, Mrs. Raymond Sayre of Iowa, Mrs. Russell Cushman of Indiana.

Southern States: Walter L. Randolph of Alabama, H. L. Wingate of Georgia, R. Flake Shaw of North Carolina, L. F. Allen of Kentucky, J. Walter Hammond of Texas, Ransom E. Aldrich of Mississippi, Thomas J. Hitch of Tennessee, John I. Taylor of Oklahoma, Mrs. D. W. Bond of Tennessee.

Northeastern States: Warren W. Hawley of New York, Herbert W. Voorhees of New Jersey, Edward P. Rowland of Connecticut, S. Lothrop Davenport of Massachusetts, Clyde Bonar of West Virginia, Mrs. Roy C. F. Weagly of Maryland, Mrs. Lynn Perkins of New York.

Western States: Ray B. Wiser of California, Ralph T. Gillespie of Washington, W. Lowell Steen of Oregon, Delmar Roberts of New Mexico, Mrs. Harold Wright of Montana.

The following resolution on the subject matter covered by H. R. 2032 was submitted by the resolutions committee and unanimously adopted by the voting delegate body:

LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS

"The welfare of the Nation depends upon the prosperity of all segments of our economy. The rights and benefits of all the people of the United States are paramount to those of any one group or class. Farmers know we cannot maintain a sound national economy if labor, management, or farmers follow unsound or unfair practices. Thus, the welfare of all demands that both labor and industry accept their duties and responsibilities in assuring industrial peace and full production.

"Farmers produce abundantly even in periods of low prices. To do otherwise would jeopardize the health and welfare of the American people. Labor has little to gain if increased wages are translated into higher prices for the things they buy. The only real way the standard of living of labor can be improved is by increased real income resulting from high productivity per man. A high level of production at fair prices is the objective of American agriculture. We recommend that both labor and industry accept it as their objective.

"The American Farm Bureau Federation favors maintaining such provisions of law as will protect the general welfare. Strikes in industries essential to the public welfare, jurisdictional strikes, secondary boycotts, hot cargoes, closed shop, wildcat strikes, the use of force and violence, obstruction of commerce, or destruction of property are not in the national interest, and consequently not in the long-time interest of labor itself.

"Management must cooperate with labor to improve working conditions, assure policies which will give high real income to workers, and follow such other policies as will contribute to full and sustained industrial production and employment. Monopolistic practices which result in low production and high prices, unreasonable profits, inefficient management, lock-outs, and other activities which provide the basis for instability in labor-management relations must be corrected.

"Uncontrolled economic power in the hands of either management or labor leaders can equally be a threat to our national well-being. Legislation should be designed to protect the public interest against the selfish exercise of autocratic power either by labor or by management.

"We support a reasonable minimum wage for labor. In our judgment, a reasonable minimum wage should fluctuate either up or down with the cost of living.

"We urge our Government to develop and aggressively follow a vigorous antimonopoly program. The elimination of all monopoly except that under Government regulation and control is essential to the successful operation of the competitive system. Farmers and others cannot produce for a free market if prices in large segments of our economy are rigged by monopolistic practices."

I am certain that in making these recommendations it was not the intention of the Farm Bureau leaders to be either prolabor or antilabor. Likewise, it was not their intention to be promanagement or antimanagement. Our full resolution on labor-management relations is intended to provide the sort of economic philosophy which might well serve as the basis for real cooperation among the great economic groups in this country.

The board of directors of the organization, with a membership of 22 persons, representing all of the agricultural regions of the United States, has the duty, within the framework of the national legislative policy resolutions, to direct the actions of the executive officers. The board of directors held a 4-day meeting here in Washington, January 24–27, 1949. They instructed the executive officers to support aggressively such action as will best assure the maintenance of adequate legislation in the field of labor-management relations.

Prior to the consideration and enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, farm organizations did not take an active interest in labor legislation pending before the Congress. However, since that time there has been an ever-increasing interest on the part of general farm organizations in labor-management problems. We believe this is as it should be. After all, farmers have a manifold interest in the development and maintenance of healthy labor-management relations: (1) They are interested in having freely available widespread markets for farm products; (2) they have a vital stake in making certain that services performed between the producer and the consumer are done efficiently; (3) costs of things farmers buy are an important factor in the farm economy (farm operating costs in 1948 were higher than total gross farm income any year prior to 1942); and (4) farm people are interested in promoting, to the best of their ability, policies and programs which are in the general interest, for they know that only through the development and maintenance of a dynamic, full-production economy can the interests of farm people themselves be promoted and sustained.

I should like to reread that paragraph of our resolution which deals most directly with the subject matter of H. R. 2032:

"The American Farm Bureau Federation favors maintaining such provisions of law as will protect the general welfare. Strikes in industries essential to the public welfare, jurisdictional strikes, secondary boycotts, hot cargoes, closed shop, wildcat strikes, the use of force and violence, obstruction of commerce, or destruction of property are not in the national interest, and consequently not in the long-time interest of labor itself."

We do not presume to be experts in the field of labor-management relations; neither do I presume to be thoroughly acquainted with the technicalities of present laws on this specialized subject or of the implications of proposed legislation in this field. Nevertheless, in behalf of American farmers, we urge members of this committee to make certain that the Government has the power under law to deal with strikes that jeopardize the national welfare. Concentration of power which can threaten the public health and safety is dangerous, whether it be in industry, labor, or agriculture. We believe it is the duty of Congress, which we sincerely believe to be the best protector of the people's welfare, to make certain that our Government has the capacity to deal effectively with threats to the general welfare.

In his annual address to the 1948 convention of the American Farm Bureau Federation, Allan B. Kline, president of the organization, said:

"Monopoly is a bad thing. Traditionally, we have thought of it as centralization of capital used to control production of goods, their prices and distribution. The time has come when we must take note, as part of the public, of the apparent capacity of well-organized groups of labor, some of them very small, to disrupt production and distribution in this country. Monopoly is no more in the public interest if it is operated by a labor union than it is if it is imposed by a cartel. The farmer is interested in full production, in high real wages for labor. The farmer knows full well that his own real income depends upon continuing high production in the rest of the economy. We are more than willing as farmers, each of us to produce with the resources at his command. All we wish to get is what we earn. We insist, however, that those things must be done which will accomplish continuing high production in the rest of the economy. Personally, I am sure that this can only be facilitated by laws. That much the laws can and must do. With even the best of laws, however, there is much dependent on honest efforts of citizens working freely in a productive and progressive society."

It is our firm belief that the provisions of H. R. 2032 definitely need strengthening in at least three very important particulars which are of vital importance to the public and to American agriculture.

(1) Restraining orders against certain strikes and lock-out.—H. R. 2032 contains no provisions empowering the President of the United States, upon recommendation of a board of inquiry, to direct the Attorney General to apply for a restraining order to enjoin for a limited period—a reasonable cooling-off period, if you please—a threatened or actual strike or lock-out affecting an entire industry when the national health or safety is imperiled. There are some who contend that such power presently exists exclusive of any more recently enacted legislation. There are others who challenge the existence of such power. Our organization expresses no opinion as to the existence or nonexistence of this implied power. At best, the question is a highly debatable one. The American Farm Bureau Federation strongly urges the Congress to take affirmative action to place this power in the hands of the President of the United States, subject only to the condition precedent of the recommendation of a fact-finding inquiry.

(2) Jurisdictional strikes.—In our opinion, H. R. 2032 does not adequately provide for handling jurisdictional disputes between labor organizations, when such disputes degenerate into jurisdictional strikes seriously affecting innocent third parties. The public is entitled to protection against such conflicts. Such family fights between labor organizations must continue to be defined as unfair labor practices, with violations subject to appropriate civil sanctions. Farmers have too long been the innocent victims of these unsocial and vicious practices.

The American Farm Bureau Federation stands firmly for positive provisions of law outlawing such practices.

(3) Secondary boycotts.—H. R. 2032 does not adequately outlaw secondary boycotts. These instrumentalities are dangerous weapons. The possession and use of them must be made unlawful and finally subject, if need be, to the restraining processes of Federal courts. The public, and farmers in particular, must not again be subjected to the abuses of such practices, whether exercised by labor groups, or by labor groups in collusion with employers. Protection against such practices must be preserved.

We respectfully urge this committee to make certain that protection of the public interest in these three important matters be definitely assured by Federal statute.

STATEMENT OF CHARLES W. HOLMAN, SECRETARY, NATIONAL COOPERATIVE MILK PRODUCERS FEDERATION, RELATIVE TO H. R. 2032

As a national agricultural organization of dairy farmers, the National Cooperative Milk Producers Federation is vitally interested in the subject of labor-management relations. The federation consists of 86 cooperative dairy associations and more than 600 submember associations owned and controlled by over 425,000 farm families in 47 States. These farmers through their cooperatives marketed in 1948 over 20,000,000,000 pounds of whole milk equivalent, which was approximately one-fifth of all the milk and cream that left the farm, in commerce. At annual meetings prior and subsequent to the enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, the voting delegates of the federation passed resolutions clearly setting forth our position on labor-management relations.

We are opposed to the proposals as contained in H. R. 2032.

For several years our organization has given much thought and deliberate consideration to the establishment and maintenance of a sound national labor relations policy so that there may be assured the preservation of a free labor and a free competitive enterprise. Our interest in the subject of labor-management has been in connection with the over-all problems affecting the national welfare of all the people in these United States, with particular concern over the impact of certain activities upon agricultural operations. We insist that the rights of the general public are paramount to the rights of any one segment of our national economy, whether it be agriculture, labor, or industry.

Prior to the enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, we indicated on several occasions our anxiety and perturbation over an apparent trend of widespread industrial strife, with ever-increasing tendencies on the part of certain labor leaders and their labor unions totally to disregard the rights and welfare of the general public. It was our opinion that a continuation of such a trend would be harmful not only to the public, but also would curtail the economic freedom and employment opportunities of a large number of willing workers. Predicated upon this opinion, we urged the enactment of constructive legislation which would correct the then existing situation in the field of labor relations and develop a mature and stable national labor policy which would have the respect and trust of labor management so as to secure harmonious relations between employers and employees with resultant benefits to all segments of our economy.

As a result of the efforts of many people sincerely interested in the welfare of our Nation, legislation cited as the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, was enacted by the Congress of the United States, overriding a Presidential veto. This act has as its purpose among other things: Prescribing the legitimate rights of employees and employers; providing an orderly procedure for the settlement of disputes; protecting the rights of individual employees in their relations with labor organizations; defining and proscribing practices on the part of labor and management which affect commerce and are inimical to the general welfare; and protecting the rights of the public in connection with labor disputes.

A fair and unbiased appraisal of the operation of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, indicates that gratifying progress has been made in reducing industrial strife and stabilizing relations between industry and labor, with substantial benefits to all people in the United States. Improvement in labor-management relations is due in large part to the establishment of mutual legal duties and responsibilities. Economic power without corresponding responsibilities, whether by labor or management, will always make possible the exercise of such power in total disregard of the rights and welfare of the general public.

Notwithstanding the restoration of labor-management equilibrium, with resultant orderly collective bargaining, and industrial peace and justice, tremendous publicity has been issued for the repeal of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, and substituting in lieu thereof the provisions, with some revision, of the National Labor Relations Act, or the so-called Wagner Act.

No individual or organization genuinely interested in the rights and welfare of our Nation would advocate a return to the chaotic conditions existing prior to the enactment of the Labor-Management Reltions Act, 1947, and yet that is precisely the probable effect of the enactment of the bill H. R. 2032.

In opposing H. R. 2032 no inference should be made that we hold that the present law should be retained unchanged. It is axiomatic that laws are dynamic and a manifestation of changing conditions. Therefore, based on time and guided by experience, legislation should be enacted reflecting new concepts and ideas. So it is with respect to laws pertaining to labor-management relations. Serious and unprejudiced consideration should be given to needed revisions to the present law in order that further improvement can be achieved in the field of employee and employer relationship.

As a guide to enacting progressive legislation which will give assurance that the rights and welfare of the public will continue to be paramount to that of any one segment of our national economy, the balance of this statement will be devoted to a consideration of some specific subjects concerning labor-management relations.

1. Definition of agricultural labor.—Considerable confusion and uncertainty has existed since the enactment in 1935 of the National Labor Relations Act concerning agricultural exemption from the provisions of the act. Although the act specifically states that the term "employee" shall "* * * not include any individual employed as an agricultural laborer," the act failed to define "agricultural labor." As a consequence every time a dispute arose involving agriculture, the National Labor Relations Board had to make a determination as to whether or not the employees in question came within the exemption. In the absence of a definition of agricultural labor, the Board could never for a certainty know if it properly had jurisdiction of the case, and frequently jurisdiction was assumed in contravention of generally accepted definitions of agriculture or agricultural labor.

In order to remove all doubt as to the limitation of authority of the National Labor Relations Board concerning agriculture, the Congress incorporated in appropriation bills a prohibition against the use of funds in cases involving agricultural labor as that term is defined in the Fair Labor Standards Act. The appropriation for the National Labor Relations Board for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1949, contains a similar prohibition.

During the consideration of proposed legislation of labor relations, subsequently enacted as the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, strenuous efforts were made to include a provision defining agricultural labor either as contained in the Fair Labor Standards Act or in the Social Security Act. The Senate and House conferees could not agree on which definition to accept. Hence legislation was enacted again failing to define the term "agricultural labor."

We are cerain the Congress will recognize the need for incorporation in proposed legislation on labor relations a definition of agricultural labor and we respectfully urge the adoption of either the definition as contained in the Fair Labor Standards Act or the Social Security Act, preferably the latter since it delineates in greater detail agricultural operations.

2. The health, safety, and welfare of the public.—Adequate authority and power must be available at all times to cope effectively with activities and practices which endanger the health, safety, and welfare of the public. Merely providing a so-called cooling-off period is totally inadequate. It is futile to expect to control actual or threatened strikes or lock-outs which imperil the Nation by finding "that a national emergency is threatened or exists because of a stoppage of work has resulted or threatens to result from a labor dispute"; by issuing "a proclamation to that effect"; and by calling "upon the parties to the dispute to refrain from a stoppage of work or, if such stoppage has occurred, to resume work and operations in the public interest."

The power of injunction to enforce appropriate orders must be continued.

3. Secondary boycotts.—The use of secondary boycotts is aimed in many cases directly against the operations of farmers and farmer cooperatives. It is a pernicious form of compulsion to achieve union objectives of increased membership and employee representation. Farmer cooperatives and the individual farmer are innocent victims and unless the use of this destructive power is unconditionally prohibited, they are helpless to prevent the deterioration and decreased value of agricultural commodities caused by the refusal of certain workers to handle the merchandise. Farmers refuse to endure again the hardships and financial losses incurred due to the secondary boycotts so frequently practiced prior to the enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947. We insist there is no such thing as a good secondary boycott. Every type of secondary boycott must be prohibited, not merely those in connection with jurisdictional strikes. Injunctive relief and recovery of damages must be available against this abuse of power.

4. Jurisdictional strikes.—Equally responsible as secondary boycotts are jurisdictional strikes. The farmer or his cooperative in this case is an innocent third party of a dispute between labor organizations. It is our opinion that all jurisdictional strikes are unjustified and we insist that full protection must be given against this indefensible practice, with injunctive relief whenever needed.

5. Rights of employees.—Farmers of America believe in the right of labor to organize and to bargain collectively for the purpose of advancing their welfare, but with such right, it must be recognized that employees should also have the right to refrain from joining a union or participating in concerted activities.

To safeguard these rights, individual employees or groups of employees must be given protection against any acts of compulsion by employers or labor leaders and their unions, such as coercion, intimidation, violence, or threats. Any legislative proposal which will destroy this protection is of utmost concern to all who believe in freedom of action by the individual employee. We insist that neither employers nor labor organizations should have immunity from restraints against such form of compulsion.

6. Contractual responsibility.—The philosophy of collective bargaining is the achievement of peaceful labor relations through negotiation, with the terms agreed upon embodied in a legal contract. The success of collective bargaining depends upon the extent to which both parties carry out their obligations under the agreement. Any effort to limit contractual responsibility upon only one party to the contract dooms the effectiveness and value of collective bargaining. To preserve the sanctity of contract, both parties must be held accountable for the failure to perform according to the provisions of the contract and may be subject to legal action for the enforcement of the contract.

7. Freedom of speech.—The Constitution of the United States assures to all the right of free speech. There must be no qualifications as to the possession of this right in the field of labor-management relations. Individual employees are entitled to be given all the facts as presented both by management and by labor organizations. To abridge the right of freedom of speech for the employer, but to permit labor unions and labor union organizers to freely express their views, is to create a condition of inequity and set up obstacles in the development of harmonious relations.

With such rights, care must be taken that any expression or statement of fact is not accompanied by coercion or threats of reprisal.

8. Supervisory employees.—The very nature of a foreman's duties or other supervisory employee makes such person an instrumentality of management in dealing with labor. He is the point of contact between the employer and the individual employee. Such duties imply a delegation of authority and to permit a foreman to be organized by the same union which represents the employees supervised by such foreman, inevitably raises serious difficulties, particularly with respect to conflicting loyalties on the part of the supervisory employees.

To assure the elimination of conflicts of interest and give management the individual loyalty of such representatives of management and to prevent the disruption of efficient production, it is highly desirable that management should not be required to bargain with foremen or other supervisory employees.

In conclusion, we want to emphasize again, as we have on many occasions in the past, that the National Cooperative Milk Producers Federation is neither prolabor nor antilabor. By the same token it is neither promanagement nor antimanagement. The farmer members of our organization are interested in and concerned wtih the welfare of all the people in the United States, and they have a strong conviction that the law which is best for all is best for labor and best for management. We respectfully urge the enactment of legislation which will provide for the exercise of powers and discharge of duties and responsibilities by labor and industry in accordance with the principles of democracy, which in turn will assure full employment and full production.

STATEMENT OF H. L. WINGATE, PRESIDENT, GEORGIA FARM BUREAU FEDERATION, MACON, GA.

My name is H. L. Wingate. I am president of the Georgia Farm Bureau Federation, which has a membership of more than 75,000 Georgia farm families, a vast majority of which are small, family-type farmers. I am also a member of the board of directors of the American Farm Bureau Federation, which has a membership of more than 11 million farm families in 45 of the 48 States.

At the annual meeting of the American Farm Bureau in December 1948, a resolution on labor-management relations was adopted after long and careful deliberation on the subject. I quote from the resolution as follows:

"The welfare of the Nation depends upon the prosperity of all segments of our economy. The rights and benefits of all the people of the United States are paramount to those of any one group or class. Farmers know we cannot maintain a sound national economy if labor, management, or farmers follow unsound or unfair practices. Thus, the welfare of all demands that both labor and indusrty accept their duties and responsibilities in assuring industrial peace and full production.

"Farmers produce abundantly even in periods of low prices. To do otherwise would jeopardize the health and welfare of the American people. Labor has little to gain if increased wages are translated into higher prices for the things they buy. The only real way the standard of living of labor can be improved is by increased real income resulting from high productivity per man. A high level of production at fair prices is the objective of American agriculture. We recommend that both labor and industry accept it as their objective.

"The American Farm Bureau Federation favors maintaining such provisions of law as will protect the general welfare. Strikes in industries essential to the public welfare, jurisdictional strikes, secondary boycotts, hot cargoes, closed shop, wildcat strikes, the use of force and violence, obstruction of commerce, or destruction of property are not in the national interest, and consequently not in the long-time interest of labor itself.

"Management must cooperate with labor to improve working conditions, assure policies which will give high real income to workers, and follow such other policies as will contribute to full and sustained industrial production and employment. Monopolistic practices which result in low production and high prices, unreasonable profits, inefficient management, lock-outs, and other activities which provide the basis for instability in labor-management relations must be corrected.

"Uncontrolled economic power in the hands of either management or labor leaders can equally be a threat to our national well-being. Legislation should be designed to protect the public interest against the selfish exercise of autocratic power either by labor or by management." The Georgia's Farm Bureau participated in the preparation of this resolution and we subscribe to it fully.

Obviously, this resolution is neither antilabor nor antimanagement. Rather, it deals with a set of principles which the Georgia Farm Bureau believes should be incorporated in whatever labor-management legislation is enacted by the Eighty-first Congress.

The farmer who owns any portion of the land or equipment which he operates is a capitalist. Also, he must be a laborer if he chooses to be a farmer. He is willing to endure the hard work and long hours associated with his business because he is an individualist; he values his freedom of activity more than he values the added gains which might come to him in other types of endeavor. So the farmer is in a logical position to look objectively at the problem of labor-management relations because he is representative of the three basic segments of our economy: labor, management, and agriculture. He is a part of each. He believes that what is good for one is good for all. At the same time he knows that the surest way to create economic chaos is to allow any one of these three basic segments an undue advantage over the others.

The Georgia Farm Bureau stands firmly for equality of opportunity between labor, management, and agriculture. The history of this Nation has taught us that stability and prosperity cannot be maintained when any one of these groups is out of line for any length of time, or when any one of the groups is in position to suppress or depress the others.

We witnessed an era not too long ago when managment and capital were given undue advantages over labor. The results were bad, and millions of workingmen suffered. Then the pendulum swung and we witnesses an era when labor leaders were given undue advantages over management, over the workingmen whom they represented, and over agriculture. In due time that system was responsible for internal strife, for inefficiencies, monopolies, suppression of freedom, exploitation of power, and eventually for demands by the public that corrective legislation be enacted.

In both cases the failure of the system was due to disregard for the basic principle that a reasonable balance of opportunity, of advantage and freedom must be maintained among the major economic groups.

So far, there have been only brief periods in our history when agriculture has been on an economic level with capital and labor. But, if the time ever comes when agriculture, either through actions of Government or for other reasons, is given an undue advantage over these other segments, the results will be the same.

Two years ago, because organized labor was exploiting its legalized powers to the detriment of the whole Nation, the people demanded and got corrective legislation. Unquestionably, this legislation was aimed at equalizing the advantages of labor and management. The record speaks for itself on the effectiveness of the law in stabilizing relations between the two groups and in preventing national emergencies. However, since passage of the act, labor-union officials have said that it is a slave-labor bill; that it is an insult to the workingman; that it is crushing the organized-labor movement, and many other things. Now, in response to the demands of labor, and without regard for the record of the effectiveness of the law, the administration proposes to do away with Taft-Hartley and take us back to the situation that prevailed prior to 1947. Actually, the workingmen of the Nation have not suffered due to the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947.

The thousands of farmers whom I represent are not particularly interested in whether or not the Taft-Hartley law is maintained as such, or whether we have a Thomas-Lesinski bill, or a bill by any other name. But they are intensely interested in developing and maintaining legislation that will insure a proper balance between labor and management. Stated differently, they are rigidly opposed to legislation that places labor or management in position to suppress other groups.

It may be that some of the Taft-Hartley law needs correcting, but certainly a law that received such long and careful study and had such overwhelming support in Congress cannot be all bad. This Congress has an obligation to labor to change the law in those instances where it creates an undue hardship on the laboring man. But the Congress must not forget that it also has a responsibility to the rest of the Nation to see that the chaos which prevailed prior to 1946 is not reimposed.

The Georgia Farm Bureau believes that the same basic principles apply, whether Congress is legislating in behalf of labor, of industry, or of agriculture. Consequently, the Taft-Hartley law should be examined, not in light of the broad criticisms which have been leveled against it by those whose powers have been curtailed, but in light of the principles involved as they apply to the laboring man, to industry, to agriculture—in fact, to the economy of the Nation as a whole.

Should a man have a right to work in an endeavor of his own choosing, according to his own abilities, without paying tribute to those who would dictate his actions? The farmers believe that he should. It is basic to the American system of individual freedom. We would oppose to the end any efforts to deny this right to a man engaged in agriculture, and we believe that the same principle is just as applicable to labor. We recommend, therefore, that the ban on the closed shop in the Taft-Hartley be retained.

We feel that both employees and employers should have the right of free speech, within reasonable limits. Naturally, neither employees nor employers should be allowed to attain their ends through such methods as coercion and bribery. We do not favor a return to the situation which prevailed under the Wagner Act. I am not a labor expert, but it is no secret that, under it, employers were muzzled while union leaders were given full freedom of discussion. The Taft-Hartley Act gave the employers the same rights of free speech that it gave employees. This, to us, seems a desirable objective.

The two points I have mentioned are matters of principle upon which, as we see it, everyone should be able to agree. As farmers, we did not come directly in contact with many phases of the Wagner Act, and I am not qualified to discuss them. We did, however, have some experience with secondary boycotts. The ordinary secondary boycott is one in which union employees refuse to handle or deal with goods (including agricultural commodities) that are made, produced, or handled by nonunion labor.

In instance after instance, under the Wagner Act, farmers stood by and watched their produce rot and become valueless because union labor would not allow it to be unloaded. In some instances, the driver of the truck, according to union employees, did not belong to a union. Other reasons were given in other instances.

Mr. Edward A. O'Neill, in testimony before the House Education and Labor Committee during the Eightieth Congress, insisted that the secondary boycott be outlawed.

The Taft-Hartley Act made secondary boycotts an unfair labor practice and provided for an injunction to restrain them.

Our experience has been that the act gives farmers and others protection against secondary boycotts. We would like to see this protection continued, and recommend strongly against any proposal which would weaken the act in this regard.

Farmers also have been the innocent bystander during jurisdictional or sympathy strikes. These strikes, under certain conditions, have operated like secondary boycotts. Unions could not agree upon the handling of farm products; consequently, nobody handled them.

Even union leaders do not defend jurisdictional strikes. Under the Taft-Hartley Act they have almost ceased, and we see no reason for changing provisions which obviously have done what they were intended to do.

We feel that provisions in the present law which require both employer and employee to bargain in good faith are fair and just. If anyone can explain why only employers should be required to bargain in good faith, I certainly am willing to be educated.

We think workers should have the right to join unions or not to join unions, as they see fit, and once union members they should be protected in their rights from both employers and union leaders. We would strongly oppose any move to require farmers to join a farm organization. The same principle is applicable to labor.

The use of force and violence in labor disputes cannot be condoned. We are not too certain that existing law goes far enough in this regard, for there are recurrent reports of mass picketing that is in reality a form of coercion.

The Georgia Farm Bureau believes that the right of individual States to legislate on labor-management relations should be protected. Our own State legislature has enacted a ban on the closed shop and on jurisdictional strikes. This action was taken only after the most careful consideration and represents the judgment of our legislature as being in the best interests of labor, of management, and the State as a whole.

To deny our State governments the right to act in their own best interest would be a serious blow to our constitutional form of government.

Finally, we favor giving Government the power to deal with strikes in basic industries. Only recently the need for some such legislation once more impressed itself upon the American people when John L. Lewis called out the mine workers. Labor objects to the use of the injunction to deal with national emergencies caused by labor disputes, and the administration seems to agree with them. Yet, the administration has used the injunctive powers in six cases. Twice the courts held Lewis guilty of contempt for violating an injunction not to strike. In view of the successful use of the national emergency dispute provisions, we strongly urge their retention.

In conclusion, let me say again that existing labor legislation must be looked at from the standpoint of the welfare of the entire country. Slogans and generalized charges should not sway the committee. The fundamental to be considered is the welfare of the people of the entire country. This requires fairness to labor, fairness to management, and fairness to agriculture.

STATEMENT BY J. GORDON DAKINS, GENERAL MANAGER, ON BEHALF OF THE NATIONAL RETAIL DRY GOODS ASSOCIATION

The National Retail Dry Goods Association is a voluntary trade organization whose members operate some 7,000 retail department and specialty stores located in every State in the Union. Its membership comprises small as well as large retail stores. Approximately 65 percent of its members do an annual volume of business of less than one million dollars.

Many of its members now have one or more collective-bargaining agreements in force with labor unions. Our members are directly interested in and affected by legislation governing collective-bargaining activities.

Retail management's stake in labor legislation is not in laws that tend to impair or limit the right of employees to join unions or the right of unions to represent them in free and honest collective-bargaining activities. Management's stake rather is in laws that do two things: First, prescribe rules of fair conduct in order that employees, when asked to merge their individual interest with the interest of an entire group, may exercise their choice in an informed and intelligent manner free of coercion or fear of any kind from any source; and, second, laws that protect management against the impairment of efficient and continuous business operation.

Retailing is essentially a local business serving customers of its community and immediate trading area. It is intrastate in character. No retail department or specialty-store establishment, to our knowledge, makes a majority of its sales outside of the State in which it is located.

Because of its intrastate character, the question may arise as to why retailing should be concerned with Federal labor legislation applying to interstate commerce. The answer is simple. Retailing as an industry has never requested that it be subject to Federal labor legislation. When the original Wagner Act was passed, retailers generally did not believe that they were subject to the provisions of the act or to the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board. However, both the National Labor Relations Board and the highest courts consistently ruled that they were covered, principally on the basis that stores purchased most of the goods which they sold from outside of the State in which they were located.

The National Labor Management Relations Act of 1947 contained the same "commerce" clause as the Wagner Act. Under it, the National Labor Relations Board and the courts have continued to hold that retail employers—large or small—who buy and receive goods from other States are subject to the present act. This same "commerce" clause is contained in the proposed bill now before your committee. If the proposed bill is enacted retailers will be subject to its provisions. Because of this, the National Retail Dry Goods Association has a direct interest on the behalf of its members and the consuming public in urging that any new legislation enacted provide for fair, well-balanced regulations which will really promote sound and equitable management—labor relations.

Retailing is currently confronted with a multiple-pronged drive by various labor unions to organize employees in stores throughout the country. This announced drive comes not only from the leading unions but from various subdivisions within both the CIO and the AFL. It is bound to be confusing to both management and employees—and particularly the employees when they may be solicited by several union organizations simultaneously to represent them with their managements. It resolves itself simply to a contest, between management on the one hand and the labor organization on the other, for the loyalty of employees. If management is to have an equal opportunity in retaining the loyalty of their employees and if the employees are to exercise their free choice in an intelligent manner in the absence of coercion or fear, rules of fair conduct should be prescribed and specifically set forth by legislative enactment which will apply equally and fairly to management and to unions. We believe the establishment of these principles is necessary in the best interests of the public and of the employees and employers in the retail industry. We therefore strongly urge that any new labor legislation to be enacted or any amendment of existing labor legislation should establish the following principles by the direct incorporation in the law itself, of provisions to effectuate their purposes.

1. Freedom of speech for both management and unions in labor matters.—New legislation should insure the right of employers as well as labor organizations to freely express their views on labor matters provided that such statements in themselves do not threaten economic reprisal or violence, or give promise of benefits. Labor has long enjoyed complete freedom of speech. Employers were said to have had the right of free speech under the original National Labor Relations Act; but that right for management was so restricted and so qualified under the so-called course-of-action doctrine and the captive-audience theory that it was only with the enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 that an employer was really free to express his views and opinions in a labor dispute. This right of management should continue to be explicitly stated in legislation.

2. Outlaw the "closed shop," but permit the "union shop."—The present prohibition against the closed shop contained in the present LMRA should be continued but the troublesome and costly procedure for union shop elections can certainly be discontinued, leaving that issue to collective bargaining. Retailing has always been a free field of employment and is not adapted to so-called hiring halls. Because of the public contact nature of the retail business, high standards of appearance and other personality traits are basic employment requirements. The retailer should be free to select his employees from any available source, and at the same time opportunities for a career in retailing should be available to all. Union scurity in retailing can always be protected without infringement of either the individual's right to seek employment wheresoever he may choose or of management's right to select his own employees.

Related to the right of the employee to freely solicit employment is the principle that he should not be deprived of employment, once attained, merely because of expulsion from a union other than for the nonpayment of dues and initiation fees.

3. Guaranteeing individuals the right to engage in or to refrain from engaging in concerted union activities.—The overriding purpose of labor legislation has been the right of employees to determine for themselves whether they prefer to deal with management individually and directly on questions of wages, hours, and conditions of employment—or whether they prefer to be represented by a union. All other provisions of labor law which establish rights or obligations for employees, labor organizations and employers flow from this fundamental right vested in employees. Section 7 of the N. L. R. A. (Wagner Act) announcing employees' right to engage in concerted activities established the foundation upon which employer unfair labor practices were based. The present L. M. R. A. paralleled the N. L. R. A. by adding a provision to section 7 recognizing the fundamental right of employees to refrain from such concerted activities. Thus was established the basis that union interference with this fundamental right by way of coercion or encouragement of certain strikes and boycotts for illegal purposes constituted union unfair labor practices. The safeguard this fundamental right of the individual to make up his own mind on the question of representation requires that any new labor legislation reiterate his right to engage in or refrain from engaging in concerted activities for the purposes of collective bargaining.

4. Setting forth unfair labor practices by unions as well as by management particularly with respect to strikes and boycotts for illegal purposes including provision for injunctive relief.—The right of an employee to freely select his bargaining agent should be guaranteed against coercion not only by the employer but also against coercion by the union.

Similarly it should be an unfair labor practice for one union to strike for bargaining rights where another union has been certified or has contractual relations with the employer. If an employer is legally obligated to deal with a particular union, surely the same law that imposes the duty should protect him against efforts to force him to deal with any other union. The present act prevents such a distortion by making these activities subject to injunction and it is difficult to find any justification for its repeal.

It should also be unlawful for any union to engage in picketing and boycotting of a secondary nature which involves "picketing of the premises of or refusal to work for, or refusal to handle merchandise for a person who is not a party of the labor dispute which such acts are intended to affect." Such boycotts invariably result in loss and inconvenience to innocent bystanders who have no connection with the particular labor dispute. Retailers are especially susceptible to secondary strikes and boycotts. They feel strongly that parties to a dispute should be required to settle their differences between themselves.

Similarly it should be an unfair labor practice for employees or a union to engage in a jurisdictional strike. Here, too, an employer is confronted with demands by opposing unions which he cannot resolve. It is an issue which he has not created and cannot settle. The law should continue to protect him against such senseless harm.

Legislation should also define other unfair labor practices by unions which experience has already established—such as refusal to bargain, and "featherbedding."

5. Require NLRB to seek injunctive relief in instances of illegal strikes and boycotts.—New labor legislation should continue to make it mandatory for the Board to seek injunctive relief where labor unions strike to force employers to capitulate to illegal demands and practices as outlined in the preceding principle. Whereas the present law leaves it to the discretion of the Board to act in cases involving jurisdictional disputes, we think here, too, injunctive relief should be made mandatory.

6. In determining appropriate bargaining units the extent to which employees have been organized should not be controlling.—Prior to the enactment of the L. M. R. A., the Board permitted unions to carve units out of larger groups depending largely upon the extent to which the unions had succeeded in organizing among a given group of employees. This was true even though the employees so organized composed an integral part of a larger operating unit.

The L. M. R. A. attempted to minimize such "accident of organization" by providing that the extent of organization should not be controlling in determining the appropriate unit. The implication being that greater consideration be given to the actual business operations and conditions of employment for all employees concerned in determining the appropriate unit.

This principle is particularly pertinent to retailing and should be continued. In the past, unions have sought to establish units consisting of individual selling departments rather than the selling force as a whole.

In other instances they have concentrated upon certain nonselling groups rather than on all related nonselling activities. Such balkanization of employees into splinter groups disregards completely the close relationship among the many and varied operations characterizing retailing. And what is most important, it ignores the factors of uniformity of working conditions, personnel policies and practices, compensation methods, and supervision for all retail employees, thereby destroying the true operating unit and curtailing management's efficiency.

7. Exclusion of supervisor from bargaining rights.—Supervisors are part of management and represent the employer to rank-and-file employees. By the very definition spelled out in the L. M. R. A., true supervisors are vested with such genuine management prerogatives as the right to hire or fire, discipline, promote, grant rate increases or to make effective recommendations with respect to such action. Membership in a labor organization, whether a rank-and-file union or an organization of foremen would obviously create conflicts of interest incompatible with their obligations as management representatives. While it is unlikely that legislation can prevent supervisory membership in unions, the law ought not to encourage the unionization of supervisors, and employers should continue to be relieved of any compulsion to recognize and bargain with unions on behalf of supervisors.

8. Permitting the employer or individual employees, as well as labor unions to petition for elections.—The employer and the employee should have equal recourse to the NLRB in the matter of representation elections to preserve the peaceful method of settling disputes whether it be one union or several unions seeking representation rights. The argument advanced by unions that such a provision could serve to permit employers to effectively frustrate employee organization by petitioning for an election immediately upon the appearance of organizers must necessarily fail because the Board still retains the discretion to dismiss petitions whenever conditions make an election inappropriate. When only the union is given the right to petition for an election, management may be pressured by unions for recognition in instances where there is doubt that they truly represent the employees and where the union refuses to submit the claim to formal determination under the Board's facilities.

Similarly, the right of the employee to petition for decertification election should be preserved. Also, management and employees should be protected from unnecessary harassment by some restriction on the frequency with which elections for representation purposes are held.

9. Provide restrictions on union welfare funds to which management contributes.—It seems essential that where employers contribute funds for the welfare of their employees based upon services rendered by such employees, that the use of these funds be strictly safeguarded and that the administration of the trust be held strictly accountable. Joint administration, periodic audits and reports to the membership are among the basic requirements for protecting the best interests of employees and their beneficiaries.

10. Preserve administrative procedures for the investigation and prosecution of unfair-labor-practice charges separate and apart from the judicial function of the Board.—This is fundamental to the whole democratic process and in prescribing rules for an orderly solution to labor disputes, this principle should be incorporated in the law. The dual right to act as both prosecutor and judge is contrary to our philosophy of government.

11. Unions should be responsible in damages for breach of contract and other unlawful acts.—The importance of such responsibility needs little argument from an employer's point of view. However, even from labor's standpoint it is important that it should recognize that responsibilities go with privileges and that the day of irresponsible leadership is past.

12. Adequate procedure for handling strikes affecting the health and safety of the Nation.—While it is improbable that a labor dispute in any retail establishment would directly affect the national welfare, the retail trade feels strongly that no union should be in a position of paralyzing the economy or the safety of this Nation for the purposes of promoting its own interests. Assurance of a continuous flow of goods from producer to user is essential to public welfare. In the interest of the public, effective and adequate procedures should be incorporated in any new legislation for dealing with national emergencies arising from labor disputes. We do not believe the provision for merely a "cooling off" period is sufficient.

13. Preserve an independent Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service.—Experience has certainly demonstrated that the success of mediation in resolving labor disputes hinges entirely upon the objective and unbiased perspective of the mediator or conciliator. We believe it can function more effectively as a separate agency.

The above principles are essential to good labor relations and are in the interest of the public and of the parties directly affected. We urge that they be specifically provided for in any new legislation to be enacted.

STATEMENT OF ROWLAND JONES, JR., PRESIDENT, AMERICAN RETAIL FEDERATION ON PROPOSALS TO AMEND THE LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT OF 1947

Inasmuch as a personal appearance before your subcommittee has been impracticable, I wish to submit the following statement of the views of the American Retail Federation upon proposed amendments to the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947.

This statement contains 15 major principles which retailing believes should be taken into account in the development of any equitable labor-management relations legislation. These fifteen principles were evolved by a group of the ablest retail executives in the Nation and have been endorsed generally by all segments of the retail trade.

The American Retail Federation with offices in Washington, D. C., is a federation of 33 State-wide associations of retailers and 18 national retail trade associations.

The membership includes: California Retailers Association; Colorado Retailers Association; Delaware Retailers' Council; Florida State Retailers Association; Georgia Mercantile Association; Illinois Federation of Retail Associations; Associated Retailers of Indiana; Associated Retailers of Iowa, Inc.; Kentucky Merchants Association, Inc.; Louisiana Retailers Association; Maine Merchants Association, Inc.; Maryland Council of Retail Merchants; Massachusetts Council of Retail Merchants; Michigan Retailers Association; Mississippi Retailers Association; Missouri Retailers Association; Nevada Retail Merchants Association; New Hampshire Council of Retail Merchants; Retail Merchants Association of New Jersey; New York State Council of Retail Merchants, Inc.; North Carolina Merchants Association, Inc.; Ohio State Council of Retail Merchants; Oklahoma Retail Merchants Association; Oregon State Retailers' Council; Pennsylvania Retailers Association; Rhode Island Retail Association; Retail Merchants Association of South Dakota; Retail Merchants Association of Tennessee; Retail Merchants Association of Texas; Utah Council of Retailers; Vermont Council of Retail Merchants; Virginia Retail Merchants Association, Inc.; West Virginia Retailers Association, Inc.; American National Retail Jewelers Association; Association of Credit Apparel Stores, Inc.; Cooperative Food Distributors of America; Institute of Distribution, Inc.; Limited Price Variety Stores Association, Inc.; Mail Order Association of America; National Association of Credit Jewelers; National Association of Music Merchants, Inc.; National Association of Retail Clothiers and Furnishers; National Association of Chain Drug Stores; National Association of Shoe Chain Stores; National Retail Dry Goods Association; National Retail Farm Equipment Association; National Retail Furniture Association; National Retail Hardware Association; National Shoe Retailers Association; National Stationers Association; Retail Credit Institute of America, Inc.

Retailing sincerely desires Federal labor-management relations legislation which will be fair and equitable to the greatest possible number of employees, employers, and the general public. Legislation of this type will go a long way toward the achievement of the proper climate for wholesome labor-management relations which, in turn, will contribute substantially to the maintenance of economic stability in the field of retail distribution.

Retailing has had rather limited experience under both the Wagner Act and the Taft-Hartley Act—limited, that is, if number of cases presented to the National Labor Relations Board is an appropriate yardstick of experience. In the past, few retail employees or retail employers have found it necessary to seek the services of the Board. This scarcity of retail cases may be due to the fact that, basically, retailing is local business and therefore is more responsive to local conditions of employment than many other types of industry. Retail employees and their employers come in close touch with the lives of the people in their respective communities. This closeness tends to temper attitudes toward each other and toward the people they serve.

The existence of relatively few retail cases before the Board may also be explained by the fact that in only a few areas of the Nation have retail employees been organized into labor unions. Labor union organizational activity, however, has begun to develop in more and more retail communities.

Within the past 6 months, four of the large national labor unions have announced extensive campaigns to organize employees of retail stores from coast to coast. These labor unions are big interstate operations comparable in size and strength to many of the larger interstate business corporations. It is understood that these four labor unions will aggressively compete with each other for membership and support of retail employees. Labor leaders will seek collective-bargaining contracts with employers in all branches of retail trade from large department-store units in metropolitan areas to corner grocery stores in the crossroads villages. This prospect obviously contains the potential for bitter jurisdictional strife with all the extremes known to attend such controversies. The welfare of the public, as well as that of retail employees and retail employers, may be seriously jeopardized unless the rules set up under Federal enactment to regulate activities related to collective bargaining are fair and equitable to all affected parties.

In the course of the recent public hearings on S. 249 before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, it was intimated that retailing appeared to be inconsistent in its desire on the one hand to be covered by the Labor-Management Relations Act and on the other hand to be excluded from coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

There is no inconsistency in retailing's position with respect to these two Federal laws.

The so-called retail exemption was placed in the Fair Labor Standards Act originally in 1938 because retailing is fundamentally local in nature and thus more responsive to local wage and hour regulation than to such regulation from the national level. Retailing is typically intrastate business.

Local economic conditions have an extraordinary effect upon retail employment; perhaps more so than is the case in most other types of employment. The peculiarities of retail operations, the variables in the costs of living between large and small communities, together with the local intrastate character of retailing, have the effect of precluding the successful establishment of a national pattern of wages, hours, or other standards of employment in the field of retailing. Recognition of these factors and the difficulties inherent in them prompted the Congress in 1938 to leave retail wages and hours to such State and local regulation as might be deemed necessary by the State and local authorities.

On the other hand, if retailing is obliged to bargain with national and international labor unions having widespread interstate connections, then retailers must be permitted to meet these labor unions under the same applicable rules of conduct and restraint.

The history of the Wagner Act shows that retailing did not request coverage under that act in 1935; neither did it object to coverage. Similarly, when the Taft-Hartley Act was under consideration in 1947, retailing did not question coverage.

Retailing's position upon these two Federal enactments is logical and understandable when the purposes and the limitations of the two laws are viewed in their true perspective.

In recognition of retailing's stake in the outcome of Federal labor-management-relations legislation, the American Retail Federation urges the committee to consider the following 15 points:

(1) Free speech must be guaranteed to employers as well as unions and employees.

(2) Every employee must be protected in his right to work and to join or not to join a union without fear of reprisal from any source.

(3) The right of employers as well as unions to obtain an election must be preserved.

(4) Employees who become dissatisfied with their union must have the right to ask for an election to determine whether that union shall continue to represent them.

(5) In order to protect the freedom of employees to select their own representatives without fear of coercion, questions of representation must be determined only by secret ballot.

(6) Unions as well as employers must be prohibited from committing unfair labor practices. The following practices by unions must be prohibited:

(a) Interfering with an employee's right to join or not to join a union.

(b) Forcing an employer to discriminate against an employee because he belongs or does not belong to a union.

(c) Refusing to bargain with an employer in good faith.

(d) Engaging in jurisdictional strikes or secondary boycotts or forcing an employer to deal with a union other than the duly qualified representative of his employees.

(e) Forcing an employer to carry on his pay roll more employees than are needed, or engaging in other "feather bedding" practices.

(f) Prohibiting or limiting union membership of employees qualified to perform the work.

(7) Any strike or picketing to force an employer to violate the law must be regarded as an unfair labor practice.

(8) Supervisory employees must be recognized as members of management and excluded from the provisions of the act.

(9) The Government must have authority to prevent and deal with strikes affecting key industries which may be seriously injurious to public health, safety, and welfare.

(10) Unions and employers must be equally responsible for the performance of their contracts and equally liable for damages for violating such contracts.

(11) Unions and employers must be equally liable for damages resulting from unlawful strikes, boycotts, and lock-outs.

(12) The Board must not use the extent to which employees have organized as the controlling factor in determinnig which employees shall be eligible to vote in an election.

(13) Monopolistic practices are harmful to the public whether brought about by combinations of employers or unions and must be prohibited. Unions and employers must be equally subject to the antitrust laws.

(14) The right to work must be protected, and the right of any State to prohibit compulsory union membership must be preserved.

(15) Stability of labor relations must be protected. The holding of elections more often than once a year for the same groups of employees must be prohibited.

Retailing is also interested in the ultimate decisions upon the issues of administration of health and welfare funds, Communist affidavits, industry-wide bargaining, financial reports, stranger picketing, closed shop, check-off, independent Federal mediation nad conciliation service and right of an individual to adjust grievances directly with management.

Some segments of retailing have already communicated their views with respect to these additional subjects to members of the committee and to other Members of the House of Representatives.

We urge your earnest consideration of these 15 points in the belief that they are fair and equitable to all concerned and will contribute to effective collective bargaining and, equally important, to labor peace.

STATEMENT OF CHARLES H. MERIDETH, EXECUTIVE VICE PRESIDENT, INDUSTRIAL ASSOCIATION OF QUINCY, INC., RELATIVE TO ASSOCIATION'S POSITION REGARDING THE PROPOSED H. R. 2032

The Industrial Association of Quincy, Ill., is speaking as a representative of the industries in this area, which includes the natural industrial areas of Macomb, Ill., and Keokuk, Fort Madison, and Burlington, Iowa.

The following testimony, presented for your consideration, refers to the proposed H. R. 2032 which would replace the present Labor Management Relations Act of 1947 with another law built for the most part around the Wagner Act. We want you to know that we have seen a remarkably improved relationship between employee and employer, as well as between unions and management, since the passage of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, and we urge you to enter into the record and to consider the experiences and views which are attached to this letter in your deliberations concerning the proposed changes in labor legislation.

We feel, fundamentally, that the place to settle differences between employee and employer is in a spirit of mutual responsibility and cooperation; and if it were possible to have no laws passed regarding this subject, we could do an even better job. However, the principle of labor legislation is now so well entrenched that it will probably be impossible to take that idealistic view, and we must, therefore, enact legislation which is equally fair to both sides of a union-management problem with mutual responsibilities and mutual privileges.

We urge you to look at the proposed bill which starts out with a prejudiced viewpoint. In the present Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, under section 101, subsection 1, the third paragraph points out why employers by their actions have caused the need for labor legislation. The fourth paragraph points out why activities by unions have made it necessary to pass certain labor legislation. The proposed law deletes any reference to any need for any control over unions because they "have done and can do no harm." That, in its very inception indicates the unfairness of the point of view in the proposed law.

We are convinced that the following basic concepts are necessary to guide proper passage of any labor legislation:

(1) Will the law contribute to the dignity of the individual workman?

(2) Do the requirements of the law place equal responsibility and equal privilege upon both parties being legislated for?

(3) Does the law preserve the constitutional guaranty and philosophy of our American type of government which includes proper checks and balance, proper trial before courts, proper separation of prosecuring and judicial functions, and adequate standards for rules of evidence to preserve the principle that a person is assumed innocent until proven guilty?

(4) Does the law protect the public, which includes the Government, against the infiltration and domination of communistic philosophies?

We present for your study the following material:

Appendix A—An article entitled "Crossroads," which outlines our views regarding your current consideration of labor legislation.

Appendix B—A copy of the letter sent by the Quincy Compressor Co. of Quincy indicating the manner in which unions coerce and dominate employees.

Appendix C—A copy of a letter addressed to the Honorable Cleveland M. Bailey, pointing out the need for proper legal protections.

Appendix D—A statement of some specific experiences in Quincy indicating the need for certain types of protection in legislation.

We urge you, in your serious consideration of this material, to recognize the principle: that unions as well as management are fundamentally responsible to the public, and that whereas management is now governed by many regulations assuring that responsibility, the proposed bill would place the public at the mercy of big unions. We urge you to preserve the principles of equal responsibility presently included in the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, particularly those areas covered by the attached testimony and material.

Appendix A—Crossroads

The last dikes against the onrush of socialism may be removed and allow the tide of Statism to render us incapable of resistance to communism unless we impress upon our Senators and Congressmen the importance of the steps they are on the verge of taking in current proposed legislation.

During World War I, with some help from England and France, our production capacity of tools, equipment, and armaments defeated the enemy. Then in World War II, alone and without the productive capacity of England and France (rendered sterile of productive personal ambition by socialism), we won the war, not because we had more men but with more equipment, better fighting tools, and a personal dignity to protect. When World War III comes (God forbid), and our fight with foreign ideologies breaks into the open, we must have the ability to produce and the will to win.

Certain legislative proposals now under consideration would (1) eliminate the dignity of individual men; (2) reduce the national productive efficiency.

Every bit of legislation held up against these two guides will be accepted or rejected according to the amount of patriotism flowing in the red blood of American congressional and senatorial patriots.

Labor legislation has passed the stage where it can be looked upon as political hay. It is now national health. Consider, then, the following analysis:

There is a belief which is prevalent that the labor problem is a private fight between labor unions and managements. This is a misconception. There are actually three groups of people who are affected by agreements reached between labor union leaders and management representatives. They are the wage earner, the investor, and the consumer. The fact that any labor problem is a three-way struggle between these interests is most important to understand. Some members of our legislature look upon labor problems as an isolated part of the economy. The error of such a view was pointed out by President Truman on June 12, 1946, when he said, "We accomplish nothing by striking at labor here, at management there. There should be no emphasis placed upon whether a bill is antilabor or prolabor. Where excesses have developed on the part of labor leaders or management, such excesses should be corrected, not in order to injure either party but to bring about as great an equality as possible—neither should be permitted to become too powerful against the public interest as a whole. Equality for both and vigilance for the public welfare—should be the watchwords of future legislation."

LABOR LEGISLATION IS ONE PART OF THE TOTAL PATTERN OF LEGISLATION DESIGNED TO PREVENT INTERFERENCE WITH THE FUNCTION OF THE ECONOMY

We spoke before about the three parties—the consumer, the investor, the wage earner. Legislation has been passed affecting all three. For example, affecting the consumer: The Sherman Antitrust act, the Clayton act, and the Federal Trade Commission Act were passed to prevent individual sellers from conspiring with other sellers through price agreements to raise prices. (2) The Robinson-Patman Act was passed so that large buyers through abuses of their tremendous purchasing power were not permitted to obtain price concessions.

Then legislation was passed affecting investors: (1) The Securities Act protected individual investors against incorrect information. (2) The Public Utility Holding Company Act was passed to prevent large investors from abuses to minority stockholders.

And then finally the wage-earner had legislation passed affecting him: (1) The wage-earner was protected by being given a statutory right to bargain, to strike, and protection against discrimination. The Wagner Act which covers these was never designed as a full labor relations statute. Its limited purpose was to protect employees against employers' interference with their rights and to compel employers to bargain. (2) As in the case of the consumer and the investor, one law created abuses on which it was necessary to pass a second law. The same is true of the wage earner. Legislation designed to prevent further abuses by labor unions was established for the first time in the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 (Taft-Hartley). The changes it contains are only the other side of a normal legislative pattern. They are designed to prevent the abuses of the rights of the public, employees and employers by unions, which abuses eventually affect our economy without infringing upon the wage earner's basic rights under the Wagner Act.

President Truman, at the time of the railroad strike in 1946, asserted that the very existence of the Government was at stake due to abuses of powerful union leaders when he said, "My fellow countrymen, I come before the people tonight at a time of great crisis—the crisis tonight is caused by a group of men within our own country who place their private interests above the welfare of the Nation. It is inconceivable that in our democracy any two men should be placed in the position where they can completely stifle our economy and ultimately destroy our country. The Government is challenged as seldom before in our history. It must meet the challenge or confess its impotence."

(1) We must keep our national standard of living and productive efficiency high. It is a simple rule that a nation's standard of living depends upon its productivity per man-hour. The average American worker produces in 1 hour from 1½ to 2½ times as much wealth as the British worker, and, consequently, enjoys more leisure and better conditions. High productivity or high efficiency means a higher standard of living because there are more goods produced than can be consumed by the Nation, and a high standard of living is in the public interest. This principle was outlined by President Truman in his Labor Day speech in September 1948.

The American economy is the most productive in the world and with that the highest standard of living, and with only 6 percent of the world's population the United States produces over one-third of the world's goods. And still, current labor union philosophy rejects this conception and shies away from the idea that workers, by increasing their own productivity, will elevate their own standard of living. They prefer the doctrine of "less production and more pay." This is dangerous to the Nation's long-run well-being. It is in violation of the very principle that has made the economic status of the American worker the envy of his fellow wage earners the world around.

(a) Featherbed rules imposed upon business by labor unions interfere with industry efficiency. These make-work principles cover such things as limited daily output; controlled quality of work; imposing time-consuming methods; requiring that unnecessary work be done or that work be done more than once; requiring unnecessary men on a machine or in a crew; prohibiting the use of machines for more efficient production. It is estimated that the sum total of such restrictive practices in the construction industry adds at least 10 percent to the cost of every home or construction job. Such featherbedding is prohibited by law at the present time, and much of the present pressure to repeal current labor legislation is aimed at gouging the consumer more by this technique.

(b) Secondary boycotts are strikes to compel employers to cease dealing with other employers or to cease handling their products for union reasons. In 1947, Mr. Truman, in his message to Congress, stated there should be legislative restriction against unjustified secondary boycotts. That was included in the present labor bill which is in effect at this time and against which there is much pressure for repeal.

(c) Jurisdictional strikes are disputes between two unions as to who has the right to do certain work. The Taft-Hartley Act sets up a procedure with the unions themselves deciding who shall have the right to do certain work. That requires a logical solution and takes the test of economic warfare out of the dispute and prevents the employer and the public from being caught in the middle of a situation over which they can have no control. One of the most articulate spokesman for unions, Mr. Gerhard P. Van Arkel, said, "Union representatives will not defend jurisdictional strikes." That is another item which would be removed from the law if the present pressure to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act were successful.

(d) By devious means, the Wagner Act saddled onto management the responsibility of negotiating and dealing with its own foremen as though they were a stranger or outside group. The Taft-Hartley Act states that members of management who decide to organize need not be recognized by management since they are, in effect, management themselves.

(2) There has been much criticism that the present Labor-Managements Relations Act of 1947 (Taft-Hartley) has created a "government by injunction." Such statements are, of course, not true. Sections 301 and 303 of the act which authorizes injunctions if either employer or employee violate the law does not give the union or management the right to obtain injunctions. The Norris-LaGuardia Act remains in effect with respect to such actions and the Government remains the sole agency permitted to seek relief under the act. This procedure within the new law establishes the very principles of checks and balance inherent in the Constitution of the United States. The National Labor Relations Board which is the administrative and executive function of labor legislation under the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 has been supplemented by the appointment of a general counsel whose job it is to bring legal action through the Federal courts, thereby divorcing the prosecutor and jury and eliminating "kangaroo" court procedure.

(3) Labor legislation must be viewed in terms of what it does to contribute to the dignity of individual man as compared with the processes of regimentation so obvious in other places throughout the world. Measured against that guide and against the principle that Americans are free people and the protection of the rights of the individual is a basic American principle, and recognizing that, although this principle is expressed in the Bill of Rights, it has been frequently flouted by unions exercising vast control over the employment of millions of workers. Much of the obedience to the union dictates by individual workmen comes from fear of loss of employment through union fiat; and, therefore, labor legislation must include an analysis of the result to individual freedom and to the extent that legislation can prevent individual rights from being infringed upon.

(a) Forcing the loss of an individual's job as a penalty is guarded against in the present Taft-Hartley Act but would be denied them under the proposed repeal. Unions traditionally make "conduct unbecoming a union member" grounds for expulsion from the union; and, where a union shop or closed shop exists, this means loss of the employee's job. Through loose standards of union committees, gross injustices occur. Trial committees have caused members to lose their jobs because an employee testifies to the truth in a hearing, or because an employee handed out political literature in favor of a candidate not supported by the union leader, or because an employee criticized a union official; or because an employee refused to go on strike during war, claiming his first allegiance to his country—not to the union.

Under the present law, arbitrary discharges are prohibited except for nonpayment of initiation fees and regular dues.

(b) The improper uses for collection of funds by unions is a means of depriving a person of his individual freedom. It is not unusual for some unions to have initiation fees from $100 up to $1,500 for the privilege of membership. Under the present law, which would be repealed, it is an unfair labor practice for unions to require employees to pay exorbitant initiation fees, and the National Labor Relations Board determines what is exorbitant.

(c) The law further requires at the present time that unions file financial reports to show that they do not abuse the trust of the funds given them by members. This has long been a requirement on the employer, and Walter Reuther, UAW–CIO, says, "Any democratic organization that spends millions of dollars" (and he says his union does) "should provide machinery for a broad and practical check of expenditures. Such machinery is lacking in our union. * * *." He noted that funds had been misused, and said further, "Such endless waste of union funds is inexcusable." The present law requires that union officials advise their members of the manner in which their money is spent. The proposed repeal would eliminate that responsibility.

(d) Law and order need to be maintained as a means of protecting the rights of individuals. Numerous examples of union violence toward employees have been brought to light. Importing of pickets by the union is not uncommon, as is indicated by the recent wrecking of the Shakespeare plant in Kalamazoo. Employees have been beaten and their property destroyed in an effort to intimidate them, and local police are either unable or unwilling to enforce the law. There have been some National Labor Relations Board decisions recently inferring that mass picketing and violence are illegal. That is not a part of the present law. But, by the elimination of the right of the National Labor Relations Board to secure injunctions, there would be no protection against the further development of this philosophy. The right to work is probably more basic and fundamental than the right to strike, and the law should say so in unmistakably clear language. Justice Hughes of the Supreme Court once stated, "It requires no argument to show that the right to work for a living in the common occupations of the community is of the very essence of perfect freedom and opportunity that it was the purpose of the fourteenth amendment to secure." Labor violence cannot be justified on the grounds that employees who go through picket lines are scabs.

(4) An orderly procedure for collective bargaining must be protected. If free collective bargaining cannot be used, then disputes between labor and management will need to be settled by the Government and will eliminate the existence of a free economy. As the power of labor organizations increases, their bargaining techniques change and they find themselves in a position to present their demands to the employers on a take-it-or-leave-it basis. They have demanded that management violate the law and have struck to enforce those demands. This means that employers have no chance to influence the opinions by facts or by arguments.

Unions were encouraged to take unreasonable positions during the Wagner Act era because there were no penalties against the unions for refusing to bargain in good faith.

(a) Under the present law, both parties have a right to select their bargaining representatives. Prior to the Taft-Hartley Act, the union could select, but they could strike or refuse to bargain if they did not approve of management's representatives at the bargaining table.

(b) Labor contracts should be enforceable to the same extent as other contracts. If the collective-bargaining processes should be respected, unions should be subject to penalties if strikes are called in violation of a contract. The union is established for the purpose of collectively bargaining with the employer to gain concessions from the employer. The employer many times grants these concessions because the union, during the bargaining process, has the right to call a strike. This power often produces settlements; but once a deal or settlement has been reached, if the union goes on strike, there is little or no reason to reach a settlement in the first place. Labor contracts and the principle of labor legislation as laid down in the Wagner Act are supposed to bring labor peace, and a strike in violation of a contract is inconsistent with that objective.

The Taft-Hartley Act includes under section 301 the machinery for enforcing labor contracts. The repeal of that provision would bring chaos to collective bargaining.

President Truman, in his state-of-the-Union message to the Eighty-first Congress, said, "Contracts once made must be lived up to." The basic attitude of Union leaders has changed since this responsibility was placed upon them, and we have had 42 percent less strikes since the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, partly because they are responsible for their illegal actions.

5. The Mediation and Conciliation Service should remain independent. The Taft-Hartley Act placed the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service in a neutral position where it could be respected and used by both union and management as a means of bringing about understanding and labor peace. It has previously been a part of the Department of Labor, staffed by men who were appointed by labor and dominated by administrative officials appointed to pursue and develop the interests of labor. To place the department of Mediation and Conciliation Service in the Department of Labor would destroy its present effectiveness and would be no more practical than an employer's suggestion that it be placed in the Department of Commerce. The repeal of the present law would have this result of eliminating the impartial arbitrator or conciliator in matters of national concern.

(6) Unions should be required to bargain in good faith. There were no such restrictions or requirements under the Wagner Act. The Taft-Hartley merely stated that both employers' and employees' representatives must bargain in good faith. The repeal of the present law would eliminate the necessity for unions to bargain in good faith. Union leaders have no argument against this requirement of the law. There is no socially defensible argument that can be made that the obligation to bargain in good faith should be imposed upon the employer and not retained as a requirement on the part of the union.

(7) National strikes are considerably lessened by the present labor law which is part of the Taft-Hartley Act. President Truman has used this provision of the act six times since its passage—five times during 1948—in identical emergencies: Shipping, coal, meat packing, and telephones. The procedure set up provides for the President to determine when a strike affects the national safety and welfare, and prescribes a procedure for investigation and recommended settlement. The repeal of the present law would eliminate any control over arrogant and power-mad union leaders whom we have seen in action during recent years.

(8) The Taft-Hartley Act sets up a procedure whereby individuals pledged to destroy our economy must be removed from the positions of leadership in the unions. It withholds from unions dominated by Communists the right to certain legal procedures. Since its passage in 1947 the Taft-Hartley Act has been instrumental in removing many nationally known Communists who were dominating labor unions and undermining the productive efficiency of our entire industrial economy. Some of those leaders are now standing trial under decision by the Supreme Court of a few days ago. This "non-Communist affidavit" procedure as prescribed by the Taft-Hartley law cannot be justifiably criticised and must be applauded as one of the bulwarks of American patriotism.

(9) Political activities of special-interest groups, including unions, are matters of public concern. It is a matter of history that certain powerful business groups once exercised tremendous control over political parties. Laws were passed to prevent the use of corporations' income for exploiting political advantage. With national unions now collecting millions of dollars each year, the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947 stated that labor unions were subject to the same rules and procedures as those imposed upon corporations many years ago. It said that dues paid by union members should not be used for political purposes for exactly the same reasons that corporate funds should not be used for political purposes. During the heat of the railroad strike argument, the head of one of the national unions made the irresponsible statement that he would spend several million of dollars to defeat the President. National unions are now spending millions of dollars to secure the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act which will only give them a license to commit uncontrolled and irresponsible acts which are in violation of the interests of the public and the Nation at large.

CONCLUSION

Changes in labor legislation must be considered with great care. The welfare of our economy is at stake. We cannot afford to permit prior political promises, threats of political reprisal, or emotional prejudices to crowd the objective analysis. The truth is powerful, and one should not underrate its influence. The rapid growth of unions and rise to power has been accompanied by an abuse of this power. The national economy cannot stand by and hope that these abuses will of themselves stop.

APPENDIX B

QUINCY COMPRESSOR CO.
Quincy, Ill., March 1, 1949.

Attached to this letter is a reproduction of a letter which has been mailed to a considerable number of employees of our company. We shall be glad to supply the names upon request but have deleted them from the photostatic copy because of the danger to the personal welfare of the individuals addressed. If the Congress is willing to provide proper protection to these men, we shall be glad to forward their names. Our company has had a contract with the union since 1942. Employees are free to join or to refrain from joining this union.

In the present Taft-Hartley Act, section 1 (b) reads: "It is the purpose and policy of this act * * * to protect the rights of individual employees in their relations with labor organizations * * * and proscribe practices on the part of labor and management * * * and to protect the rights of the public in connection with labor disputes affecting commerce."

Further, under title I, section 101, subsection 1, the first paragraph reads: "Experience has further demonstrated that certain practices by some labor organizations, their officers, and members have the intent or the necessary effect of burdening or obstructing commerce by preventing the free flow of goods in such commerce through strikes and other forms of industrial unrest or through concerted activities which impair the interest of the public in the free flow of such commerce. The elimination of such practices is a necessary condition to the assurance of the rights herein guaranteed."

And, further, title I, section 101, subsection 7, reads: "Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations * * * and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all such activities. * * *"

And, further, under subsection 8 (b): "It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents to restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7."

We believe it will be evident from reading the attached letter that the provisions referred to above in the present Labor Management Relations Act are necessary to protect the rights of individual employees, employers and the public; and that, further, these provisions written into the law will protect the rights and privileges of responsible unions in the pursuit of collective bargaining carried on under the true principles of intelligent union leadership. We encourage you to use your influence and to vote for retaining the principles outlined above in the new labor legislation under consideration by the Eighty-first Congress.

Sincerely yours,

Quincy, Ill.

Mr. ———,
Quincy, Ill.

DEAR SIR: We are very sorry to hear that you object becoming a member of the largest labor organization in the city of Quincy: namely, Lodge No. 822 of the International Association of Machinists.

We are enclosing several pamphlets which we hope you will read and then make up your mind to sign the enclosed application and return it to your shop committeeman, together with the required fee. Initiation fee is $5; reinstatement fee is $25. We are urging you to do this as soon as possible.

We are giving you the opportunity to join our organization and become a part of the greatest union in America today.

If your signed application is not received within the next few weeks, other action will be taken against you.

We do not like to take such action; but, when you force us to it, we will carry out the mandate.

Our forefathers fought hard to accomplish what benefits the worker has today, and we intend to preserve that accomplishment, if we have to revert back to their tactics.

We are very certain that you wouldn't want to be followed along the streets and called "scab."

So, we hope you will give this letter and its contents very serious consideration, and we will be looking for your signed application along with the required initiation or reinstatement fee.

We remain, organizing committee, Lodge No. 822, I. A. of M.

INDUSTRIAL ASSOCIATION OF QUINCY, INC.,
Quincy, Ill., March 22, 1949.

HON. CLEVELAND M. BAILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BAILEY: We were very pleased to have you take the time to answer our recent correspondence regarding some of the labor-management legislation before your committee. Certainly, we learn to understand each other better by seeing what the difference of opinion may be.

You indicate that your specific objections to the Taft-Hartley Act is its injunctive procedure, and feel that you would be opposed to any legislation which goes opposite to our constitutional guaranty of a right to trial by jury. You are to be praised for that position and we feel, therefore, that you will be willing to reflect that philosophy in terms of the following thoughts:

(1) The principle of the philosophy of trial by jury means that no person shall be considered guilty until so proven, and that the prosecution of such a suspect shall be separated from the judicial functions. Therefore, there should be little question in your mind about the importance of separating the prosecuting and judicial functions within the activities of the National Labor Relations Board so that those rights we both hold so dear can be protected.

(2) Any constitutional right for fair and unbiased judgment is, of course, based on presentation of factual evidence, not to be judged on hearsay or rumor. There is, therefore, no reason why the present provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 should not be retained as compared with the proposed administration's labor bill, which permits the National Labor Relations Board to be guided by any evidence which it chooses to use, rather than adhering to the rules of evidence as laid down in the present law. This, too, is part of the constitutional right of fair judgment and trial by court standards.

(3) If we are to be guided by the principles of proper court procedure (and I am one who feels that labor relations cannot be solved in the courts), then we must at least have written into our laws that both parties are equally responsible before the law for any contracts entered into. That requirement exists in the present law and is eliminated in the proposed law.

We appreciate your taking these viewpoints into consideration, and trust that the kind of law which you help to write will adhere to the principles indicated in your letter: "Our constitutional guaranty."

Sincerely yours,

(s) C. H. MERIDETH,
Executive Vice President.

APPENDIX D

[Copy of statement attached to letter sent to Senator Robert A. Taft, Washington, D. C.]

FEBRUARY 22, 1949.

STATEMENT OF SPECIFIC EXPERIENCES IN THE QUINCY, ILL., INDUSTRIAL AREA

(1) It is our contention that the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service should be kept out of the Department of Labor and in independent agency because of the following case history:

During 1945 and 1946 there were several instances in which labor disputes over the settling of a contract appeared imminent. In these cases a Federal conciliator from the United States Department of Labor Conciliation Service was assigned to assist in the settling of these disputes. The conciliator assigned was one who, prior to his appointment in the United States Department of Labor Conciliation Service, had been an official in a labor union. This man, in his assignments, was so obviously prounion and antimanagement that it was nearly impossible to get management to agree to sit down at the table with him. His attitude and expressions proved his one-sided attitude, and in at least one instance in the course of his evening social activities he made it clear before a large group of people that the next day he would "get the union what they wanted and show these manufacturers." This threat was discussed with this conciliator, who did not deny the allegation. Subsequently, the Taft-Hartley Act was passed, and the man was again asked to serve as conciliator. His attitude had changed. After a few months he submitted his resignation because "he could not act in the interest of the unions" and resumed his position as an official of the Motion Picture Projector Operators' Union, and proceeded to blast the Taft-Hartley Act in a series of articles appearing in trade-union papers.

This isolated case, we know, does not prove the rule; but, if multiplied by the many times that the same experience has been on the record throughout the country, it indicates the need for impartial, independent Federal mediation and conciliation service.

(2) It is our contention that the closed shop serves as a deterrent to industrial development, prevents industrial employees from securing the type of employment which they choose, and, further, places the union in a position to become dictatorial in its attitudes and policies as indicated by the following experience during negotiations in December of 1948 and January of 1949:

During negotiations between the Stovemounters' International Union and the three local stove companies, a member of the negotiating committee very defiantly stated, "Wait until the Taft-Hartley Act is repealed. We will tell you who can hire and how much work they can do." This was in answer to a management proposal that the union lift its work restrictions on the piecework schedule in order that the companies might become more competitive in their cost analysis. This type of denying the company an opportunity to hire persons who are competent to do the work, and the work limits placed by the union, are intolerable if industries are to be kept vital and produce the standard expected of them. One might expect this kind of relationship to be in those companies where a union relationship had been of rather short duration. On the contrary, the parties to this negotiation have had a bargaining experience of over 40 years.

We trust these experiences of specific examples will justify our position in which we recommend that the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service be kept out of the Department of Labor, and that closed-shop contracts be unlawful under the new labor legislation.

C. H. MERIDETH,
Executive Vice President, Industrial Association of Quincy (Ill.)

STATEMENT BY THOMAS BUTLER, SECRETARY AND GENERAL MANAGER OF THE ALTON DISTRICT MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION, ALTON, ILL.

This is an association of 17 industrial plants situated along the Illinois shore of the Mississippi River, opposite the mouth of the Missouri River, in the communities of Alton, East Alton, Wood River, Hartford, and Roxana.

Their products include the following: Paper board, brick, lead, iron and steel castings, railroad transportation, steel and steel tubing, lime, sand and crushed stone, glass containers, machine-shop products, flour, electric power, steel forgings and tools, brass, ammunition and explosives, petroleum products, leather, tank-car repairs.

These plants employ, on the average, 20,000 persons, of whom 90 percent are represented in collective bargaining by nationally affiliated unions and 10 percent by independent unions.

Based on actual experience in this area, we submit a conviction that in the 18 months of operation under the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 there has been a greater benefit to the employees of the plants and to the public on whom they must rely to buy their products than under the previous experience of the Wagner Act.

1. High employment.—Production and employment have been maintained at high levels; there have been no work stoppages due to labor disputes.

2. Wage increases.—Wage increases varying from 18½ cents an hour to 39½ cents an hour have been established by collective bargaining, negotiated in an atmosphere of confidence and harmony on both sides. Both the amount of the wage increases and the frankness of dealing have been of higher degree than previously existed.

3. Wage standards.—This progress does not stem from a low point of beginning. Wage rates in these plants range from $1.14 to $1.51 an hour for common labor, and up to $2.03½ an hour for skilled labor.

4. Weekly earnings—Weekly earnings have increased from $51.25, as reported by the State department of labor in August 1947, to $58.41 for October 1948; and hours worked per week have diminished. Most plants now average 40 hours.

5. Building trades.—Building tradesmen, whose officers are extremely critical of the law because of the closed-shop prohibition, have, nevertheless, maintained their prestige, enjoyed their unprecedented high level of steady employment, and increased their wage scales 25 cents to 50 cents an hour. The rate here for building laborers is $1.75, and for the skilled crafts is $2.50 an hour—carpenters, pipefitters, boilermakers, etc. For bricklayers, $2.75 and $3 an hour. Their supremacy in their field and first call for work has had no challenge.

6. Construction.—Industrial and commercial construction programs have been extensive and have helped create this market for the services of building tradesmen. We believe much of this has been due to business confidence, resulting from stability in labor relations, which is a basic requirement for justification of expansion and rehabilitation of industrial plants.

7. Jurisdiction; boycott.—Jurisdictional disputes are one of the most costly and discouraging elements in any prospects for employment of building tradesmen. The provisions of the present law have, we are sure, minimized these occasions, and certainly without any detriment to the tradesmen themselves. This factor has contributed to the maintenance of a steady market for building labor. The same elements pertain to the provision regarding secondary boycotts.

8. Featherbedding.—Featherbedding practices have been harmful issues in the building-trades field. Local unions themselves have negotiated many of these conditions out of their requirements as they have bargained with contractors for wage increases. And this has been accomplished reasonably, peacefully, and constructively.

9. Mediation.—Status of the United States Mediation and Conciliation service as an independent agency has increased its usefulness and effectiveness in negotiations on contracts where Federal mediators have taken part. In every instance they have been called in by the union, which must indicate the unions' confidence in the service. On these occasions their service has been accepted by the employers in good faith as one of impartiality. The result has been that they were able to contribute to the process of agreement because their status of independence inspired the confidence of both sides, through the bargaining process.

10. Union security.—Responsibility of union leadership has been enhanced. The reaction to this has been one of confidence and agreement with union leaders on the part of management. Proof of this lies in the fact that nine union-shop agreements have been negotiated, and three maintenance-of-membership agreements have been continued, all in accordance with requirements of the present act and without great area of controversy.

These results we think have met the demand for union security, demonstrate that the employers have no desire to make unions insecure, and the elections rquired have been of no hardship whatever to the unions. In each instance votes on authorizing negotiation for this form of union security were so decisive as to discount completely the criticism that an absentee, or a failure to vote, counts against the proposition. Such a construction might be made of any issue on which a vote is taken, such as the establishment of a bargaining agent, and under the rules of the NLRB this factor has worked to the advantage of unions in gaining recognition and bargaining rights.

11. Fringe benefits.—In addition to wage increases heretofore listed, and in the atmosphere which he hold to be constructive and beneficial to the interest of employees as well as the business itself, nine plants employing almost two-thirds of the total employment, have negotiated payment for holidays not worked; and several other fringe benefits such as sick leave, group medical and hospital benefits, and pension programs have been agreed upon.

12. Fourth round.—In several of these plants the so-called fourth round of negotiations has not been completed. The result of this will add to the facts here listed.

Comment.—The attempt here has been not a technical analysis of the words or provisions of the act, but rather to offer a factual statement as to what has occurred in a period during which these employers and the bargaining agents of their employees have operated under a rule which has been denounced as one of slavery. The statement of facts is accurate to the best of our knowledge and the facts do not support this conclusion.

This next is entirely an opinion for whatever it may be worth.

Business and employment must have as a basis the investment of capital in plant and equipment with which employees may work. It will not develop and expand in our economy if the leaders of Government decide to abandon the rules under which both labor, owners, and the public have been benefited. The results of high production are manifesting themselves now in the leveling off and reduction in living costs. Summarily repealing rules which have contributed to this progress in the economy, and in the standards of living of the people, is the most decisive way to halt this progress.

STATEMENT SUBMITTED BY THE UNITED FURNITURE WORKERS OF AMERICA, CIO

Your committe has undoubtedly received a large number of communications and briefs respecting the Taft-Hartley law and its proposed repeal. It is our purpose here to present to you the high lights of our experience under the Taft-Hartley law. We are convinced on the basis of that experience that this law is so pervasively destructive of not only the rights of labor but of American civil liberties whose preservation is indispensable to the continuance of American democratic institutions that its immediate repeal is necessary on behalf of the Nation as a whole.

Our experience under the act and our analysis of the decision rendered since its passage make crystal clear to us that a proper approach to the problems raised by the act must be one which is not partisan in its perspective but which sees the act as functioning in so wide an area that, in contrast to the Wagner Act, which, by virtue of its protection of the rights to self-organization provided an administrative gyroscope for industrial relations, destroys and throws out of balance the measure of equilibrium which the Wagner Act was in part able to achieve. The Taft-Hartley law infects the entire anatomy of our economic, political and civil rights necessarily emerging in the pattern of labor management relations, and the infection in turn has done, and if unremedied, will continue to do, serious damage to the entirety of American economic and political life.

The critical question which centers around legislation seeking to fix, in some measure, labor-management rights is one which is connected with estimates of bargaining power on each side. Manifestly, the individual worker, standing alone, has little or no bargaining power, a fact which has long been recognized by American courts, and the right of the workers to form labor organizations has received judicial recognition since at least the case of Commonwealth v. Hunt (4 Metcalf 111 (Massachusetts, 1942)).

The protection of the rights of workers to associate and form labor organizations to the end that they may effectively exercise their bargaining power presents, from its point of view, the essential aspect of the question. On the other side, the growing accession and concentration of economic power in the hands of employers presents a problem of imposing upon such aggregations restraints which will to some extent equalize or help to equalize the bargaining powers which face each other at the time collective agreements are formulated.

The statistics dramatically underscore the swollen development and growth of economic power on the employers' side as contrasted with the halting and still not completely matured growth of labor organizations on the other side.

Between 1909 and 1935 the assets of the 200 largest nonfinancial corporations increased from 33 to 55 percent of all the assets of nonfinancial corporations. The profits of the largest 5 percent of nonfinancial corporations reach 87 percent of the total profits of all nonfinancial corporations.

Astride of all of these monopolies stood eight multi-billion dollar financial empires controlling the decisive sectors of the economy. On the other side, in contrast to the growth of trade-unions in European countries, the efforts of American workers to organize were crushed during the first decades of the twentieth century.

By 1929 only 4,000,000 workers were organized. Between 1899 and 1929 the real income of workers increased by less than 30 percent. During the same interval the volume of production per wage earner increased 92 percent and the wage earner's share in the volume of his production dropped 32 percent from 1919 to 1933.

In this contest the role of the Government as a decisive factor in the bargaining struggle becomes manifestly of the highest and weightiest significance. Efforts of the employees to organize themselves into unions up to the commencement or the initiation of the Wagner Act were frustrated by court injunctions. This period came rightfully to be known as the era of "government by injunction." The right to self-organization, while verbalized by the United States Supreme Court in American Steel Foundries v. Tri-State Central Trades Council (257 U. S. 184), was nevertheless left unprotected by legislation. In the meantime the use of predatory devices by employers such as provocateurs, spies, goons, was implemented by injunctions issued by both the State and the Federal courts.

The Wagner Act was premised upon the firm underpinning of long investigations into the activities of employers which thwarted and destroyed the rights of self-organization, promoted strikes, and thus interrupted the free flow of commerce. It was palpably necessary that the Wagner Act should be passed to the end that the right to self-organization should be protected by affirmative sanctions against employer interference with those rights in the form of discriminatory discharges, the use of spies, and the formation of company unions.

The conditions which gave rise to the enactment of the Wagner Act have not changed. On the contrary, the safeguards afforded by the Wagner Act to labor to protect its right to self-organization are at least as essential today as they were in the past. To undo and destroy the beneficial gains of labor in the period of the Wagner Act as well as to check further progress by labor, the NAM and kindred organizations have deliberately conjured a myth that organized labor constitutes a national menace from which the employer class must be protected. The Taft-Hartley Act is the monstrous result of this myth. The American worker is the victim of this multi-million-dollar myth making.

The Wagner Act had two main purposes: first, to avert strikes by limiting employer interference with the rights of self-organization (strikes for recognition between 1919 and 1936 ranged from 17 to 49 percent; 39 Monthly Labor Review 75; 40 id. 1267; 42 id. 162); and, secondly, to encourage collective bargaining by protecting the right to self-organization.

The experience of the United Furniture Workers of America demonstrates sharply that the Taft-Hartley law has been used as a strike-breaking weapon against its members.

We can illustrate this fact by two outstanding cases in which we were directly involved; the Smith Cabinet case (No. 35–CB–3) and the Colonial Hardwood case (No. 5–CB–4).

The Smith Cabinet Co. is located in Salem, Ind. The company employed approximately 450 workers. The wages and working conditions of these workers affect a substantial portion of the population of the small town of Salem. The wages paid to the workers are unconscionably low.

The union won an NLRB election on August 19, 1947. Despite the clearly demonstrated choice of the workers, the company arbitrarily refused to recognize the union. A strike resulted and the Taft-Hartley Act and the Board administering this act were immediately brought into the picture on the side of the company. Hearings were held in the town of Salem while the strike was in progress and the weight and influence of the Government was psychologically and materially cast on the employer's side.

The shadow of governmental disapproval hung over the strike from the outset. On the other hand the Government was placed n the position of supporting and giving moral aid and encouragement to the strikebreakers.

With this aid furnished by the Government, the company was enabled to demoralize the strikers and to fill its plant with scabs. The protracted hearings before the Board necessarily diverted the energies of the union from the effective prosecution of the strike.

The acts charged against the union by the company several times amplified by it during the hearing were made the platform of an attack upon the union and a contest between strikers and strikebreakers with the Government pleading the cause of strikebreaking which in reality was the cause and sole objective of the company. Voluminous testimony was taken, thus magnifying matters mainly trivial into seemingly monstrous events—all of which served to seriously prejudice the union and critically advantaged an antiunion employer that was bent upon using the Taft-Hartley Act to break the strike. The decisions of the trial examiner and the Board issued many months after the strike had been broken are completely unrealistic and propound a dragnet theory of agency which makes every striking employee and every picket an agent of the union. It is safe to say that no strike can be insulated from the withering effects of the Taft-Hartley all-out attack. Thus the right to strike, apparently preserved, is in reality substantially curtailed.

Counterposed to the trial examiner's and the Board's pronunciamentos on this strike, the following testimony under oath will give some inkling of the much ado about nothing with serious consequences to the union and Salem workers which this case poignantly illustrates.

First. Was the Salem strike characterized by violence? You will agree that the person whose testimony on this issue would be most reliable is the chief of police of Salem, Ind., Clarence Little. We quote his sworn testimony:

"Question. Chief, you have been down there four or five times a day since the strike started?

"Answer. Yes.

"Question. Now in your opinion, based on what you have seen, based on your experience as a police officer, will you state your opinion as to whether or not the conduct of that strike or picket line has been violent or peaceful?

"Answer. It has been peaceful."

The record in the case is replete with admissions by nonstrikers that they walked in and out of the plant daily, unmolested.

As stated above, before the Salem strike was called, an election among the employees was held by the National Labor Relations Board on August 19, 1947. A very substantial majority of them—252 to 159—designated the United Furniture Workers of America, CIO, as their collective-bargaining representative. The company, however, refused to accept this democratic selection of a bargaining agent and instead used the Taft-Hartley Act as a protective coloration to hide its real motive to get rid of the union. The union, having had the door leading to negotiations shut in its face, had no alternative but to call the strike which began on September 4, 1947.

The president of Smith Cabinet Co., Chester M. Smith, testified under oath:

"Question. You are aware of the fact that this union represents the majority of your employees as a result of this election; isn't that correct?

"Answer. Yes.

"Question. And still you refuse to recognize the union?

"Answer. That is correct.

"Question. Will you tell the court why in your opinion this strike started; what the issue was?

"Answer. I suppose they were striking for recogniton.

"Question. I mean, actually you know that that is the issue in this strike?

"Answer. Yes, sir.

"Question. And being the issue, you know if this issue had not been there, there wouldn't have been a strike; isn't that correct?

"Answer. That is probably correct.

"Question. No strike, no picket line; isn't that true?

"Answer. Yes, sir."

Mr. Smith also testified that he refused to meet with the officials of the Indiana division of Labor Mediation and Conciliation Department and would continue to reject any of their efforts at settlement.

As aforesaid, in this context, the NLRB entered upon the scene at the behest of the company and threw its weight, prestige, and authority on the side of an unfair employer who was confessedly frustrating the majority will of its employees, as well as the efforts of the Indiana government to mediate the dispute.

A similar experience was suffered by our union in the Colonial Hardwood strike in Hagerstown, Md. Protracted hearings during the strike and the tenor of the hearings created an atmosphere that the strike was a conspiracy. Minute inquisition was made into the functioning of the local and international union, membership and executive board meetings, finances, relief payments—all on the assumption that these and many other internal union matters might have some bearing on the question of agency.

In this case, too, the Government sitting at the same table with the employer prosecuting the union, using scab labor and supervisory and executive employees as its witnesses, tipped the scales in favor of the employer and contributed affirmatively toward defeating the strike.

Once again minor and immaterial matters were blown up to major proportions and a strike generally peaceful and orderly was surrounded with an atmosphere and aroma of conspiracy and Government disapproval. This, too, was an important situation lost by our union largely through the constrictive operation of Taft-Hartley. In Colonial Hardwood the strike was against an employer who refused to negotiate a renewal agreement with a union that had represented its employees for several years and continued to so represent them.

In Colonial Hardwood, other sections of the Taft-Hartley Act were invoked to atomize the strike. During the strike a scab filed a petition for decertification of our union. A hearing on this petition was also held during the strike. During this hearing the employer raised the contention that a great many of the strikers were disqualified from voting in an election since many of them had been and others would be replaced by scabs. The Government went along with this theory.

Ironically, this decertification election which took place after the strike had been defeated and dissolved, resulted in an electoral victory for the union by a minority vote in favor of decertification, although many scabs voted and many strikers' votes were sealed under challenge and not counted. Despite this fact, the workers of this company are today without a union and are working under open-shop conditions.

In both these cases the most active union workers were barred from returning to work and in most instances had to seek employment in other towns at considerable distances from their homes.

The many devices placed at the disposal of employers which were designed to harass and debevil unions have encouraged employers so minded to beset the path of organization and collective bargaining with controversy and conflict.

The Taft-Hartley Act was used by many employers either as a barrier or a club, in the former case to stifle or disrupt unionization and in the latter case to whip unions and workers into a submissive state under the threat of invoking the aid of Taft-Hartley.

The results were twofold; on the one hand, Taft-Hartley prevented workers from receiving wage increases and other improvements to which they were justly entitled and, on the other hand, provoked and precipitated many strikes and industrial disputes that could otherwise have been avoided.

Thus, in place of the beneficial national policies enacted into law by the Norris-LaGuardia Act and the Wagner Act based upon the principles of "encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining" and of "protecting the exercise by workers of full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choosing, for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment or other mutual aid and prtoection," was substituted the Taft-Hartley Act which completely reversed this process by interfering with, hampering, and restricting collective bargaining and by encouraging a competing system of individual bargaining and supplying devious and divers means of combating and defeating bona fide trade-unionism.

This legislative atavism completely upset the measure of balance and equality between corporate power and individual workers created by the Wagner Act. Greater inequality in favor of employer interests was established with Government sanction. For the underlying and pervasive philosophy of the Taft-Hartley Act is the "right not to join or assist" labor unions and the right to bargain individually rather than collectively, thus resurrecting in a sense the corps of "yellow-dog" relationships.

It also revives from the dark past the socially backward conception of the "sanctity" of individual contracts to work which asserted the right of children to work in sweatshops, women to work excessive hours and in any employment without restriction, and workers generally to agree to work at starvation wages and for abnormally long hours.

The Taft-Hartley Act is the embodiment of reaction against social and economic progress over the last decade or two and, as President Truman said in his vetoing message, "is a clear threat to the successful working of our democratic society."

Senator Taft, commenting on the Taft-Hartley bill let the cat out of the bag. He boasted that:

"The bill is not a milk-toast bill. It covers about three-quarters of the matters pressed upon us very strenuously by the employer."

We believe that the estimate of "three-quarters" is the only modest part of this tell-tale assertion.

All unions have had the debilitating experiences with the confusing network of Taft-Hartley restrictions such as the sweeping prohibition against secondary boycotts, destruction of union security, deprivation of the right to vote to economic strikers, the license called "free speech" given to employers to coercively influence and intimidate workers in their selection of a bargaining agent, the ineffectual but confusing 60-day and 30-day notice provisions, the provisions for injunctive relief against unions, the banning of political expenditures, and the amorphous theory of "agency" as applied to unions.

All of these are threads in a grand design to enmesh unions and make them inert and impotent. In this manner a vital organ of democracy is collapsed. Without sound labor relations, free from the inhibitions and restrictions of Taft-Hartley, democracy must suffer and the basic rights of workers will be forfeited.

To return our labor-relations to the path of democracy and social progress, we must release it from the strangling grip of Taft-Hartley.

The right of free organization and free collective bargaining must be returned to the people. This was their clear mandate in the 1948 elections.

The answer is clear. It is unequivocal. It is a compelling necessity. Taft-Hartley must be repealed in toto and the Wagner Act must be restored.

STATEMENT BY ROBERT E. MARSHALL, COUNSELOR ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS, WORTHINGTON PUMP & MACHINERY CORP., HARRISON, N. J., RELATIVE TO THE PROPOSED NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT OF 1949

We appreciate the privilege which you have granted us in making possible our conveying to you a brief expression of how our company feels about certain portions of the bill which you have proposed repealing the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, and reenacting the old Wagner Act with certain amendments.

I say "certain portions" because our purpose is to comment upon a few aspects of labor relations with which we have had direct experience and which are touched upon by your proposed bill and the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947. To others we leave testimony upon the matters with which they have had particular concern.

The roots of our company stretch back more than a hundred years—in fact, to 1840. Its first shop was a small wooden building in Brooklyn, N. Y., staffed by two men, Henry R. Worthington and his partner. Now there are nearly 10,000 of us working in offices and plants in Harrison, Buffalo, Minneapolis, and other cities and towns, large and small, throughout the United States, where we make and sell pumps, engines, turbines, construction equipment, and other machinery. There are 9 works and we have 11 different collective-bargaining agreements. Probably 5,000 people are represented by labor organizations who are the other parties to our contracts.

The company has to be managed, of course. You could not ask the limited number of officers and the works managers to be everywhere in those plants and offices all the time, directing production, maintenance, and the activity of 5,000 people. So there are foremen who represent those men in the plants every day, managing the flow of material from purchased goods and services to finished product. But that is an oversimplification of their job. Their big job is leadership of those who work with them—leadership in the know-how of the work, leadership in the problems of the day, leadership and help in the problems which confront the people with whom they work. As such, they exercise without question the purest type of management function. I speak now of real foremen, real supervisors—the "hiring, firing, work-assigning, and directing foremen"—not the group leaders and the straw bosses. Are they again by your proposed bill, sir, to be caught in the maelstrom of conflicting loyalties, as they were under the old Wagner Act?

No one in America can look forward with pleasure to the creeping paralysis of a dying industrial system in these United States. Surely no more sensitive spot in the American industrial system could be found than the nexus and meeting place of top management and all the splendid men and women workers in our industrial system. That is where the foreman is, at the delicate crossroads, the outer and last phalanx of management.

That he occupies that position does not mean that he is not really management but, on the other hand, part of the rank and file of workers. Of course, those who would upset our economic system, or who—and this is most important—would like to grasp for power purposes the sensitive nerve of management and render it powerless to act, would be the first to becloud the status of foremen in order to envelop them.

How is an employer of any size to communicate with employees unless through foremen? Broadsides, page newspaper ads, and the like may serve as a media for the expression of thoughts in great issues, and for very large companies. But only through foremen can the average employer speak clearly. And who is there to say that an employer should not speak to his employees—or to anyone else, for that matter? Are we to return to the dark ages of give and take with those who mange the unions, and fervently hope that their self-interest may permit them to pass on to their members an employer's point of view on a given matter? To ask that question is to answer it.

We are undertaking throughout our works this year a program designed to integrate our foremen more closely into the management structure of the company through education and discussion with them on a series of subjects which will include a consideration of salaries and wages, profits, dividends, capital formation, labor relations, taxes, pending legislation, technical and production problems, and anything else of interest bearing upon the problems of our business. We are arranging for experts in the several fields—mostly university educators—to speak on and discuss these vital problems. We hope that you gentlemen will not make it inadvisable for us to realize this enterprising and worth-while objective by the legislation you are now considering.

Does not this bill, sir, bind and gag the voice of management and return the microphone and megaphone to unions alone? Are the great and powerful internationals to lay down policies on public and private matters to the State union organizations and local unions, against which employers will be powerless to speak because it is considered that they should be disinterested about common, everyady affairs which vitally affect their business and the very existence of our economic system?

An employer's right to speak and discuss matters with his employees under the Wagner Act was, of course, not specifically forbidden, nor—and this is most important—was it affirmed. Therefore, employers were subject to the uncertainty of the National Labor Relations Board's case-by-case administrative decisions involving their statements to their employees. No employer could be sure of the permissible area of speech. Such a vital activity as employer-employee communication should not be left as a sporting pastime, available only to those employers who would gamble that, months after they had spoken, the Board upon review would uphold their actions. No; statutory reassurance and a definitive statutory standard of conduct, as is now found in the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, provides the only fair and proper way to legislate upon the subject.

If part of our population—management, employers, and the millions of stockholders in this country—is to have its voice practically stilled through the legislative legerdemain of saying foremen are not management, and by returning to the negative treatment of freedom of expression, how can it be ever said thereafter that in the United States we arrive at all of our great decisions through free discussion everywhere at all times? We submit that all the people must be heard, all the points of view considered, if validity and dignity are to be accorded the results of our discussions.

One other matter concerns us: the proposed restoration of the so-called United States Conciliation Service in the Department of Labor.

Prior to the enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, the Conciliation Service was regarded rather generally by employers to be part and parcel of a Department set-up to watchdog the interests of labor and no employer would, I am sure, take any issue with the interest and help which that Department gives to labor. That is its high purpose and it should do so unstintingly. By the same token, businessmen look for aid and encouragement to the Department of Commerce and farmers to the Department of Agriculture—representing as they do the three great producing segments of our economic system. But for that very reason an agency of the Government which purports to be a peacemaking body, a go-between for two great parts of our economic system, should have its genesis, its nourishment, and surroundings somewhere besides the preserve of one of the parties to the dispute. Can someone effectually answer the question, Why does labor fervently press for the return of the Mediation Service to the Department of Labor from its now impartial position in the Government? To phrase the question differently, When before has it ever been seriously contended that independence was an improper atmosphere for impartiality?

In December 1947 and again in June of 1948 we were involved in labor disputes into which the National Mediation and Conciliation Service entered. Our negotiators uniformly felt in both instances that that Service performed a fine, impartial, and constructive bit of peacemaking. There was no hint of partiality in the mediators and conciliators, but only clear-cut devotion to their prime duty. Would we feel the same way if the old regime were resurrected and put on the Labor Department pay roll rather than remaining an independent agency in the executive branch of the Government? The answer is obvious. Impartiality may be subjective, but it is never effective unless it is obvious to those affected. The impartiality of the revived United States Conciliation Service would be seriously impaired if it moved in the aura and image of a Government department devoted to the cause of one of the parties to the dispute. It would cease to be effective as a peacemaker if its name were more properly the United States Conciliation Service for Labor.

While I have expressed our primary interest in only three aspects of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, we feel it would be a mistake to repeal that act in its entirety without further proof and experience that show it has been injurious to this country's industrial relations.

In conclusion, I should point out that we have had no labor- or union-relations problems that have adversely affected any of the parties because of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947—no lawsuits, no refusals to bargain, even though some of the union officers had failed, for one reason or another, to file the non-Communist affidavits. We did, of course, have to have check-off authorizations furnished us. (But I am sure in that connection most union members must not feel like slave labor because they have an individual right to decide whether they will voluntarily submit to check-off.) However, we do feel from our own experience that to undermine what is the true functional and historical position of foremen, that to repeal the right of free speech (to say that seems shocking, does it not, in view of the Bill of Rights?), and that to make the resurrected Conciliation Service a partisan in appearance—that to do these things will adversely affect the industrial system of this country and stop, when it has just started, the industrial peace essential to American industrial democracy and world peace, dependent as world peace is on American production.

STATEMENT OF L. E. ROARK, EXECUTIVE VICE PRESIDENT, NATIONAL FOUNDRY ASSOCIATION, ON THE LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT OF 1947 AND PROPOSED H. R. 2032

The National Foundry Association is a voluntary management organization, which has several hundred members, engaged in the production of metal castings in all parts of the country. Our interest in harmonious labor relations prompts us to submit our experience under the Wagner Act and under the Taft-Hartley Act.

Employment in our industry ranges from 5 men to 1,500 men. The crafts have been organized for many years, and, for a major part of the time, labor relations have been a very important phase of our industry, because of the unusually high direct labor burden per sales dollar. We normally figure the direct labor burden to be around 50 to 55 percent of our sales dollar. You will see from this that our interest in continuous and harmonious production performance is a primary one.

For 5 or 6 years prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act our industry was torn asunder by work stoppages, union violence, unauthorized interference with production programs, and a generally unsatisfactory and uneconomic operation.

We know that the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act have materially lessened industrial strife in our industry and have served to protect the interests of the public, the individual worker, and the employer.

For the past 2 years, we have had an almost uninterrupted period of constructive labor relations, with the result that our production has been the highest in the history of the industry; the wages paid have been the highest, both in rate and in volume; and our general economic structure has been better served, because of management's and labor's ability to recognize that, under the Taft-Hartley Act, specific performance was required from both parties.

To begin with, compulsory unionism, which was required under the Wagner Act, was a critical cause of dissension in our industry. The substitution of coercion and force instead of personal liberty caused many thousands of lost man-hours during the several years prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act.

The clear-cut provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, giving full protection to all parties concerned in labor relations and imposing full responsibility on all parties concerned, has enabled labor organizations to fulfill their joint obligations to each other to the definite economic advantage of the Nation.

The various divisions of the Government have issued charts showing man-hours lost by work stoppages and the improvement in this record is most imposing.

The income of the workers has been greatly increased due to uninterrupted operation. Industry has been able to utilize its tools and equipment to a more full and complete degree, and the general public has been served with better material and better products due to the harmony in manufacturing operations.

We know that the requirement for officers of labor unions to sign anti-communistic affidavits has contributed to peace and harmony, particularly in the automotive and implement industry.

Some of our great automotive and implement unions have, in the past 2 years, been able to purge their ranks of dangerous men and subsersive influences which were fomenting costly work stoppages and promoting costly dissension. The passage of H. R. 2032 would again stimulate and activate contention and coercive measures. We know this, because we lived under the Wagner Act for a number of years, and the record of expensive and destructive labor losses reached an all time high due to the philosophy that was engendered and fostered by the provisions of the Wagner Act.

To repeal the present act would nullify the law guaranteeing an individual's right to act in his own best interests in his relation with his employer. It would put the American workingman again under the whim and caprice of irresponsible labor leaders. It can be accurately defined that this has been a destructive condition because, as before mentioned, we had it for a number of years.

The United State Department of Labor now reports that the number of no-strike clauses in successfully worked out labor contracts are increasing—and the provision of the present Taft-Hartley Act requiring a waiting period before strikes occur—has enabled well-intentioned parties to compose their differences before valuable time and costly production is interrupted.

The United State Department of Labor figures disclose that in the first year under the Taft-Hartley Act, strikes dropped 38 percent from the previous year's figure.

The provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, which clearly define and dignify the rights of the individual worker has promoted responsibility on both sides and under such conditions labor unions have enlarged their membership beyond all previous figures.

The pasage of H. R. 2032 would set aside all of these beneficial and constructive factors.

The passage of H. R. 2032 can again bring into being the secondary boycott, which is a ruthless and costly penalty on people and institutions not involved in a labor dispute. Under the Taft-Hartley Act, both industry and labor is protected from the burden of secondary boycott.

On this point, we would like to call your particular attention to the experiences in the electrical field where the controversy between a CIO union manufacturing an item and the IBEW-AFL, installing the equipment, has caused this industry and its workers millions upon millions of dollars in waste and loss of time over a period of years.

During the past 2 years, the figures, showing the additional value of products produced in the electrical field and installed, are definite proof that the curbing of secondary boycott has been good for the industry, good for the worker, and good for the economic health of the country.

The protection of the individual worker against union coercion is giving a new dignity to trade and professional organizations.

The tremendous decrease in jurisdictional strikes, which would again be turned loose if H. R. 2032 is passed, have contributed greatly to the economic health of both workers and industry.

The numerous additional benefits, as well as the great increase in numerical strength that unions have experienced during the past 2 years are convincing reminders that if this condition is changed by the passage of H. R. 2032, economic loss, covering both sides of the labor problem, will again be the order of the day.

There is no known record under the Taft-Hartley Act where unions were either weakened or destroyed.

The many months of hearings which were held prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, and the multitude of instances which occurred, showing the need for some type of sensible control prove that a healthy and progressive improvement in the conduct between management and employees could be and has been achieved.

We submit that the merit of all these features definitely supports our position that H. R. 2032 would be detrimental to the interest of industry and labor and that any modification of the Taft-Hartley Act would be a disservice to our economic structure.

We repeat that during the 2 years of the Taft-Hartley Act operation, new highs in employee earnings and new progressive and constructive service to the public has been achieved. We have had experience with the Wagner Act and we know it is destructive in philosophy, coercive in operation, and useless as a device to promote harmony between management and employees.

With the prosperity of our country and the welfare of our people as our first consideration, we urge the defeat of H. R. 2032.

STATEMENT BY DAVID R. CLARKE, GENERAL COUNSEL, ON BEHALF OF THE NATIONAL METAL TRADES ASSOCIATION

The National Metal Trades Association is an organization of more than 1,000 manufacturers in the metal fabrication industries. It is devoted to employer-employee relations matters exclusively.

We submit that to replace the Taft-Hartley Act with bill H. R. 2032 would be contrary to the best interests of employers, employees, and labor unions alike.

The enactment of H. R. 2032 would mean the substitution of compulsion for freedom, the substitution of coercion and restraint in the place of individual liberty.

Under H. R. 2032—

Compulsory unionism would be legalized through the legalizng of the closed-shop contract, whereby unwilling employees are forced to belong to a labor union or be discharged from their jobs.

Compulsory collective bargaining through the Wagner Act majority rule would be reenacted, whereby unwilling employees are compelled by law to accept the majority labor union as their agent to bargain and sell their services and to handle their grievances with their employer.

Compulsory arbitration would probably be the result of the provisions of the bill, which provides that the public policy of the United States requires that every employer-labor union agreement shall provide for final and binding arbitration regarding disputes growing out of the interpretation and application of the agreement.

Under H. R. 2032—

The provisions of the present law guaranteeing freedom to speech would be repealed.

The provisions of the present law guaranteeing an individual's right to refrain from union membership and union activities would be repealed.

The provisions of the present law guaranteeing an individual's right to freedom from restraint and coercion by labor unions would be repealed.

The provisions of the present law guaranteeing the right of an individual or group to settle grievances directly with their employer would be repealed.

The provisions of the present law excluding foremen and supervisors from its coverage would be repealed. Foremen and supervisors are the representatives of management and should be made free from the requirements of this bill (H. R. 2032) which would treat them as though they are not part of management, but part of the group over whom they exercise management functions.

The provisions of the present law protecting employees, employers, and labor unions from jurisdictional strikes and secondary boycotts would be repealed.

The provisions of the present law to protect employees and labor unions and employers from Communist domination and misuse of labor unions would be repealed.

Under H. R. 2032—

The Federal Conciliation Service would again be placed under control and domination of the Department of Labor, a department which is created and operated as a champion of labor, one of the two sides in any conciliation case.

Under H. R. 2032—

The National Labor Relations Board would be set up as prosecutor, judge and jury, as a court with power to make decisions that for all practical purposes are above review, even by the Supreme Court of the United States, as a court with authority to disregard the established safeguards of rules of evidence that prevail in all the courts of law, as a court with authority to disregard the weight of the evidence in any case and to decide the case according to the least evidence and against the most evidence.

Under H. R. 2032—

Employers would be required to enter into contracts with labor unions binding upon the employer and the breach of which would subject the employer to suits for damages, but which the labor unions would be free to breach without any liability of suits for damages or any other responsibility.

Based upon our knowledge and experience, gained through close contact with more than 1,000 employers in the metal working industries, during the era of the Wagner Act, and, during the era of the Taft-Hartley Act, we respectfully submit—

The enactment of H. R. 2032 will bring unprecedented pressure upon employers by the unrestrained labor union monopolies, and, so, will bring unprecedented dislocation of our industrial economy through the economic struggles that will ensue—and, we respectfully submit—

It is possible to work out a labor-relations law that is fair to all and that is in the public interest, if irrelevant considerations that have nothing to do with good employer-employee relations in America, but only with political expediency of either political party, are sacrificed, in the public interest.

We represent to you that at this time, in the present state of our economy, the interests of employers, employees, and the public, all require that Congress work out a labor relations law that is fair to all.

H. R. 2032 is not such a law.

STATEMENT OF HARRY B. PURCELL, INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS MANAGER, THE TORRINGTON CO., TORRINGTON, CONN.

This statement is submitted for the record at the invitation of Mr. John Lesinski, chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor.

At the outset I wish to enter a strong plea that whatever bill the committee reports out as a substitute for the Taft-Hartley Act that that bill embody principles that will be primarily in the interest of the public, not in that of labor leaders or misguided employers. Because how perfectly that or any other labor law operates, will depend upon how generally we accept the idea that the law must respect the individual rights and liberties of every man; and that all men must stand equal before the law.

If the Committee on Education and Labor in its actions, does give primary consideration to the welfare of the general public, I know of no employer or management representative who would not be completely satisfied; and the overwhelming majority of American people will ever applaud the Eighty-first Congress for having met the test, squarely and successfully, of whether Government is to function, or whether selfish minority pressure groups are to dictate the type of legislation we are to have.

The Committee on Education and Labor must be concerned with the impact its bill will have on the union-management power equation, the effect of Government policy upon the relative strength of these two parties. At the same time, I believe the committee should recognize the fact that in the development of our country's labor policy, we have, by public command, entered the stage of public interest and union responsibility. We should not go backward to the days of the public-be-damned, and union irresponsibility. We should maintain the rules that have been established for both sides.

The Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 imposes on management every duty which was previously imposed by the Wagner Act, and, without taking away any rights from the workers, it gives them new and additional rights and protection.

I further submit that the core of whatever bill is reported out by the Committee on Education and Labor should be in such principles as:

(1) That unions give advance notice before striking;

(2) That Communists as agents of a foreign power, should not control American unions;

(3) That unions honor their contracts;

(4) That union members are entitled to a report on their organization's financial standing;

(5) That enforced membership in a union as a condition of employment is repugnant to free Americans;

(6) That the jurisdictional strike and the secondary boycott are inexcusable wastages and unfair; and,

(7) That work stoppages in industries vital to the public health and welfare are unjust and should be prohibited, or at least delayed until all efforts at peaceful settlements have been exhausted.

From my more than 10 years of active participation in labor relations work, I would say very definitely that these principles are accepted by the public, including most union members.

The hysterical screams of certain labor leaders against the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 are not prompted by any sincere concern those leaders have for the rank-and-file workers, or the general public. And anyone who is familiar with the labor movement knows that the screams of the labor leaders are as empty as they are frenzied. For the labor spokesmen never proved their case against the Taft-Hartley Act. The gap between the charges and the palpable facts was just too great.

My confidence in the essential fairness, good sense, and good will of the American people is great. I sincerely hope that the Committee on Education and Labor believes, as I do, that the American public will oppose any attempt to force a retreat on the principles which I have enumerated above, and which, in my opinion, are the historic core of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947.

STATEMENT OF FRANK C. HUNT, DIRECTOR, INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS DIVISION, BRIDGEPORT-STRATFORD PLANTS, MANNING, MAXWELL & MOORE, INC., BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

My name is Frank C. Hunt; my business address is 11 Elias Street, Bridgeport, Conn.; and I am in charge of the industrial relations activities for a division of Manning, Maxwell & Moore, Inc. This division includes two plants, one at Bridgeport, Conn., and the other at Stratford, Conn. The total work force in both these plants amounts to approximately 1,200 people.

We have always felt that our employees are the company's most important asset and that our personnel policies and practices must give the fullest opportunity for enjoying the self-respect, dignity, and importance to which all of us are entitled, wherever we work. We have long felt that our employees should be free to choose the kind of relationship they wished to enjoy with their fellow workers and with the company.

Approximately 5½ years ago the majority of our employees chose to join a union, and we have negotiated collective-bargaining agreements with local 210 of the United Electrical and Radio Workers Union since that time.

RECORD OF HARMONIOUS RELATIONSHIPS WITH EMPLOYEES

I am glad to state that we have had the good fortune to enjoy friendly and cooperative relationships with our employees, many of whom are skilled craftsmen. During this period of time we have continued to strive toward the goal of an ever better understanding with them. I am glad to say that there has been no strike or any serious interruption of production in that period of time.

I should like to make it clear at this point that we have extended the full hand of cooperation to our union and they in turn have worked with us. It is this mutual willness, the common desire of both labor and management to work together, which I believe is at the core of our present relationship.

As a result of our earnest effort toward fair dealing, we have so far been successful in settling our own problems, and have not found it necessary to appear before the NLRB either under the Wagner Act or more recently under the Labor Relations Act, or have we ever appealed to the courts.

All of this is good. It serves the best interests of our employees, of the company, of our stockholders and, equally important, has made it possible for us to put more and better goods at lower prices into the hands of more and more people.

Of course, gentlemen, you realize that I do not speak for any local union, nor would I presume to speak for any union of any kind, but I believe the facts bear out my statement. In every State in the Nation there are hundreds, if not thousands, of medium-sized and small plants.

In the Bridgeport area, and the Detroit area, and around Wheeling, W. Va., and Kansas City, Mo., there are thousands of these small plants, and it is from these modest beginnings that come the fine, strong companies that make American industry what it is, and give to this Nation an unsurpassed standard of living.

Also, we must remember that in every industrial locality new companies come to life every year. Some fail, it is true, but others go on to be fine, stable organizations. In the Bridgeport area in 1948, 38 new corporations started business. Now, it is true some of these corporations employed only two or three people, but if we look back through our industrial history we will probably find that Mr. Edison or Mr. Ford first employed only two or three people. In all the other areas there are other new companies being formed and, gentlemen, all of them, employer and employee alike, are asking for only one thing—a fair and just Labor-Management Relations Act impartially administered.

Many of these plants have local unions, and in the great majority of cases industrial relations are excellent. The union and the management both try to be just and fair in their dealings with the employees and with each other.

The millions of people that work in the thousands of small and medium-sized plants are a great segment of the public. This great group want steady employment and fair pay, and I believe their best protection is a fair and just Labor-Management Relations Act. The basic principle of industrial peace is most important.

There are millions of people in these plants. These people believe in the fundamental rights of the individual. They believe that a bargain is a bargain and must be lived up to. They believe that a contract is a contract and the terms of the contract should be enforced. They believe that the foreman in the shop is really the boss and they hope some day to be the boss themselves and, perhaps, even own a shop of their own.

Let it be understood that I represent no group of any kind, either manufacturing, chamber of commerce, or any other organization, I speak here of my own beliefs, and I believe this belief is founded on fact.

The country has before it a very vital question of the civil-rights measure that has been proposed by President Truman. It would appear to the average layman that a civil-rights program would be designed to insure freedom in education, in religion, in politics, and many other ways; all of this regardless of race, creed, or color. Also, it has no doubt occurred to many laymen why any civil-rights program should not also include the freedom to work at your trade and earn a living, regardless of any restrictions. How can we preach civil rights for all on one hand and then insist the man must join any type of an organization to earn a living; isn't his right to earn a living a civil right?

There is no need for any type of compulsion in labor unions. There is a far better way. The unions of today are strong financially; far stronger in every way than many of the medium-sized or small plants throughout the country, or any combination of them. Let the union leadership in the locals be of that caliber that would make the employee glad to join, and the employer glad to have able men to deal with, and the union needs no compulsory membership of any kind. People will flock to join the union. That is the better way.

BARGAINING

To reach an agreement we suppose that there was some kind of a bargain, therefore, we can take it for granted that when Mr. Edison hired his first helper there was an agreement as to wages and, therefore, a bargain, and both Mr. Edison and his helper acted in good faith and so carried on their work.

Now, in all the small and medium-sized plants throughout the country, whether there be unions in them or not, I believe it is the intent of the employer to bargain with his men in good faith, and I believe the local unions, in the vast majority of cases, want to bargain in good faith. Sure, we all know the companies get tough or the unions get tough. Sometimes they feel they have to, and sometimes they might really have to. The point I believe is important is that these smaller groups sit down and really and truly believe in the principles of bargaining in good faith on both sides of the table. It is my belief that the issue before the law in this matter of requiring both sides to bargain in good faith is essential. All the world over a contract is a contract and should be enforcable before the law. This is a cornerstone of proper relationship between any two parties.

I would like to quote here from a statement that President Truman made in opening the Labor-Management Conference in 1945:

"We shall have to find methods not only of peaceful negotiations of labor contracts, but also of insuring industrial peace for the lifetime of such contracts. Contracts once made must be lived up to and should be changed only in the manner agreed upon by the parties. If we expect confidence in agreements made, there must be responsibility and integrity on both sides in carrying them out."

It is my very earnest belief that here is another basic principle that will go a long way toward keeping that industrial peace that never makes the headlines.

The United States Mediation Service can only best serve all the people all the time by having the absolute confidence of the public and of labor and management. This administrative body should be independent from any suggestion or persuasion. We should take a long range view of this service and look ahead to the time when through the justice and ability displayed by this agency we will have reached the status, in the eyes of our people, comparable to the integrity of the Supreme Court of the United States.

It has always been one of my firm beliefs that the first obligation of management to its employees is to so manage a business that it will make a profit. It is obvious that only a profitable company can pay good wages, have good working conditions, and attract the type of employee that the union is glad to have for a member, and the employer is glad to have in his plant.

You gentlemen can probably find, each in your own district, a situation that looked hopeful, but through mismanagement something went wrong so there simply was no jobs. This is wrong; it hurts the public, it hurts labor, and it hurts the managers who put their money into the enterprise.

To manage an operation and make the profit necessary, management must be allowed to manage, and in the management setup of today the foreman is perhaps the most important of all.

Any type of unionization of supervision would appear to be disastrous for the small and medium-sized companies. In the large companies there may be thousands of foremen, but in the type of companies I am talking about there may be 2 or perhaps 40 or 50. They are management's men. They must see to it that the departments they operate are operated at a profit. These management men must be fair, they must be just, they must know their business, but they must help the company in its endeavor to be a good, strong company that can afford to improve working conditions, can afford to expand and make more jobs, and can continue to give the public a good or a better article at the same or a lower price. In the medium-sized companies these men know almost from day to day many of the over-all problems; they are really and truly management.

Gentlemen, the basic principles that I have enumerated to you, I believe, are absolutely necessary for the peaceful industrial life of the hundreds and thousands of small and medium-sized companies throughout the land, and once more I believe that these principles are, as of today, practiced in the day to day dealings between labor and management which is the reason that we have industrial peace in the hundreds of thousands of these plants.

OAKLAND, CALIF., February 4, 1949.

Hon. JOHN LESINSKI,
Chairman, House Committee on Education and Labor,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Request this be read to full committee and made of record. Passage of the Taft-Hartley Act was demanded by the general public to correct the abuses of irresponsible labor elements. It has accomplished that objective. Your committee should hold unlimited hearing if necessary and demand proof of necessity from any proponents of changes. Failure to do so would constitute a grave offense against the public welfare and unwarranted favoritism toward a minority.

L. W. WATSON,
2999 Glascock Street, Oakland, Calif.

AIRLITE LAUNDRY, INC.,
Philadelphia, Pa., April 5, 1949.

The Honorable JOHN LESINSKI, M. C.,
Chairman, Committee on Education and Labor,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Reference: Your letter of March 17, 1949.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LESINSKI: I wish to express my appreciation to the Committee on Education and Labor of the House of Representatives and to you for the priviledge extended me in permitting me to express my views on bills H. R. 2032 and H. R. 2033. While I do believe it would have been easier to present my views in person in a round-table discussion, I can readily appreciate the heavy demands upon the committee's time due to the tremendous impact this contemplated legislation will have on business people, both large and small, upon invested capital, upon labor, and through its accumulative effect, upon the national economy as a whole.

As I read your letter I can't help but be forcibly struck by the meaning of your sentences "* * * the subcommittee requests you file a written statetment which will be placed on record. Consideration will be given your views by members of the subcommittee." Under what system of government other than ours could a little person be heard by his duly elected legislative body with the patience and respect implied in your letter?

Certainly this is a shining example of a government recognizing the rights and dignity of its individuals. Whether my views are helpful or not in assisting the subcommittee in formulating wise and just legislation in the field of labor-management relations, remains to be seen, but I value most highly my right to be heard.

At this point, I wish to emphasize that the views I shall present herein are entirely my own and are not those of any group of laundries, local, State, or national trade associations. They are based solely upon my personal background, training, and education, and upon my present problem of bringing a business which had been badly mismanaged and milked from one of a very precarious financial position to one of financial health.

The two phases of my discussion will cover: (1) Labor-management relations and (2) a legislated minimum wage.

1. Labor-management relations: For the past 16 years, our country has been undergoing a very important phase of growth of our labor-management relationship. Labor, fighting an uphill battle for many decades has finally won its rightful recognition on the same plane with invested capital and management. Slowly—even to many die-hard reactionaries—but surely has come the universal recognition that we all play on the same team—invested capital, the line; management, the quarterback; and labor, the ball carriers. Teamwork, and teamwork alone will give us a winning combination—not continual bickering and strife.

In any social evolution for betterment, frequently the pendulum has a tendency to swing from one extreme to another, and it takes a while before it strikes a happy medium. Formerly it was too far on the side of capital and management; now it has swung slightly too far toward labor. Ultimately, whether it be now or in the future, it will hit a state of equilibrium, at which time our economy will reach a better state of stabilization, which is the basic goal of government, labor, business, and Mr. Average Citizen.

Unfortunately the divergent views built up over many years between management and labor, failing to accept their universal partnership under our present economic order, has now been extended into our national political life. For example, an article covering hearings similar to yours which were held before the Senate Labor Committee, reported the Honorable James A. Murray, United States Senator accused Mr. Gerald D. Reilly of double-crossing labor by assisting in formulating the Taft-Hartley Act. (Philadelphia Inquirer of February 5, 1949)

Only too frequently now do we read or hear of a similar implied indebtedness due labor or management for its campaign endorsement of a dully elected legislator. Certainly this is an unfortunate assumption—though commonly held by many—as I sincerely believe any man who is of the caliber to be seated as a Member of our Congress or Senate, certainly creates, sponsors, and supports legislation according to the dictates of his conscience, to the best of his ability, and for the best interests of the country as a whole—not for any group or special interests.

Because labor in its first real entry into the political arena largely backed the successful party, and because of the magnificent fight waged by our President, labor has been somewhat prone to identify the Democratic Party as its own. If this thought becomes more universally accepted, it is conceivable that it could become more nearly an actuality, in which event, as the success of each of our two major political parties ebbs and flows, so will legislation affecting labor-management relations. Therefore, I recommend a bipartisan policy be adopted in this field, similar to that being followed in the field of foreign affairs to create permanent and just legislation which will lead to industrial peace.

The basis for any such peace must be fair play and a code of ethics recognizing everyone's rights. The very essence of a contractual relationship is one of dual responsibility—not that of a unilateral position. Therefore, I propose that union organizations be subjected to the same rules of existence that any other nonprofit organization is. With their growth and gains in public acceptance, comes their obligation to accept responsibility. This means corporate organization, financial responsibility, and accounting of income and disbursements to the Government, their entire membership, and the general public.

Finally, I believe that this subject is so vital to the future economic welfare of our country, that legislation in this field should not be recommended to the Congress to meet any given time schedule, or satisfy any executive directive. This is entirely a function of the legislative branch of our Government. It should be developed slowly, carefully, deliberately—with the thought in mind that it will be practical, positive, and workable; that it will stand the test of time; and that regardless on whose toes it may tread, it shall be for the best interests of the industrial peace of our country.

2. A national minimum wage: As our economic life is composed of so many thousands of types of businesses, and as living and working conditions vary so widely throughout the country, no one can fully appreciate the effect of a national minimum wage on each type of business and on each geographical section. This is a matter requiring a great deal of study, research, and thorough investigation by sections, by industries, and by sections within industries. However there are certain generalizations which I shall set forth, and then I shall show its inevitable effect upon the AirLite Laundry, Inc., which company I operate.

The laws governing our present economic system, that known as the individual, cooperative exchange system—and certainly no one in his right mind would trade it for any other existing in the world today—are as true as any law of physics or chemistry. Any attempt to manipulate them artificially can only produce distorted and undesired results.

Despite the fact we are enjoying the highest prosperity in our history, for many of us, the depression of the 1930's is still a vivid nightmare. Our Government is constantly on the alert and doing everything in its power to smooth out the hills and valleys of the business cycle. Yet we can't close our eyes to the fact that the business cycle has been and always will be a part of our economic life. The beginning of each phase has its inception in the preceding stage, and it is such a logical and natural phenomenon, that everyone is powerless to prevent it. In enacting a national minimum-wage law during a high point in the cycle, we may feel we are helping to level it out; yet we are only deceiving ourselves. While in many industries, wage rates are higher than this proposed minimum, at least during these boom times, still they are not as high in many others, particularly in the service industries where labor constitutes such a high percentage of the selling price. The fact that so many may be adversely effected, may have a reverse effect from what was intended, and thus precipitate an earlier turn in the business cycle by the creation of unemployment due to pricing a commodity or service out of the market.

Furthermore, assuming for the sake of an argument, it should have no effect upon wages or any business today, what assurance is there of industry being able to provide 40 hours of work at this or any other wage rate? How will a national minimum wage prevent a continued operation of the business cycle? When we are in the lower phase of a business cycle such as the early 1930's, how will business be able to start up? Will a national minimum wage of 75 cents or any other amount facilitate or impede recovery at this time?

Labor is and always will be a commodity, subject to the laws of supply and demand, despite how much we may not like to recognize this fact. Before universal unionization, it was more at the mercy of the buyer, but with the general acceptance of the principal of collective bargaining, this position has improved immensely. Certainly today our responsible labor leaders are unquestionably highly skilled negotiators, and invariably are able to obtain the highest possible rates of pay the traffic will bear without pricing their particular industry out of the market. This fact in itself suggests the solution to the whole problem of wage rates. With widely divergent circumstances existing in each industry and in each locality, and due to the fact that labor contracts are generally of a limited duration so that they will be negotiated in all phases of a business cycle, certainly there is far more flexibility inherent in arriving at a wage rate over a bargaining table than through a fixed national legislative rate.

Approaching it from another angle, supposing in a given industry, there was an average raise of $10 per employee. Two and one-half dollars of this $10 raise would immediately go into Federal income tax, so that exclusive of OAB, unemployment, city or State wage tax, etc., his greatest increased take-home pay would be $7.50. However, $10 per employee would have to be injected into costs which will either (1) reduce profits, (2) create or increase a loss, (3) result in an increased price structure, or (4) which may result in an unfortunate loss of volume. If this increase were general in all industries, or at least in many, most costs would increase progressively, so that percentagewise, the real buying power of labor would tend to be reduced, thereby sowing the seed for the next phase of the business cycle.

The pay structure of Airlite Laundry, Inc., is as follows:

Type of personnel	Hourly rate	Average hours worked per week, last 6 months
Entire plant	$1.13	37
Shirt girls [1] (inside)	.95	37
Other inside plant	.75	37
5 key employees (inside)	1.57	48
Office personnel	.93	40
Driver-salesmen [2]	1.34	40

[1] Piece-work basis.
[2] Salary and commission basis.

Our Union Contract has a 61-cent base rate. Should the 75-cent minimum wage be enacted, we shall be obliged to have a general increase of at least 14 cents per hour across the board because (1) individual differences in ability, skill, and length of service must be recognized, and (2) the union will of necessity and fairness require that if raises are accorded one group of employees, it shall be given to all. Actually, however, it is almost a certainty that this 75 cents would be used as a floor from which the union would be forced to up its minimum base, because it must have something more to sell its membership than that which the Government was able to obtain for them through the proposed national minimum-wage law.

Assuming no raises were given our drivers, key employees, or office personnel, I calculate the wage raise caused by this legislation would amount to 10 percent of our pay roll—namely about $12,000 per annum, which is nearly 6 percent of our gross sales. With an operating profit of $4,500 in 1947 and an operating loss of over $8,000 in 1948, to absorb this $12,000 without an upward revision of our price structure is, of course, an arithmetical impossibility. Mind you, this increase in pay roll has excluded many classes of employees, but practically whether this can be done or not without destroying the morale of our organization, is highly speculative and probably impractical.

This leaves no alternative but to raise our retail selling price. In a service business such as laundry, this is not quite as simple as it sounds. Since November 1946 when OPA was removed, we have been forced to effect five price increases. Without exception each time our poundage dropped in greater proportion than our increased price was able to hold up our dollar volume, so we have shown a steady decline in receipts as well as tonnage. Therefore, despite increasing wage rates, the total hours worked per week have been reduced from an average of 44 hours to 37. Thus the dollar take-home pay of our employees has remained relatively constant.

Of every $1 our customer pays for her laundry service, 63 cents is paid for labor of our organization. With this high percentage of labor costs, obviously any marked increase in wages will cause a rapidly higher increase in price, and coming at this time will create dangerous customer resistance. While I calculated only 10-percent increase for our minimum personnel so affected, practically we would have to extend this coverage to all. As our supply costs would also reflect this legislation, in my opinion, it would require at least a 15-percent general raise in our prices to safely carry Airlite through.

In our former price raises for a few weeks, the average sales price of our bundles would rise, but within 6 to 8 weeks, it would return to its original average, indicating again that a woman has just so much to spend for laundry service and come what may, she can not and will not spend more.

While I am violently opposed to any sweat-shop labor, and despite the fact that the pay rate of Airlite's employees are in the lower brackets, still we offer stable employment to all our people—52 weeks out of the year, which is something mighty few other businesses can do. In the long run the annual pay of our employees is quite comparable to and in many cases better than industries which pay a higher hourly wage rate.

As I indicated before, I am seriously concerned about pricing Airlite out of a very substantial percentage of our market—so much so that at this time when our volume is off 8 percent over the last 4 months, I believe we would fall far below our "break even" point, sufficiently to jeopardize our already critically weak cash position. Frankly, I am seriously afraid that the impact of this legislation would drive Airlite out of business.

In the final analysis, laundry is a luxuary item which people can do without by doing it in their home. Pecularily enough, Airlite laundry's competition are its own customers. It's a basic economic principal that if a business doesn't have sufficient economic utility to sell its product at a fair price, it will die and the moneys it would have received will be diverted to more efficient industries and to those which contribute more to the economic well being of the community. However our business is the exception which proves this rule. For example we might expect a large portion of our $260,000 income to buy washing machines, thereby stimulating sales and employment in that field—but almost every customer we serve either has a washer or has access to one. As they are truly marginal workers, many of our employees, if we fail, would gravitate toward domestic work or laundresses.

In this case our employee would then pay no unemployment tax, social-security tax, income tax, or city wage tax; each would work for wages for the housewife depending on how badly she needed the work, and for just what the traffic would bear; and who, in the case of similar laundry failures to our, would find herself in heavy competition for domestic work, thereby driving the wage rate of this class of worker down. In short, inasmuch as our real competitor, the housewife, is exempt from the national minimum-wage rate and from the attendant costs of hiring labor, I believe that the laundry business should also be exempt, at least until such time as the housewife is brought under this coverage.

Airlite's taxes collected by city, State, and Federal governments, both hidden and direct, were in excess of $10,000 in 1947 and $7,500 in 1948. This is exclusive of the personal income taxes paid by the employees of the corporation. Should Airlite be forced from business, this would represent a rather substantial tax loss to our governments.

While I am speaking only for Airlite Laundry, Inc., I am certain nearly every other laundry will be in a comparable position. Therefore I sincerely believe that by multiplying Airlite out several thousands of times, it is highly imperative that the laundry business be completely exempted from any national minimum wage, should such a law be enacted.

Most respectfully yours,

ARTHUR J. THORNER, JR.
